Fuit hic Chriſtiano Cultui deditus; quare non mirandum, ſi eum Marcellinus noſter acerbius perſtrinxit; cui uxor Ariſtanote fuit, Mulier ob Pietatem Eximiam celebranda; eundem Helpidium proſcripſit Libanius in orat. adverſus Polyclem. Valeſius in Loc.

Takes care to ſecure Africk.

109. In the mean time Julian departing from the Rauraci, ſent Salluſt, whom he had advanced to the Dignity of Præfect, into Gall; and he ordered Germanianus to diſcharge the Office of Nebridius. Moreover, ſuſpecting Gnomarius, as an old Traytor, who had formerly betrayed Veteranio, his Princely Maſter, he promoted Nevita to be Magiſter Armorum, and Jovius to the Quæſtorſhip; Mamertinus he made his Magiſter Largitionum, and Dagalaiphus, his Comes Domeſticorum, and on others he beſtowed Places, as he ſaw convenient. Being now to paſs through the Martian Woods, and near the Banks of Iſter, amongſt other things he was afraid, leſt for his ſmall Numbers he ſhould be contemptible, and therefore took this Courſe: He diſtributed his Army into ſeveral Parties; ſending ſome with Jovinus and Jovius by the Common Roades of Italy, and others, under Conduct of Nevita, through the middle of Rhætia, that being ſo ſpred, they might ſeem more numerous, and ſtrike a greater Terror: a Courſe practiſed by Alexander the Great, and other skilful and famous Captains. But he gave them ſeriouſly in Charge to be very cautious in their March; and by Night to look well to their Watches, leſt they ſhould be ſurprized by the Enemy. And he himſelf paſſing the Iſter, and taking another Courſe, upon Rumours ſpred abroad of theſe ſeveral Armies; all Illyricum was poſſeſſed with a Belief, that he was at hand, with all the Kings, and Nations of Gall, being elevated by his many Succeſſes in thoſe Provinces. Whereupon Taurus, the Præfectus Prætorio, got him away betimes, and by the Uſe of the Curſus Publicus, paſſing with Speed the Julian Alps, took along with him Florentius, his Brother-Præfect. But Lucillianus, who then commanded the Army in theſe Quarters, lying at Sirmium, upon Report of Julian's coming, was reſolved to get his Men together, and make Head againſt him. He apprehenſive hereof, made all the haſte he could, and coming by Julian makes his great Officers.

His Stratagem in his March.

The Effects thereof.

Boat to Bononia, a Place diſtant nineteen Miles from Sirmium, diſpatched away Dagalaiphus with a choiſe Party of men in the Night (which now was dark, the Moon being in her laſt Quarter) with Orders to bring him away to him by Force, if he made Reſiſtance. Being ſurprized in Bed by a Company of Strangers, upon Mention made of Julian, as Emperour, he conceived what they meant, and ſubmitted to them, though very unwillingly; and then being ſet on an Horſe that came next to Hand, but juſt before ſwelling with the Dignity and Command of Magiſter Militum, was preſented to Julian, as ſome mean Priſoner, being ſcarcely able to recollect himſelf in ſo great a Surprize and Terror. But when he ſaw the Purple offered him to kiſs, he took Heart, and giving him the Title of Emperour, told him, he was not well adviſed, with ſo ſmall Forces to truſt himſelf in ſtrange Countries; to which the Uſurper replied bitterly, that he ſhould keep this prudent Advice for Conſtantius; being admitted to this Favour of the Purple, not as a Councellor, but that he might be put out of his Fear.

He comes to Sirmium, having ſurprized Lucillianus, who Commanded the Forces there.

110. But he was ſo far apprehenſive, as to underſtand there was great Need of uſing Speed in what he was about, the better to ſupply the other Diſadvantage; and away he haſted to Sirmium, to which as he approached, multitude of all Sorts came out, as well Souldiers as others, to receive him; and with Lights, Flowers, Lucky Acclamations, and the Titles of Auguſtus and Lord, brought him to the Palace. He was much encouraged with ſo proſperous a Beginning, as that which promiſed greater things; and hoped, that moved by the Example of this ſo populous and famous a City, the reſt would be induced to ſubmit. The day following he pleaſed the People by the Curule-Games; and on the third, being impatient of further Delay, he took in Succi, a Place famous for its Situation betwixt the Mountains Hæmus and Rhodope, whereof the one riſeth from the Banks of Iſter, and the other from the hithermoſt ſide of the River Axius. Having placed Nevita Governour here, he returned to Neſſus, a Town of good Note, there to take further Order for his Affairs. Having met at Sirmium with one Victor, an eminent Hiſtoriographer, he prefered him to be Conſularis of Pannonia Secunda, and honoured him, for his Learning and Sobriety, with a Statue of Braſs; who, a good while after, roſe to be Præfect of the City. Now bearing himſelf more high than ever, and concluing that Conſtantius would never be brought to any agreement, he wrote to the Senate, a bitter invective againſt him, wherein he ripped up his Faults, and laboured to bring him in Diſgrace with that ſort of men. And now he took Confidence further to fall foul upon the Memory of Conſtantine, his Uncle, whom, like a Pagan, he traduced as an Innovator and Diſturber of the ancient Laws and Cuſtoms. He openly accuſed him, as being the firſt that preferred Barbarians to the Dignity of the Conſulſhip. But of this he accuſed him (Ammianus, though his good Friend, tells us) both abſurdly, and without Conſideration. For whereas he ſhould have himſelf ſhunned what he reprehended in others; within a little while he advanced to be Conſul, one Mamertinus, neither in reſpect of his Life, Splendor, Experience, nor Fame comparable to any, whom Conſtantine had graced with that moſt eminent Magiſtracy; but on the contrary a man ſhallow, a Clown, and (what was leaſt to be borne) cruel in his Office.

Falls foul upon Conſtantius, and the Memory of his Uncle.

Inſulsè nimirum, & leviter.

Nec Vita, nec Splendore, nec Uſu, nec Gloria horum cujuſquam ſimilem, quibus Magiſtratum detulerat ampliſſimum Conſtantinus; contra &c.

111. While he pleas'd himſelf in driving on his Deſigns after this ſort, he received a Meſſage, which a little interrupted the Contentment he took, in the Conſideration of his own Wiſdom, and other Endowments. Two of Conſtantius his Legions, and a Cohort of Archers, which he found at Sirmium, he had ſent away for Gall, under pretenſe of publick Neceſſity, but indeed becauſe he could not truſt them. Theſe marching ſlowly, and being utterly out of Humour, upon thoughts of the great way they had to march, and the Fierceneſs of the Germans, to which they muſt be expoſed, fell to mutiny, at the Inſtigation of one Nigrinus, a Tribune of Horſe, and born in Meſopotamia; and yet they carried the matter very cloſe, till they came to Aquileia; but there ſhewed their Inclinations, ſeizing on that City, which for it's Situation, Wealth, and the Strength of it's Walls was very conſiderable; and the Inhabitants, to whom the Name of Conſtantius was very grateful, readily aſſiſted them, ſo that they fortified the Place all the wayes they could, and prepared for Reſiſtance of any Violence which ſhould be offered them; further exciting the Provincials of Italy, to follow their Example in ſtanding up for their Emperour as not yet dead, though his Kinſman had made bold already with his Shooes. Julian ſtill lying at Neſſus, having not in the leaſt feared any Enemy at his Back, and hearing this City to have been often attacqued, but never demoliſhed, nor ſo much as yielded, was reſolved to omit nothing of Fraud or Flattery, to draw

Two Legions and a Cohort of Archers ſeize on Aquileia.

In the Name of Conſtantius.

Ut Superſtitis.

draw it over to him, before any greater Miſchief ſhould follow. Therefore he ordered Jovinus, the Magiſter Equitum, who over the Alps was come into Noricum, to return with all Speed thither; and that there might be a ſufficient Supply of men, he commanded all the Troops that came that way, in their March Eaſtward, there to be ſtopped. Not long after it was, that he received the welcome News of Conſtantius his Death, and thereupon paſſing through Thrace, he removed to Conſtantinople; and being often told, that what had hapned at Aquileia, was not much now to be fear'd; he removed Jovinus from that Service, to another, he thought more proper; and ordered Immo with other Captains to perform it in his Room. Now was Siege laid to Aquileia, which it was in Council reſolv'd ſhould firſt be ſummoned, but the Garriſon was too obſtinate to be won with fair Words, or Threats either. Hereupon they endeavoured to undermine the Wall, and vigorouſly attacqued the City; but at this firſt Onſet were beaten off, and foiled. This not Succeeding, and there being none found skilful enough to manage Rams, or other Engines of Battery, they betook themſelves to this Device, of planting wooden Turrets upon Boats, joyned together, which lay on the River Natiſo, running by the City, which being higher than the Fortifications of the Town, they hoped that thence with their miſſile Weapons, they ſhould do great Execution; and beſides the Men they placed on the Top, others they beſtowed within the Body of theſe Towers; who Iſſuing forth, as they ſaw Occaſion, by the Bridges they made for this Purpoſe, might eaſily Land, and while the Defendants were diverted by them above, attacque and ſcale the Walls; but the Device, though comparable to thoſe of the Ancients, in the Opinion of Ammianus, could not take any Effect, by Reaſon that the Beſieged ſo plied theſe Turrets with Fire and Combuſtible Matter, that they diſabled the Engines, killed thoſe that ſtood on the Top of them, for the moſt Part, and cauſed the other below to ſhift for themſelves; but moſt Periſhed by the great Stones caſt upon them.

Which Julian his men beſiege.

112. This done, they gave themſelves to reſt on both ſides, for ſome time; but afterwards, though the Beſiegers had moſt Reaſon to be diſcouraged, yet renewed they the Aſſault. Some made their Approaches with their Targets on their Heads, others carried ſcaling Ladders on their Shoulders, and haſted to come to the Walls; which e're they could do, many of them miſcarried in the Showers of Arrows that flew from the Town. Some laboured to break in Pieces the Iron Hinges of the Gates, and were either ſcalded by burning Pich, or knocked on the head with Stones; and others, endeavouring to paſs the Trenches, were killed, or wounded by ſuch as ſallied out through the Poſterns, to whom the Line drawn before the Walls, gave good Convenience, both for lying in Ambuſh, and ſafe Retreat. Though the Defendants excelled them in the Arts of War; yet did the Beſiegers, who were men choſen out of many Companies for this Purpoſe, fret exceedingly, that they ſhould be ſo long about their Work; and often coaſted the Town, to ſee if any Force or Device would prevail. But at length they were convinced, that the Difficulties were ſuch, as they were not able to overcome, and therefore they began to ſlacken their Siege, and waſt the adjacent Countrey. Yet they thought they might, by want of Water, bring them to ſuch Extremity as to force them to yield. And for that Purpoſe they firſt cut all the Aquæducts that ſerved the City, which not having that Effect they imagined, by great Labour they drew the River away from the Walls, though ſtill to little Purpoſe; for they within contented themſelves with the Water they found in Wells, and lived very ſparingly, as reſolv'd to hold out. And ſo long they held, till Agilo, the Magiſter Peditum, was ſent by Julian from Conſtantinople to acquaint them with the Death of Conſtantius. At firſt they would not believe, but rejected him with reproachful Words; but upon Promiſe of Safety, being alone permitted to approach the City; he ſo far ſatisfied them, that they opened their Gates, came out, and received him; and purging themſelves, laid all the Blame upon Nigrinus, whom with a few others they delivered up; deſiring that by the Puniſhment of them, might be expiated the Crime of High Treaſon. A few dayes after by Mamertinus, the Præfectus Prætorio, who ſate as Judge, Nigrinus, as the Author of this War, was ſentenced to be burnt alive; which was executed upon him for his Gallant Fidelity to his Prince, which they called Treaſon againſt him he couted an Uſurper. After him Romulus and Sabeſtius, two Curiales, or Decuriones, of the Town, were for having been great Actors againſt Julian's Party, put alſo to Death; and all the reſt were pardoned; for ſo Ammianus tells you, it pleaſed the mild and gentle Emperour to ordain in Æquity, in their Behalf, whom Neceſſity, and not any Deſign, had thruſt forward into the Danger. But it ſeems he would not truſt Nigrinus, nor have any Reſpect to his Fidelity and Conſtancy, although gal-

Where they find notable Oppoſition.

The Defendants holding out, till ſatisfied that Conſtantius was dead.

gallant Princes have been wont to admire and love thoſe whom they found faithful to their Maſters, to whom they were bound by the Ties, either of an Oath, or Conſcience; and when once advanced into the Place of the deceaſed, have found themſelves obliged, rather to deſpiſe thoſe, who formerly neglected the ſetting Sun, and adored the Riſing, becauſe now the Caſe was altered, and become their own.

Julian in great Fear of himſelf.

How he laboured to ſecure his Intereſt.

Injuſtè plures muneribus publicis adnectebat.

Qui nuper ut primum augendæ Barbaricæ Vilitatis Auctorem immoderatè notaverat Conſtantinum.

Conſtantius manageth his Matters in Meſopotamia as prudently as they would bear.

113. But theſe things happened ſome time after. We muſt ſee the Setting of Conſtantius, and the Mounting of Julian, who ſeemed but a Meteor, in that he aroſe before the other was down; and after he had alone appeared in another Colour, again ſuddenly vaniſhed. While Julian ſtill lay at Neſſus, he was extremely perplexed wirh various Cares and Fears. He expected to hear, that the Gariſon in Aquileia had broken forth, and drawn the Provinces of the Julian Alps from their Obedience to him. He alſo ſtood much in fear of the Eaſtern Armies, being told, that the Forces diſperſed through Thrace, to give him a Stop, were drawing down under Command of Narcotianus, a Comes, towards the Streights of Succi. To obviate theſe Difficulties, he gathered together the Army of Illyricum, which was well-Diſciplin'd, and heartened by Succeſs; and to gain the Affections of the People, refuſed not to receive the Complaints of Private Perſons, ſpending ſome time in Hearing their Cauſes; but eſpecially he endeavoured to purchaſe the Favour of the Corporations, and that Unjuſtly, by Condemning many Perſons to Publick Services there. Two Senators of good Note he much courted, viz. Symmachus and Maximus, who were lately returned from a Meſſage they were ſent on to Conſtantius, and paſſing by the better, he promoted the latter to be Præfectus Prætorio of Rome, in the place of Tertullus, and that for the ſake of Rufinus Vulcatius, whoſe Siſter's Son he was: And he ordered his Affairs ſo well, in reference to Proviſions, that the People, which was wont to be very Tumultuous, made little or no ſtir during his Government. Further to Secure the Fidelity of thoſe who now pretended Fair to him, he deſigned Conſuls Mamertinus, the Præfectus Prætorio of Illyricum, and Nevita, who had lately wonderfully pleas'd him, by Railing upon Conſtantine, as the firſt Prince that had Promoted Barbarians. While thus betwixt Hope and Fear he Ordered his Matters as well as he could at Neſſus, Conſtantius, ſtill lying at Edeſſa, was often Diſturbed by the Reports which his Scouts brought to him, and thereupon was very doubtful what to do, whether to Fight the Perſians, as he could light on them, upon occaſion, or with double Force Attacque Bezabde. And though his Inclinations were to move Weſtward, yet it troubled him to think of leaving Meſopotamia Expoſed to the Violence of the Enemy. For the Perſian King hover'd beyond Tigris, which, if he paſſed, and found none to Reſiſt him, he might eaſily croſs Euphrates alſo, and do further Miſchief to the Adjacent Provinces. However, Conſtantius, purpoſing to preſerve his Army as intire as he could, for a Civil War, was Reſolved not to make Havock of his Men by thruſting them upon Deſtruction in Attacquing the Perſian Gariſons, which he found by Experience to be ſtrongly Fortified; but, leſt he ſhould be blamed for Negligence or Cowardiſe, he gave order to Arbetio, Agilo, and other Officers of Horſe, to Fortifie, as well as they could, the Banks of Tigris, and, obſerving the King's Motions, to retire *, in caſe he ſhould venture over. They received Intelligence by their Spies and ſome Fugitives, but ſuch as was altogether Repugnant to it ſelf, and contradictory: for the Perſians, of all men, kept their Councils the moſt ſecret, which were communicated to none, but ſome of the moſt cloſe and Truſty among their Nobility; and of Divulging any thing they were ſo cautious, that they Worſhipped Silence as a Deity. For this, or other Reaſons, the Officers ordered to the Borders were ſo Diſtruſtful of themſelves, that they often ſent for the Emperour, Proteſting that with all the Force they could make, if the King ſhould come, they could not be able to make Head againſt him.

Id Concilium Conſtantii laudat Libanius in Βασιλικῷ aſſentans Conſtantio; ſed in orat. Funebri Juliani, valde illud idem reprehendit. ut Notat Valeſius in Locum.

Receives the News of Julian's Practices in Italy, and other Weſtern Countries.

114. Though of the Perſian King nothing could certainly be known out of the Eaſt, yet from the Weſt now came News certain enough, that Julian had over-run Italy and Illyricum; and having Secured the Streights of Succi, there ſtaid for the meeting of greater Forces, wherewith he was reſolved to Invade Thrace. Hereat Conſtantius was very Melancholick, and his Grief would only admit of Eaſe from this Conſideration, that he had ever been Happy in ſuppreſſing Uſurpers. He thought it the ſafeſt Courſe, by degrees to ſend away the Souldiers in the Publick Carriages, that they might be ready to make timely Reſiſtance; for which as he was preparing, word was brought the next morning, that the Perſian King, for certain, was returned Home; upon which good News, he took all away, but ſuch as of courſe were left to the Defence of Meſopotamia, and departed to Hierapolis. Here, conſider-

Sect. 4.

A. D. 361.

dering the Danger he was to undergo, he cauſed all his Army to draw up in the Camp; and to animate them, from a lofty Tribunal, with a ſerene and pleaſant Countenance, made a Speech to them. He told them, “That being ever ſolicitous to carry himſelf, both in Word and Deed as comported with Honeſty, and as a prudent Pilot, having Steered, according as he found the Wind and Weather to require; he was now conſtrain'd to confeſs ſome Errors before them, or rather accuſe himſelf, as guilty of too much Humanity, which he thought would have conduced to the publick Good. He advanced Gallus, his Couſin-German to the Dignity of Cæſar, and ſent him to the Defence of the Eaſt, at ſuch time as Magnentius had made Diſturbance in the Weſtern Parts, whom their Valour at length ſuppreſſed; but he (Gallus) declining from all the Tracts of Juſtice and Moderation, committed many Enormities no way fit to be related, and had received ſuch Puniſhment as he had deſerved. And he wiſh'd, that his Miſfortune would therewith have ſatisfied it ſelf; but now had followed a Miſchief greater than all that was paſt. For Julian, whom he had appointed to Watch for the Defence of Gall, againſt the Invaſions of the Germans, while he himſelf was imbroil'd in the Motions of the Nations bordering upon Illyricum, madly puffed up by the Succeſs of ſome ſlight Engagements with an half-naked Enemy, having cajoled an inconſiderable Number of men, fierce, and deſperate for any pernicious Deſign; had ſet up for himſelf, and entred into Rebellion againſt the Commonwealth, contrary to Juſtice, which had ever been both the Parent and Nurſe of the Roman Empire. It muſt be therefore their Part, to cruſh ſo monſtrous a Deſign in the Beginning, before it ſhould grow to any Maturity. Neither was it to be doubted, but that God himſelf would be aſſiſting to their Endeavours, by whoſe Sentence ungrateful Perſons are ever condemned; ſo that their Swords ſhould be turned upon themſelves to their Deſtruction; who without any Provocation, but on the contrary many wayes obliged, had entred into a Courſe pernicious to ſuch as were Innocent; and he concluded, that he was of the Opinion, nay very confident, that if once they came to engage, they would be ſo overpower'd with Fear; that they would neither be able to look them in the Face, nor endure the Noiſe of their Shouting to Battel.

He accuſeth him in a Speech to his Army.

115. His Harangue had that Operation upon the Souldiers, which he deſired; for, conſenting fully to what he required; of Anger, they made the uſual Sign with their Lances, and deſired to be led away againſt the Rebel. Herewith exceedingly encouraged, he ſent away Arbetio, whom he had found very lucky in the Suppreſſion of civil Broils, with the Lancearii, the Martiarii, and the reſt of the light-Armed, and Goamarius with the Læti toward the Streights of Succi, knowing him to bear ill Will to Julian, for being diſgraced by him in Gall. But now did his Fortune, in the Opinion of our Hiſtorian, clearly preſage his End to be near. For he was often frighted in his Sleep, and dreamt, that his Father put a beautiful Child into his Lap, which daſhed, and caſt to the Ground, the Globe or Sphear that he bore in his Right Hand. Now Ammianus tells us, that this did ſignifie a Change of Times, though his Flatterers made him believe other things; but if this beautiful Child was that Julian, who, if any, was ſet in his Lap, when he made him Cæſar (upon his Father's Accompt, he being Conſtantine's Brother's Son) this Babe of Grace was but little grateful to his Uncles Memory. But Conſtantius, he ſaith, confeſſed to his moſt cloſe Attendants, that now he ceaſed to ſee any Apparition, as one forſaken; but ſometimes he beheld it in a more ugly Shape; and this was thought to be the Genius appointed to his Safe-keeping, which now had quitted him, as one about to leave the World: For as much as Divines, He addes, do report, that all men, as ſoon as born, have ſome Deities allotted them, to govern their Actions; (the Stability of Fate alwayes preſerved) but ſeen by very few, as theſe alone, whom their manifold Vertues render famous; ſo that by this Doctrine Conſtantius, who was wont formerly it ſeems to ſee his Genius, was a man Famous for his Vertues. However, he was not ſo far diſcouraged, but being come with Speed to Antioch, he haſted thence with all Alacrity, as he was ever wont, when he went about to chaſtiſe Rebellions; at which though many murmured, yet durſt none ſpeak openly againſt it. Marching thence, when Autumn now declined, as he came to a Place called Hippocephalus, three Miles diſtant from that City; he was preſented with the Spectacle of a dead man, having the Head cut from the Shoulders, lying on his Right hand toward the Weſt, wherewith being ſtruck, as apprehending it ominous, he went forward, and came to Tarſus. Here he was ſeized with a gentle Fever; but believing that Motion and Exerciſe might do him Good, he reſolved to proceed in his Expedition, and through difficult wayes reached Mopſueſtia, Sends ſome Forces againſt him.

Quos multiplices auxere Virtutes.

He comes to Antioch.

Proceeding, dies at Mopſueſtia in Cilicia.

Situate at the Foot of the Mountain Taurus, and the laſt Station of Cilicia on that Road. Hence he had alſo determined to move, on the following day; but was detained by the Force of his Diſeaſe; which by Degrees, was grown to that Height, that he burnt like Fire, and could for Heat ſcarcely be touched. All means uſed for his Recovery proving unſucceſsful, he bewailed his End; and having, as the Report went, named Julian his Succeſſor, at laſt, after long ſtrugling with Death, he departed this Life. Such was the End of Conſtantius, at Mopſueſtia, or Mopſuerenæ on the fifth of October, as writes Ammianus, or rather on the third of the Nones of November, as ſome date it, in the thirty eighth year of his Reign, and the forty fourth of his Age, in the Conſulſhip of Taurus and Florentius A. D. CCCLXI.

Laws made by him in his laſt year.

His great kindneſs to Themiſtius the Philoſopher.

116. Before we had brought Conſtantius to his End, we ſhould have taken a view of the Laws he made in the laſt year of his Reign; but that it would have broken the Series of thoſe Actions which he proſecuted in order to his marching Weſtward, and therefore we referred it hither, where ſomething more ought to be ſpoken of his Character. And in order to this, we may firſt call to mind what we have already obſerved; That he was very Studious to Preſerve and Increaſe the Dignity and Privileges of Senators. To this end, principally, he Directed his Fifth Oration, or Conſtitution, to the Senate of Conſtantinople, diſtinguiſhed at preſent into Nine ſeveral Laws, according to the ſeveral parts of which it conſiſts; bearing Date on that third day of May which preceded his Death, from Gephyra, a City of Syria, diſtant two and twenty Miles from Antioch. The firſt Direction it gives, is, for the better Election of Prætors, concerning which he had formerly made ſeveral “ Laws, as we have already ſeen. But now further He Ordains, That at the making “ of the Senatuſconſultum (for the Choice, as we ſhewed before, he left wholly to the Senate, which muſt conſiſt at leaſt of thirty Perſons) ſhould be preſent Ten “ of the Principal Senators, or thoſe they called Summates, viz. ſuch as had been or- “ dinary Conſuls, had born the Dignity of Præfects, Proconſuls, and Prætors; and, “ what is more to be taken notice of, Themiſtius the Philoſopher, he will have in par- “ ticular to be there. This Perſon Flouriſhed at this time, with great Reputation for Learning, which appeared herein, as well as otherwiſe, that with excellent Commentaries he Illuſtrated the Works of Ariſtotle. Conſtantius, to Encourage Learning, and reward ſo Deſerving a Man, for whom he had Extraordinary Kindneſs, had, almoſt ſix years before, by a peculiar Oration (ſo theſe Imperial Conſtitutions Directed to the Senate, are termed) Promoted him to the Dignity of Senator; and now, to do him ſtill Greater Honour, will not have any choſen Prætors without “ his Preſence and Aſſiſtance at the Election, amongſt theſe Summates or Proceres, “ the Perſons of the Higheſt Quality; and that further, with this Elogium of him, “ as a Learned Man, That his Learning Ennobled his Dignity of Senator. But fur- “ ther, as to the making of the Senatuſconſultum, he will have them give their “ Voices in order, and not by the way of Exclamation, or Acclamation, to what was “ ſaid by the firſt that ſpake; when they all cried together Yea, or Nay, or went “ out to ſhew their Opinions; as was uſual then, and now continues to be the Cu- “ ſtom in caſes of ſmaller conſequence in Publick Aſſemblies of that nature. And “ if any Prætor died in his Office before he had Celebrated the uſual Games, he En- “ acted, That after the ſame, one be choſen to ſucceed him, as ſhould in courſe have “ been Prætor the following year.

L. 12. de Prætoribus & Quæſtoribus, Cod. Th.

Themiſtius quoque Philoſophus; cujus auget Scientia Dignitatem.

Hanc ſubrogationem Imp. Subſortitionem vocat; quod vetus & proprium hac in re verbum fuit. Vide Comment.

He provides for the Publick Buildings of Conſtantinople.

117. The ſecond Head, or Segment, of Conſtantine his Oration, hath relation to the Publick Works of the City of Conſtantinople, for which, by occaſion of the Prætorſhip he Amply provides. For, in the firſt place, whereas all the five Prætors, which in his time we have ſaid to have been in this City, were obliged to be at the Expence of Publick Games, or Paſtimes; he very laudably changes the Cuſtom, Ordaining, That, for the time to come, only Three of them be at this kind of “ Expence, and that the other two, in room thereof, contribute a Sum of Money “ to the Publick Fabricks, or Works of the City; and to each he limits the Expence, “ requiring, that he who bore the Title of Prætor Conſtantinianus, ſhould pay one “ thouſand Pounds of Silver, and the other, called Flavialis, five hundred. But, in caſe any of them ſhould be conſtrain'd to be Abſent, by reaſon of Sickneſs, Age, or the like; then he Ordains, That they ſend their Procurator to the Cenſuales, “ or Officers of the Præfect of the City, with the Sum of Money which they were “ obliged to Expend; and which Cenſuales were to ſee the Works carried on and “ Finiſhed; yet ſo as the Names of the Prætors were to be ſet upon them: But in caſe any wilfully and contumaciouſly Abſented himſelf, then, as a Mulct, he Ordains, He ſhall pay half as much more as his ſhare came to; which Mulct ſhall be “

L. 13. de Prætoribus, &c.

Ludorum Editio.

Levied by the Governours of the Provinces, after Warning received from the “ Præfect, into whoſe Office they were to pay it, whence it ſhould be laid out in “ ſome Publick Work, whereon the Name of the Contumacious Prætor was not to “ be ſet: and in caſe Money could not be had, the Governours were to proceed by “ way of Diſtreſs, which alſo was to be brought into the Office of the Præfect. “ Now the Ordinary Judges or Governours of Provinces are commanded to take this Pains, for that by other Laws it was incumbent upon them, to find out ſuch Prætors as ſculked or concealed themſelves, and to force them into the City, there to Diſcharge their Duties. And if thoſe Judges failed therein, they were alſo Finable for their Omiſſion, and the Fine was, in like manner, to be Employed upon Publick Works; being Levied and Expended by the Officers of the Citie's Præfect, the Dignity of whom, Conſtantius hereby Advances, as he himſelf Declares his Intention to be, who but two years before had given Beginning to the Præfect himſelf. And very much indeed his Authority, and conſequently his Dignity, was hereby Advanced; he having Power to ſend his Officers through all the Provinces of the Eaſtern Empire, to Levy this Mulct inflicted upon the Governours; Beſides that great Privilege he granted to the Senate, and conſequently to him, who was Head of it, that Appeals ſhould lye to them out of Bithynia, Paphlagonia, Lydia, the Helleſpont, the Iſlands, Phrygia Salutaris, and other Parts, by another Law. From the great Care of Publick Works he here manifeſts, it's probably concluded that at this time there were ſome Notable Buildings he had in hand; as poſſibly, the Baths, Aquæducts, and Forum Regium, which ſome mention to have been raiſed by him. The Deſire of carrying on theſe Works in this his City, as he calls it, was ſo great, that whereas formerly he had abſolutely refuſed to give leave to ſuch as had been Vicars, to Excuſe themſelves from the Prætorſhip; now he is content they be Excuſed, “ provided they bring to the Bank, or Chamber, of Conſtantinople, ſo much Money, “ as the two Prætors, lately mentioned, were obliged to pay toward the “ Works.

Noſtræ urbis.

His Indulgence to Senators.

118. But further, as to the Privileges of his Senators, for ſo he terms them, he Ordains; That they be freed from the Burthen of the Metatus, ſo as without “ their conſent none ſhould Lodge or Quarter in their Houſes; a Privilege which “ afterward would not be permitted them, and therefore this Law, or branch of this Oration, is not put into Juſtinian's Code. And whereas they were wont to be Sued by the Treaſury, when Husbandmen fled and abſented themſelves, he Commands, That if they received no Profit from the Lands of ſuch Husbandmen, they ſhould “ not be obliged to pay for ſuch Fugitives. Now this Gothofred Expounds to be meant of ſome ſmall Lands which their Coloni or Husbandmen had of their own, beſides thoſe of their Lord's, which they Tilled: but I ſee no reaſon why we may not underſtand it of thoſe who plaid leaſt in ſight, and betook themſelves to the ſhelter of Great men, when a Tax came out, and therefore their next Neighbours were bound to make up the Sum Impoſed, as formerly hath been ſhewed, from which Burthen he will have his Senators Excuſed. It was a Cuſtom, that when there was any danger of Famine, as in this City of Conſtantinople, or great want of Corn, or Proviſions for War, or upon any other urgent occaſion, the Provincials were bound, at a Market-price, to find, and Sequeſter Corn for Publick Uſes, from which very few were Excuſed; but Conſtantius beſtows this Immunity upon the “ Procurators, or Stewards of Senators throughout the Provinces. As to the Payment called Luſtralis Collatio, of which we have already ſpoken, to which Merchants, or ſuch as Trafficked with Wares, or with Money, were principally and eſpecially obnoxious; he declares, by another part of this Oration, That the Ruſticks, or “ Husbandmen of Senators, who only ſell the Growths of the Lands they till, are “ not to be Comprized amongſt ſuch men, or taken for ſuch; there being indeed “ two Contracts required to make a Merchant or Trafficker; the one, of buying firſt a Commodity, and the next, of ſelling it again for Profit or Advantage. Further, at this time, it being lawful for the Governours of Provinces to raiſe within their Juriſdictions certain publick Works, as of Baths or the like, when and where they thought fit, without conſulting the Prince or the Præfectus Prætorio (which yet afterwards was forbidden) they were wont to ceſs the Eſtates of Senators amongſt others. But this Conſtantius in another Part of his Oration forbids; and for that “ there were throughout the Provinces, certain Senators impowered to look to, “ and preſerve the Privileges of thoſe of that Order within their Diſtricts, (in like “ manner as the common People had alſo their Defenſores, the Church it's Protectors, “ and the Poor their Overſeers) he impowers them to make, conſtant Oppoſition “ againſt the incroachment on their Immunities; which if they, being of ſo “

L. 1. de Metatis, Cod. Th. lib. 7. tit. 6.

L. 7. de Annona & Tributis, Cod. Th.
Abeſt à Cod. Juſtin.

Publica Comparatio vocatur & Synoneton.
L. 1. de publica Comparatione, Cod. Th. lib. 11. tit. 15.
Abeſt. à Cod. Juſtin.
L. 3. de Luſtrali Collatione. Cod. Th.

L. 7. de operibus Publicis, Cod. Th.
L. 7. Cod. Juſtin. de Dignit. hinc decurtata eſt.

great Quality, and Intereſt, could not obviate without having Recourſe to the “ Emperour; no wonder that the Curiales (or Senators of Corporations) were much vexed alſo at this time, upon the ſame Account.

In what Caſes he will not excuſe them.

119. Theſe are the Privileges which he Ordains, and Confirms to his Senators; but leſt they ſhould ſeem to be ſet free from all Services and Obligations, beſides what, at the beginning, is ſaid concerning their Obnoxiouſneſs to the Prætorſhip, and Expenſe of Publick Paſtimes; he Inſtances in other two things, wherein they muſt plead no Immunity or Excuſe. By reaſon of his Indulgence to Perſons of this Rank, or to ſhun the Charge and Trouble in Corporations, many of the Curiales had obtained an Admiſſion into the Senate, as others betaken themſelves to the Army, or to Holy Orders, as a Refuge; but now, though formerly he was content, that being admitted to this Dignity, they ſhould be freed from their Obligations to Bodies Corporate, He Commands, That ſuch be ſtruck out of the Liſt of the Senate, “ and be returned back to their own Towns. But this is to be underſtood of “ thoſe only who had not born the Office of Prætor, or been at the Expenſe of the “ Publick Paſtimes; for if they had undergone this Charge, he will not have “ them forced back to their Towns; yet with this Proviſo, that if they had any “ Money in their hands belonging to the Publick Treaſury, or that of their City, “ they ſhould be bound to make Reſtitution; for, out of theſe Decuriones were choſen the Exactores, Suſceptores, and Curatores, of whom heretofore. The next Duty “ from which he will not permit them to be Excuſed, is, that of the Protoſtaſia, “ than which nothing is more obſcure in the whole Code: but from all laid together, it appears (though the word in general ſignifies Principality, or Preeminence) to have been the chief Inſpection or Care of Contributing and Collecting Tributes in each Municipium and Territory throughout the Eaſt; and this to have been Incumbent upon Perſons, according to the Quantity and Value of their Lands. But this he will have them tied to, ſo far as their own Grounds make “ them lyable only, and not by way of Epibole, or Contribution for the barren “ Lands of others; although, to ſpeak indifferently, the Senators that lived in the Countrey were too guilty of getting all the beſt Lands into their own poſſeſſion.

L. 48. de Decurionibus Cod. Th. Abeſt à Cod. Juſtin.

L. 1. de Protoſtaſia Cod. Th. lib. 11. Tit. 22. Vide Comment.

120. But thus we ſee how Indulgent Conſtantius was to Senators; and this is further to be ſaid of him, that he cheriſhed the Nobility and Senate as much as his Succeſſor did the Corporations. For evidence of this, there is Extant a Law of his, though not in the Code of Theodoſius, (out of which ſeveral have been loſt) yet in that of Juſtinian; for that his it was, though it be by error Aſcribed to his Father, appears from the Direction of it to Orſitus, who was Præfectus Prætorio in his time. This forbids any mean Trafficquers, as the Monetarii, or any of abject and vile “ Office or Employment, as the Stationaries; or ſuch as lived by any filthy courſe of “ Life, to attempt, or aim at any Dignity: or if they did, it Commands they be repulſed, “ and returned back to their former Trade, or meanneſs of living. For his other Qualities, thoſe who do not Flatter him, confeſs, that he ever preſerved the grandeur of Majeſty and Authority; that with a great and lofty Mind he contemned Popularity; was careful and ſparing in conferring Honours, and eſpecially the greateſt; which, as a Maxim, Princes that deſigned to uphold the Reputation of Nobility, and prevent Popular Tyranny, have ever obſerved, as much as they could. Neither did he ſuffer (or but rarely) either thoſe in Civil or Military Commands to grow greater, through any new Acceſſion of Power or Honour, which would ſtill give others that came after, encouragement to expect the like; ſo that, under him, no Commander was Advanced to the Degree of Clariſſimus, having been only of the Rank called Perfectiſſimatus. In his time, no Governour of a Province went forth to meet a Magiſter Equitum; neither did he ſuffer a Magiſter to meddle with any Civil Buſineſs; but all, both Military and Civil Officers, according to the antient Cuſtom, bore Reverence to the Præfecti Prætorio, as thoſe that were Advanced to the higheſt pitch of Honour. In preſerving Military Diſcipline, he was rather too exact; ſometimes too ſcrupulouſly examining the Merits of his Souldiers. The Palatine Dignities, or his Court-Employments, he beſtowed, as it were, by a Plumb-line and Level; and during his Reign, no Upſtart or Unknown Perſon came to bear any Sway; but it was certainly known, who, of courſe, having paſſed ten years of Tryal in an Inferiour Station, would be promoted to be Magiſter Officiorum, Largitionum, or the like. As it was rarely known that any who had been bred a Souldier was tranſlated into a Civil Employment, ſo none were preferred to Command in the Armies, but ſuch as had undergone the Toil of War, and learn'd Experience. Preferment did not in his dayes court all ſorts of men indifferently,

L. 6. de Dignitatibus. Cod. Juſtin. lib. 12. Tit. 1.

Otherwiſe indulgent to the Nobility.

His Virtues.

ut honorum omnium apicem.

He prefer'd none but fit Perſons.

differently, or rather thoſe who were moſt unfit; Perſons did not riſe to thoſe Places, as inſpired, without any Breeding or Study to fit them for the Diſcharge; as in later Enthuſiaſtick Ages, wherein, not only in Spiritual Miniſteries, but even in Civil Employments, little or no Study and Preparation hath been thought requiſite to any Place. The Light within us, or Natural Wild-fire, whether Canting or Drolling, was not eſteemed for its Cracks. Study and Induſtry were not accounted Formal Foppery, nor what diſtinguiſhes us from Beaſts, turn'd into Ridicule: Perſons might then, as of old, perhaps think themſelves born Poets; but not Orators (either Religious or Secular) not Lawyers nor Judges in either kind; Commanders Military, or the like.

121. But, Ammianus further tells us, that he was a Diligent Affector of Learning, but by reaſon of his blunt Wit, no good or tolerable Orator; and yet, if that be the beſt Oratory that accompliſheth its End, he was not unhappy in his Military Eloquence, and could as effectually cajole the Souldiers, as his Learned Couſin Julian; for he ſtill perſwaded them to what he pleaſed, and this by a gentle and pleaſing way he had, which this Writer upon occaſion aſſerts, though not where he gives us his Character. Having no ſucceſs in Rhetorick, he further writes, he betook himſelf to Poetry, wherein he did nothing to any purpoſe. As to his manner of Living, he was ſpare and ſober both in Eating and Drinking, whereby, (Temperance being, as a Prince that Reigned in England an hundred years ago, and ſince, was wont to ſay from good Experience, the beſt part of Phyſick) he retained ſo perfect Health, that he ſeldome contracted any Diſeaſe; but when he did, he was ſick to Death. He was content with little ſleep, when Buſineſs and Time required it; and ſo Eminent for Chaſtity, during his long Reign, that he could not be ſo much as ſuſpected toward any Male he had about him, which Crime, Envy, though without any real ground, is wont, ſaith our Hiſtorian, to fix upon Perſons placed in greateſt Power. He was an Excellent Horſeman; and in caſting a Dart very Expert, but eſpecially skilled in Archery; and alſo moſt knowing in the Arts of Training and Commanding Foot. As for things of more ſlight conſequence, as that in Publick he was never ſeen to blow his Noſe, to Spit, to turn his Head aſide, or in all his Life to have taſted any ſort of Apples; our Author tells us, he omits to ſpeak further of them, as being often before mentioned by him, and ſo having but ſummarily, as he ſaith himſelf, mentioned his Virtues, or ſuch of them as he could know, he comes to explain, or lay open his Vices. In other matters, he was to be compared to the middle ſort of Princes; but if there was but any Appearance of Deſigned Uſurpation, true or falſe, he knew no end of making Inquiſitions, and neither having reſpect to Right nor Wrong therein, exceeded Caligula, Domitian, and Commodus in Cruelty, whom imitating in this Exceſs, at the beginning of his Reign, he utterly cut off all that were near him in Blood or Kindred. In ſuch caſes his Suſpitions were ſtrained to the utmoſt, and his Inquiſitions were ſo Severe, that he appointed moſt cruel Perſons to Examine and Judge the Accuſed, and was deſirous, in Puniſhing thoſe that they Condemned, to extend their Torment even farther than Nature her ſelf could hold out, herein far more Rigid than Gallienus. Ammianus inſtanceth in this Emperour's milder Puniſhment of ſuch as he found really guilty of Treaſon; takes occaſion to ſhew how unlike Conſtantius was to Marcus, who, when Caſſius had Uſurped in Syria, burnt a Packet of his Letters, which had been intercepted. And after this, he cites paſſages out of Cicero and Heraclitus the Philoſopher, to ſhew the baſeneſs of Cruelty; to which we muſt needs Aſſent, but not Imitate, nor tranſcribe him in ſuch like Sallies.

He was Temperate,

Perque ſpatia ita longiſſima impendio caſtus.

An excellent Horſeman, &c.

Equitandi & jaculandi, artiumque armaturæ pedeſtris perquam ſcientiſſimus.

De numeratis carptim bonis quæ ſcire potuimus, nunc ad explananda ejus vitia veniamus.

His Vices.

His Cruelty, according to the Character given him by Ammianus.

122. But to the purpoſe; he adds, that thus Cruel he was, under a ſpecious Pretence to Juſtice and Clemency: that, as in Forein Wars, he was broken and dejected, ſo in Civil Conteſts, wherein he had uſually Succeſs, he was puffed up, and, as he words it, ſprinkled with horrid filth from out of the Inteſtine Ulcers of the Commonwealth; ſo that through a depraved purpoſe, rather than what was Right and Uſual, he Erected in Gall and Pannonia Triumphal Arches, at a great Expence out of the Calamities of the Provinces, with the Narration of his Acts thereto affixed. To his Wives, his whining Eunuchs, and certain of his Courtiers, who Applauded all he ſaid, and obſerved how his Inclinations ſtood, that they might accommodate themſelves to his Humour, he was too too much addicted. And the Badneſs of the Times was rendred worſe by the inſatiable Rapacity of his Officers, who thereby procured him much more Odium than Money; and this yet ſeemed more intolerable, that He himſelf would never hear a Cauſe, nor take any care for the Eaſe of the Provinces, at ſuch time as they were burthened by multiplied Tributes and Impoſitions. He was, to conclude this Character, of his mind, (for what our Author ſpeaks of him in reference to Chriſtian Religion, will be more proper for another place) eaſily inclined to take away what he had formerly beſtowed. As for that of his Body; His Complexion was brown, his Looks lofty, and his Sight quick; the Hair of his Head was ſoft, his Face, which he conſtantly ſhaved, very comely; from his Neck to his Groin he was tall, but his Legs were very ſhort and bowed, which made him very excellent in running and Leaping. Such is the Character given him by Ammianus, to which it will be requiſite that we adde what others, as to this point, have written of him, and one that lived in his Time, though of a Pagan perſwaſion; for, to avoid partiality from Affection, we ſhall not have reſpect to what Chriſtians have written, but rather conſider what they ſay of him upon another occaſion.

Et inteſtinis ulceribus Reip. ſanie perfuſus horrendâ.

Too much given to be led by his Eunuchs.

The Character given him by Eutropius, and other Pagan Writers.

123. Eutropius, who lived alſo in his dayes, having told us, that he died as he was going againſt Julian, betwixt Cilicia and Cappadocia, in the forty fifth year of his Age; adds, that he deſerved to be reckoned amongſt the Divi, or Deified Emperours. Then, that he was a man of egregious Tranquillity, of a pleaſing Diſpoſition, that he gave too much credit to his Friends and Familiars, and was ſomething too Uxorious; yet, in the firſt years of his Reign, he demeaned himſelf with great Modeſty, was an Inricher of his Familiars, and ſuffered not thoſe which he had found Induſtrious to go unrewarded. But he was more than ordinary inclined to Severity, upon ſuſpicion of Treaſon, otherwiſe mild; and one whoſe Fortune was to be more eſteemed in Civil than in Foreign Wars. With Eutropius agree others of the ſame way, commending this Emperour, as to the Main, and laying the great fault upon his Eunuchs and Miniſters. But, although all men, and eſpecially the greateſt, be obnoxious to Flattery, and thoſe that ſee with the Eyes, and hear with the Ears of others, are too ſubject to falſe Repreſentations; yet Conſtantius cannot hereby be Excuſed, nothing ſo much declaring the Wiſdom and Diſpoſition of a Prince, as the choice of his Miniſters. For, they all therein ſuit their own Inclinations; not but that the moſt Prudent may be miſtaken in Men as well as Things; but we ſpeak of the conſtant Practice, as that of this Emperour, who was generally thus impoſed on all his Life. At parting yet we cannot but obſerve ſomething in his behalf, in reference to the odious compariſons Ammianus makes of him for his Cruelty. He tells us, that he rooted out utterly his Kindred at the beginning, which all muſt needs acknowledge an Expreſſion Hyperbolical. For to be ſure, Gallus and Julian he left alive, and they and He were as near a Kin as Brothers Sons are wont to be. Then Eutropius tells us, that Dalmatius Cæſar, another Couſin, was indeed killed, but by a Military Faction, and ſo as Conſtantius rather ſuffered, than commanded it.

Verum Dalmatius Cæſar proſperimâ indole, neque Patruo abſimilis, haud multo poſt oppreſſus eſt à factione Militari, & Conſtantio patruele ſuo ſinente potiùs quàm jubente.

Sect.

Sect. V.

From the Death of Conſtantius, to that of Julian.

The Space of a Year and ſome Eight Months.

Conſtantius being dead, his Officers ſend and invite Julian to take poſſeſſion.

1. THE Body of Conſtantius, being duely prepar'd and Coffin'd, was committed to the care of Jovian, his Protector Domeſticus, to be convey'd with Royal Pomp to Conſtantinople, there to be Buried with his Relations. While in the way, Jovian was ſitting in the Chariot that carried the Corps, there were offered to him, as was wont to be to Emperours in their Journeys, the Eſſayes of Corn, or Military Proviſions; and the Publick Beaſts of Carriage and Burthen belonging to the Curſus Publicus, were produced ſo often, that, together with Officious Meetings upon the Road, and other things of like nature, they portended Empire to Jovian, but ſuch as was empty, and rather a ſhadow of Sovereignty, than otherwiſe, as to one who was the Chief Actor in a Funeral Solemnity. But to leave him with his Charge, and return to the Place whence he ſet forward with the Body. After the Chief Officers, Military and Civil, had, by their Tears and Lamentations, teſtified their due Reſpect to the dead Emperour, they began to lay their Heads together, and conſider what was to be done in reference to a Living Prince; for ſuch an one now there muſt be made, or owned. After ſome ſmall Attempts in another way, at the motion of Euſebius, as was reported, whoſe Conſcience now flew in his Face, Julian, who ſeemed near at hand, and well provided, was reſolved on for the Man; and Theolaiphus and Aligildus, both Counts, were ſent unto him, to inform him of the Death of his Kinſman, and to deſire that he would without delay come into the Eaſt, which was very ready to receive his Commands. But the Report went, that Conſtantins made a Will, and therein, as was formerly ſaid, named Julian his Heir; bequeathing Legacies and Eſtates in truſt to other his Relations; for as for Children he left none, except one in the Belly of his Wife, which, proving a Daughter, and after him named Conſtantia, was afterward married unto Gratian. In the mean time, Julian, being variouſly employed in Illyricum, yet principally intended his Divinations, by a continual prying into the Entrails of Beaſts, and viewing of Birds; yet were the Anſwers ſo Ambiguous and Obſcure, that he remained ſtill in Suſpence, and altogether Uncertain about future Events. At length one Aprunculus, an Orator in Gall, afterward promoted to the Government of the Province of Narbon, a man mighty ſkilful in the Aruſpicina, made to him a full diſcovery from the Liver of a Beaſt, as he ſaid, which was covered with a double Call. Yet was he ſtill afraid that theſe things were but feigned, which were thought to be acceptable to him; and this made him Melancholick, Good Man, till he himſelf perceived by a good Token, that Conſtantius his Death was portended. At the very ſame inſtant, Ammianus tells you, that the Emperour died in Cilicia, a Souldier, who lifted him up upon his Horſe, he being ſet, fell down to the ground; whereupon he ſuddenly cryed out, in the hearing of all the Company, that He, who had raiſed him up on High, was fallen himſelf. He knew that this boded well towards him, yet he was reſolved ſtill to continue in Dacia, as ſtill apprehending ſeveral Dangers. For he thought it not ſafe to truſt to Conjectures, which perhaps might fall out quite contrary to what they ſuggeſted.

Julian hears of his Death.

2. Theſe Doubts were at laſt all diſcuſſed by the Arrival of Theolaiphus and Aligildus, who brought him News both that Conſtantius was dead, and that he had declared him his Succeſſor, as our Pagan Hiſtorians write; though Chriſtians have believed, that this was feigned by them, to take off the Odium of Julian's Uſurpation. For, it's reported of Conſtantius, that when he lay on his Death-bed, amongſt other Reflections upon his Life, he repented that he had Promoted Julian to be Cæſar; but if he ſo Ordained him his Heir, the more Gratitude he owed to his Memory, and ſo vertuous and gallant a man as he, doubtleſs, could not but pay ſo juſt a Debt. However, now delivered from all Fears and Incumbrances, he was exceedingly Elevated with his good Fortune, and gave credit to Divinations; but, knowing how much Expedition had contributed to the Advancement of his Affairs, he gave Orders to march away into Thrace; and paſſing down the Mountains of Succi came to Philippopolis, which by the Ancients was called Eumolpias, his Army following very chearfully, now they found that what they were going to take by Force, and that with the hazard of all their Lives, was devolved upon him by ordinary Right. When the Report of his Approach was brought to Conſtantinople, all ſorts came out to receive him as one dropp'd from Heaven; and there he entred with great Applauſe, and the Admiration of all that beheld him, on the eleventh of December. For they conſidered how a young man, as he was, of a little Body indeed, but renowned for very great Actions, after bloody Tragedies made by him, both of Kings and Nations, was ſuddenly paſſed from City to City, eaſily conquered all Oppoſition where he came, and in Concluſion arrived at the Poſſeſſion of the Empire, as by Divine Appointment without any Expenſe of Blood, or Treaſure, to the Commonwealth. But though he came ſo eaſily to the Supream Power, he thought fit not to forgive ſuch as had been his Enemies formerly, though now they readily ſubmitted themſelves, and cloſed with his Intereſt. For within a ſhort time, as a Foundation of what was to follow, and to have a Judge whom he could truſt, he made Salluſtius his Præfectus Prætorio, and with him joyned Mamertinus, Arbetio, Agilo, Nevita, and Jovinus, whom he had lately promoted to be Magiſter Equitum through Illyricum. Thoſe Commiſſioners paſſed over to Chalcedon, where being protected and aſſiſted by the Tribunes and others the Principal of the Joviani and Herculiani, they made more ſevere Inquiſition after Criminals than Juſtice would bear them out in, though their Emperour did; ſome few Caſes only excepted, wherein they could ſcarcely exceed the Merits of ſuch, as they had Reaſon to condemn.

Sect. 5.

A. D. 361.

Goes to Conſtantinople.

Flammæ inſtar cuncta facilius occupaſſe.

Severely animadverts upon his late Enemies.

Cauſas veehmentiùs æquo bonoque Spectaverunt.

3. They began with Palladius, whom they baniſhed hither into Brittain, merely becauſe he was ſuſpected to have plotted ſomething againſt Gallus, while under him he executed the Place of Magiſter Officiorum. Next after him they puniſhed Taurus, who had born the Office of Præfectus Prætorio, in the like ſort; though his Crime, in the Opinion of indifferent Judges was very ſlight, as having, when he apprehended a Storm approaching, betaken himſelf to the Court, and Protection of the Emperour his Maſter: And the Record made at his Tryal, was not read without great Horror, it beginning in this manner: In the Conſulſhip of Taurus and Florentius, Taurus being brought to the Bar. In like manner was Pentadius indangered, it being objected that he took in Short-Hand the Anſwers of Gallus to ſuch Interrogatories as were put to him a little before his Death; but he made ſo clear a Defence, that he eſcap'd unpuniſhed. By the Force of the like Injuſtice was Florentius the Son of Nigrinianus, and then Magiſter Officiorum, confined to Boas, an Iſland of Dalmatia; as for the other Florentius who had been Præfectus Prætorio, and at preſent was dignified by the Title of Conſul; he retired with his Wife, and, though condemned to Death in his Abſence, lay concealed all the time that Julian lived. But Evagrius the Comes Rei Privatæ, and Saturninus, who had had Charge of the Palace, together with Cyrinus, lately a Notary, could not eſcape being driven into Exile. And yet the Caſes of theſe Perſons ſeemed very Juſt and Reaſonable, in Compariſon of what Urſulus the Comes Largitionum ſuffered, whoſe Death Ammianus tells us that Juſtice her ſelf ſeemed with Tears to have bewailed, and taxed Julian as ingrateful, however Libanius hath minced the Matter. For, this Perſon when he was made Cæſar, and ſent into the Weſt, perceiving there was a Deſign to ſtraighten him of Money, that he might have nothing to give to the Souldiers, and thereupon they might be ungovernable; wrote Letters to the Treaſurer of Gall, to furniſh him, as he ſhould have Occaſion. After he was put to Death, when Julian perceived he was thereupon revil'd and curſed as a moſt ingrateful Wretch; he thought to ſalve the Sore by a Falſitie, and excuſe the Crime which could not be expiated; affirming that the man was killed without his Knowledge, and pretended that the Souldiers made him away in a Rage, for having ſpoken thoſe Words at Amida ſo long before; which we related upon Occaſion of Conſtantius his coming “ before that City. Therefore in the Opinion of Ammianus he was fearful and unadviſed, when he made Arbetio a man of an uncertain humour, and very proud, to be Judge of theſe Matters, (for the Officers of the Legions and the reſt that were joyned with him were but only for Show) to him whom he knew firſt of all to have been ſet againſt his Life and Safety. Though thoſe Proceedings were deſervedly blamed, even by his Followers, yet other Examples of Severity he ſhewed, wherein he did not at all deviate from the Paths of Juſtice. Apodemius the Agens in Rebus, who had been ſo buſie in the Death of Gallus and Sylvanus, as alſo Paul Sirnam'd Catena the Notary, not to be named without Grones for thoſe that were murdered through his violent Proſecution, were burnt alive. Euſebius the Præpoſitus Cubiculi

Several unjuſtly put to Death;

Vide Valeſii Annot. in Ammian. lib. 22. p. 206.

Quum maledictis execrationibus multorum ſe Julianus ſentiret expoſitum, impurgabile Crimen excuſari poſſe Exiſtimans &c.

Some juſtly.

culi to Conſtantius, that Execrable and intolerable Eunuch, who from a contemptible Original, arrived at ſo great Impudence as even to command the Emperour, rather than to receive Orders from him, was alſo put to Death.

He too ſeverely handles the Palatines, or Courtiers, though generally bad men.

Non ut Philoſophus indagandæ veritatis Profeſſor.

Socrates hæc à nonnullis laudata, à pleriſque autem ait improbata fuiſſe. Remotis enim tot Palatii Miniſtris, qui ſi non aliud, certè ornamentum ac pompam aulæ afferebant, vilem & contemptum Principis Comitatum videri neceſſe eſt. Cæterùm Gregorius Nazianz. in odium Conſtantii à Juliano factum eſſe dicit, & Chriſtianis: Simum quemque à Palatio pulſum. Vide Valeſ.

4. From ſuch animadverſion upon theſe men, Julian fell on all the Palatines or Courtiers; though not like a Philoſopher or one that profeſſed to find out the Truth. He had deſerved Commendation, had he retained ſuch as were honeſt amongſt them; though indeed of theſe there were but very few. For it muſt not be denied, but that moſt of them were very vitious, and did much hurt to others, chiefly by their ill Examples. Some by the Spoiles of Temples, our Writer informs us, and the reſt by ſome other Occaſions of gratifying their rapacious Minds, from the greateſt Poverty raiſed themſelves to vaſt Eſtates, and knew no Mean, neither in giving, taking, nor ſpending; being ſo habituated to invade the Rights of other men, that all Shame laid aſide they ſtuck neither at Perjury nor any other Crime. Hence came up Feaſts and Entertainments as luxurious as thoſe uſed at Triumphs; Silk alſo began to be ordinarily worn, which hitherto was of vaſt Price and Scarcity; the Art of Weaving increaſed: and eſpecially that of the Kitchin; and of ſplendid Furniture. Neither was the Diſcipline of the Camp leſs corrupted than that of the Court, the Souldier now only exerciſing his Voice in Songs; not contenting himſelf, as formerly, with a Stone in his Tent whereon to reſt himſelf, but carrying about his Feather Beds, and drinking out of Cups, whereof each was heavier than the Sword he wore: he ſhamed now to drink out of an earthen Pot, and by his good Will, no Houſe would ſerve him but one of Marble, whereas a Spartan Souldier is ſaid to have been puniſhed for being ſeen but within doors at the time of an Expedition. But ſo ſurly and rapacious the Military man was in thoſe Dayes, toward his Fellow Subjects, and on the contrary ſo cowardly towards an Enemy, that being arrived at Wealth through ambitious Courſes, and in a way of Lazineſs, he was become very expert and knowing in the Vanity and Worth of Jewels; a thing certainly wherein thoſe of but little later times were but meanly practiſed; for the Story was now commonly known of a Souldier, who in the Reign of Maximian, at the Plunder of the King of Perſia his Camp, having light of a Bag wherein were pretious Stones, caſt out the Gemms, as things of no Value, and went away very well pleaſed with the fineneſs of the Bag. But now Luxury had ſo infected all ſorts of People, that on a time when a Barber was ſent for, to cut Julian's Hair, there was one brought to him who had on a very gay Suite of Cloths, at the Sight of whom Julian was aſtoniſhed, and ſaid, I commanded not a Rationalis, (of which ſort of Perſons, formerly;) but a Barber to be called. This Fellow being asked what Income he had by his Trade, made Anſwer, that he had twenty Annonæ (or ſo many Loaves) by the Day, and as great an Allowance for Horſes, (an Allowance for an Horſe they called in thoſe times Capitum) beſides a large yearly Salary, and many other advantages he had of begging Boones. Hereat the Emperour was ſo moved, that he turned him and all his Companions away, (together with Cookes and others, Profeſſors of like Myſteries that received the ſame Advantages) to ſhift for themſelves, as they could. Thus much Ammianus tells us of the Corruption of the Court, and the Reformation made by Julian. Now let us ſee how the Reformer, in all Relations, ordered his own Affairs.

As the Souldier, alſo was very degenerate in theſe dayes.

Vicenas diurnas reſpondit annonas, totidemque pabula Jumentorum quæ vulgò dictitant capita.

Julian profeſſes himſelf a Pagan.

5. And firſt for his Religion, although from his very Childhood, he was much inclined to Paganiſme, and as he grew up, his Inclination that way ſtill more increaſed, yet not daring to ſhew it, with as great Secreſie as he could, he had medled with Matters relating thereunto. But now that his Fears were removed; and he had Liberty to do what he liſted, he revealed the Secrets of his Heart, and in Plain and downright words commanded by his Edicts, both that Temples ſhould be opened, Sacrifices be offered as formerly, and the Worſhip of the Heathen Deities reſtored. And that his Deſign might take fuller Effect, having ſent for the Diſſenting Chriſtian Biſhops with their Followers to the Court, he told them, he would have them bury all Diſſentions amongſt themſelves, and, without all Fear or Controul, every one live after his own way; and this he did with great earneſtneſs and Cunning, that this Liberty procuring great Diſagreement, he might not be indangered by that mighty Advantage which their Unity would have procured to them. For he knew very well from Experience, that no wild Beaſts are ſo fierce and violent againſt men, as Chriſtians commonly one againſt another. And he would often cry out, Hear me whom the Allemans and the Franks have heard, therein thinking he imitated the Saying of Marcus Aurelius; though not a little differing. For that Prince when paſſing through Paleſtine, toward Ægypt, he was much peſtered by the ſtinking and tumultuous Jews, cried out with grief, O Marcomanni, O Quadi, O Sarmatæ, At laſt I have found out more troubleſome People than your ſelves. About this time he was much troubled by the importunate Addreſſes of many that came out of Ægypt, being, as naturally that Nation then was, very much addicted to Suits and Troubles; and ſo Covetous as well as Impertinent, that if they had given any Money for doing Buſineſs, as either to procure the mitigation of a Fine, or longer time of payment, they would earneſtly contend to have it reſtored. They ſo plagued with their noiſe, both Julian and the Præfecti Prætorio, (not being ſatisfied except they could recover money which had been ſo employed, though ſeventy years before) that they could do no other Buſineſs for them; and therefore the Emperour, for his own Quiet, and the Repoſe of his Miniſters, by an Edict commanded, that they ſhould all paſs over to Chalcedon, whither he promiſed that he himſelf would ſhortly follow. But there when he had them, Command was given to all Boat-men, that they ſhould not dare to bring over again ſo much as one Ægyptian, which being carefully obſerved, this their Deſign of Informing fell to nothing, and they were all forced to return home as they came. But this gave occaſion to the Promulgation of a Law, as Ammianus tells us, whereby no Perſon that had legally received any Money for doing any Buſineſs, ſhould be moleſted.

Cunningly divides Chriſtians.

Sect. 5.

A.D. 361.

Provoked by the troubleſome and impertinent Ægyptians,

He Publiſheth a Law.

Valeſius potiùs eum Auguſtum fuiſſe imitatum exiſtimat, qui cum legibus Juliis juventutem coerceret dicere ſolebat, Audite me, Juvenes, Senem, quem Senes Juvenem audierunt ut refert Plutarch.

Homines autem Ægyptii plerunque ſubfuſculi ſunt & atrati, magiſque mœſtiores, gracilenti & aridi, ad ſingulos motus excandeſcentes, Controverſi & Repoſcones acerrimi, Amm. ad finem, lib. 22.

6. This Law is ſtill Extant in the Code of Theodoſius, and the very firſt that therein we find made by Julian. But, beſides what Ammianus writes concerning the particulars for which the Ægyptians made ſo troubleſome an Addreſs, it principally aims at ſuch as had given Money for Places or Offices in the Commonwealth. For, amongſt other means of getting Money, the Palatines, or Courtiers of Conſtantius underſtood this very well; it being a Trade ſeldome unlearn'd by bad men about Princes, to make money of the Employments of which they have the beſtowing; the great Cauſe of ill Management of Affairs, when Preferment goes not according to Deſert, when men are not ſought for that are fit for Places, but ſuch Places as may be fit to advance and enrich, are ſought for men. Yet by what this ſame Author Ammianus writes it is evident that this corrupt courſe of giving and receiving Money for Honours did not in Conſtantius his time extend to the filling of any eminent Offices either in Court or Camp with new upſtarts or unexperienced Perſons, he being wonderfully cautious to prevent all ſuch Abuſes. However, Julian ſignifies in this his Edict, that ſome there were who through baſe Fictions or Lies had thruſt themſelves into Places, which ought to have been conferred upon good and deſerving Perſons; and others have written that Offices in the time of Conſtantius were ſet to Sale, which muſt have been then meant of the inferiour ſort, and ſuch as were removed from his own Obſervation; for indeed it was impoſſible but that one who was ſo ſerved by Eunuchs and other Flatterers, ſhould be ſometimes over-reached in beſtowing inferiour Places of Magiſtracy. But however as to the Law, it was neither allowed to give nor to receive any Gifts of this Nature. Yet if ſuch a thing had hapned, he that had received, and was in Poſſeſſion was ever eſteemed to have both the more legal and more plauſible Title; and for as much as the Roman Laws (ſo Julian tells us in this Edict) are utterly Strangers to ſuch Contracts, he takes away all Power of recovering Money ſo diſhoneſtly imployed. But in caſe any ſhould endeavour to recover ſuch Money, or get it back into his Hands, he ſhould not only loſe it, or return it to the Party, but forfeit as much more to the Publick Treaſury. Now this Conſtitution reſpects only the time paſt, and gives order in ſuch caſes as were then in Controverſie; but afterwards ſeveral other Laws were made by ſucceeding Princes, both for puniſhing in the ſame ſort ſuch as had uſed Bribery for the obtaining of Preferment, and for prevention of the Sale of Honours and Offices, even by way of Oaths, as we may ſee in due time. For this practice ſtill returned, as Princes became obnoxious to their Freed-men, Eunuchs and Courtiers; and hard it was utterly to prevent it; for, though the Emperours, as we ſee by Conſtantius, might be ſeverely careful, that in Places near them and under their Eyes, none but fit and experienc'd men ſhould be preferred; yet they could not know all Perſons, nor out of their own Acquaintance make proviſion for the Supply of thoſe Numerous Employments and Charges through this vaſt Empire. Such they muſt take as thoſe about them recommended, ſo that (as was formerly ſaid) the work of a Prince, eſpecially lyes in chuſing ſuch Eyes and Ears about him as he may truſt, in what he cannot ſee and hear himſelf: Ill management when it happens begins moſt commonly here, and Government is hereby rendred as Culpable and Infirm, as the Growth and Nouriſhment of the Body perverted, when the firſt Concoction thereof is vitiated.

Unde velut æquitate ipſa dictante, Lex eſt promulgata quâ cavetur nullum interpellari ſuffragatorem ſuper his quæ eum rectè conſtiterit accepiſſe. Amm.

L. 1. *Si certum petatur de Suffragiis, Cod. Th. lib.*2. *tit.*29.

Abeſt à Cod. J*uſtin.*

Examinator meritorum nonnunquam ſcrupuloſus P*alatinas Dignitates velut ex quodam tribuens perpendiculo; & ſub eo nemo celſum aliqnid acturus in Regia, repentinus adhibitus eſt vel incognitus: ſed qui poſt decennium, &c.--- non niſi pulvere bellico indurati præficiebantur armatis. lib.* 21.

Sed quia leges Romanæ hujuſmodi contractus, penitùs ignorant, &c.

7. When

Sect. 5.

A. D. 362. Mamertino & Nevitta Coſs.

He ſhowes much Affectation in all his Wayes.

7. When the firſt day of the year was come (on which this Law beareth Date) which gave beginning to the Conſulſhip of Mamertinus and Nevitta, the Emperour himſelf condeſcended ſo far as to walk on Foot with the reſt, at the (a) Solemnity, which ſome commended as the Effect of his Humility, but others condemned as below him and proceeding from Affectation. But this Affectation he began every day more and more to ſhew. He himſelf would manumitt the Slaves, they being introduced forſooth by the Proximus Admiſſionum, till he was told, that that Juriſdiction now belonged to another, Being acquainted that Maximus the Philoſopher was come to ſee him out of Aſia, in an unſeemly ſort he leaped up, and forgetting what Perſon he was, ran as faſt as his Legs would carry him a great way out of Doors, fell upon him and kiſſed him, and then brought him in with great Ceremony; which rendred him (b) ridiculous for his unſeaſonable Oſtentation, and immoderate thirſt after vain Glory. And in the Opinion of Ammianus herein he forgot that Saying of Tully, by which he and ſuch like are cenſured. viz. Thoſe very Philoſophers even to thoſe Books which they write againſt Vain Glory, prefix their own Names, with Deſign, that by that very Act whereby they deſpiſe Honour and Fame, they themſelves may be ſpoken of and commended. Not long after, two of thoſe Agentes in Rebus, who had been turned out, came confidently to him, and offered, on Condition they might be reſtored, to diſcover to him Florentius the late Præfect; but he reviled them and worthily called them Informers, adding withal that it was not the part of an Emperour by any indirect Diſcoveries, to find out a man who concealed himſelf for Fear of Death, and who perhaps would not long be ſuffered to lye concealed without Hope of Pardon. But he not only endeavoured a Reformation in civil Matters; into the Affairs of the Camp he alſo made diligent Inſpection. He preferred ſuch to Commands as he knew well experienc'd, reinforced the Cities of Thrace, and was very careful that neither Arms, Clothes, Proviſions, nor Pay ſhould be wanting to thoſe Souldiers whom he underſtood to have gallantly demeaned themſelves upon the Limits of Iſter, againſt the Incurſions of the Barbarous Nations. In Reference to what Ammianus thus diſcourſeth, concerning his Care about the Proviſions of Souldiers; there is a Law of his extant in the Code, and dated on the ſixth of this ſame month of January. When they were in their March, their Proviſions both for Horſe and Men were all found them and brought to their hand; but when in Garriſon or their Quarters, the Provincials were not bound to bring it, but they themſelves looked out, as for other things, for Straw and Provender. Now leſt they ſhould range too far, or be too much ſtraitned, by this Edict directed to Salluſt the Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt, he ordains that their Purveyance ſhall extend twenty Miles.

(a) Ludos intellige quos menſe Jan. Coſs. edere conſueverant ex ante diem 3. Non. Jan. in Urbe per continuum triduum Per Provincias in majoribus Civitatibus Circenſes iſti quoque à die 3. Non. Jan. à Magiſtratibus edebantur ut ex Libanio notat. Valeſius.

(b) At id factum prædicat. Libanius.

He reforms Matters relating to the Camp.

L. 7. de Erogatione militaris Annonæ. Milites ad viceſimum lapidem capitum petere juſſimus Dat. 8. Id. Jan. Mamertino & Nevita Coſs.

8. Having ſetled Matters relating to the Army as he thought convenient, he was adviſed by his Followers to fall upon the Goths, a fallacious and perfidious People; but he anſwered that he look'd for a more noble Enemy; and as for them, the Galatian Merchants would do their Buſineſs, by whom they were ſold up and down; and yet, notwithſtanding his Preſumption and ſlighting of them, this deſpiſed People afterward made bold to purchaſe by their Blood, and poſſeſs by their Sword a great Part of the Roman Empire. But Ammianus further tells us, that thus carefully demeaning himſelf, he became famous to Foreign Nations, and by Degrees filled the World with the Renown of his Fortitude, Sobriety, Military Skill, and eminency in all other Virtues. And the Dread of him being ſpred to the ſame Extent, Ambaſſdours were now ſent to him from all Quarters. Here he gives us an Enumeration, as if he repeated the Epigram concerning the Spectacula commonly aſcribed to Martial. The Armenians and thoſe beyond Tigris now begged Peace, and the Indians, from Countries yet more Eaſtward, by the hands of their Noble men made him Preſents. From the Southern Parts of the World, the Moores offered him their Service. From the Northern, and where the River Phaſis falls into the Sea, the Boſphorani and other Nations till that time unknown became humble Suppliants; that, for a yearly Acknowledgment, they might be permitted to live quietly in their own Countries. Thoſe Addreſſes cauſed no ſmall Joy at Court, which was farther increaſed by News out of Italy, that the Weſt might alſo contribute her Share. For now News was brought that they within Aquileia, convinced that Conſtantius was dead, had ſurrendred the Place. Julian with theſe Felicities was much elevated, and began now to entertain Fancies and Deſigns, which exceeded the Bounds of humane Nature. He look'd upon himſelf as one, whom governing the Roman World in Peace and Tranquillity, Fortune preſented with a Cornucopia of all good things, and to his former Trophies, he added this great Favour, that while he reigned alone (how long it was we ſhall ſhortly ſee) he was neither diſturb-

Galatæ venaliciarii erant & ſervitia vendebant.

He is courted by all Nations.

Quæ tam ſepoſita eſt, quæ gens tam barbara Cæſar. Ex qua &c.

And wonderfully elevated.

ed by any Inteſtine Diſorders, nor any of the Barbarous Nations adventured out of their own Bounds; but all ſorts of People, being ever violently bent to diſcommend what is paſt, as very bad, wonderfully admired and commended him. Having diſpoſed of all things, as Time and Place required, and by frequent Speeches, as well as by Pay, animated the Souldier to ſuch Undertakings as he ſhould put him upon, he reſolved to remove from Conſtantinople; which City he very much favoured, as the Place of his Nativity, though elſe it had doubtleſs been unacceptable to him, by reaſon of its Founder, and the Name from him received. Zoſimus writes, that he continued ten Months in this City, but from the Dates of ſuch Laws as he made this Year, it is evident, that the time is to be contracted within Eight, or thereabouts. For, during his Reſidence here, ſeveral other Edicts he Publiſhed upon various Occaſions, of which we muſt take notice, at leaſt, ſuch of them as moſt lead to the Illuſtration of the Hiſtory or Polity of theſe Times, before we follow him hence to Antioch.

Aviditate ſemper inſectandi præterita ut damnoſa & noxia.

Ll. 6, 7. de Numerariis, actuariis, &c. Cod. Th. lib. 8. tit. 1.

Makes a Law for reſtraining the Avarice of Numerarii.

9. Two of theſe Laws he made for reſtraining the Avarice and Corruption of the Numerarii, Officers of whom we have formerly ſpoken, who, amongſt other Matters, having the Accounts of Corporations in their hands, often play'd the Knaves either with them or the Publick. He therefore makes them lyable to Examination by Torture, for the better Diſcovery of their Cheats: Ordains, that " having been employed five years in the Publick Accounts, they be out of Service " and all Employment the ſixth, that ſo they may be more liable to Accuſations; " but after ſeven years, in caſe they have well demeaned themſelves, and either have " been burthened with none, or anſwered all Accuſations, he then will have them " enjoy the Dignity of the Perfectiſſimatus. We have lately ſeen how at his firſt coming to the Monarchy he employed Salluſt his Præfect and others, in the Tryal of ſuch as had the Repute of being Enemies to him and his Brother Gallus. While they were at this Work, and might have occaſion to Examine and Cenſure ſeveral that bore the Dignity of Senators, he directed an Edict to Salluſt, bearing Date of the Nones of February, for moderating the Rigour of ſuch Proceedings againſt Perſons of that Quality. Although by the Cuſtom of the Roman Empire, ſome ſorts of Perſons, when accuſed of Crimes, were not ſhut up in cloſe Priſon, yet, till they were tryed, and either acquitted or condemned, they were wont to be held in a ſort of Cuſtody by the Apparitor, Agens in Rebus, or Meſſenger that had been ſent to fetch them up. Now Julian by this Edict, not only Ordains, in ſuch caſes, that the Antient Right of Senators, and Authority of that Order, be preſerved inviolable from " all Injury in general, but particularly Commands, that ſuch being Accuſed, be- " fore their Tryal, have no cauſe of Terrour offered to them, but be void of all Ca- " lumny and Suſpition; and (what is moſt) be abſolutely free and at liberty till " ſuch time as they be either Convicted, or confeſs the Crime; in which caſe, he ac- " knowledges them to have incurred Deprivation. Indeed ſuch as were only accuſed, though of Capital Crimes, though they could not be admitted to new Honours, or Preferments, their Cauſe depending, yet, till their Tryal retained their former Dignity; in like manner, as by the Canon Law, a Biſhop, before he be heard and condemned, ought not to be deprived of his Biſhoprick. And, as to Senators, they were wont to be kept in free and honourable Cuſtody, neither at their Tryal were they bound to ſtand, but they might ſit, though upon a Seat inferiour to the Bench of their Judges. As a Senator retained his Dignity till Tryed, ſo was it agreeable enough that he ſuffered no Injury, Reproach or Moleſtation, as Guilty, before ſuch time as he ſo appeared; but in point of Liberty, that he ſhould be abſolutely free, and in no Cuſtody at all; this was ſuch a Privilege as could not comport with the Publick Safety, giving leave to Offenders, how Criminal and Dangerous ſoever, to make their Eſcapes, and avoid their being made Examples; which ought to be the end of all Puniſhments. Therefore was this Indulgence to Senators afterward taken away, and when Juſtinian's Code came to be compoſed, the former Part of this Law, which ſpeakes of the Preſervation of their Rights and Authority, only was inſerted into it; the latter part concerning this new Privilege granted by Julian being left out. But the reaſon he gives, is, becauſe he reckons himſelf alſo one of their Order or Rank, as ſeveral Princes both before and after him, have alſo expreſſed themſelves, though without the Grant of ſo dangerous a Privilege. Hence was the Emperours own Houſe ſubject to that Charge which was called Onus Glebale, and was proper to Senators. And the Daughter of a Senator could not marry to one whoſe Father had been a Slave.

Another in behalf of Senators.

L. 1. de exhibendis vel tranſmittendis Reis Cod. Th. lib. 9. tit. 2.

Lex 8. Cod. Juſtin. de Dignitatibus hinc deſumpta eſt.

Vide Gothofred. in L.

Jus Senatorum & auctoritatem ejus ordinis in quo nos quoque ipſos eſſe numeramus, neceſſe eſt ab omni injuria defendere.

Another for Confiſcation of their Eſtates if Traitors.

10. But, though Julian was thus indulgent to Senators before Conviction; yet when condemned or proſcribed he was as ſevere in the Point of the Confiſcation of their

Sect. 5.

A. D. 362.

their Eſtates. For, having been informed that ſome there were that concealed their Goods; by an Edict directed to Felix the Comes Largitionum, he commands, that ſuch Concealers if they be Rich, be alſo proſcribed; and if they be Poor, and thereby as he phraſeth it, be abject as far as the Dreggs, and baſeneſs of Plebeians, that then they be put to Death. This Law is ſaid to have been publiſhed at Rome, on the ninth of March, where the Habitations of ſeveral Senators proſcribed by Julian upon the Account of him and his Brother, were. But whereas this Felix his Comes Largitionum was an Apoſtate as well as himſelf, this Direction of the Edict to him hath induced Baronius to believe, that he intended it againſt ſuch as concealed the goods of proſcribed Chriſtians; it ordinarily hapning that none are ſo zealous and furious in their Way as Apoſtates. Indeed the Penalty is ſevere to all Extremity; and might become as an Apoſtate to enact, ſo alſo a Fugitive from his Religion to execute. But, beſides that there were thoſe that he proſcribed upon the Account of him and his Brother, and as Zonaras writes, he baniſhed many, and confiſcated their Goods, ſo Chriſtians he did not now proſcribe as Chriſtians, neither in the Beginning of his Reign did he perſecute them, but cunningly and underhand endeavour to undermine them and their Religion. He was now rather acted by the pleaſant Paſſion of Revenge which when backed by Supream Power ſeldom knows moderate Bounds. There were ſeveral that had done ill Offices with Conſtantius; that had helped on his Brother to his deſerved end, and eſteeming him perhaps an Uſurper, as well as fearing him, had tampered about promoting others to the Imperial Dignity. Of the Proceſs framed againſt theſe Perſons he himſelf makes mention in a Letter written by him at this time to Hermogenes the Præfectus Auguſtalis of Ægypt, and beginning with a Rapture. He prayes him to permit him with the Poets to ſay Oh how beyond Hope am I preſerved! Oh Meſſage beyond all Expectation that I have eſcaped, not ſo much that Hydra with many heads my Brother Conſtantius (he was as he was) but the wild Beaſts his Attendants, who endeavoured to murther one with their very Eyes, and made him more cruel than he had been elſe, who was not very merciful neither of himſelf, though to many he appeared ſo to be. But ſeeing he is dead let him go as the Proverb is; as for them, Jupiter knows I would not have them ſuffer unjuſtly, but becauſe they have many Accuſers they are called to their Tryal. As for thee my Friend, endeavour, even above thy Power, to be with me, for I proteſt to the Gods I deſire to ſee thee, and rejoycing to hear thou art in good Health, command thee to come. Thus he writes to his dear Hermogenes, whoſe Preſence poſſibly he requires at the Tryal of thoſe Criminals. As for his Proteſtation that he would not have them to be puniſhed unjuſtly, compare it with what Ammianus writes concerning Urſulus, Taurus and others.

Quidam ſcelerate proſcriptorum Facultates occultant. Hos præcipimus, ſi locupletes ſint, proſcriptione puniri: ſi per Egeſtatem abjecti ſunt in fæcem vilitatemque plebeiam, damnatione capitali debita luere detrimenta. P. P. Rom. 7. Id Mart. Mamertino & Nevitta Coſs. 362. Abeſt à Cod. Juſtin. Vide Goth.

Juliani Imp. Epiſtola. 23. p. 141.

He makes good Laws about the management of the Curſus Publicus.

11. Whether or no as to this Point he conſulted his Paſſion, we determine not; but another Law he made about this time which tended much to the publick Service. Conſtantius, as we have ſeen, by ſeveral Edicts took great Care of the Curſus Publicus, both as to the reſtraint of the too common Uſe made of it, and reforming other Abuſes in it's management. But the Remedies were not potent enough to conquer the Diſeaſe. What by reaſon of the too much hagling them about through perpetual Imployment, (much occaſion'd by the Travel of Biſhops to ſo many Synods as were held during his Reign) and the Neglect of them by their Keepers, the Beaſts that drew the Waggons were moſt of them tired out, and not able to travel, toward the latter end of his Days, if we may believe Libanius in an Oration compoſed in Honour of Julian. Conſtantius to prevent their too frequent Uſe had taken away the Power of granting Licenſes, from the Governours of Provinces; but they had reaſſumed the Privilege either by his particular Command, or of their own Heades, and by Connivence. Of this, Julian by an Edict directed to Mamertinus the Præfectus Prætorio taking Notice, abrogates fully the Power of granting Licenſe, to all Perſons except him and his Brethren the Præfects. But that publick Affairs may not be hindred, he tells him that he himſelf will with his own Hands give to Vicars ten or twelve Courſes, and they the Præfects ſhould grant to Præſidents two yearly, that thereby they may upon urgent Occaſions ſend their Officers into the moſt remote Parts of their Provinces: and beſides when there was any need of conſulting him or referring to him; upon ſuch Emergencies he himſelf would grant them particular Licenſes. Hence it is that ſome write how Julian taught his Subjects either to keep Horſes and carriage-Beaſts of their own, or to hire when they had Occaſion, and not to burthen the Publick Courſe deſtined only to publick Service; as for ſending down the Emperours Commands, Conveyance of Ambaſſadours * or Meſſengers to him, and of the publick Revenue to the Court: in a Word, as Caſſiodorus expreſſeth it, whatſoever almoſt was tranſacted

L. 12. de Curſu Publico &c. Acc. 8. Kal. Mart. Syracuſis Mamertino & Nevitta Coſs. Abeſt à Cod. Juſtin.

* ut pene quicquid in Rep. geritur, Curſuali Miniſterio Compleatur. Var. lib. 5. Ep. 5.

ed in the Commonwealth, was performed by the Service and Convenience of the Curſus. Now to Vicars, as being Officers of greater Dignity, by their Place Spectabiles, and the Juriſdiction of whom extended to a whole Diœceſe; he gives more Courſes and that by his own Hand than he allows by the Præfects to be granted to the Præſidents and Conſulares, who were but Perfectiſſimi or Clariſſimi by Degree; and governed but particular Provinces. But this law was, too ſtrictly worded at leaſt; and that in Reference to the Conveyance of the publick Money to the Treaſury, and of the Souldiers Clothes (both which are ſignified by Species Largitionales) without which nothing could be done either at Home or abroad. For, the Vicars were not alwayes preſent to give out Licenſes upon theſe Occaſions; and therefore by another Edict, directed to the ſame Mamertinus, he explains and mendes his former; giving Power to all Governours of Provinces in their Abſence to grant them; but this upon Suggeſtion of the Comes Largitionum and the Præpoſiti, or Officers belonging to the Revenue, which Valentinian afterwards confirming calls a moſt prudent or adviſed Law. Yet did not Julian think it ſo prudent as fully to provide againſt Abuſes of a thing of ſo vaſt Conſequence to the Empire. For within three Moneths after he found it requiſite, by another Conſtitution ſtill directed to the ſame Præfect, to inflict no leſs than capital Puniſhment upon him that ſhould uſe more Horſes or Beaſts than his Warrant or Licenſe expreſſed. There are two more Laws aſcribed to Julian concerning this Subject, whereof the former will be more conveniently mentioned upon another Occaſion, and the other though it bears his Name, yet by the Subſcription it ſhould rather belong to his Succeſſor. However, here it will be convenient to take Notice that it hath relation to the publick Courſe of the Province of Sardinia, and the eaſe of the Inhabitants of that Iſland. For, Sardinia lying out of the way, there being no Road through it into any other Province, Julian (or Jovian) thinks fit that the People be not put to any Expenſe for the finding of Horſes; or if there was any Occaſion to go Poſt, the Officers of the Præſident he declares ſhall find themſelves Horſes upon ſuch neceſſary Occaſions. But whereas there was great Uſe of the Angariæ or Carriages drawn by Oxen for Conveyance of Corn (for this Iſland as well as the adjacent Sicily, was a Nurſe of the City of Rome) to the ſeveral Ports, of which there were ſeven in number; he ordains that the Uſe of them continue; and that Mamertinus under whoſe Juriſdiction this Iſland lay, ſhould ſettle ſuch Order about them, as he thought moſt convenient.

L. 13. eod. Acc. 12. Kal. Jul. eod. An. Abeſt à Cod. Juſtin.

Conſultiſſimam legem.

L. 14. eod. Dat. 5. Id. Sept. eod. An. Prior pars H. L. abeſt à Cod. Juſtin.

L. 16. eod. Dat. 7. Kal. Septemb. Antiochiæ Julian. A. & Salluſtio Coſs. A.D 363.

Veredi & Paraveredi.

12. There is another Law made by him, while he ſtill reſided at Conſtantinople, which is not ſo remarkable of it ſelf, as for the manner and circumſtances of the making of it. For, the Title of it ſhews plainly the manner of the Emperour's proceeding in Conſiſtory, or when he ſate in Council, in theſe words: Part of the Acts had before the Emperour Julian Auguſtus, when Mamertinus and Nevita were Conſuls, on the three and twentieth of March at Conſtantinople, in Conſiſtory; there ſtanding by Jovius, of the Dignity of Clariſſimus, the Quæſtor; Anatolius the Magiſter Officiorum; Felix the Comes Sacrarum Largitionum, &c. The Emperour Julian Auguſtus ſaid: after which follows a Sentence given by him in Greek concerning the Validity of Writings, that Credit be afforded to ſuch, as by others are not proved to be counterfeit or invalid. Now this Law, which is very ſingular and remarkable in divers reſpects, is one of that ſort called Cognitionales, or which the Emperour, having cogniſance of a Cauſe debated before him in Council, pronounced and Enacted thereupon; of which kind there are others in the Code of Theodoſius. It's called Part of the Acts or Records, becauſe a Book or Record was kept of all done or tranſacted in Conſiſtory, as from the time of Henry the Eighth it hath been the conſtant cuſtom in the Privy Council of England, which, in ſeveral reſpects, reſembles that of the Emperour. In whatſoever place he conſulted with his Council, that Place was called the Conſiſtory, be it where he would. Here is expreſſed the compoſition of his Conſiſtory or Council, of whom it conſiſted, and though only three be mentioned, viz. the Quæſtor, Magiſter Officiorum, and Comes S. L.; yet by the &c. others are underſtood to have been preſent, compriſed, as well as theſe, amongſt the Comites Conſiſtoriani, of whom heretofore. In the next place may be obſerved, the Place and Precedence of theſe Great Officers, in the time of Julian, what it was. Again, we may take notice of the Ceremony of theſe Dayes, and what reſpect the Councellors bare to ſo great a Majeſty as that of the Emperour; for while he ſate, they ſtood by him, and much more did the Parties and Advocates concerned in the Cauſe: a Poſture very fit to ſhew their Diſtance; the Ceremony of being uncovered not being then in faſhion, as in after-Ages: And yet there are ſeveral Inſtances in Hiſtories, of the ſitting of theſe Conſiſtorians with the Emperour. Further, we may ſee how Another Law which ſhews us the manner of the Conſiſtory.

Pars Actorum habitorum apud Imp. Julianum Aug. Mamertino & Nevitta Coſs. 10 Kal. April. Conſtantinop. in Conſiſtorio. adſtante viro cl. Jovio Quæſtore; Anatolio Magiſtro Officiorum; Felice. Com. S. L. & Imp. Julianus A. dixit. Τηνικαῦτα γϱαμμάτια &c.

L. 5. de fide Teſtium & Inſtrument. Cod. Th. lib. 11. Tit. 39. Abeſt à Cod. Juſtin.

Sect. 5.

A. D. 362.

how the Rule of Entring things down in the Conſiſtory, was, to prefix the Names of ſuch Councellors as were preſent (at leaſt ſome, and the choiſe of them) as our Clerks of the Council practiſe at this day. And in the laſt place, we cannot but take notice of a Novelty, which expreſſes the Humour and Affectation of the preſent Emperour. It was the Cuſtom before his time, that the Emperours, when in Conſiſtory, gave their Sentence, or pronounced their Decree in Latin, as the Language of the Empire, to preſerve the Grandeur and Majeſty of Rome, from which, all muſt needs be acknowledged to have proceeded; though Neceſſity of Affairs might urge Princes to have their Reſidence,at leaſt ſometimes,at another Place more conveniently ſituate for Defence and Succour of the Provinces. But Julian his Vanity now broke the Courſe, who, as appears from Ammianus, was, not without occaſion, (ſaith Gothofred) derided with the Names of Loquax Talpa, and Literio Græculus, and out of this Affected Humour he inſerted Greek words into his Conſtitutions. As for other Laws, viz. Reſcripts or Edicts, ſometimes they were Publiſhed in both Languages; and for this reaſon, as Juſtinian renders it, that being in Greek, they might be underſtood by more, and in Latin, to obſerve the Form and Decorum of the Empire. In Publick Aſſemblies they ſpake in Latin, and had an Interpreter, as Conſtantine the Great in the Council of Nice: But ſome time after, eſpecially when the Weſtern Provinces were over-run, and there was not ſo much Uſe of Latin, Greek was generally ſpoken by them, as beſt underſtood both by Speaker and Hearers, and the Roman Tongue by degrees began to be diſuſed, till Juſtinian reſtored to the Empire its Weſtern Provinces; and preſented it with a new Model of its Laws, dreſſed up in its own Language. But after his time all went to wreck again.

Illud igitur Juliani Imp. vanitati adſcribendum fuerit, quem olim meritò Loquacem Talpam & literionem Græculum carpebant, teſte Amm. Marcellino, lib. 17. Vide Gothofr. in L.

13. This Law, made in Conſiſtory, as we ſaid, was of little Concernment, the Preamble being only of Uſe; but about a Month after, he made another Conſtitution, wherein his Subjects, whether of Conſtantinople (for whom poſſibly he principally intended it, being ſaid to have done ſo many things for that City) or other Places, were much concerned, at leaſt, as he believed: the thing was this. It was the cuſtome of old time, that, when the Roman Generals had performed ſome notable Matter, the Provinces, the aſſociate States and Kings preſented them with Golden Crowns, or a quantity of Gold it ſelf, therewith to grace their Tri- and this was called Aurum Coronarium, being a thing of courſe, not only amongſt the Romans, but the Greeks alſo. When Claudius triumphed over our Country of Britain, amongſt other Golden Crowns, the hithermoſt Spain preſented him with one of ſeven pounds weight, and Gallia Comata with another weighing nine. To Titus, for his Conqueſt of Judæa, were Crowns ſent by Vologeſus King of the Parthians,and to ſucceeding Princes the ſame, by others, upon like occaſions; for, Hiſtories other Books afford many other Examples; which from Victories were drawn at laſt to other Emergencies, ſo that the Provincials preſented this Gold alſo, and that by Cuſtome, as good as Law, when any remarkable matter of Joy hapned, as at the coming of a Prince to the Government, upon his Adoption, or any Pardon or Indulgence granted the Subject. But Julian, now, by an Edict, declares, That " it is a free Gift, and depends meerly upon the Will, without any Neceſſity, " (to which Cuſtome, and the Greedineſs of ſome Emperours, had brought it) ly- " ing either upon Senators or any other ſort of People. Not but that he himſelf received theſe Crowns, or Gold that was preſented him by Cities and Provinces at his Arrival there, or in ſome other gratulatory Addreſs; as particularly from the Inhabitants of Edeſſa, and from the Saracens; but herein he alſo practiſed Moderation, commanding that no Crown ſhould exceed ſeventy Solidi in value. Yet doth he acknowledge, that ſometimes Neceſſity of Affairs may require the Exaction of this Gold, but in ſuch caſe he will not have others to be Judges (as the Præfecti Prætorio) but reſerves the Power of Determining when it is fit to accept of this voluntary Preſent (or require it) to himſelf. This Law bears Date on the twenty ninth of April, and on the day following another there we find though not concerning the ſame matter, yet of the ſame Nature, viz. of Indulgence toward the Subject; ſo that Gothofred rationally concludes them but ſeveral Parts of one and the ſame Conſtitution. Sometimes there had been Indulgences granted to particular Perſons or Places, whereby they were diſcharged, by ſingular Privilege, from the Duty and Burthen of the Capitatio heretofore mentioned; but it ſeems betwixt them and the Officers that collected that part of the Revenue, Diſputes were at this time wont to ariſe, how far or to what thoſe Privileges did extend. Now he follows that Rule in Law which directs us in ambiguous things to the moſt favourable Interpretation, explaining by ſuch Indulgence and Immunity a full Diſcharge not only

By another Edict he declares the Aurum Coronarium to be a meer free gift.

L. 1. *de Auro Coronario, Cod. Th. l.*12.*tit.*13. Dat. 3 Kal. Maii, Mamertino & Nevitta Coſs. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt. Vide Com.

L. 2. *de Immunitate Conceſſa, Cod. Th. lib.*11. tit. 12. Abeſt & hæc à Cod. Juſt.

In ambiguis favorabilior ſententia eſt ſequenda.

from the Payment of the Grain called Species Annonaria, but the other Species wont to be paid in by the Provincials, as Cloaths for Souldiers, Gold, Silver, Braſs or the like. And yet could there not be ſo great Difficulty in what was meant by Capitatio; by it being ſignified all thoſe Payments made in reſpect of Lands, and for Heads in what Species ſoever, as Gothofred obſerves; but Julian ſubjoyns a Reaſon, not taken at all from Law, but for oſtentation of his own Humanity or Indulgence, of which, many Examples may be produced out of the Laws, and from elſewhere.

Et rationem addit non Juris vel ἔνταχνον, verum ἄτεχνον & oſtendandæ tantum Humanitatis & Indulgentiæ ſuæ.

He takes care of Phyſitians.

L. 4. de Medicis, Cod. Th. lib. 13. tit. 3. Dat. 4 Id. Maii Conſt. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

14. Of this Indulgence, about this very time, part he extended to the Profeſſors of Phyſick by another Edict, dated alſo at Conſtantinople, on the twelfth of May. What Privileges and Immunities had been granted by former Princes, and Confirmed with Enlargement by Conſtantine, we have already ſeen; but it ſhould ſeem that Conſtantius, his Son, had ſome way or other infringed their Liberties, or elſe Julian gave another proof of his vanity and oſtentation in this particular. For, beginning with a Preface, how the Art of Medicine is by Uſe it ſelf demon“ſtrated to be healthful to Mankind, upon which Account the Philoſophers not “improperly affirm it to have come down from Heaven, the Infirmity of our Nature, “and the Impairments of our Health, which daily happen, being hereby relieved; “thereupon he Ordains, by his Humanity, as Reaſon requires, therein following the “Authority and determination of former Emperours, that for the time to come, “they the Phyſitians, ſhall be free'd from all publick Services. The Edict only, or Sanction is now inſerted into the Code of Theodoſius, but all the whole Law both Preface and Sanction is ſtill extant amongſt his Epiſtles, with this Difference from the other, that what the Edict in the Code expreſſeth concerning publick Services, this other ſpeakes of thoſe belonging to the Curiæ or publick Councils of Corporations, to which a former Conſtitution of Conſtantine hath a particular Reſpect. Now this Edict is directed to the Archiatri in the Code; though amongſt the Epiſtles, the Title expreſſeth it to be Julian's Law concerning Phyſitians in general. But by Archiatri are meant thoſe who practiſed, though to private Perſons, within the two Cities of Rome, and Conſtantinople, whence the Law bears Date, and where ſtill Julian reſided. For by this Appellation were not meant anciently thoſe who were the principal Phyſitians, but they were ſo called who were either Phyſitians to the Prince himſelf in his Palace, or Phyſitians to the two principal Cities; wherein they alſo had Publick Allowances, that they might take care of the Poor as well as the Rich; neither had they only this Title which were Principals, or preſided in the College, as ſome have imagined, but all of them were indifferently ſo called. But thus we have given Account of ſuch Laws as Julian made, whilſt at Conſtantinople, and are proper for us here to mention. Now let us follow him in his Progreſs Eaſtward.

Ep. 26. p. 154. ἡμετέρα φιλανθρωπία κελεύομεν τῶν βȣλευτικῶν λειτȣργημάτων ἀνενοχλήτȣς ὑμᾶς τοῖς λοιποῖς χρόνοις διάγειν. Ἰȣλιανȣ͂ νόμος περὶ τῶν Ἰατρῶν.

He removes to Nicomedia.

15. Having croſſed over into Aſia, he paſſed through Chalcedon, and Libyſſa, (where Hannibal was buried) and thence came to Nicomedia, at preſent a famous City (though much more famous, had it not been for Conſtantinople;) a City ſo inlarged and beautified by the Care and Expence of former Princes, that in reſpect of the multitude both of Publick and Private Buildings, to thoſe that knew it well, it ſeemed one of the Regions of the Eternal City, ſaith Ammianus, meaning Rome. When he ſaw how her Walls were now reduced to Aſhes, he bewailed with tears her Condition, and with a ſlow and mournful pace paſſed on towards the Palace, but eſpecially when he beheld how ragged and deſpicable the Inhabitants were that met him, though heretofore in ſo flouriſhing a Condition; and ſome he remembred that were akin to Euſebius the Biſhop, by whom he had been brought up. Being now moving toward the Eaſt, and deſigning in his Head to attempt ſomething againſt the Perſian, for which End he made all the preparations Ammianus ſpeaks of; one Law he paſſed, while he ſtaid in this City, for the Eaſe of the Countreys, through which his Armies were to march. The Provinces were bound to find the Souldier Proviſions for Man and Horſe as we have ſeen, which Burthen it concerned the Emperours to render as light as might be, and that no needleſs thing ſhould be required. Therefore were they wont to ſet certain times to the Payment of the ſeveral Duties, as might be moſt for the Eaſe of the Provinces: the Provincials were allowed to ſerve the Army with new Wine, from the Moneth of November; it being cheaper than the old; and now by an Edict Julian commands that Meat for “Horſes ſhall not be furniſhed by them till the firſt of Auguſt, for this Reaſon, as “is conceived, becauſe in the Summer-time there was graſs enough to be had, and they might eaſily put them out to feed in all Places. Having enacted this Law, and taken order for repairing thoſe Breaches which the Earthquake had made upon the Place, he removed from Nicomedia, and, by Nice, came to the Borders of Galatia, where Nicomedienſis Euſebius Arianæ factionis columen, primò Beryti, deinde Nicomediæ Epiſcopus, tandemque Paulo pulſo Conſtantinop. ſedem tenuit.

Prepares for a War againſt the Perſians.

L. 8. de Erogatione Militaris Annonæ, Dat. Nicomediæ.

And marches toward the Eaſt.

where he turned on the Right hand toward Paſſinus, there to ſee the old Temple of the Mother of the Gods, whence in the ſecond Punick War Scipio Naſica, conveyed her Image to Rome, by reaſon of an Hint thereof given by the Verſes of Sibylla Cumana.

16. Having here done his Devotions, at no leſs Expence than of Sacrifices and Vowes, he returned to Ancyra; and in his Progreſs was ever importun'd by a Multitude of Suitors, of whom ſome deſir'd they might be reſtor'd to ſuch Poſſeſſions as had been violently taken from them, others complained that they were unjuſtly forced to the Service of Corporations, and ſome without Regard to any Decorum, ſo that they might gratifie their Malice, accuſed their Adverſaries of high Treaſon. But he being, as his Friend the Hiſtorian tells us, more ſevere than Caſſius or Lycurgus themſelves, fully weighed the Circumſtances of every mans Cauſe, and diſtributed Juſtice with all impartiality, but with a great Averſion towards Informers, whom he had Cauſe to hate, for having himſelf been indangered by them heretofore, whilſt a private Man. Of his Moderation in this point, he gives us one Example inſtead of many others. There was a certain Perſon who moſt vehemently accuſed another, to whom he bore a mortal Grudge, of no leſs than Treaſon; and when the Emperour took no Notice of it, he ſtill came, and every day renewed his Accuſation with much Clamour. At length he was asked who it was that he accuſed. He anſwered a Rich man in a Corporation; whereupon Julian demanded with a Smile, what Proof he had of the Crime, to which he replied, that He had made him a Garment of Purple Silk. Upon this he was bid be gone as frivolous and troubleſome; but ſtill he would not be quiet; whereupon Julian turning to the Comes Largitionum, bade him give this dangerous prating Fellow a pair of purple Shooes to carry to the man who he ſaid had got him a Veſt of the ſame Colour, that it might be known of what Value and Force ſuch Trifles as Hoſe and Shooes were, without being accompanied by ſufficient Power. But as theſe things are to be commended, ſaith our Writer, and to be emulated by good Governors, ſo another thing there was which was notably ſevere or bitter; for ſcarcely was there any one challenged by the Curiales, or thoſe of the Corporations, as lyable to their Burthens and Services, however enfranchiſed by Privileges, by long Service in the Warrs, or by an Original or Deſcent utterly eſtranged from them, who ever could obtain any Right at his Hands. Being come as far as Pylæ, or the Streights which divide Cappadocia from Cilicia, he received the Governour of the Province, whom he had known when he ſtudied at Athens, with a Kiſs; as the manner was; and taking him up into his Chariot carried him to Tarſus. And now drawing nigh to Antioch, that beautiful Head of the Eaſt, he was met and received with Vows, as if it had been ſome Deity; ſo that he could not but admire the Acclamations of the People which were made to him as a lucky Star now riſen upon the Eaſtern Parts. He entred the City at the time of the Celebration of the Adonia, or of the Lamentation of Venus for Adonis his being killed by a Boar; which was eſteemed to portend no good, that he ſhould make his Entry at ſuch time as the Place was full of ſorrowful Noiſes and Groans. This was toward the latter end of June, or after the Summer Solſtice, when Corn is fully ripe; for by Adonis is meant the Sun, which being in Winter kept under the Earth for the moſt part; our Hemiſphere, by the Ancients called Venus, is ſaid to lament him as killed by a Boar. The Boar repreſenting Winter as a Creature ruggid, fierce, and loving dirty Places.

An Inſtance of his Juſtice.

Ita illud amarum & notabile fuit.

Another of his rigid Severity.

He comes to Antioch.

Vide Macrobium in Saturn. lib. 1. c. 21.

17. The firſt thing done by Julian after his coming to Antioch, and related by Ammianus, is, an Example of his Patience and Mildneſs, a matter of light Moment he tells you to Appearance; but for all that to be admired, or wonderful. There was one Thalaſſius that had born the Office of Proximus Libellorum, whom he hated becauſe he had been an Enemy to his Brother Gallus; and upon this account he was prohibited to adore the Purple, or be in the Company of the Honorati at that Ceremony. This being taken Notice of by ſome that were at Law with him; the next day after, they came to the Emperour and clamour'd, that Thalaſſius his Enemy, by Force had taken away their Goods, which he knowing to be deſigned for the Ruine of the man, anſwered that he acknowledg'd that with him whom they ſpake of he was offended, and that for juſt Reaſon; but for as much as he himſelf was the more conſiderable Enemy they ought to ſit ſtill and be quiet till he had firſt received Satisfaction; and therewith he commanded the Præfect, who ſate by him, not to hear their Cauſe till he was reconciled to Thalaſſius, which ſhortly after came to paſs. While here he winter'd and ſpent his time according to his Wiſh, he indulged not himſelf in any of thoſe Pleaſures with which Syria abounded; but under a Show of Quiet, being intent upon hearing Cauſes judiciarily, no leſs difficult than matters concerning War, (b) was diſtracted by manifold Cares, with exquiſite dexterity weighing with himſelf how he might give every one his Due, and how beſt, by his juſt Decrees, Offenders might be puniſhed with Hic patientiæ ejus & lenitudinis documentum leve quidem apparuit ſed mirandum.

How he behaved himſelf there.

(a) Thalaſſius quippe relicto Chriſti cultu ad Deornm cultum tranſiit, & ita cum Juliano in gratiam rediit Plerique eo tempore idem factitarunt muneribus & hujuſmodi aſſentationibus à Juliano deliniti. Vide Valeſium in locum.

(b) Longo diverſa Gregor. Nazianz. in Julian. Orat. 4. p. 305.

Moderation, and the Innocent protected. For though our Hiſtorian confeſſeth he was otherwhiles impertinent or unſeaſonable in the Debates, by demanding at ſuch a time as was no whit proper, of what Religion each of them was that were at Law; yet were none of his Sentences or Determinations faulty, neither could it be proved that out of reſpect to Religion or any other thing, he deviated from the Courſe of Juſtice, to that of Partiality, which he ſhunned as ſome dangerous Rock. And this he could the better do, for that acknowledging the Levity and Heat of his Nature, he permitted the Præfects and thoſe about him, to reſtrain his Impetuoſity by ſeaſonable Hints; and he ſhewed that he was troubled at his Faults, and rejoyced in being corrected. When the Advocates that pleaded before him would applaud him, as one that perfectly underſtood what Reaſon was, he is reported to have ſaid in Anger, that he ſhould have rejoyced and been proud had he been commended by ſuch as durſt have reprehended him, had he done otherwiſe than well. Another Example Ammianus will give you, which yet alſo may ſtand for many, of his Clemency in hearing and deciding Cauſes; and this we ſhall alſo relate that we may not ſeem to omit any thing brought in his Commendation. There was a Woman had a Cauſe depending before him, and that againſt a Courtier, whom when ſhe ſaw amongſt the Protectors and girt with the uſual Girdle, being ſtruck with ſo unexpected a Sight, ſhe began to complain and make Diſturbance; but he bade her follow her Buſineſs, if ſhe found her ſelf concerned: for as for her Adverſary he was ſo girt that he might go more readily through the Dirt, and was not able to do her any Harm. In reſpect of theſe and other things (and he himſelf you muſt know daily ſaid it) old Juſtice, which being offended with the wickedneſs of mankind was by Aratus lifted up into Heaven, in his Reign returned back to Earth; if he had not done ſome things by his meer Will and Pleaſure and from no warrant of the Laws; and ſometimes by Errors clouded the manifold Courſes of his Glory, as his Hiſtorian wordeth it. Yet after many other things, he alſo amended certain Laws, cutting off their Ambuigities, and explaining fully what was commanded or forbidden by them. But that, ſaith he, was unmercifully and with perpetual Silence to be overwhelmed, that he prohibited Profeſſors of Rhetorick and Grammar to teach, if they were of the Chriſtian Religion. This, whereof Ammianus ſo much and juſtly complains, we ſhall further examine, and diſcover amongſt Matters peculiar to Religion. At preſent we ſhall take a View of the Laws themſelves made by him at this Time and Place, and ſee how far they diſcover ſuch Amendment as that Author writes of.

Ammianus his Relations concerning his Ju-ice and other tues, ut ipſe dicebat aſſiduè.

Ex Chryſoſtomo monet nos Valeſius hanc Juliani legem non ad ſolos Grammaticæ ac Rhetoricæ ſed etiam ad Medicinæ profeſſores pertinuiſſe.

19. The firſt which bears Date from this City of Antioch, is an Edict lately reſtored by Jacobus Gothofred, out of certain Manuſcripts, to the Code of Theodoſius, for impowering Governous of Provinces to aſſign inferior Judges, called Judices Pedanei for deciding ſmaller Cauſes. For better underſtanding hereof, it will not be amiſs to tell the Reader, that there were three ſorts of Cauſes in Reference to the Cogniſance of Judges. Some were of an inferior Sort, for determining whereof the Governors of Provinces were compelled to aſſign Pedaneous Judges, they being thought too much below their own Examination. The ſecond was that Sort which thoſe Governours were bound Ex Officio to hear in Perſon, neither could they aſſign any other to do it. And the third was ſuch as they might either hear themſelves, or appoint others to hear them. But in the time of the Tetrarchy of Diocleſian, Maximian, Galerius and Conſtantius, by whom the Vicars of the Præfecti Prætorio were conſtituted, the Power of the Governours of Provinces was much leſſened, Neceſſity being put upon them of hearing all Cauſes in Perſon, and the Power of aſſigning lower Judges utterly taken away, except in certain Caſes; as when they were ſo imployed in Buſineſs of an higher Nature, that they could not attend; or the Number of Cauſes was ſo great that they could not diſpatch them. But now by this Edict Julian gives them Power to aſſign other Judges “ promiſcuouſly in Matters of leſſer Moment, and for it this Reaſon, that there be “ ſome Cauſes wherein it is ſuperfluous for the Governour of the Province his Pre- “ ſence to be expected. Therefore are there three ſorts of Times and alſo of Laws to be diſtinguiſhed in Reference to the hearing and determining of ſmaller Matters. The firſt before the Reign of Diocleſian, when theſe Governours as Preſidents, Proconſuls, and the like, could not take Cogniſance of them, but referred them to other Judges. The ſecond in which they were conſtrained to hear them themſelves alone, which being a very great Burthen to them; the third was introduced by this Law, whereby they had Liberty either to hear them or cauſe others to do it at their Pleaſure. But as for theſe Pedaneous Judges, they were ſo called becauſe they judged on the Ground, or ſtanding on their Feet (as below the ordinary Governours, or Judges, who ſate upon Tribunalls or Judgment-Seats) and they only had the Hearing of inferiour Cauſes, but not Laws made by him at Antioch.

L. quædam, vel quæ primæ & ſecundæ interponitur in Editione poſtrema Gothofredi. de Officio Rectoris Provinciæ. lib. 1. Tit. 7. & Lex ult. Cod Juſt. de pedaneis Judicibus. Dat. 5. Kal. Aug. Antiochiæ Mamertino & Nevitta Coſs. A.D. 362. Lege 2. Cod. Juſt. de pedaneis Judicibus.

Vid. Notas in tit. 3. lib. 3. Cod. Juſt. de pedaneis Judic.

not any Juriſdiction. So that our Courts of Piepoudres ſomething reſembled theirs, both in Etymology, having their name alſo from Feet, and in the ſmallneſs of Matters therein determined.

A pied pes Gallicè, vide Cowelli Interpr. in voce.

He endeavours to make things cheaper than they could be.

Inter præcipua tamen & ſeria illud agere ſuperfluum videbatur, quod nulla probabili ratione, Suſceptæ popularitatis amore &c.

20. But Julian now lying at Antioch, and conſidering as he himſelf ſaith, what Multitudes of People flocked thither, both upon his own account, and of the Magiſtrates which attended him, thought with himſelf how he might provide againſt the Scarcity and Dearneſs of Proviſions thereupon like to follow. But herein he was acted by his Humour of Affectation, and Study of Popularity, which tranſported him into Courſes ſuperfluous; and founded upon no probable Reaſon, as Ammianus affirms, with this Obſervation, that a Cheapneſs forced in an inconvenient way is wont to beget Scarcity and Famine. And the Magiſtrates of the City openly demonſtrated to him that the thing could not be effected, yet would he not deſiſt from his Purpoſe, being of the ſame Diſpoſition, ſaith he, as his Brother Gallus, though not in point of Cruelty; yet for this Reaſon, he raged againſt them, though not by his Sword, by his pen, as Slanderers and contumacious Perſons; and other Miſchiefs followed hereupon, as we ſhall ſee hereafter. But to maintain this Popularity; whatever theſe Courſes were wherein the Citizens and he differed about bringing down the price of Proviſions (of which Ammianus is ſilent) he had full Liberty to order his own Houſe and Attendance as he pleaſed, ſo as to reduce them to a ſmaller Number, that leſs might ſuffice them. He began with his Protectores Domeſtici, of whom, ſome ever attending on his Perſon at Court, and others being allotted to other Quarters in the Provinces, as their Defence required; to the former ſort, viz. thoſe that were called Præſentales, or in waiting, he commanded by an Edict directed to Secundus the Præfectus Prætorio, the uſual Allowance both for “ Man and Horſe to be given; but ordered the reſt away to their ſeveral Limits or “ Stations. Obliging the Antiochians in this point, whether they would or not, he took another Courſe wherein he alſo thought he gratified them, and that was in filling up their Court, or Senate, by forcing Perſons to the Service thereof, a matter wherein he was very troubleſome if not tyrannical (as Ammianus complains very much of him) that right or wrong, he would ſubject them to that kind of Slavery. Yet to ſay Truth, as to this particular relating to Antioch, he rather followed the Example of other Princes, than went on his own Head; as his Friend Zoſimus would have him. The Eminence of this City, as being the Head and Glory of the Eaſt, had procured it divers Privileges from ancient Emperours; and amongſt the reſt, that if any one by the Mothers ſide was deſcended from thoſe of the Curia, he ſhould be obliged to the Services of the ſaid Curia. This now Julian, by an Edict directed “ to Julian (his Uncle by his Mother and Comes of the Eaſt) both relates and “ confirms, but with this Reſtriction: In caſe the Father of the Party did not belong “ to the Curia of ſome other City; for if he did, the Son was obliged unto that; “ it being a general Rule in this as well as other Caſes (Slavery of the Mother excepted) “ that the Son followed the Condition of the Father: but in Caſe the Father “ was not obliged to any Curia, but the Grand-Father by the Mother was to “ this of Antioch, the Son was alſo to be obliged, and that by this ſpecial Privilege. “ So of old there were Privileges granted to the Inhabitants of Ilium, whence the Romans were ſaid to be deſcended; to thoſe of Delphi the Place of the famed Oracle, as alſo to the Inhabitants of Pontus, by procurement of Pompey, that the Mothers Deſcent ſhould there qualifie Perſons for Citizens.

L. 1. de Domeſticis & Protectoribus. Cod. Th. lib. 6. Tit. 24. Dat. 15. Kal. Septemb. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

Forces Perſons to the Service of the Corporation.

L. 51. de Decurionibus Cod. Th. Dat. 5. Kal. Septemb. Antiochiæ & L. Eos indulſerunt. 22. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

21. But yet a little to explain Ammianus his meaning concerning his unjuſt forcing of Perſons to theſe Services, there's another Law Extant concerning this Subject, Dated but ſix dayes after the former, and directed to Julian, not his Uncle, but one who was now Conſularis of Phœnicia; except there be ſome Errour in the Inſcription. By this it appears, how little Equity ſuch could find at his hands, (as he writes of him) whom theſe Corporations ſought to oblige to their Services, “ though, as to Original, they were utterly ſtrangers to them; that if they “ were but Inhabitants in thoſe Places, although they were Decuriones in other “ Corporations, yet the Claim, or Petition of the Curiales againſt them ſhould be “ good; and conſequently, a man might be Decurio in two places at the ſame time; “ in one by reaſon of his Original, and in the other becauſe of his Habitation. Yet “ he limits it thus far, that one who had only Lands or Poſſeſſions in a Town ſhould “ not be eſteemed an Incola or Inhabitant; although this Privilege was granted to “ ſome Corporations alſo that the very having Eſtates in them ſhould binde to thoſe “ kind of Services. Again in caſe they renounced their Habitation before they “ were named to the Court, they were not conſtrained to ſerve, though ſuch renunciation “ after Nomination was utterly null. And laſtly, their Habitation “

L. 52. de Decurionibus Cod. Th. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

Dat. 3. Non. Septemb. Antiochiæ. Acc. Id. Octob. Tyro.

And that very rigorouſly.

ſhould not ſubject them to this Charge, if they had borne Arms and been Captains “ in an Expedition, or elſe with the Title of Senators had alſo ſome Employment “ belonging to Perſons of that Quality. Thus we ſee part of what Ammianus “ writes of him, in Reference to Corporations, illuſtrated by the Code. Now as for what he is ſaid to have done in the Point of reforming the Laws, in taking off their Ambiguity, and removing thoſe Delays that were found in the Execution of them. As to this Matter we are furniſhed with another Edict, dated the very ſame day with this but now mentioned, and therefore thought to have been joyned to it, though it carries with it now another Inſcription to Secundus Salluſt the Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt. It had been of old held and obſerved for Law, that Copartners in Inheritances or any other thing might either ſue or be ſued altogether, or, though Iſſue had already been joyned one of them might proſecute or defend himſelf unto Judgment or final Deciſion, without the Concurrence or Aſſiſtance of the Reſt. Now this, in the time of Conſtantine, ſeemed hard; for otherwiſe it was generally received, That what concerned All was by All to be tranſacted: and it was taken for Law, that (a) every Buſineſs was to be decided, all being preſent to whom it belonged. Otherwiſe the Sentence ſhould only take Effect amongſt ſuch as were there, how evident and plain ſoever the Matter was. But although Sentence was given only for or againſt, ſuch as were preſent, yet might thoſe that were abſent ſuſtain great Damage thereby; for however erroneous the Sentence was, if the Abſent ſhould bring the Matter about again, as concerning themſelves, the Exception might lye againſt them that it was Res Judicata an adjudged Caſe, and poſſibly thoſe that were abſent might be able better to inſtruct Council to make out ſomething more than the other, which might be of great Moment in the Deciſion. For theſe and other Reaſons, it ſeems, Conſtantine the Great had been adviſed ſo far to abrogate the old Law in this Point, that if the Conſortes, as the Law terms them, were in diverſe Provinces, or under the Juriſdiction of ſeveral Judges, a ſtop ſhould be put to the Suite, till all that were concerned could be preſent. “ But Julian now thought fit to repeal what his Uncle had therein done as giving advantage “ to thoſe that deſired Delay and would not come to Tryal. But whether “ to this and other Alterations moved alwayes by Reaſon, or ſometimes by his great Hatred to Chi and Kappa (this we ſhall tell the meaning of ſhortly) will perhaps more evidently appear hereafter.

What he did toward reforming the Laws.

In Law-ſuites.

Quod omnes tangit ab omnibus tractari debet.

(a) Dig. lib. 42. Tit. 1. L. 47.

L. unic. de Dominio rei quæ poſcitur &c. Cod. Th. lib. 2. Tit. 5. & L. 1. Cod. Juſt. de Conſortib. ejuſdem litis.

22. Further, to prevent Delays in Suits, by another Law he Commanded all “ Appeals legally made, to be admitted, and all the Acts concerning the Tryal “ to be tranſmitted to the Office at Court, by one of the Officers of the Vicar of “ Rome (to whom the Edict is directed) within the ſpace of thirty dayes, that “ they might be recorded; and this under the Penalty of Ten pounds of Gold, “ to be levied upon the Office of the ſaid Vicar. Now Conſtantine the Great had allowed but twenty dayes for this tranſmiſſion, but Julian thought good to enlarge the time, and herein was followed by other Princes. But as for ſuch as did not Appeal within due time, and that upon pretence of Fear, againſt the Præfects of the City, the Pro-conſuls, the Comes of the Eaſt, or Vicars, by another Law made afterwards, he commands, that they be utterly barred: for he tells them, That as “ long as he Reigns no Judge ſhall dare to deny lawful Appeal to any that deſire it: and “ in caſe he do, He gives further Direction for the Relief of the Parties. And whereas it was the Cuſtom, that when any Judge, or Governour of a Province, met with ſuch Difficulties in the Deciding of a Cauſe, that he could not of himſelf overcome, that then he made Report thereof to the Emperour, and conſulted him for Explication of any Doubt, or removal of ſuch Difficulties in Law, or otherwiſe; Julian now found, that the Judges were wont to ſuppreſs or deferr the ſaid Reports. For prevention hereof, he requires Mamertinus, the Præfectus Prætorio, to Summon “ them within his Diſtrict, and let them know, that, Under penalty of Ten pounds “ of Gold, to be paid by themſelves, and Twenty by their Office, they ſhould “ cauſe the Report to be tranſmitted within thirty dayes expreſly. But, foraſmuch as thoſe that carry ſuch Reports, might be hindred by ſome Accident from making ſuch haſte as was requiſite for fulfilling of this Order, to ſave harmleſs the Judge and his Officers, he will have it to be entred in the Regiſter of the Court, what day it was that the Report was delivered to the Meſſenger. Further, in purſuance of the ſame Deſign, of cutting off Delayes in Suits, by another Edict he declared, with reaſon, That after Iſſue joyned, the Mandatum, or Power given to the Proctor, “ was not extinguiſhed by the death of the Party; that there might be no need of “ beginning again. And in like manner he impoſed a Mulct of a pound of Gold upon “ any

In Appeals.

L. 29. de Appellationibus & Conſultat. Cod. Th. lib. 11. Tit. 30. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

Cod. Th. L. 30. eod. tit. & L. 2. Cod. Juſt. de his qui per metum &c. Nobis enim moderantibus Remp. nullum audebit Judex Provocationis perfugium purgantibus denegare.

L. 3. Cod. Th. eod. tit. abeſt à Cod Juſt.

L. 1 de Cognitor. & Procurator. Cod. Th. lib. 2 Tit. 12. &

L. nulla 23. Cod. Juſt. de Procurator.

Sect. 5.

A. D. 362.

any Advocate, that ſhould, after Iſſue joyned, uſe a Dilatory Exception, which “ ſhould have been uſed at the beginning.

In matters relating to Women.

L. 12. Cod. Juſt. de Exceptionibus ſeu Præſcript. lib. 8. Tit. 36.

23. He alſo amended the Law, or he would be thought ſo to have done, in ſome matters relating to Women. Of old time, the Lands and Houſes of Minors, or thoſe under five and twenty (for, by the Law of the Romans, Perſons are not of full Age till then) could not be ſold or alienated without a Decree in that behalf obtained, if they lay in the Country; and this Conſtantine the Great extended alſo to ſuch as were within Cities. And for prevention of Miſchiefs that ariſe to ſuch Minors from the Fraud or Careleſneſs of their Guardians, he forbade Moveable things alſo to be alienated without a Decree, three Caſes only excepted; as when things by keeping became worſe, or there were Cattel belonging to Minors, that were uſeleſs; and if a Woman was married, though not twenty five complete, yet he permitted her Goods or Eſtate to be ſold without obtaining a Decree, provided the Conſent of her Huſband thereunto was had, and that certified by ſome Inſtrument or Writing: which is held good Law in France at this day. By this Conſtitution did Conſtantine intend more fully to conſult for the Security of Minors, than had been provided by the old Law, againſt the raſh and heedleſs Sales of their Eſtates made by their Guardians: and herein was his Edict more ſingular and expreſs, that in thoſe Sales an Inſtrument was required, whereas ordinarily, in Buying and Selling, no ſuch thing was neceſſary; and moreover, by this Edict, he gave the Woman remedy againſt her Huſband, in caſe ſhe received Detriment, yet ſo as the Sale ſhould be aſſured to the Purchaſer or Buyer. But Julian, being vehemently inflamed with a Zeal to the old Laws and Cuſtomes, not only relating to Religion but other matters, and burning with greater Hatred, if poſſible, to Chi and Kappa,(as ſome conceive)did, by a new Edict, Abrogate this part of his Uncle's Con- “ ſtitution (calling him both in this, and another, his Uncle Conſtantine) reſpecting “ Women, and would have the Old Law to be of force, that the Sale of any Minor's “ Goods whatſoever, whether of Male or Female, without the Authority of a De- “ cree, ſhould be null; giving this reaſon for it, That it was more abſurd for “ Wives to have their Huſbands reſponſible for ſuch Sales, who poſſibly ſhould be “ poor, and not able to make ſatisfaction, than recover their own from theſe who “ had made ſuch illegal Contracts.

L. 3. de Contrahenda Emptione Cod. Th. lib. 3. Tit. 1. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt. ideò quia hac L. vetus jus reducitur, quod retinere ſatis habuit Tribonianus. Vide Goth. in L.

24. In another matter relating to Women, he changed alſo what had been done either by Conſtantine or his Son Conſtantius. It had been a practice too frequent amongſt thoſe of that Sex, for ſuch as were of free Condition, to joyn themſelves to Slaves, out of indulgence to their carnal Appetite, and without any reſpect to their Honour, and ingenuous Condition. For prevention hereof, Order was taken by a Senatuſconſultum, called Senatuſconſultum Claudianum, that if, after they had been thrice admoniſhed to forbear the Company of ſuch as were of Servile Condition, they again offended in that kind, they ſhould loſe their liberty, be Slaves to the Lords of thoſe of whom they had uſed the Company, and their Children alſo remain Slaves to them; according to the Rule in this Caſe, that if the Mother was a Slave, the Children ſhould alſo remain in Servitude. Now this Law aimed at the prevention of two ſorts of Miſchiefs; both of Women, they offending againſt Modeſty and Chaſtity, aggravated by the circumſtance of the Slavery of them with whom they had to do; and alſo of the Damage the Lords of ſuch Slaves often received thereby; for they might pilfer from their Lords the better to maintain, or gratifie ſuch Wantons, and neglect the Buſineſs of their Maſters, in ſpending time to do that of their Miſtreſſes. And this Damage was the greater, by how much the Employment to which the Servants were put, was of greater concernment. For, although Servitude did not, as Logicians ſay of Quality, receive magis or minus, but each Slave, in a ſtrict ſenſe, in what Employment ſoever, was as much in Servitude as another; yet betwixt an Agent, Factor, or he that drove the whole Trade of his Maſter, and a mean Scullion, or ſome idle Fellow, there was a vaſt difference, as to the Concernments of their Lords; and therefore ſhe that inveigled ſuch an one, and made him miſpend his Maſter's Time or Money, was guilty of a greater Crime, and deſerved more Puniſhment; neither was there need of warning to be given in a thing of ſo palpable inconvenience. For thoſe Agents or Factors, by them called Actores, and Procuratores, had often the whole Eſtates, and Concernments of whole Families in their hands; and thence it came that the Law was very cautious in points relating to them, for the Sake of thoſe that ought them. If a Legacy of a Slave was left to any one in general Terms, this Actor or Agent muſt not be underſtood to have been bequeathed; and in Caſe of an Injury done to a Maſter in the hurting of his Slaves, diſtinction was made by the Law betwixt ſuch an one, and others of meaner Abilities or Employments. In like manner did the Emperour Conſtantine, or his Son, think fit to make a Difference, and as appears from Julian's Edict, ordain, either that leſs Warning, or none at all, might be given to a Woman that accompanied with Slaves of this Nature. “ But Julian by “ another Edict repeals all Conſtitutions made to this Purpoſe, and requires that the “ Denuntiations be made to a Woman ſo joyned to any of ſervile Condition what- “ ſoever, if Slaves to private Perſons. Further, as Conſtantine thought fit to be more rigorous in this point ſo in another to be more moderate, and abate the Severity of former Laws towards Women, in what more nearly concerned himſelf, his own Profit and Revenue; though as to the Intereſt of Subjects he was ſevere. For in caſe any Woman accompanied with a Slave belonging to his Treaſury, or his Lands, he ordained in a large Edict moſt full of Clemency (wherein he caſt ſeveral Burthens from off the Shoulders of his Subjects, both in Reference to the Laws and Debts owing to him) that ſuch ſhould not loſe her Freedom; yet that ſome ſort of Puniſhment there might be, He declared, that though her Children ſhould not be Slaves, yet they ſhould not enjoy ſo full and ample a Liberty as other Perſons, but be in a middle State betwixt Slavery and Freedom; as were thoſe who were called Latini, or Spurious; being as it were free amongſt Slaves, and Slaves amongſt Freemen, and the Lords of their Fathers ſhould have a Right of Patronage over them, as Maſters were wont to have over thoſe that had been infranchiſed, on which here we muſt not inſiſt. But this Julian thinks fit alſo, by the ſame Edict, to repeal; ſo “ great was his Love to the old Law, or Hatred to ſomething elſe.

L. 4. ad S. C. Claudianum. Cod. Th. lib. 4. Tit. 9. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

Partus ſequitur ventrem.

Vide Com.

L. 3. ad Sc. Claudianum. Vide Comm.

About the Scriniarii,

25. Again, Conſtantius had appointed the Scriniarii of the four Scrinia of the Palace by twenty years Service to be freed from Obligation to the Charges of Corporations: but Julian, though croſs alſo in the Matter of Corporations to the other Extreme, will have this Term contracted to the Space of Fifteen, by a Law which “ Arcadius the Emperour afterward confirmed. Other Laws he made for the Eaſe of the People; and in this kind alſo is remarkable a large Conſtitution for the Benefit of thoſe of Africk, who were haraſſed with heavy Impoſitions. The firſt part of it hath Relation to the High-wayes, which being repaired after ſeveral Methods proved a great Grievance to ſome ſorts of men, and were for want of a certain and ſettled Courſe far worſe maintained. In ſome Places, the Officers called Magiſtri Pagorum were wont to force thoſe that were Inhabitants in their Villages to worke at them: In others, certain Parts, preſcribed within certain Bounds, were allotted to be kept in Repair, to thoſe whoſe Lands lay near to them: and this Courſe Julian approves of as moſt equal, being founded upon ancient Cuſtom, a thing of which he was ſo inamoured. There was another great Abuſe in the Curſus Publicus, of which the Officers named Mancipes, plaid many Pranks with the Provincials; being thoſe who managed the Courſe, that none ſhould exceed what the Laws allowed in the Uſe of it, who took Care that Horſes and other ſorts of Beaſts ſhould not be wanting to the Courſe, nor Fodder and Provender to the Cattel. Endeavours were uſed formerly by ſundry Laws to keep them from oppreſſing the Subject; and now for the time to come, he ordains that they be under the Command of the Proconſul of Africk. Moreover it was the Cuſtom for great men, and Governours of Provinces, both to burthen the Courſe it ſelf, and miſerably to afflict the Countrey by preſſing of Carriages to convey Marbles for the ſumptuous Building or Ornament of their Houſes, though not ſeated upon the Roman Cawſyes or publick Streets, but at good Diſtances, which he condemns and forbids as a moſt audacious Pra- “ ctice; and prohibits the Removal of Pillars or Statues of what Materials ſoe- “ ver made, that Places may not be deprived of their Ornaments. But the beſt “ comes laſt, or that wherewith the Provincials of Africk were moſt pleaſed. This was, a Pardon or Remiſſion of all Dues to the Treaſury: yet with the Exception “ of what was wont to be paid in Gold or Silver. It was the Cuſtom for Princes “ to paſs ſuch Acts of Grace for weighty Reaſons; as, if Lands had been deſerted; if overrun by Enemies, or been too much burthened and exhauſted by publick Payments. And though Julian was ſparing in granting ſuch Indulgence, as what was wont to ſerve for Eaſement to the Rich, and little to the Relief of the Poor; yet herein he alſo imitated his Predeceſſors, but with Limitation, both as to the Things and Places indulged; for, his Grants of this Nature were commonly partial as to the Dues behind, and granted only to particular Countries or Places, which yet other Princes alſo ſometimes practiſed. Some other Laws he made here at Antioch, for the filling of Corporations, to which Work he was with ſo much Af-

And other matters relating to Africk.

L. 1 de Proximis, Comitibus Diſpoſitionum &c. Cod. Th. lib. 6. tit. 26. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

Dat. 7. Kal. Nov. Antiochiæ, ad Avitianum vicarium Africæ. A.D. 362. Acc. 15. Kal. April. Karthag. Juliano & Salluſtio Coſs. A.D. 363. L. 2. de Itinere muniendo Cod. Th. lib. 15. Tit. 3.

L. 15. de Curſu Publico Cod. Th. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

L. 7. de ædificiis privatis Cod. Juſt. lib. 6. Tit. 10.

L. 1. de Indulgentiis Debitorum Cod. Th. lib. 11. Tit. 28. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt. Velut temporaria.

L. 53. de Decurionibus Cod. Th.

fecta-

A. D. 362.

L.54.eod.Tit.& L.providendum eſt 23.Cod.Juſt. eod.tit.

fectation inclined, directed them to nominate the Sons of the Decuriones, and “ ſuch amongſt the ordinary ſort as had ſufficient Eſtates; for want whereof, he “ nulles the Choice of ſome that were lately elected. And for better Encouragement “ of all, who to comply with his Humour, had joyned themſelves to them, he declares “ that they ſhall not anſwer for the failings of ſuch as were made Receivers “ of the publick Revenue amongſt the Decuriones before their Admiſſion, but “ only thoſe to whoſe Overſight or Negligence it was to be imputed, that ſuch unfitting “ Perſons were intruſted with an Imployment of that Conſequence.

26. Thus have we illuſtrated out of the Laws themſelves, ſo far as concerns this Year, what Ammianus writes concerning Julian's Endeavours in this Kind, and that in Reference to civil Matters while he ſtaid at Antioch. Concerning his Complaint of his Rigor towards the Profeſſors of Chriſtian Religion, both in that he mentions and other Particulars much more will in due Time and Place God willing, be produced alſo out of his Laws, and his other Writings, Now to take up the Story of that Author where we left it, while he ſtaid at Antioch, Gaudentius the Notary, who had been ſent into Africk, to ſecure that Country againſt him, by Conſtantius, as alſo Julian who had been Vicar, and was eſteemed too much a Favourer of the ſame Party, were apprehended and put to Death, as was Artemius who had been Dux of Ægypt, upon Accuſations of the Citizens of Alexandria; but how juſtly, and what thereupon followed about George the Biſhop muſt be examined in a more proper Place. But now began he to be much inflamed with a Deſire of proſecuting the Perſian War, conſidering how that Nation had for ſixty years laſt paſt miſerably haraſſed the Eaſtern Provinces, and defeated ſeveral Armies that were ſent to reſtrain them, which raiſed up a Deſire in him of Revenge and this was farther heightned by an earneſt Ambition to grace his former Atchievments with the glorious Sirname of Parthicus. There wanted not thoſe, who perceiving what vaſt Deſignes he had in his Head, and what great Preparations were requiſite for bringing them to paſs, much blamed his Ambition, and taxed it as dangerous and abſurd, to caſt the Empire into ſuch Difficulties and Dangers, only for the Humour of one Man, that he might domineer over more Animals; and that murmured to the Appetite of one ſingle Mortal, ſo many Perſons muſt be ſacrificed; which however Ammianus blames in them as ſpoken out of Malice and Sloth, yet is agreeable to the Sentiments of any who bear a Regard to the Preſervation of Mankind; for though ſome Wars be neceſſary, and the Duty of a Prince, yet boundleſs Ambition and Deſire of Conqueſt are Paſſions which humane Nature cannot but abhor, as producing Effects contrary to its beſt Preſervers, which are Peace and Union; and ſtrangely unequal ſo as to gratifie and tickle the Fancy of one ſmall Creature (conſidered in himſelf) with a conceit of it's greatneſs, multitudes of men or a great Part of the world muſt be diſturbed and brought to Miſery. Theſe Perſons though they durſt not ſpeak themſelves, yet by ſuggeſting divers Objections to others who they knew would tell him, endeavoured to divert him from his Purpoſe, urging this eſpecially, that if he would not find Bounds to his Heat this way, he would miſcarry as the luxuriant Corn is wont, through immoderate Proſperity. But all their Endeavours proved unſucceſsful, or they barked in vain (againſt a man Ammianus tells us, who was not to be moved by ſecret Injuries) even as Pigmies or Thiodamas of Lindus, that Clown, againſt Hercules.

He reſolves for the Perſian War whatever is ſaid againſt it.

27. For he ſlackned not at all either of his Zeal for the proſecution of the War, or his Preparations in order to it: But, our Hiſtorian confeſſes, he ſhed too much Blood, and too often upon the Altars, in order thereunto, ſometimes ſacrificing hundreds of Bulls, and innumerable Droves of other Beaſts, and white Birds, all he could compaſs both by Sea and Land: inſomuch, that (notwithſtanding all his Labours for the Diſcipline of his Army, ſo much talked of, amongſt other things) almoſt every Souldier, and that almoſt every day, glutting himſelf with meat, and drinking with as much greedineſs and Exceſs, was carried upon the ſhoulders of ſuch as caſually met him, from the Temple wherein they Feaſted, through the Streets, to his Quarters; and eſpecially the Petulantes and Celtæ, who, having come along with him out of the Weſt, were grown confident above meaſure. The Rites and Ceremonies of this his Religion, were increaſed alſo beyond all Moderation, and conſequently the Expenſe thereof to Sums unuſual and burthenſome; and every man that would make profeſſion of the Art of Divination, how skilful or ignorant ſoever, without any Bounds or Rules preſcribed, was permitted to ſeek for Anſwers, and conſult the Entrails, which ſometimes afforded Predictions of all ſorts; and theſe were every where ſought after, and that all manner of wayes, with affected variety. And, out of his great

And in order to Divinations is extravagant in Sacrifices.

Adeo ut indies pene ſingulos milites carnis diſtentione ſagina victitantes incultius, potuſque aviditate Correpti humeris impoſiti tranſeuntium &c.

Curioſity, he had a Project in his Head, of opening the Caſtalian Fountain, ſo Famed for its Power in Fortune-telling, which had been long ago choked up with a great Heap of Stones, by commandment of Adrian the Emperour, who, having found that the Empire was predicted to him by virtue thereof, was unwilling that any other ſhould have from it the ſame Encouragement: and he commanded the Dead Bodies, buried thereabout, to be removed, according to the Rite whereby the Athenians formerly had purged Delos. But, while he pleaſed himſelf with the Exerciſe of thoſe Superſtitious Vanities, an Accident there was, which relating to the ſame, gave him no ſmall Diſturbance. On the two and twentieth of October, the Spatious Temple of Apollo at Daphne, the Suburb of Antioch, built by * Antiochus Epiphanes, wherein he placed an Image as big as that of Jupiter Olympius, took fire, and was ſuddenly burnt; with which Diſaſter being extraordinarily moved, he cauſed more ſevere Inquiſition than was uſual to be made about it, and commanded the greater Church at Antioch to be ſhut up, imagining the Chriſtians had ſet it on fire, out of Envy to ſee it incompaſſed with ſtately Galleries, or a Periſtylium. But, privately, Ammianus tells us, it was reported to have been burnt upon occaſion that Aſclepiades, a Philoſopher, being come to viſit Julian, and having ever about him a little Silver Image of the Carthaginian Goddeſs, termed by them Dea Cœleſtis, placed this Image at the feet of the Statue, and lighting up Wax Candles, according to the Cuſtome, then departed. From theſe Candles ſome ſparks caught hold of ſome old and combuſtible things thereabout, in the dead time of the Night, when there were none to prevent it; and by degrees the Fire ſeized and conſumed that lofty Fabrick.

Potius à Seleuco Nicatore ut ex Libanio oſtendit Valeſius.

Πρόσθεν μὲν ὀλιγωσία τῶν φυλακῶν, ταῖς δὲ τῶν ἀθέων ἀνδρῶν τόλμαις ἀφανισθέν.

Hic Aſclepiades Cynicæ Sectæ Philoſophus ad Conſtantii Comitatum venerat tempore Magnentiani belli.

28. And this the more eaſily it might do, by occaſion of the great Drought which now was ſo remarkable, that, though the Winter-Solſtice was at hand, yet ſeveral Rivolets and Fountains alſo failed of Water, wherewith they had formerly abounded. Though the Seaſon of the Year would not permit it long to hold, it was accompanied with a terrible Earthquake, wherewith, on the ſecond of December, the remaining part of Nicomedia was overturned, and with it no ſmall portion of the City of Nice. Though thoſe Accidents perplexed Julian, yet his mind was no leſs intent upon the War, and Matters conducing to it; but, amongſt ſuch ſerious things, he, to no purpoſe, employed himſelf in bringing down the price of Vendible Commodities at Antioch, as we have before related, out of an Affection to Popularity, though ſuch improper Conſtraint of Cheapneſs, be wont to cauſe great Scarcity, as Ammianus obſerves. Thoſe of the Corporation demonſtrated it could not be done, yet was he pertinacious in his Purpoſe, being of the Humour of Gallus his Brother, except in the point of Blood; and raging againſt them as Slanderers and contumacious Perſons, he compoſed (this year following) an Invective, which he called Meſopogon, Beard-Hater, or the Antiochian, wherein he maliciouſly ripped up the Faults and Defects of the Citizens, adding to Truth very many things. So the Hiſtorian, but yet an Antiochian himſelf cenſures the Invective; which being ſtill extant amongſt others of his Workes, we muſt do both him and others that Right, as to take Notice of it. “He terms it a Poem in Proſe, and for as much as it was neither fit for him nor “ any others to return ill to them by whom they had been injured, therewith “ he pretends not to play upon ſuch, but himſelf the Poet; for as much as no “ Law forbids one to write either Commendations or Diſpraiſes of his own “ Perſon. To commend himſelf he tells you he could not, but if to diſcommend “ he was able infinitely to do it, and he will begin with his Face. Whereas to “ this Face, Nature her ſelf had not been over kind, he through a certain Moroſe “ Humour had added to it a long Beard, as it were to puniſh it, and this for “ no other Fault, but becauſe Nature had been no kinder to it. For this “ Reaſon he ſuffered Lice to run in it as Deer do in a Park; neither, for Fear of choaking by Haires, could he either eat or drink plentifully; for as for what concerned kiſſing, he did not on that much inſiſt, knowing that his Beard would not ſuffer his Lips to be joyned to others more delicious. And whereas “ they, the Antiochians, had ſaid that Ropes were to be made of it, he was very “ willing they ſhould do it, if the roughneſs of his Hairs would not hurt “ their tender and delicate Hands. But leſt any ſhould think him to be moved “ by all theſe Reproaches (for herein he recites what they ſaid of him) he would “ render an Account why he went ſo like a Goat; whereas he could ſhave himſelf “ and be as ſmooth as beautiful Boyes or Women, on whom Nature her ſelf had “ beſtowed much Beauty and Comelineſs. For they in their Age imitated their “ Chil-

He and the Citizens of Antioch falling out.

Ex qua aquarum inopia Caritas Annonæ Conſecuta eſt, in qua quidem penuria Julianus 13000 modiorum tritici Antiochenſibus Largitus eſt, ut ipſe & Libanius aſſerunt.

He compoſes his Miſopogon or Invective againſt them.

Τὸ δ' ᾆσμα πεζῇ μὲν λέξει πεποίηται.

Ταῦτά τοι διαθεόντων ἀνέχομαι τῶν φθειρῶν, ὥσπερ ἐν λόχμῃ τῶν θηρίων.

The Subſtance of it.

Children, and according to their delicate manner of living, and perhaps for the Simplicity of their manners, they ſhaved all off, and ſhewed themſelves to be men, not as he did, by their Cheeks, but from their Foreheads.

29. But not content with the length of his Beard, his Head was to boot out of Order, the Hair whereof he ſeldome cut; and as ſeldom he pared the Nayles of his Fingers, which were moſt commonly alſo black with Ink. And if they would needs know a Secret, his Breaſt was moreover rough with Hair, as briſtly as were thoſe of Lyons the King of Beaſts; and if he had any Mole about him, he would tell them of it. But further he had to ſay, that he had not only ſuch a kind of Body, but alſo he led a very auſtere Life, and very troubleſom. The Theatre out of his great Folly, he frequented not; neither ſuffered a Play to be acted at Court, but at the Beginning of the Year; (ſuch was the Stupidity of his Mind, (like a poor Huſbandman that paid his Rent to ſome hard Landlord) and when he did that, he gave but little heed to what was acted; for he had no Poſſeſſions, though he had the Name of a great King throughout the World, not ſo much as a Præfect or Captain who commanded Comedians or Chariot-Drivers. All which, though they were ſignes ſufficient of his moroſe Humour, yet he had one thing to tell them that was more new and wonderful. He hated the Circenſian Games, as much as Debtors did Courts of Juſtice, therefore ſeldom came he at them but in the Dayes that were holy to his Gods, neither then did he there ſpend the whole day, as his Couſin, Uncle, and Brother were wont to do; but was glad to be gone after he had ſeen the ſixth Courſe ran, and that with little Delight, nay on the contrary with much Trouble and Uneaſineſs. So much it ſufficed to ſpeak of external things, and yet in further Drollery he tells them, that this was nothing to the Injuries he did them over and beſides, for as to his Domeſtick Life, he ſlept little by Night; and the ſmall reſt he took was upon a Pallet, and in eating he did not ſatiſfie even Hunger, which way of Living made him Moroſe, and of an Humour quite contrary to the Effeminacy of Antioch. Yet would not he have them think, (the Poem he mixeth with ſerious Matter) that he did it to torment them; for a grievous and fooliſh Miſtake, (you muſt know) and that from a very Boy, had induced him to wage War with his Belly. Hereupon it was that he would not ſuffer it to be ſatiated with Meat,and therefore very rarely did he vomit, to his Remembrance but once ſince he was made Cæſar, and that not from any Repletion, but it came by Chance. Upon this hung a Tale, which he would tell them, not out of Conceit that it would be pleaſant to them, but wonderfully ſuited his Condition, and the Scene of this Comedy lay at his dear Lutetia or Paris, while there he abode in his Winter-Quarters. This Town he tells them is a River-Iſland of no great Capacity. On both ſides they paſſed to it by wooden Bridges; and as for the River it did not increaſe nor decreaſe; but as it was in Summer, in Winter it was found in the very ſame Condition. Water is afforded very pleaſant and clear to the Eye of the Drinker, for it being an Iſland, there upon Neceſſity the Inhabitants were to get Water for the moſt part. The Winter was very gentle, by reaſon of the warmth of the Ocean (as was ſuppoſed) which was diſtant from it but nine hundred Furlongs, ſo that a mild Vapor thence ſeemed to be diffuſed, for the Water of the Sea is much more warm than the ſweet, or that which ariſeth out of Springs, or is taken from Rivers. Hereupon it was that the beſt ſort of Vines there grew, and through their Induſtry they alſo had great Quantity of Figgs, which in Winter they covered with Wheat-Straw,or ſuch like Stuff, as they were wont to defend Trees againſt the Weather.

A deſcription of Paris.

30. But when he lay there, the Winter was more ſharp than ordinary, and the Froſt laid as it were, a Bridge, over the River, of Ice much reſembling the Phrygian Stone. There was he more ſtubborne and humourſome than ever before; for he would not ſuffer a Fire to be made in his Chamber, according to the Cuſtom of the Place, though it was very convenient for it: and thus it came to paſs, through his Stubborneſs, and, to ſpeak truly, Inhumanity toward himſelf, out of a Reſolution to uſe himſelf to that Air, ſo that though it grew colder and colder, he would not permit his Servants to make any Fire, for Fear he ſhould ſtir the Moiſture that was in the Walls; only he let them bring a little Charcoal or ſome Wood throughly kindled, with which, though very ſmall was the Quantity, a Damp was raiſed from the Walls, which filled his Head with Vapours ſo as to make him drouſie; and indeed he was, in great Fear he ſhould be ſuffocated. Thereupon he was taken ſud-

Sect. 5. A.D. 362.

ſuddenly out of his Chamber, and his Phyſitians adviſed him to vomit up “ his Supper, which he did, but no great Quantity; for much he had not eat- “ en; but he was better after it, had a reaſonable good Night, and was fit for “ any Buſineſs the day following. After this Pariſian Story, he falls in direct “ terms, though in a jeering and drolling Vein, upon the Antiochians, telling them “ that the Ruſticity of the Galls could eaſily bear his Humour, but a rich flou- “ riſhing and populous City as was theirs, in which there were more Dancers, Fid- “ lers and Players than Citizens, but no reſpect nor Modeſty ſhewn toward Prin- “ ces, would not endure it. Lazy and luxurious Perſons might be aſhamed to “ do, what it was lawful for them, being ſo gallant and valiant Perſons, to “ practiſe; as to ſpend both Morning and Night in Revellings, and by Deeds, “ not words, to demonſtrate that they had ſmall Regard to the Laws: although “ Laws are made for the Sake of Princes, and he that injures a Prince doth ſtill “ much more offer violence to the Laws. But this was their Practice, (both of “ Magiſtrates and People) in the Forum and Theatre, and all agreed together “ in being ſpruce and neat, and ſetting more by their Bathes, their gay Cloaths “ and rich Beds, than by Juſtice and Honeſty. And matters thus ſtanding he “ makes them ask the Queſtion of himſelf, whether he thinks that that his Ru- “ ſticity, Inhumanity and Rigidneſs can well agree with theſe Pleaſures and De- “ lights, of the Place, and whether he be ſo ſilly as to imagine that his little Soul “ can be adorn'd and accompliſhed by Temperance? For, firſt for Temperance “ what it was they knew not, only they had heard of the Name. Indeed if it “ was that which he endeavour'd after, it conſiſted in Obedience to the Gods “ and the Laws, in living in equal Right with ones Equals, if a man was excel- “ lent in any thing yet to carry it humbly, in taking care to provide that the “ Poor ſhould not be oppreſſed by the Rich, in bearing all ſorts of Troubles “ patiently, as Enmities and Reproaches; without indulging ones Anger or Re- “ venge; in governing and correcting ones Paſſions; and (if that may be ac- “ counted a ſort of Temperance) in abſtaining openly from all pleaſure though “ otherwiſe neither diſhoneſt nor ſcandalous; for as for him, he was of Opinion, “ that No man ought to be eſteemed as Temperate at home, who was diſſolute abroad “ and took Pleaſure in the Theatres. If this be Temperance, then he ruines both “ himſelf and them, who cannot endure ſo much as to hear the name of Subje- “ ction, neither towards the Gods nor towards the Laws; Liberty being ſweet “ in all Caſes.

31. After this he feigns them ſtill railing upon him for his Diſſimulation, “ in that he denyed himſelf to be their Lord; would not endure that Name, “ nay, was angry if he had it, inſomuch that many through his Procurement had “ left that word out of all Matters relating to the Empire; however formerly “ accuſtom'd to it; and yet he compelled them to be Slaves to the Magiſtrates “ and the Laws: how much better would it be for him to admit the Name of “ Lord, and indeed and in Reallity ſuffer them to be Free-men. But this he “ was ſo far from, that he undid them, by conſtraining the Rich in Courts of “ Juſtice, to uſe moderate Courſes; by depriving the Poor of the Liberty of “ calumniating their Betters, and by putting away Stage-Players, Dancers and “ the like, ſo that they received no good at his Hands, except it was this, that having indured this odious Severity now ſeven Moneths, they had commit- “ ted Vows and Prayers, to be freed from ſuch Miſchiefs, to the Management of “ old Women that were converſant about the Tombes of dead men. And “ further had the Satisfaction of their Jeſts and Taunts to wound him no leſs, “ than with ſo many Darts. What Follows is to the ſame Purpoſe, driving at “ this by manifold Variety of drolling, to repreſent himſelf as a moſt virtuous “ Perſon, one practiſed in the higheſt Degree of Philoſophy, and the Citizens “ of Antioch, as Enemies to him upon this Account, and eſteeming it ſlavery to “ be Subject to the Gods (as he calls them) to the Laws, or him; and as ſo “ governing their Wives and Children, as to give them Liberty to do what “ they liſted, and train them up even to Rebellion. Further having received “ ſome Taunts not only in Reference to his Beard and affected Clowniſhneſs, “ but his Oppoſition to Chriſtian Religion, he endeavours in the ſame way to “ anſwer ſuch Matters as were objected upon that Account. It was a common “ Saying amongſt them, that Chi and Kappa had done no Hurt to the City “ though he had injured both the City and them. He tells them it was hard “ to unfold this Riddle, but having got ſome Interpreters of their own, he had “ learnt the beginning of ſome Names to be ſignified by theſe Letters; as by “
the

Τὸ χῖ φησὶν οὐδὲν ἠδίκησε τὴν πόλιν, οὐδὲ τὸ Καππα. Χριςὸς incipit cum χ. Κωνςάντιος & Κωνςαντῖνος cum K.

the one that of Chriſt, and the other that of Conſtantius. To this he replies that in one thing only Conſtantius had done them an Injury, that when he made him Cæſar he had not put him to Death. And as for other Matters, he wiſhes that to them only of all Roman Subjects the Gods would give many Conſtantii, or rather to be made lyable to the Rapines of his Favorites. In Reference to what had paſſed betwixt them two, Conſtantius was his Kinſman and his Friend, and after he choſe to be his Enemy, and the Gods had decided the Quarrel very favourably on his Side, he was a more faithful Friend to him than before they fell out he could have expected to find him. And therefore he demands why they ſhould think he was ill pleaſed to hear him well ſpoken of, when as he was angry with any one that diſcommended him. He perceives they had choſen Chriſt for their Tutelary Deity, in the room of Jupiter Daphnæus and Calliope: gives thoſe that profeſſed his Religion the Title of Galilæans (in which he prides himſelf and thinks he meets with them in all his Writings) moſt impiouſly calls it the Sect of Impiety, and adds that the greateſt part of the People, nay indeed all, imbracing that Sect was angry with him for owning the Religion of their Fore-fathers, and adhering to it. That the Rich were diſpleaſed, for being prohibited the Sale of their Commodities at too dear a Rate, and all in General out of Reſpect to the Dancers and Stageplayers; not for that he had wholly deprived them of the Uſe of ſuch, but regarded them leſs than the Froggs that croaked in the Fenns.

32. But he comforts himſelf with a Story of Cato, who had been formerly offended with the Idleneſs and Luxury of the Antiochians, and exclaimed againſt the Place as a miſerable City upon that Account. Now he tells them, like a pleaſant Droll, that they muſt not wonder at him if he had the Misfortune, being of a more rough Humour than Cato himſelf, and one that exceeded him as much in blunt Boldneſs as the Galls did the Romans. For Cato being born at Rome, converſe with his own Fellow Citizens all his Life; whereas he, as ſoon as ever he could write man, was ſent away to the Galls, Germans and into the Hercynian Forreſt, where he ſpent his Time as it were in hunting and waging War with wild Beaſts; and thence contracted an Humour which very ill befitted a Courtier; could not flatter, but was only skilled in living plainly and freely with all men. Before that he had ſuch Education as was fit for Childhood, he had been trained up in the Books of Plato and Ariſtotle, at ſuch years as were more proper for a delicious kind of Life, and he inſiſts very much upon it to declare how his Maſter laboured to ſhow him the Vanity as off of all Pleaſure in general, ſo of the Sports and Plays which were uſually ſeen on the Theatre. When a full man grown and preferred, he had lived according to his own Way and Rule with moſt fierce and Warlike Nations who knew Venus and Bacchus no further, than for the Sake of Marriage and Procreation; And drinking only ſo much Wine as was agreeable, and might lawfully be uſed; where no Obſcenity was practiſed on Theatres, nor Mimicks trode upon the Stage. But theſe Nations (the Galls he means) ſo loved him for his agreeable Diſpoſition, that not only they took up Arms in his Behalf; but gave him Money, and often forced him to receive it, and what was beſt of all, they were obedient to him in all things. Thence, ſaith he, it came to paſs, that my Name with great Glory and Renown ſounded in your Ears, and they all proclaimed me to be a Valiant, Prudent and Juſt Perſon, who knew not only how to governe in War, but in Peace alſo; and moreover they ſaid: I was eaſie of Acceſs and Gentle. But you, the Antiochians have treated me in a quite contrary Manner. You ſay I have overturned the World, whereas I know nothing one way or other ſubverted by me: then, that Ropes may be made of my Beard; and laſtly, that I have denounced War againſt Chi and wiſh I may do it againſt Kappa too. To what he acted againſt Chriſtianity, he oppoſeth what they had practiſed againſt Paganiſme, and relates ſome Paſſages, which, in the Place proper to them, muſt not be omitted. In the latter End of his Poem, from drolling he deſcends to down right and moſt earneſt Expoſtulation, and ſhews himſelf moſt grievouſly nettled with the ſtinging Libels that were caſt abroad.

33. Yet this he tells them they might freely do, for he would neither cauſe them to be killed beaten, nor impriſoned for ſo doing. But to continue his Expoſtulation, he further urges the Mildneſs and Modeſty both of himſelf and his moſt familiar Officers. Neither he nor they had medled with their Lands or Eſtates, nor been at all taken with thoſe they eſteemed very fine things amongſt “ them; they had neither abuſed their Magiſtrates, nor ſuffered them to abuſe “ the Citizens, but to the City been the Authors of Immunity and great Plenty “ and thereby afforded Leiſure even to ſuch as had Libelled againſt them. “

No Silver nor Gold had been exacted, nor Tributes increaſed, but beſides “ Arreares, a fifth part of the uſual Cuſtoms and Impoſts had been remitted; “ for, not thinking it ſufficient to be indulgent this way himſelf, he had got “ an Officer that managed ſuch Matters, the moſt moderate and abſtinent of all “ others, though they abuſed him for the Hair of his Head, as well as they “ did his Maſter for his Beard. Moreover, he had five more, that were near “ him, fully as virtuous as he, whereof the one was his Uncle of the ſame “ Name with himſelf, who had, with great Juſtice and Moderation, formerly governed “ them of Antioch, and, though with no great Prudence, ordered the Affairs “ of the City. By ſuch Courſes as thoſe he thought he might ſufficiently “ approve himſelf, and ſeem lovely enough to their Eyes; but ſeeing at length “ the Neglect of his Hair, his Hatred to the Spectacula, his Endeavour to preſerve “ Gravity and Decorum in Temples, his Care to maintain Juſtice in Courts, “ and his Deſire thence to baniſh Avarice, had ſo much ſet them againſt him, he “ would very willingly be gone from them; for as much as he could ſcarcely “ expect that with Age and Continuance his Humour would be ſweetned. And “ here he tells them a Fable of the Kite, who having once had a Voice like “ other Birds, would not therewith be contented, but muſt needs endeavour to “ neigh like an Horſe, and by endeavouring after the latter, loſt the former Faculty, “ and became inferiour to all his winged Brethren; which caſe would be “ his; for, endeavouring to be courtly, if he ſhould miſs of his Courtſhip he might “ alſo poſſibly fail of down right dealing.

34. And now he turns down right indeed, conjuring them by his Immortal Gods, by Jove the Preſident of the Forum, and Keeper of the City, to tell him what Cauſe they had to ſhow themſelves ſo ingrateful and bitter againſt him.
He demands what Injury either publickly or privately he had done them, that “ not otherwiſe able to hurt him they daily ſo reviled him in the Forum, whom “ though it was in his Power ſufficiently to hurt, in a larger way of retaliation, “ yet he choſe to return them their own, in their own way of Invective, though formerly he had been ſo far from any ſuch thing that he had ſtudied their Commendation, “ ſo far as ſtood with the Prudence of an Emperour. He had laboured “ to deſerve well of all; though it was impoſſible to pleaſe every individual “ man, or the City it ſelf in every individual thing. For, to ſuch as paid Cuſtomes, “ all Duties of that kind could not be remitted; nor all given, to thoſe “ Officers that were imployed to receive them; but he had kept a Mean, ſo as to “ require what was neceſſary for the Publick Expenſe, and alſo been very bountiful “ in remitting of Tributes where he ſaw convenient. Out of his great “ Kindneſs and deſire to deſerve well of them, though they were the laſt of “ Cities that ſent to congratulate him, yet had he forgiven them far more Money “ than to any other; and, beſides, had increaſed the number of their Senators “ or Decuriones to two hundred; and not ſpared his own Officers, but given “ up thoſe that were imployed in his Revenue, to undergo the Burthens of “ their Corporation. But whereas out of his Deſign to make their Corporation “ greater and richer, he had endeavoured to fill their Court with able men, “ they had taken another Courſe, which indeed better ſuited with an ill tempered “ City and their own univerſal Demeanour: and he inſtances in a pittiful “ beggarly Fellow they had choſen, but ſuch an one, as through the great Prudence “ of them, the City Governours, made merchandize for them, of the miſerable “ ordinary People. Now becauſe he would not ſuffer them thus ſillily “ and knaviſhly to manage their Elections, he had loſt utterly all thanks for his “ former Favours, and they were angry with him. But yet this was not the “ thing that rendred them ſo implacable; there was another Matter of greater “ Concernment. When he came firſt to Town the ordinary ſort being oppreſſed “ by the Rich, received him with Clamours againſt the Dearneſs of Victuals. “
The day following he diſcourſed with ſome of the better ſort and endeavoured “ to perſwade them, that omitting their univerſal Exactions they would conſult “ the Good of their own People and Strangers both, which they promiſed “ ſhould be done. Hereupon he made no more ſtir about it; but for three Moneths “ expected the Performance of their Promiſe; but then perceiving the Complaint “ of the Poor not to have been without Reaſon, and that indeed there “ was not ſuch Scarcity of Proviſions as was pretended, but the Avarice of the “ Rich was the greateſt Cauſe of the Miſchief, he ſet a moderate Price upon “ Commodities by a publick Edict.

35. And whereas the Grain of which there was any real Want, was Wheat, “ cauſed by the great Drought of the preceding year, he ſent and procured a “ Supply from Chalcis, Hierapolis and other neighbouring Cities, to the Value of four “ thouſand Meaſures; which being ſpent, he furniſhed them firſt with five, then with “ ſeven, and afterward with ten thouſand Modii, out of his own Granaries which “ had been ſent him from Ægypt, and took for every fifteen Meaſures but the “ Rate they were wont to pay for ten, viz. one Aureus. Hereupon enſued Plenty “ of Bread; not only for thoſe in the Town, but Country too, who flocked “ to buy it, with which the richer ſort were ſo ill pleaſed that their Trade “ failing them at home, they ſold their Corn into Foreign Parts, and hence “ muſt neceſſarily follow a Famine in Winter, and the ſame Price muſt be paid “ for five as now were for fifteen Meaſures. However he thought he had done “ very well; and further, as ſhould appear from the latter End of his Invective, “ which is ſomething difficult to be underſtood, as he had by his Care made “ Plenty of Wheat, ſo by an Edict he had leſſened the Prices of other Commodities, “ as Wine, Oyl, and other things; whereupon the rich Merchant who “ traffiqued in ſuch Matters, kept them up and would not ſell them; which “ again cauſed the Emperour to be rail'd on, though he had done it for Relief “ of the Poor, and for the Eaſe of thoſe Strangers which flocked to the City “ upon his Account, as alſo of the Magiſtrates and Judges that attended him. “ But now he tells the Antiochians that ſince thoſe Perſons were returned home, “ and all the City had bandied againſt him, ſome out of Hatred, and others “ whom he had provided for, out of Ingratitude, he would commit all to Fate, “ and get him gone to ſome other People; not upbraiding them with what “ had hapned ten years before, when in a Tumult the People had offered Violence “ to the Magiſtrate. Yet he cannot but again ask the Queſtion, for what “ Reaſon they were ſo violently bent againſt him? If it was becauſe he had “ fed them at his own houſe, which hitherto had not been indulged to any “ City, and that ſo plentifully and magnificently? If it was becauſe he had increaſed “ the Number of their Corporation? Or for that he had puniſhed ſuch “ Thieves as he had found amongſt them, according to their Merits? There were “ three thouſand Acres of Lands, it ſeems of that ſort called Caduca, or for “ want of Heirs fallen to him; and theſe Grounds being, as they ſaid Barren, “ they had begged of him. When they had got them, the richer ſort juſtled “ out the Poor, and kept them to their own Uſe, which he having underſtood, “ took them from thoſe that had no Right to them, and appropriated the beſt “ of them to thoſe common Expenſes of the City which were of greateſt Burthen “ and Concernment. And now, ſaith he, you that keep Horſes all the year, “ have the Common of almoſt three thouſand Acres partly through the Prudence “ and Diligence of mine Uncle Julian and partly by the Bounty of my “ ſelf, who having in this Manner chaſtiſed Thieves and Cheates, may very well be “ ſaid by you to overturn the World; for Lenity and Clemency toward ſuch “ as theſe, believe me, do cauſe the Naughtineſs of men to increaſe. Wherefore “ now I come to what I would be at. I my ſelf am Author of all theſe “ Miſchiefs, in being bountiful to ingrateful Perſons. And therefore all is to “ be attributed to mine own Folly, and not your Freedom. And therefore for “ the time to come, I will endeavour to be more prudent and cautious in my “ Carriage toward you: and I pray the Gods will requite you ſuitably, for the “ Honour and Good Will, which I have publickly found at your hands.

Hic Juliani Præfecti Præt. filius, Baſilinæ frater antea Præfectus Ægypti fuerat, Poſtea Comes Orientis, Mamertino & Nevitta Coſs. Vide Valeſium in Ann. ad p.237. Ammiani.

Conſiderations upon his Invective.

36. Thus doth Julian end in earneſt, however he began in Jeſt, his bitter but moſt elegant Invective. The Pluck the Antiochians gave him by the Beard, did ſo much twitch him, that it made the Tears ſtand in his Eyes, however he thought to put it off with Laughter. The Subſtance of the whole Invective we have given, though the Length thereof be ſomewhat improper, becauſe it gives Light to the Laws and Hiſtory of this Prince, and poſſibly diſcovers ſomething of his Humour, which this Paſſage betwixt him and the Antiochians, if you will believe a Native of this Place, Ammianus, ſeems well to make out, in that he ſaith he was willful and not to be diverted from his Purpoſe, being like to his Brother Gallus, although not bloody. That he did not indulge his Paſſion in Killing, Beating or Impriſoning his Subjects (as he tells them he would not) for libelling againſt him, and reviling him in the Forum, he is really, nay much to be commended for his Clemency; for the Laws was very ſevere in ſuch kind of Offences, though committed againſt private men. But as to the Merits of the Cauſe, and Controverſie betwixt him and the City, although his deſerving well of them as to ſeveral Indulgences ought to be acknowledged, yet an indifferent Judge is rather to hear others, than either of the Parties concerned. The great Matter of Offence and Enmity betwixt them was that of the Proviſions, or his bringing down the Price of Commodities, which, however he ſaith he did it out of a good Intention, yet Ammianus tells us it was out of Love to Popularity; and that unſeaſonable or forced Cheapneſs, is often the Cauſe of great Want: As alſo that the Corporation openly ſhewed to him, that the thing could not be effected; and yet he perſevered in his Humour. Another matter about which they differed was the Filling of the Court; and though they might be in the Error as to that particular Perſon he mentions, yet if we give Credit to the ſame Ammianus, who was alſo his no ſmall Friend, we muſt believe him in this point to have been much to blame, and guilty of the greateſt Error (in civil Matters) committed during his Government; for however he boaſts of his filling up the Number of the Decuriones to two hundred, this Writer tells us, that right or wrong he compelled Perſons to theſe Services, and therefore herein he overdid, and they that underſtood them and were upon the Place, and had been exerciſed themſelves in them, were the ableſt to diſtinguiſh of fit Perſons. So ſtood the Caſe, and the Cauſe of the miſunderſtanding; as to the Effects thereof, viz. Invectives, Libels and Railing on both ſides, there is no Excuſe to be made, if we conſult the Equity as well as the Rigour of the Laws, as we ſaid, on their part. But that his Affectation made him ridiculous is evident enough from the Teſtimonies of his Friends: his Affectation as to Philoſophy and Eloquence was vehement, and this cauſed him both to wear ſo great a Beard (though an Emperour and a profeſſed Philoſopher vaſtly differed) to pride himſelf in it, and write this Invective as an Apology for it; for conſidering his Humour, this gratified his Affectation and this way of Revenge pleaſed him ten times more than Cruelty could have done; for there did not lye his Temptation at this time. As for what he returns upon them; which is their Luxury, and that the Hatred they bore him proceeded from the Averſeneſs they had to his Virtue, or the Strictneſs of his Life; if ſuch it was, as he ſets it forth, the Love and Reſpect they bore to Chi and Kappa will not bear them out in it; the Principles of Chriſtian Religion more than of any other, (more than thoſe of his Superſtition) contradicting all Exceſs in any kind. But Ammianus an Antiochian gives us an heavier Cenſure of his Miſopogon, (yet poſſibly ſomething concerned for his Country, though an Eye-witneſs it may eaſily be granted of all thoſe Paſſages) that reckoning up with malicious minde the Faults of the City, He added many things to the Truth. However, leſt we ſhould be ſuſpected of this other Extreme, in not relating the beſt, he ſayeth for his own Advantage, we have choſen to treſpaſs in being tedious upon this Subject.

Apertè monſtrante.

(a) Quocirca in eos deinceps Sæviens ut obtrectatores & contumaces volumen compoſuit invectivum, quod Antiochenſe vel Miſopogonem appellavit, probra Civitatis infenſa mente dinumerans, adenſque veritati complura.

35. Notwithſtanding, he ſtill found many things facetiouſly ſaid againſt him, which though he was conſtrained to diſſemble, inwardly he ſwelled with Anger. For they laught at him as a Cercops, a kind of Dwarf, ſtretching out his Shoulders, thruſting forth his Goats Beard, and yet ſtrutting like ſome Brother of Otus and Ephialtes, the Tallneſs of whom Homer vaſtly extolleth. They termed him Victimarius in Reference to the Multitudes of his Sacrifices; and that deſervedly; for out of Oſtentation he prided himſelf in carrying Oblations or ſuch like things, as the Prieſts uſed to do, attended on by ſilly Women. Though he inwardly fretted for being twitted for this Vanity, yet he concealed his Indignation ſo far as to finiſh the Solemnities. On a certain Feſtival he aſcended the Woody and ſteep Mountain Caſius, whereon at the ſecond Cocks Crow, the Sun was to be ſeen; and there, as he was ſacrificing to Jupiter, he eſpied a Man lying proſtrate on the Ground, who begged his Life and Pardon at his Hands. Upon Enquiry he found it was one Theodotus of Hierapolis, who having amongſt the Honorati, or thoſe who had borne Civil Offices, brought Conſtantius on his way from the City, baſely flattered him, and with feigned Teares and Grones beſought him, as one who without any Doubt would prove Victorious, to ſend them the Head of Julian that ingrateful Traytor, in the ſame manner as he remembred that of Magnentius to have been carried about in Triumph. To this Requeſt, he anſwered that he had heard from many how guilty he had been as to this Matter, but bade him go in ſafety to his own Houſe, and live free from all Fear, through the Clemency of the Prince, who as a prudent Man, had determined and was very ready to diminiſh the number of his Enemies and increaſe that of his Friends. Having finiſhed his Devotions and departed thence, he received Letters from the Præfect of Ægypt wherein was ſignified the joyful News, that Apis the Ox having been ſought for with great Labour and Diligence, was found; which the Inhabitants of the Country reputed a lucky Sign of a fruitful Year, and diverſe other Advantages. But the preſent year thus ended, or that of the Conſulſhip of Mamertinus and Nevita. In that which followed, he took the Title the fourth time, and for his Colleague aſſumed Salluſt the Præfectus Prætorio of Gall, which had not been known of a long time that the Emperour ſhould be joyned with a meer Subject, viz. ſince the Conſulſhip of Diocleſian, and Ariſtobulus, as Ammianus writes, but by a Miſtake. And this his fourth Conſulſhip, he reſolved to render famous to Poſterity by Acts of no ſmall Moment. Beſides his Preparations for the Perſian War, he forgot not his Enemies Chi and Kappa, though in a more clandeſtine and cunning way as yet he acted againſt the Followers of the Former. If he could reſtore the Temple of Hieruſalem, the old Services and Sacrifices of the Religion once practiſed there, it would be a great means and Argument againſt the Growth and Truth of Chriſtianity, which was ſuppoſed to ſucceed it, and ariſe upon the Ruines thereof. This he was reſolved to do whatever it coſt him, and committed the Care of rebuilding the Temple there, to Alypius an Antiochian, who had formerly commanded here in Britain. And Alypius earneſtly proſecuted the Work, and was therein aſſiſted by the Governour of that Province; but (it is Ammianus that tells you) dreadful Balls of Fire broke out from the Ground where the Foundations were laid, and conſuming the Works made the Place inacceſſable, and ſo the Element making vigorous Reſiſtance, the Deſign miſcarried. Of which more hereafter.

Poſt quæ multa in ſe facetè dicta comperiens &c.

Et culpabatur hinc opportunè, cum Oſtentationis gratiâ vehens licenter pro ſacerdotibus ſacra, ſtipatusque mulieribus lætabatur.

A.D. 363.
*Juliano A.*4.
& Salluſtio Coſs.

Julian enters his fourth Conſulſhip with Salluſt the Præfect.

Endeavours in Vain to rebuild the Temple at Hieruſalem.

Inſtaurare ſumptibus cogitabat immodicis.

38. Now was he complemented from the Senate of Rome, by Perſons of conſiderable Nobility and Merit, whom he accordingly rewarded. Apronianus he preferred to be Præfect of that City, Octavianus to be Proconſul of Africk; and Venuſtus he made Vicar of Spain, as alſo Rufinus Arabius he promoted to be Comes of the Eaſt, in the room of his Uncle Julian lately deceaſed. But being ſo wonderfully ſuperſtitious he was now terrified by divers unlucky Signs, as he and his eſteemed them. Fœlix, you muſt know, the Comes Largitionum ſuddainly died of Bleeding, and him Julian, Comes of the Eaſt, not long after followed. Now the Common People looking upon the Titles of the Emperour, on Purpoſe or unwittingly, or it's not material how, read and ſpake thus: Julianus, Fœlix, Auguſtus; for amongſt the ordinary Titles Fœlix came in and uſually preceded Auguſtus immediately; ſo that it was taken as ominous, that he who was Auguſtus ſhould be reckon'd with Fœlix, and with Julian too, both who were dead. Beſides, when he entred the Temple of the Genius, one of the elder Prieſts ſuddenly fell down dead, which his Flatterers near him interpreted to portend the Death of the elder Conſul, but it rather ſignified that Conſul who excelled in Power more than Age, as the Event ſhowed: moreover Conſtantinople was ſhaken with an Earthquake, and the Books of Sybylla at Rome forbade the Emperour to go beyond his own Territories this year, all which were accounted unlucky, and uſed as Arguments to diſwade him from the Expedition; but in Vain. As he could not be utterly diſcouraged by thoſe Paſſages ſo neither receive any greater Incouragement from the Offers now made him of Aſſiſtance by many Nations; the Ambaſſadours of whom he ſent back with this Anſwer, that it did not become the Roman Empire to thrive by the Acceſſion of Forreign Aid; but to aſſiſt its Friends and Allies in their Neceſſity. Only Arſaces, King of Armenia, he commanded with a ſufficient Power to attend his Motions, and expect ſuch Orders as he ſhould ſhortly ſend him. Then did he, ere Spring was advanced to the Height, ſend the Command for his Forces to paſs Euphrates; which accordingly they did, and being quartered about as Convenience directed expected the coming of their Emperour from Antioch.

Makes ſeveral Promotions.

Fœlix defertor Fidei ob nefarium ſacrilegium in Sacro-Sancta Vaſa Commiſſum una cum Juliano comite Orientis miſerè periit, ut narrat Theodoritus lib. 3. Vide Valeſium in Annot.

He refuſes Aid offered him againſt the Perſians.

39. Before we fetch him thence, we muſt enquire what he did farther there the Beginning of this year, ſuppoſing him imployed in more Affairs that what related to the Impoſition of his Miſopogon. But ſeveral Matters therein contained, whether ſaid by the Antiochian or himſelf, we find ſtill explained, limited or confirmed by other Laws he made before his Departure. Though he was ſo Indulgent to that City, as he ſaith himſelf in Relation to Tributes remitted to them, and Grounds given them; yet it concerned him to have a Care of the publick Revenue, and that this he had, we find by two Laws made for Prevention of Abuſes in this kind; for when Grounds were ſold; ſometimes the Vendor or Giver ver would take upon him to diſcharge the publick Duties belonging to them, and afterward they being not to be found, the Treaſury was thereby defrauded. But it being reaſonable, that all Burthens ſhould follow the Soile it ſelf, and the Ground be anſwerable for all Dues ariſing from it, he ordains, That thoſe in preſent Poſſeſſion be forced to pay them. Other old Cuſtomes he laboured to reduce, which relating to that ſort of War, made by him againſt Chi and Kappa, will in a fit Place be fully conſidered. But one thing we meet with wherein he ſeems to have acted againſt his own Principles, and general Courſe of the Laws, and that in the matter of Corporations too. So ſtudious was he, that he was rather unjuſt as to conſtraining of men to undergo their Imployments, and he had a great Averſion to the Agentes in Rebus, and eſpecially the Curioſi taken out of their Body, ſo that (as much as in him lay) he took away their very Name and Being. Yet is there an Edict of his, Publiſhed at Berytus in the Moneth of February of this year, wherein he excuſes thoſe Agentes from ſuch Charges, if they had ſerved but three years, whereas his immediate Predeceſſor required ſeventy years for ſuch Immunity; and his immediate Succeſſor no fewer than ten; and in this Caſe, the Privileges of the Militia, Palatina and Armata were wont to be equal; ſo that it's thought that there's ſome Error in the Text of the Law, as perhaps the Word ſignifying ten more, hath been omitted. But he gives the ſame Privilege to ſuch of them as had received their Miſſion, or been diſcharged in this his fourth Conſulſhip. And by another Edict grants Immunity from thoſe Services of the Courts of Corporations to ſuch as had thirteen Children living, ſo as they might plead it if they were called on to ſerve, or if they were at preſent under the Burthen, they might obtain an honourable Diſcharge from them, yet ſo as ſtill to retain the Advantages accruing from them. That we may diſcharge our ſelves of the Laws made by him reſpecting the State properly, and fit here to be remembred; another Conſtitution he made, if not at this Place, about this time, and that for the Benefit of Cities and Bodies politick, in which he appointed certain Offices, called in Greek, Zygoſtates to decide all Controverſies happening now in Bargaines and Sales about Gold Coin, which from the Dayes of Conſtantine had begun to be ſcarcer than formerly, to be clipped, and otherwiſe much abuſed. In this Law as well as ſeveral others, Gothofred obſerves that he ſhows much of that Greek Pedantry with which he was but juſtly upbraided. Another there is yet of his making, but without the Addition of Day or Conſuls, as theſe we have mentioned; whereby he declares that the Sons of Libertini, or of ſuch who had once been Slaves, but after were manumitted, might obtain the Dignity of the Senatorian Order.

What he did before he left Antioch.

L. L. 3. 4. Sine Cenſu vel Reliquis fundum. Cod. Th. lib. 11. tit. 3. & L. 2. Cod. Juſt. eod. Tit.

L. 2. de Agentibus in rebus. Cod. Th. lib. 6. tit. 27. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

L. 55. de Decurionibus Cod. Th. & L. 24. Cod. Juſt. eod. Tit.

L. 2. de Ponderatoribus. Cod. Th. lib. 12 Tit. 6. & L. 2. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. hinc interpolata eſt.

Vide Goth. in L.

L. 9. de Dignitatibus. Cod. Juſt. lib. 12. tit. 1.

He leaves the City.

His Letter to Libanius.

40. When he was about to leave Antioch, he committed the Juriſdiction of Syria, to one Alexander of Hierapolis, a turbulent and cruel Man; whom he confeſſed not to deſerve the Place, but that ſuch a kind of Judge was proper for the covetous and contumelious Antiochians. When he departed, he was brought on his way by a mixt Multitude of the Citizens, who wiſhed him a proſperous Journey, and a glorious Return, and prayed him for the time to come that he would be more mild and gentle to them, but he being ſtill angry, for the Jeers and Affronts he had received, gave them a ſharp Anſwer, and affirmed that he would never ſee them more, as it came to paſs. For he ſaid he would return by a nearer way, and Winter at Tarſus in Cilicia, and accordingly had written to Nemoris the Præſident to get all things ready for him; and Winter and Summer there he did, his Body being privately buried in a Suburb of that City, as he had himſelf ordained, leaving Antioch, on the fifth of March, to come to Hierapolis, where, at his Entry, fifty Souldiers were killed by the Fall of ſome Buildings, beſides many hurt. Here he continued three dayes; and in this time wrote a letter to Libanius the Sophiſt and Quæſtor; wherein, after he had given him an Account of his Travel and Entertainment in his Journey, he tells them in ſhort the State of his Military and Civil Affairs, for as to the Bulk of them it was larger (he ſaith) than to be comprehended in three Epiſtles of the fulleſt ciſe. In the firſt place he had ſent to the Saracens, and willed them to come if they pleaſed and joyn with him, having alſo imployed moſt vigilant Spies to ſee that none ſhould give them Intelligence of his Motions. He addes, that he had decided Controverſies amongſt his Souldiers, with the greateſt Lenity and Equity imaginable, as he perſwaded himſelf; that he had provided himſelf of excellent Horſes and Mules: rendevouz'd his Army, had laden his Veſſels upon the River with Corn, or rather with Bisket and Vinegar: of all which to deſcribe the manner how they were done, and what Speeches were made about them, he knew how tedious it would be, and it was trou-troubleſome to relate in how many Letters and Books he had ordered all things “ (which happened well to him) to be Recorded, and carried about with him. Having here, as both he and others tell us, united his Forces, he march'd with all ſpeed for Meſopotamia, that he might prevent the fame of his coming (which courſe he ever obſerved) and ſet upon the Aſſyrians unawares. Having paſſed Euphrates with his own Army, and the Auxiliary * Scythians, by a Bridge made of Boats, he came to Batnæ, a Municipal Town of Oſdroëna, where he received another ill Omen, (for of this name we find two places mentioned in this Expedition, one on this ſide, and the other beyond) fifty Soldiers more being overwhelmed with a Stack of Straw, while they were careleſly pulling at it. Departing ſorrowful from this place, he haſted to Carhæ, an antient Town, famous for the overthrow of Craſſus and the Rom an Army, being the Frontier toward Aſſyria, whence lay two Roads for Perſia, one on the left hand by Adiabene and the River Tygris, and another on the right, by Aſſyria and Euphrates. Here making ſome ſtay to furniſh the Army with Neceſſaries, he ſacrificed to the Moon, according to the Cuſtom of the Country, (which was very much at her Moonſhips Devotion) and here, he is ſaid, before the Altar, no body being near, ſecretly to have delivered his Purple Military Coat to Procopius, his Kinſman, with order, courageouſly to ſeize upon the Empire, upon Intelligence that he had miſcarried amongſt the Parthians.

Id reſponſum curialibus Antiochenis à Juliano datum eſt in manſione prima quæ Litharbis dicebatur, viculus in Chalcide. Juliani Ep. 27. p. 160.

He paſſeth Euphrates.

* Inter hos Gothorum meminit Zoſimus.

41. Being now troubled with ill Dreams, he preſaged ſome Miſchief to be at hand, and both he and his Wizards declared, that the Day following, which was the nineteenth of March, was to be regarded. Yet, as afterward was diſcovered, the matter lay afar off; for, (as Ammianus obſerves) this very ſame night was the Temple of Apollo Palatinus burnt at Rome, of which Apronianus was then Præfect; and, if great help had not been at hand, the Verſes of Sibylla Cumana had periſhed in the Flames. While he was buſied in ordering the March of his Army, in which he muſtered ſixty thouſand men and five, and regulating the matters relating to Proviſions, News was brought poſt haſte, that a Party of the Enemies Horſe had broken into the Pale of the Empire, and made Depredations; wherewith being much moved, he purſued the Deſign he had before in his Head of committing a Party of thirty thouſand (ſaith Ammianus, but eighteen ſaith Zoſimus) choice men to Procopius; and with him joyning Sebaſtian a Comes, who had been Dux of Ægypt, he commanded them to keep a ſtrict Watch within Tigris, leſt any ſudden and unexpected Accident ſhould happen; as often had done before; and if poſſible to joyn Arſaces, and with him, by the way of Corduena and Moxoena, having waſted Chilocomus that fruitful Tract of Media, and other Parts, to meet him, if they could, in Aſſyria. He pretended then, that he would paſs the Tigris, and for the Diſguiſe, had cauſed Preparations to be made for him on that Road; but took the Right hand, and having ſlept quietly that Night, in the Morning called for his Horſe. They brought him one that was named Babylonius, who being ſtruck with a Blow from an Engine, and not enduring the Pain, tumbled himſelf and ſpoiled the Furniture, which was richly ſet out with Gold and Gemms. Julian herewith was very much pleaſed, as taking it for a good Omen, and cryed out with the Applauſe of thoſe that attended him, that Babylon was fall'n to the Ground, deſpoiled of it's Ornaments. Here he thought it worth his time to ſtay a little and confirm the Omen by Sacrifice; which having endeavoured, he came to a Caſtle called Davana, where the River Belias taking his Riſe, afterward powreth himſelf into Euphrates. Having here refreſhed his men; the day after he proceeded as far as Callinicus, a Fort very ſtrong and Opportune for Commerce, where, on the ſix and twentieth day of the Moneth, he celebrated the Annual Feaſt of the Mother of the Gods, as it was wont to be obſerv'd at Rome; and took his Eaſe the Night following with much Courage and Gayety. The day following he marched by the Rivers ſide, and in a certain Station pitched his Tent; and here he was ſaluted by the petty Princes of the Saracens upon their Knees, who preſented him with a golden Crown, as Lord not only of their People, but of the World; and he gave them a kind Reception, intending to ſerve himſelf of them in the War. And before they were diſmiſſed, a Fleet like that of Xerxes preſented it ſelf to his View, under Conduct of Conſtantianus a Tribune, and Lucillianus a Comes, which ſeemed to overſpread the broad River Euphrates. In it were a thouſand Veſſels of Burthen laden with Proviſions, Arms and Engines, beſides fifty others fitted for Fight, and as many wherewith to make Bridges, if need ſhould require.

ὀκτακισχιλίους καὶ μυρίους, ſolùm ait Zoſimus.

Dabana in Notitia Imperii ſub Duce Oſdroënæ unà cum Callinico.

He is preſented with a golden Crown by the Saracens.

Paulò aliter Zoſimus.

42. About this time, he aſcended the Tribunal and by a Speech fitted to the Occaſion, animated his Souldiers to the War, to which he added the more powerful Motive, of a Congiary or Donative, of an hundred and thirty Nomiſmata of Silver to every man. The Foot he committed to the leading of Victor; and the Horſe to the Conduct of Hormiſda a Perſian, whom the King his Brother having very injuriouſly treated, he had fled to Conſtantine, and after ſeveral ample Teſtimonies of his Fidelity, been preferred to great Commands; but yet with him he thought fit to joyn Arintheus. Having accepted the Aid which the Saracens willingly offered, he marched for Cercuſium (in the Scripture Carchemiſh) which he entred in the Beginning of April. This was now a very ſtrong and neat Town, the Walls whereof were ſtrengthened by the Rivers Abora and Euphrates, which circled it in the Faſhion of an Iſland: for formerly being little and weak, Diocleſian had fortified it with Walls and Turrets at ſuch time, as he ordained more inward Limits upon the Confines, to prevent the Incurſions of the Perſians, who had lately done very great Damage to the Provinces. While Julian here lay and imployed himſelf in paſſing his Army over Avora, he received ſad Letters from Salluſt the Præfect of Gall, who intreated him thereby to ſuſpend his Expedition againſt the Parthians; nay moſt earneſtly beſought him, that he would not ſo prepoſterouſly thruſt himſelf upon certain Deſtruction, the Divine Powers not being yet pacified. But he neglected this wholſome Advice, and preſſed forward rather with more Confidence; for that Ammianus tells us, no humane Power or Virtue ever yet could merit, that what Fate had ordained, ſhould not come to paſs; and being got over, he cauſed the Bridge to be broken down, that his men might perceive all Hope of Flight to be cut off. He paſſed on (as Ammianus, who himſelf was preſent in this Expedition, and therefore is our beſt and ſufficient Guide in the Hiſtory of it, writes) and came to a Place called Zaita, which ſignifieth an Olive-Tree, where they ſaw the Tumulus or Hill raiſed in Memory of the Emperour Gordian, to whom being conſecrated, out of his innate Piety, as this Writer words it, he made a Parentation; and ſo proceeded to Dura a Town depopulated. Here beholding afar off as he thought, a Band of Men, he made an Alt, and ſtanding in a Muſe to think how he ſhould order his Matters, a Lion of a vaſt Bigneſs preſented himſelf to the Army, and by it was quickly diſpatched. Hereat he conceived greater Hope and Courage, though the Event ſhewed it was without ſufficient Ground. Our Writer tells you, that indeed, by this Accident the Death of a King was foreſhewn, but of which, it was utterly uncertain. That the Oracles themſelves in ſuch Caſes were doubtful, he declares; as in the matter of Crœſus, the Athenians when they fought againſt the Perſians, and of Pyrrhus in his War againſt the Romans. The Hetruſcan Aruſpices produced their Books, and thence ſhewed ſuch a Token to be fatal to him that invaded the Territories of others, though upon never ſo juſt Grounds, but were run down by the Philoſophers, who had the greater Authority with him, and were peremptory in thoſe things they did not underſtand. They urged indeed that when Maximian, while yet Cæſar, was about to ingage with Narſes King of Perſia, a Lion in like Manner and a great Boar appeared, and were killed; and he went away with the Victory; but the Caſe differed; for Deſtruction was portended to (marke) him that unjuſtly made the Invaſion; which was Narſes who firſt invaded Armenia, ſubject at that time to the Romans.

Zoſimus lib. 3.

Salluſt writes to him, to diſſwade him from the Parthian War.

He is amuſed by ſeveral Accidents.

43. The day following, being the ſeventh day of April, by intervention of a Cloud, hapned great Darkneſs, Thunder and Lightning, and therewith a Souldier named Jovian, was ſtruck dead, as he was leading two Horſes from watering. This confirmed the Wizards in their former Opinion, who, by Books of Thunder, ſhewed, that Thunder it ſelf was to be taken for a Councellor, and when a man, of ſo great a Name, was ſo killed with Horſes, which are the great Helps for carrying on War, it evidently ſignified that the Place and Country where ſuch a thing hapened, was, as dangerous, to be quitted. On the contrary the Philoſophers affirmed that the Lightning ſignified nothing at all; but was a fierce Vapour by ſome Force or other thruſt down from the Clouds; or if any thing was meant by it, it muſt be Brightneſs and Glory, ſignified thereby as accruing to the Emperour from the Enterprize he had undertaken, flame of it's own Nature ever tending upward. The Profeſſion of the Philoſophers and their Opinion moſt ſuiting Julian's Humour, he eaſily cloſed with them therein, and now made an Oration to the Army, furniſhed with ſeveral ancient Stories of the greateſt Commanders who had atchieved as well againſt the Perſians as others, by their Valour and Affection to their Country, eſpecially through the good Will and Reſolution of their Souldiers, very great things; which now by their Aſſiſtance he was reſolved to imitate in this Affair; wherein he had this preſent Advantage of Juſtice on his ſide, that as they were prompted to what they did, by martial Glory; he was compelled to repair thoſe

By a Speech he encourages his Men.

Loſſes, and revenge thoſe Injuries which the Roman Provinces had of late years ſuſtained. With his Diſcourſe they were ſo animated, that conſidering both his former Services in Gall, and his preſent Alacrity to endure all hardſhip, even as far as the Condition of a private Souldier required, they embraced his Advice with all chearfulneſs, and reſolved to obey his Commands to the utmoſt. The undaunted Reſolution of Emperour and Army thus manifeſted and mutually applauded, he entred the Aſſyrian Borders, where fearing to fall into ſome Ambuſh, he drew his men into fourſquare Bodies, and appointed fifteen hundred as a Forlorn; to march both before and on both ſides; to give warning upon all Occaſions. He himſelf led the main Body of Foot, being the Strength of the Army. On the right Hand he commanded certain Legions to march by the River Euphrates, under Conduct of Nevita. The left Wing he committed, with ſome Troops of Horſe, to Arintheus and Hormiſda, to be led through the Plains and Mariſhes: And the Rere was commanded by Dagalaiphus, Victor, and Secundinus, the Dux of Oſdruena. To ſtrike a greater Terror into the Enemy, he enlarged his Ranks, and cauſed his Army to appear much more numerous than it was; ſo that the Front was well nigh diſtant from the Rere, the Space of ten Miles, in which Art both of inlarging and contracting an Army when the Stratagem required, Pyrrhus King of Epyrus was moſt excellent. And the Baggage he placed ſo within the Wings, that all Danger by ſudden Incurſions, might be prevented. As for his Fleet, he ordered it to keep as near as could be, that the Army and it might afford mutual Aſſiſtance and Protection to each other.

Being entred Aſſyria, the manner of his March.

44. Proceeding after this manner for three dayes, they approached Dura, a deſolate City upon the River; whence journeying, after four dayes more, they attacqued a Fort called Anathan, ſtanding in an Iſlette in Euphrates; and ſtormed it meerly by Language; for thoſe within were perſwaded to yield, which they did by driving out before them an Oxe with a Garland on his Head, with them the uſual Signal of Peace. The Emperour cauſed the Fort to be burnt. Puſeus the Governour was rewarded with the Place of a Tribune, and afterward was preferred to be Dux of Ægypt; the reſt were ſent away with their Moveables to Chalcis, a City of Syria. Amongſt them was found a Roman Souldier, who, when Maximian made an Inroad into theſe Countries, had been left behind by reaſon of Sickneſs, then a very young man. But afterwards he took ſeveral Wives, according to the Cuſtom of the Place, and now very Aged, with a Numerous Iſſue, to his great joy was carried homewards; affirming with the teſtimony of ſeveral Hearers, that he had foretold, how near to an hundred years old, he ſhould at length be buried in the Roman Territories. After this, the Scouts of the Saracens brought ſome Priſoners to the Emperour, who, glad at the ſight, ſent them back again upon the like Errand. The day following much Damage happened to the Army by a furious Tempeſt, and ſhortly after, by the breaking out of the River, which, whether it proceeded from ſome Natural Cauſe, or the Deſign of the Enemy, was uncertain. The further they paſſed, the greater danger they being to meet with, the Emperour in Perſon rode before, to ſee that all was clear; and ſometimes came behind, as there was occaſion, and ſome Forts they took in their paſſage, and others refuſed to ſubmit, about which he thought it not worth his labour to ſpend much time; but he commanded the fruitful Country to be waſted. One Town they took, called Ozogardana, which, upon their approach, the Inhabitants had forſaken, and here was a Tribunal of Trajan ſtill to be ſeen. Admiring that all this while he ſhould meet with no oppoſition, his Wonder now preſently ceaſed; for, having ſent out Hormiſda, who beſt knew the Country, to make a diſcovery how matters ſtood, the Surenas (for this, Zoſimus tell us, was the Name of Magiſtracy, not of a man) the higheſt in Power next to the King, and Malechus Podoſaces, the Philarchus of thoſe Sarazens called Aſſanitæ, watched the opportunity of intrapping him; and had done it, but that a branch of the River, ſwoln above the uſual proportion, hindred their paſſage. Being diſcovered, a Party turned head againſt them, and, after ſome ſkirmiſhing, forced them to retire.

Ἀρχῆς δὲ τοῦτο παρὰ Πέρσαις ὄνομα.

45. The Souldiers, incouraged with this Succeſs, marched more chearfully to a Place called Macepracta, where were ſeen the Ruins of Walls, formerly of great length, and built for the Defence of Aſſyria from Foreign Invaſions. And here, the River being divided, a branch of it running up into the more inward Tracts lying about Babylon, the Army with ſome difficulty got over; the Enemy making oppoſition on the farther Bank, till diverted by Victor, whom Julian cauſed to croſs it for that purpoſe. This Difficulty conquer'd, they met with a greater, at a City (called by Ammianus, Pyriſabora, by Zoſimus Berſabora) very ſtrongly fortified by Nature, and the Reſolution of the Inhabitants. Here no Language would do the work, for, all the Arguments of Hormiſda they rejected, reviling him as a Traytor to his Country. Neither would downright Force prevail; though the Emperour in Perſon ventured to break open a Gate, with as much Danger and Courage, as Ammianus had read Scipio Æmilianus to have undergone and practiſed at the taking of Carthage; till at laſt he gave order for that ſort of Engine to be mounted, which, having the name of Helepolis, obtained, by the great Execution it did, the Title of Poliorcetes for Demetrius. Affrighted at the ſight of ſo great a Machine, which both by its height and ſtrength, they perceived would ſurmount their ſtrongeſt Turrets, they cried out for pardon, and obtained it, being in number two thouſand and five hundred; for the reſt, apprehending the ſtorm, had removed themſelves into a ſafer Place by Water. The taking of it, after two dayes Siege, being a City, and the greateſt in Aſſyria, next Cteſiphon, brought Repute, and was very ſeaſonable; for there was found plenty of Victuals and Arms, which being taken away, Fire was then ſet to it. The following day, as the Emperour ſate at Meat, word was brought him that the Surenas had fallen upon three Companies of the Scouts, and having ſlain ſome few, amongſt whom, one Tribune, had taken a Banner or Enſign. Hereupon, in a great rage, he aroſe; went thither with his Guard, and having eaſily conſtrained the Enemy to retire, caſhiered the other two Tribunes as Cowards; and ten of the Souldiers that had fled, he cauſed to be put to death, according to the antient Martial Law in ſuch caſes practiſed. Then did he aſcend the Tribunal, and gave thanks to the Army for what was already well performed, exhorting them to be conſtant in the like Atchievements, and promiſed them for a Donative an hundred Nummi a man. But they diſdained the Sum, as contemptible, and began to grow tumultuous; which perceiving, he ſhewed both his Indignation and Gravity, in another Speech, to this purpoſe:

His Army, growing mutinous,

He reduceth by a Speech.

46. Conſider, ſaith he, that the Perſians abound with all things, and therefore " the Wealth of this Nation will ſufficiently inrich us if we unite in Affection, and " valiantly demean our ſelves. Believe me, the Roman Commonwealth, from vaſtly " rich, is become exceeding poor, by the means of thoſe, who to increaſe their own " private Wealth, have inſtructed Princes, how, by Gold, to purchaſe Eaſe and Qui- " et from the Barbarians; and ſo to return home. The Treaſury is emptied, the Ci- " ties exhauſted, and the Provinces haraſſed. I have neither any Treaſure of mine " own, nor Kindred to ſupply me, though Nobly deſcended; only a Breaſt that's " void of all fear; neither ſhall an Emperour, who placeth all that's Excellent in the " Ornament of the Mind, be aſhamed to own honeſt Poverty. For the Fabritii, " poor in Eſtate, managed very great Wars, and were rich in Glory. We ſhall alſo " abound with all good things, if you carry your ſelves courageouſly and modeſtly, " under the Conduct of God and my ſelf, who ſhall Govern you with as great cir- " cumſpection, as Humane Reaſon will allow of; but if you will be Mutinous, pro- " ceed in your way, I, for my part, as becomes an Emperour, having alone finiſhed " a courſe of ſo great things incumbent on me, will dye ſtanding, and contemning " that Life which ſome pitiful Fever, however, may take from me: Or, truly, I can " quit my Place: For I have not ſo lived, but I can eaſily return to a Private Con- " dition: And, I may boaſt, that here are preſent moſt excellent Commanders, of " perfect Experience and Skill in all matters relating to War. With this mild, yet reſolute Speech, the Souldiers were ſatisfied for the time, and, being encouraged by pectation of better things, promiſed Obedience, and, with univerſal conſent, extolled his Authority and greatneſs of Spirit to the Skies. And he animated them daily by theſe kinds of Sayings; So let me ſubdue the Perſians. So let me repair the tottering Condition of the Roman State; in like manner as Trajan was wont to ſwear, So let me ſee once Dacia brought into the form of a Province; ſo let me lay Bridges over Iſter and Euphrates. Thence, after a march of fourteen miles, they came to a low ground, which, the Perſians having notice they would paſs, drowned, by opening the Sluces, ſo that with great difficulty they got over, by many little Bridges, Bladders, and light Boats. Then, being way-laid by the Enemy, who diſcharged many ſhowers of Arrows upon the Flancks, the Army came near a Place where Euphrates divides it ſelf into many Rivolets; and here they found a City forſaken of its Inhabitants the Jews, who would not truſt to the weakneſs of the Walls, and the Souldiers out of Anger burnt it. Arriving at length at Maiozamalcha, a great City, fortified by ſtrong Walls; before it they encamped; and the Emperour, knowing the Enemies Horſe to be accounted terrible in theſe Champian Countreys, took all care poſſible to prevent its ſudden Incurſions.

47. This

Sect. 5.

A. D. 363.

47. This done, with a few Velites in his Company, he went on Foot to view the Town and thereby caſt himſelf into extreme Danger; for, ten Perſians, armed at all Points, iſſuing out at a Poſtern, fell on him and his Company, and two of them, knowing him by his Habit, made it their Buſineſs to diſpatch him; but he received the Blows upon his Target, ran one of them into the ſide, and the other was killed by his Followers. Of the reſt ſome were wounded, and all fled; after which he led back his Attendants with Spoiles of him he had ſlain, being a golden Collar; and herein Ammianus compares him with Torquatus and Corvinus, thoſe ancient Captains. Having paſſed his men over the River, and fortified his Camp by a double Trench for fear of the Perſian Horſe, he beſieged the Place; for that he thought it dangerous to leave ſo conſiderable Enemies, as thoſe that held it, at his Back. While he made Preparations for the Siege, the Surenas fell upon ſuch Carriage-Beaſts as were left beyond the River, but was repulſed by ſome Cohorts, with the Loſs of a few men. Now alſo were two Cities ſtanding in Iſlands deſerted by their Inhabitants; whereof ſome flying to Cteſiphon, and others getting away in little Boats, many of them were intercepted by the Roman Horſe, which was ever exerciſed in foraging, and got good Booty, while the Foot was buſie at the Siege. The Emperour drew a double Line about the Town, but the Siege proved troubleſome, both by reaſon of the natural Strength of the Place, and the firm Reſolution of the Beſieged, No attempt would prevail that was known and open, not the utmoſt Reſolution of the Legions, not the force of battering Engines, although they broke down a Tower, and together with it fell part of the Wall. At length the Deſign was effected by Mines, through which the Souldiers got into the City, and, the Governour with ſome few others excepted, all found within were put to the Sword. But as for himſelf, Julian touched none of the Booty, only accepted of a dumb Boy which could ſhew Tricks, and of three golden Coins. As for the Women, which if any where, were beautiful in Perſia, he would not ſo much as ſee one of them, imitating therein the Continence of Alexander the Great, and Africanus, who declined ſuch Temptations; leſt being invincible, as to Labours and Performances of great things, they ſhould have been conquered by Pleaſure, and pittiful momentary Satisfactions.

48. This City being burnt, and ſuch as lay hid in Caves and Holes, wherewith theſe Tracts abounded, on Purpoſe to do Miſchief, being either choaked with Smoak which the Souldiers on purpoſe fired in the Mouths of them, or killed when by it forced out; by many Bridges laid over the little Rivulets, they paſſed further, and came to two Forts, where Victor leading the forlorn was oppoſed by the King of Perſia's Son, who with many Noblemen and a power of Souldiers endeavoured to hinder his croſſing the River. Yet upon Sight of the Body of the Army, they retired, and ſo the Romans arrived at that pleaſant Country, ſo delightful for its Groves and all ſorts of Fruits, but chiefly acceptable to them in this Reſpect, that it preſented them with an Houſe of the Kings, built after the Roman Faſhion, which upon that very Account they left untouched. Here was alſo a Foreſt abounding with Lyons, Bears, Boares, and other ſorts of Beaſts, wild to Extremity, and kept for the Kings Pleaſure when he pleaſed to hunt, which now became good Game to the Souldiers. Not far diſtant ſtood Coche, or Seleucia, where the Army reſting two Dayes, the Emperour as he went abroad to view the Place eſpied the Carcaſſes of the Relations of him that betrayed Pyriſabora nailed to the Gallows: And here Nabdates, the Governour, who with eighty more had been taken at the Surrender of Maiozamalcha, was burnt alive; for that, having at the Beginning of the Siege promiſed to deliver up, or betray, as Ammianus terms it, the City, he had moſt earneſtly defended it, and having notwithſtanding obtained Pardon beyond all he could hope for, now was grown ſo inſolent as to affront Hormiſda with all ſorts of Indignities. Proceeding a little farther they loſt ſome of their Baggage, carriage-Beaſts and thoſe that attended them, by a party which ſurprized the Rear while the Front was amuſed by another Body, that gave it a Diverſion another way. Julian hereat fretting in vain, and now drawing nigh to the Regions of Cteſiphon, while he went to view another ſtrong Fort he found in his Paſſage, again caſt himſelf into extreme Hazard, whereat being very angry, as if Fortune ought to have exempted him from uſual, nay courted Dangers, he reſolved to be revenged, and for that Purpoſe laid Siege to the Place, which they within as vigorouſly defended, truſting to the extraordinary Strength of the Fort; it being eſteemed by them inacceſſible; and not doubting of ſpeedy Succour from the King, who now lay at no great Diſtance from them.

49. His Choler was ſtill further moved by another ſudden Onſet made by the Perſians; who took and killed ſeveral of his Men, and the reſt apprehending that greater Numbers of them were arrived than indeed there were, their Courage began to fail them, and they were ſlow to Action. But afterward, by their Prince his Endeavours, and their own Diſdain being again excited, they forced thoſe in, which had made a Sally at this time, when their Friends beyond the Water gave the Onſet, and had cut off a great Part of a Cohort with the Tribune. But the Emperour inraged at this Diſgrace, took away the Horſes from the reſt of the Cohort, whom he accuſed of coldly receiving the Enemy; and cauſed them to ſerve as Foot Souldiers; which done, he burnt ſtill with a vehement Deſire of taking the Fort, for the Danger he underwent of his Perſon, and for that Purpoſe ſtill thruſt himſelf forward into more Difficulties, fighting at the head of his men, incouraging them by his Example, and awing them by his Preſence and Obſervation. By theſe and other Means he obtained his Deſire; and having burnt the Fort, it was neceſſary now to give ſome Refreſhment to his Army; which that it might receive without danger or diſturbance, he ſtrongly fortified his Camp, to prevent any ſudden Incurſions, or ſecret Attempts that might be made from Cteſiphon. After this Refreſhment, they came to a Foſſe-Dike, or Artificial River, which had the Name of Naarmalcha (the River of Kings) being digged firſt by order of the Emperour Trajan, and afterward ſcowred up by Severus, for the paſſage of Veſſels out of Euphrates into Tigris. But now it was dry, and the Perſians, to prevent any ſuch Deſign, had choaked it up with Stones; which Julian having found, thought fit to cleanſe, and reſtore it to its former Uſe; and this, by the Induſtry of his men, he effected, ſo as through this Cutt, his Fleet paſſed out of Euphrates into the other River, and the Army having croſſed it on Bridges, proceeded in its March toward Cocke, through a Countrey that even raviſhed it with the beauty of what it afforded, and in the middle preſented them with an Houſe of the King's Retirement, in a ſhady * Place, the Rooms of which were furniſhed with Landſkips, and therein repreſented their manner of Hunting; for the Perſians uſed no other Pictures than what concerned War, or repreſented fighting and killing, in ſome or other ſort.

* Zoſimus παράδισον βασιλικὸν appellat. A Park.

50. Hitherto his Attempts had well ſucceeded (though ſometimes he ſuffered his calm Soul to be ruffled by very little Blaſts of not ever conſtant Fortune) which cauſed him now to deſpiſe all Difficulties whatſoever, and he often proceeded to Acts which bordered upon Temerity. He commanded eight hundred men to be put aboard the ſtrongeſt Veſſels of Burthen, and dividing his Fleet into three parts; with one he ordered Victor to paſs the River, and to ſeize on the farther Bank in the Night-time; which all the Officers concluded was a deſperate Attempt, and unanimouſly beſought him to deſiſt, but in vain: Being violently then bent upon it, five Veſſels adventured over, and when they approached the ſhoar, had caſt into them Firebrands, and other combuſtible matter, wherewith they, and all within them had periſhed, if the Emperour had not cauſed them to be relieved with the whole Fleet; which done, after a moſt violent Conteſt, the Souldiers landed, and kept their Poſt on the further Bank. Now did the whole Force of the Perſians preſent it ſelf to view, and in the firſt place, their Cataphracti, all arm'd cap à pie, with their barded Horſes, which were followed by the Foot, remarkable for their oval and crooked Targets, made of ſticks, that were covered with raw Hides: and in the Rere came up the Elephants, terrible to behold. The Emperour made Head againſt them with his Foot, placed, according to the Order deſcribed by Homer, betwixt the Troops; leſt, being firſt expoſed in the Front, they might be borne down, and diſcourage all behind them, or being placed in the Rere, they might have opportunity to run away; he himſelf, with thoſe lightly armed, was ready to fly up and down, and ſuccour all, as need ſhould require. But there was no very great need of his labour in this kind, though he ſpared it not; for the Romans, having once broken the Front of their Enemies, drove them back with all violence imaginable; and, notwithſtanding the contrary Endeavours of Pigranes, the Surenas, and Narſes, their moſt able Captains, purſued them as far as the Walls of Cteſiphon, which alſo they had entred with them, had not Victor, with Hands lift up to Heaven, and as earneſt words as he could utter, being now himſelf wounded in the Shoulder, beſought them to forbear; leſt being got in, they ſhould have been ſlaughtered by the numerous Enemy. Here Ammianus falling into a fit of Boaſting, compares the Performance of this day with thoſe of Hector, or the Antient Greeks, in the Perſian War. The Souldier, all bloody as he was, made haſte to the Emperour's Pavilion, and there was not ſparing in congratulatory Expreſſions, for that he had truly ſo demeaned himſelf in the Action, that it could not be diſcerned whether he was a Captain or an ordinary Souldier, and had fought

He grows raſh in his Actions.

Quod cum acri metu territi duces concordi precatu fieri prohibere tentarent, &c.

The Perſian Army faceth him,

Aliam ejus rei cauſam Rufus Feſtus, & Libanius produnt, nempe, intraſſet miles niſi major prædarum occaſio fuiſſet quam cura victoriæ.

And is put to flight.

fought with that Succeſs, that about two thouſand and five hundred Perſians being left dead upon the Place, only ſeventy of his men had miſcarried. He, in Return of their kindneſs, called ſuch by their Names as he had obſerved to have ſignalized their Valour; and, according to their deſerts, conferred on them Naval, Civick, and Caſtrenſian Garlands.

Sex autem millia Perſarum in hoc prælio occubuiſſe prodit Libanius.

51. Now abundantly concluding with himſelf, that Fate would ſtill continue propitious to him, he prepared for his God Mars many Sacrifices. But for all this, ſo skittiſh Fortune would have it, that of ten moſt beautiful Bulls on which was to be conferred this grinning Honour, before ever they came to the Altar, nine, of their own accord, laid themſelves down in great ſadneſs; and the tenth, having broken looſe, though with much ado he was got back, yet being ſacrific'd, reveng'd his Death by ominous Signs. Hereat Julian, with violent Indignation, cried out, and call'd Jove to witneſs, that he would never ſacrifice more to Mars; and ſo verily it came to paſs, and he never recalled his Vow. But calling then a Council of War, ſome propounded that they ſhould fall upon Cteſiphon, though they knew it was a moſt Difficult Enterprize, both by reaſon of the vaſt ſtrength of the Place, and for that the King was expected with a very great multitude to come to relieve it. The better way was reſolved on; to ſend Arintheus with a ſtrong Party of Foot to waſte the Countrey, and intercept ſuch as lay lurking up and down to watch occaſions for incommoding the Army. He himſelf would now follow his own fancies, ſuggeſted to him by the great Ambition he had of proceeding further, and not liſtening to any Advice given him to the contrary, upbraided his Officers therewith, as thoſe, who out of love to their Eaſe, would perſwade him to loſe the Kingdom of Perſia, which was now, in a manner, in his hands. Having furniſhed himſelf with Guides little fit for his Turn, he would needs take the way leading into the mid-land Countreys, and leave the River on his left hand; and, cheated by ſome pretended Fugitives, he moſt unluckily commanded all the Ships to be ſet on fire, exceptt welve of the leſſer ſize; which, being to be taken in pieces, he ordered to be conveyed in Waggons for the making of Bridges, as occaſion ſhould require. That which induc'd him ſo to do, was an unwillingneſs that the Enemy ſhould become Maſters of his Fleet; or elſe, as from the beginning of the Expedition had happened, no fewer than twenty thouſand men muſt be employed in haling and governing theſe Veſſels. But theſe Reaſons were over-ruled by the juſt Fears of every man in the Army, though never ſo valiant, who evidently ſhewed, that, though perhaps the Drought, or height of the Mountains might render the Country unpaſſable, and force them back, yet there could be no Retreat, as he had ordered the matter, and that their Fears were not without ground, the Guides themſelves atteſted, who, being put to torture, ſore againſt his will, as Zonaras writes, confeſſed, that they had offered themſelves to the ſervice on ſet purpoſe to deceive him. Late Repentance is better than none at all. The Flames are now ordered to be quenched, and the utmoſt endeavour of the whole Army is uſed to that end; but ſo great progreſs had been made, that moſt of the Veſſels were conſumed, and only twelve could be found that had not been touched by the Fire.

Complures hoſtias Marti parabat ultori.

He reſolves never more to ſacrifice to Mars.

He is ambitious and wilful.

Zonaras 700 triremes cum 400 onerariis incenſas eſſe dicit. Libanius, 15 naves ad compingendos pontes ait eſſe ſervatas qui quidem eo loci, ut notat Valeſius, multum laborat, ut hoc inconſultum & imprudens Achillis ſui facinus excuſet. Adde Auguſtinum de Civitate Dei, lib. 5. c. 29.

He burns his Fleet.

52. The Perſians perceiving this his diſadvantage, laid waſte the Countrey as much as poſſible; and ſometimes in one poſture, another while in another, began to inſult over their Enemies, now beſieged in a manner. Both Emperour and Souldier was highly ſenſible of the want of their Boats for making Bridges, and more than that, knew not well how to reſiſt the Perſians now preſſing upon them; for the additional Aids expected with Arſaces, and the other Captains, could not come at them for want of conveyance, by reaſon of the burning of the Fleet. Julian, a little to comfort his Men, cauſed ſome of the Priſoners to be brought forth, who being very lean, and thinne as moſt Perſians naturally were, he thence took occaſion to droll upon them and for the naſtineſs of their Hair, and their Cowardiſe, affirming them wont to turn Tail before ever they came to blows. This being eaſily ſaid, and the Captives removed, a Council was held to conſult of what was to be done. Much being alleaged, the ordinary ſort cried out to be led back the ſame way they came, which he and many others oppoſed with reaſon, ſhewing how impoſſible ſuch a Retreat muſt be, all Forage and Proviſions being utterly deſtroyed by waſting of the Countrey; and the Waters every where out; beſides, theſe Tracts ſwarmed ſo with Flies and Gnats, that the trouble of them was intolerable, the Skies being darkened with their vaſt multitudes. All Humane Reaſon failing, they betook themſelves to the Entrails of Beaſts, and thereby conſulted their gods, whether they ſhould return by the way of Aſſyria, or gently paſſing by the Feet of the Mountains, fall on Chiliocomus, lying near Corduena, on a ſudden, and waſte it; neither which were portended to be lucky.

UMI

He marches for Corduena.

lucky. It was reſolved then, ſeeing they could do no better, to march for Corduena, and on the ſixteenth of June, by Break of Day, they ſet forward; when preſently a great Duſt was diſcovered, which ſome imagined to proceed from an infinite number of Aſſes feeding not far off, who were wont to go in a Body together to prevent the Attempts of Lyons upon them. Others thought the Enemy at hand, and therefore the Army united, and in a graſſy Plain, by a Rivers ſide, incamped it ſelf as ſtrongly as might be; for the matter could not be diſcovered all this day. And the Night dark of it ſelf, was ſpent in great Anxiety, none daring ſo much as to ſit down or cloſe his Eyes. But as ſoon as it was light, the gliſtering Armour ſhewed the Kings Forces to be at hand; whereupon, the Emperour reſtrained his Men from making any ſudden Onſet: but the Fore-guards met and skirmiſhed; and Machameus, a Roman Leader, was killed; whoſe Death, Maurus, his Brother, afterward Dux of Phœnicia, revenged upon him that ſlew him, by ſending him the ſame way; and, with a Wound received in his ſhoulder, brought off the dead Body. The Perſians at length were forced to retire; and ſo were the Saracens that hovered about to fall upon the Baggage.

Ammianus, lib. 25.

53. The Emperour then held on his courſe, and came to a Village called Hucumbra, where they reſted for two dayes; and beyond expectation, had plenty of all things. The day following, having ſet fire to all they could not carry away, they proceeded ſlowly, and the Perſians fell in upon their Rear, but were repulſed by the Horſe, with loſs of a Noble Satrapa, one Adaces, who had been Ambaſſadour to Conſtantius, and was very well received: he that kill'd him, preſented what he took from him to Julian, and received a Reward ſuitable to the Action. The ſame day, a Party, or Regiment of Horſe, called Tertiaci, was accuſed by the Legions of deſerting them, and ſlipping away in an Engagement; by which Cowardiſe the whole Army had been well nigh diſcouraged. The Emperour hereat inraged, took the Enſignes from ſuch as were Convicted of the Crime, and breaking their Spears, cauſed them to march behind with the Baggage, and Priſoners; their Leader, who was found to have valiantly demeaned himſelf, being appointed to Command another Party, the Tribune whereof was alſo found to have run away. And four other Tribunes were alſo caſhier'd for the ſame fault: Julian contenting himſelf with this more moderate ſort of Puniſhment, in conſideration of the hardneſs of the Service. Having proceeded ſome miles further, to a place called Marangæ, a great multitude of Perſians appeared, who were Commanded by Merenes the General of the Horſe, accompanied by two of the Kings Sons, and very many of the Nobility. All theſe men were armed cap à pie, ſo as an Arrow could find no entrance, except in the little holes of their Armour, through which they ſaw or breathed; they uſed the Bow very dextrouſly; ſome fought with Lances, and they were all guarded by Elephants; with the ſmell, Noiſe and Sight of which Beaſts the Horſes of the Romans were much terrified. Their Riders who govern'd them, ever ſince the Overthrow they received at Niſibis, had large Knives hung at their Arms; that if they grew head-ſtrong and ungovernable, they might therewith wound them in the Vertebra of the Neck (for there alone they were mortally vulnerable, as was experimented once by Aſdrubal the Brother of Annibal) and by their death the miſchief might be prevented of raging and treading down thoſe of their own ſide, as fell out at the ſaid Battel of Niſibis, to the loſs of ten thouſand men, as ſome have written. Julian, putting on ſuch a countenance as might beſt diſſemble the Terrour into which they were all caſt at the ſight, drew his Battel into the form of an half Moon, and fell with ſuch violence upon the Perſians, that they broke their Ranks, after great ſlaughter. The Romans had much the advantage, but the Souldier on both ſides was ſo tired, as well by the great heat, as the fatigue of the Battel, and his Wounds, that three dayes Truce was willingly agreed on. Yet, this notwithſtanding, the Roman was little at his eaſe, having Reſt, but a very hungry Belly; for no Proviſions were to be had, the Corn and Graſs, and every other thing conducing to the ſuſtenance both of Man and Beaſt, being burnt up. There was no other Relief, but for the ordinary Souldier to be ſupplied as far as it would go, with what the great Officers had provided for themſelves, and what had been got for the Table of the Emperour, who contented himſelf with the fare of the very meaneſt, being indeed abſtemious to a wonder.

Is met by a great Power of the Perſians.

A Truce for three days.

54. After a ſhort and troubleſome ſleep, having, in imitation of Julius Cæſar, applied himſelf to the Writing of the opinion of ſome Philoſopher; when the dark and ſilent Night conduced much to his privacy, the Publick Genius which he ſaw when he came to be Emperour, in Gall, now again appeared to him, as he confeſſed to his Friends, in a ſorrowful Habit and Poſture, having the Head covered with a Cornucopia, and ſo in ſadneſs went its way. At the Sight he was aſtoniſhed at the preſent, but being above all fear, he commended the Iſſue of all things to what was Decreed above, and riſing from his Pallet on the Ground, went to his Devotions, and then ſaw an Exhalation in the Skies in the ſhape of a Torch, falling down, which, having paſſed a good part of the Air, ſuddenly vaniſhed. He was terribly afraid that it was the Star of Mars, which menaced him in this manner; and e're it was yet day, cauſed the Hetruſcan Aruſpices to be ſent for, who being conſulted about the meaning of it, affirmed out of the Tarquitian Books, in the Title concerning Divine Matters, that upon the appearance of ſuch a Meteor, all Fighting was to be forborn; and when Julian contemned it, they entreated him that he would deferr his March ſome few hours; But he hardned himſelf againſt all things of this nature; and when it was light, gave order for the Army to diſlodge. The Perſians not daring to come to a formal Engagement, diſtreſſed them upon the Flank, as they ſaw opportunity, and fell in upon the Reare; of which, word being brought to the Emperour, he forgot to put on his Armour, and only ſnatching up a Target in the Tumult, ran to their Relief; when again he was recalled by a freſh Alarm, that the Foot was attacqued in the ſame manner. Labouring to repell this Violence, without any regard had to his own Perſon, a Party of the Perſians, being thoſe called Cataphracti, ſet upon the middle Battel, and diſtreſſed the left Wing, the Romans not being able to endure the Noiſe and Smell of the Elephants. Notwithſtanding this, the Emperour ſo beſtirr'd himſelf, that he reſtor'd the Battel to an hopeful Poſture; and now the Perſians giving Ground, with hands lifted up, he urged his men to the Purſuit, without any Care of himſelf, though thoſe that were near him, adviſed him not to purſue the numerous and powerful Enemy too far. Neglecting all Counſel he was ſtruck through the Arm into the ſide, and the lower lobe of his Liver, with an Horſe-mans Javelin, it's uncertain how, which endeavouring to pull out he cut his Fingers; and falling upon the Neck of his Horſe was brought into his Tent and dreſſed. The Pain being ſomething abated; he called for his Arms and Horſe, that by his Preſence he might animate his men, and reinforce the Fight; but his ſtrength would not anſwer his Inclination, ſo much was he weakned by a Flux of Blood. Now he deſpaired of Life, when he underſtood the place where he was hurt to be called Phrygia; for in Phrygia it had been told him that he muſt dye.

Sect. 5.

A. D. 363.

Tarquitius libros de Etruſca diſciplina & Oſtentarium Thuſcum conſcripſerat, ut ex Plinio & Macrobio notat Val.

The Perſians fall upon the Roman Army.

Idem alii.

At vero Libanius ait inermem tunc fuiſſe Julianum quod Perſas ubique vicerat quæ nimia ſui fiducia in tanto Duce nequaquam ferenda eſt.

Itaque meritò in victoris Epitome reprehenditur.

He receives a Wound in his ſide.

Is carried into his Tent.

55. The Emperour being conveyed into his Tent, incredible it is with what Rage his Souldiers breathed after Revenge, which they teſtified, by the beating of their Targets with their Lances, and obſtinately reſolved to dye with him, if it ſhould ſo happen. Though they were even blind with Duſt, and melted with Heat, yet did they, as having now no Governour, ruſh on upon the Enemy, who on the other ſide, ſore galled them with his Arrows, and reſtrained their Violence by the Interpoſition of his Elephants. The noiſe and ſhouting of armed men, Grones of ſuch as fell, ſnorting of Horſes, and claſhing of Weapons was heard afar off, and continued even till dark Night put an End to them. Fifty Satrapa's and noble Perſians were killed; beſides a vaſt number of the ordinary ſort. Of the Romans fell Anatolius the Magiſter Officiorum; the right Wing of the Army being worſted after the Diſaſter which hapned to the Emperour. Salluſtius the Præfect was reſcued from Deſtruction by one of his Apparitors; but Phoſphorius his Councellor, or Aſſiſtant, was ſlain, and ſome Souldiers having paſſed through very great Dangers, ſeized on a neighbouring Caſtle, and therein ſecuring themſelves, joyned the Army after three dayes. But, while the Fight continued, Julian lay languiſhing in his Tent, and finding thoſe about him very ſorrowful and dejected to ſee him in that Caſe, comforted himſelf and them after this manner. The time of departing " this Life, is, my Companions, now arrived, which as an honeſt and well meaning " Debtor, I gladly repay to Nature; and not, as ſome believe, with Reluctancy " and Sorrow; for by the common Opinion of Philoſophers I am ſufficiently in- " ſtructed, in how much more bleſſed Condition the Soul is than the Body; and " am ſatisfied that when one paſſes out of a worſe into a better Eſtate, he ought to " rejoyce rather than be troubled, conſidering alſo that the cœleſtial Gods reward " the moſt pious men with Death, as the greateſt Reward of all others. I alſo am " aſſured that it happens to me after the ſame manner, leſt I ſhould fall under ſo " heavy Burthens as I undergoe, or do any thing unworthy of my ſelf, having yet " ever found by Experience, that Sorrows and Pains, as they domineer over Cow- " ards, ſo are eaſily overcome by valiant Perſons. Neither doth it repent me of " mine Actions, nor the Remembrance of any Wickedneſs afflict me; either com- " mitted at ſuch time as I lay in the Shade and in Corners as I could, and ſtudied " Virtue; or ſince I came to the Government. I think I have kept my ſelf blame- " leſs and without Blemiſh, as one deſcended from the Gods above, in times of Peace " governing with Moderation; and not without good Conſideration, making ei- " ther offenſive or defenſive Wars, though the Iſſue was not alwayes anſwerable; for the celeſtial Powers alone have the Sovereignty of Events. Concluding with my ſelf that the end of Government is the Advantage and Safety of good Subjects, I have ever been, as you know, more inclined to Peace and Tranquillity; by the whole Courſe of mine actions oppoſing Licentiouſneſs, as that which corrupts both Things and Manners, and whitherſoever my Mother, the Commonwealth, how imperiouſly ſoever, called me, though to never ſo dangerous a Poſt; there have I ſtood immoveable, being accuſtomed to deſpiſe all fortuitous Events. I will not be aſhamed to confeſs that I have heretofore underſtood that I ſhould dye in War. And therefore I adore and praiſe the eternal Divinity, that I periſh not by any Conſpiracy, nor languiſh through the Force of a Diſeaſe; nor am I condemned to Death (he thought, it's probable, upon his Brothers End) but in the middle Courſe of my flouriſhing Glories, I have deſerved ſo famous a Paſſage out of this World. He is equally to be eſteemed a Coward who deſires to dye, when he ought to live; as he who ſhuns Death when it comes conveniently. Thus much it may ſuffice to have ſpoken; my Strength now failing me. Concerning my Succeſſour I wittingly ſay nothing, leſt through Imprudence I ſhould paſs by a worthy Perſon; or by naming one I conceive fitly qualified, if another ſhould chance to be preferred, bring him into imminent Danger. But as a dutiful Son of the Commonwealth, I wiſh her a good Governour in my room.

Caſtellum vaccatum.

Makes a Speech to thoſe about him.

Non itaque Chriſtianorum ſublatus eſt inſidiis, qui à Juliano depreſſi & vexati tandem oblatâ occaſione facinus peregerunt, ut vult Libanius. Eutropius, Feſtus Rufus, ac Victoris Epitome eum ab hoſtium equite & quidem fugiente Conto percuſſum eſſe memorant. Et quidem Eutropius, ut Marcellinus, etiam huic Expeditioni interfuit.

56. Having mildly ſpoken thus much, he diſpoſed his private Eſtate to ſuch as were neareſt in Kindred to him, and inquired after Anatolius the Magiſter Officiorum. Salluſt the Præfect made anſwer, that he was happy; by which uſual Phraſe of Speech underſtanding that he was dead, he much bewailed his Misfortune. Obſerving thoſe that were near him to weep, he gravely rebuked them, affirming it a pitiful mean thing to bemoan a Prince that was a Friend to Heaven and the Stars. They being thus ſilenc'd, he entred into a Subtile Diſcourſe with Maximus and Priſcus two Philoſophers, concerning the Sublimity of Souls, till ſuch time as the Wound gaping and the Tumour of the Veſſels intercepting his Breath, having called for a draught of cold Water, about midnight he the more eaſily expired; in the two and thirtieth year of his Age. He was born at Conſtantinople, of Conſtantius the Brother of Conſtantine the Great, (who was made away by his Nephews, while this his Son was yet a Child) and of Baſilina a woman of very noble Deſcent. A man truly to be reckoned amongſt Heroick Wits, and otherwiſe conſiderable for the Eminence of his Actions; and his Majeſtick Comportment. For whereas, as wiſe men define, there are four Cardinal Vertues, viz. Temperance, Prudence, Juſtice and Fortitude, beſides others contributing to perfect Accompliſhments, as Knowledge in Military Matters, Authority, Felicity and Liberality, he intently ſtudied the Practice of them all. As for the firſt he was ſo invincibly chaſte, that after the Death of his Wife, he never had to do with any woman, remembring that Paſſage in Plato, how Sophocles the Tragœdian, when grown old, being asked whether he made Uſe of that Sex, denied that he did, adding withal, that he rejoyced to think how he was freed from that cruel and domineering Paſſion. And to ſtrengthen him in this Reſolution, he often called to mind the Saying of Bachilides the Lyrick Poet (in whoſe Writings he much delighted) that as an excellent Limner lively expreſſeth the Beauty of a good Face, ſo Chaſtity ſets off with Luſtre the Perfections of a good Life. But even in his youth he could never be ſuſpected as guilty of any Intemperance this way, by thoſe who had the greateſt Reaſon to know him. And to obtain this Power over himſelf, he took the true and natural Courſe, of Moderation in Eating, Drinking and Sleep; wherein he was conſtant and exact at all times. For, in time of Peace the ſlenderneſs of his Fare was to be admired, even as of one who was ſpeedily to return to the Pallium, or the Contemplative Life; and often was he ſeen in his Expeditions to eate ſome ſlight and ordinary thing, walking upon his Feet. Having a little refreſhed his weary Body, hardned by Labours, he would riſe and viſit the Guards and Sentinels himſelf. And if the Lights, by which he ſtudied could have born Witneſs, they would in earneſt have diſcovered a great Difference betwixt him and ſome other Princes; knowing that he indulged not his Pleaſures, no not ſo far as the very Neceſſities of Nature required.

And dies.

The Character given him by Ammianus.

His Virtues.

57. Of his Prudence theſe were ſufficient Evidences amongſt many more: He was excellently ſeen in martial Affairs, and moſt ſtudious he was of Matters relating to Peace and civil Government; aſcribing ſo much to himſelf as to preſerve him from Contempts, with Prevention of Inſolence. In Virtue he was older than in years, was deſirous of all ſorts of Knowledge, a Judge not to be biaſſed to one ſide or other; a moſt ſharp Cenſurer of Manners; one who eaſily contemned Riches, and deſpiſed all Mortal things: and had often this ſaying in his Mouth, That it was unſeemly for a Wiſe man that was poſſeſſed of a Soul, to ſeek for commendation from any thing relating to his Body. As to his Juſtice, that no leſs was Eminent in ſeveral particulars. He was, according to the different nature of Matters brought before him, awful, but without Cruelty. By the puniſhment of ſome few, he reſtrained the ſpreading of Vice, and rather ſhook the Rod than ſtruck with it: and (to omit many other inſtances) to open Enemies and Traitors he was ſo Merciful, that he mitigated the ſharpneſs of their Puniſhment by that Mildneſs which was Natural to him. His Fortitude ſufficiently appeared in the frequency of his Fights, and the Uſe of his Arms; beſides his enduring the extremity both of Cold and Heat. The Duty of a Souldier is diſcharged by the Body; that of a General by the Mind: Yet did he, with his own hand, kill ſeveral ſtout and terrible Enemies; and by oppoſing himſelf to manifeſt dangers, he ſometimes ſtopped his Men when running away. The Kingdoms of the furious Germans he overturned, and now, in the War of Perſia, by venturing himſelf with the firſt, very much encouraged his Souldiers. The manner of his Attacquing Cities and Caſtles, the various forms of his Battels, as occaſion urged, his cautious Encampings, and his ordering matters relating to the Prætenturæ and Stations upon the Borders, diſcovered what his skill was in things relating to the Field. His Authority was of that weight, that he was both beloved and feared; as a Companion in Labours and Dangers; and yet as one who was ready to animadvert upon Cowards, and other ſorts of Offenders; inſomuch, that when he was yet but Cæſar, he governed an Army that was not paid, and that oppoſed againſt fierce and daring Enemies; he appeaſed them, when mutinous, by threatning, that except they would be quiet, he would depart, and return to a private Life; and, which may ſerve for many evidences of this nature, by his Entreaty he drew the Gallican Souldier, inured to cold Froſts and blaſts upon the Rhine, through long and tedious wayes, into ſcorching Aſſyria, and the Confines of the Medes. His Felicity was ſo eminent, that he ſeemed to be borne up aloft upon the ſhoulders of Fortune, through all Difficulties. Though he removed from the Weſt to a vaſt diſtance, yet, ſo long as he lived, all Nations continued ſtedfaſt in their Obedience. Of his Liberality he gave manifeſt proofs, in that his Tributes were very eaſie, the Aurum Coronarium he remitted, and forgave Arrears that had been long owing; indifferently judged betwixt the Treaſury and private Perſons; reſtored Tolls and Lands to Cities from which they had been taken; except ſuch as had been ſold by ſufficient Authority: In concluſion, he never coveted to be Rich, concluding that Money would be moſt cautiouſly preſerved in the hands of the Owners, and commending the Anſwer of Alexander the Great, to ſuch as demanded where he kept his Treaſure: that it was in the Coffers of his Friends.

His Vices.

58. His Vices were, a light Humour; wherein yet he would be adviſed and corrected: Talkativeneſs, to ſuch Exceſs that his Tongue never lay ſtill: Immoderate ſearching after Divinations, wherein he ſeemeth to have been as extravagant as his Predeceſſor Adrian. Superſtitious he was, rather than any due Obſerver of ſuch Rites; for he would ſacrifice an Innumerable Company of Beaſts; inſomuch that had he returned out of Perſia, it's thought that Bullocks would have failed him, as formerly Marcus Cæſar was twitted by a Libel upon that account. Vainglorious he was, and intemperately hunted for Praiſe and Fame in matters the moſt trivial that could be; and through a Thirſt of Popularity often affected to talk with contemptible Perſons. Yet for all this it might be well thought, that, as he himſelf ſaid (if he ſhould have done it) old Juſtice, which being offended by the Vices of Men, was by Aratus lifted up into Heaven, returned down to the Earth in his Reign; if doing ſome things according to his arbitrary Will, he had not acted unlike himſelf. He made ſome moderate and good Laws, both abſolutely commanding and forbidding things to be done; but a few of another nature; amongſt which, that unmerciful one whereby he forbade Rhetoricians and Grammarians, that were Chriſtians, to teach, leſt they ſhould convert their Scholars from the worſhip of the Gods. In like manner that was intollerable, that he ſuffered many unjuſtly to be obliged to ſervices of Corporations, being either Strangers, or by reaſon of Privilege, or Original, far eſtranged from thoſe Bodies. His Stature was of the middle ſize, his Hair hanging down without curling, his Beard rough and picked, his Eyes ſparkling, his Forehead comely, his Noſe ſtraight, his Mouth ſomething large, his nether Lip hanging down. Broad Shouldred he was, and his Arms and Hands of ſuitable Proportion, his Limbs very well ſet both for Strength and Nimbleneſs. And becauſe his Detractors accuſe him as having cauſed Wars and Commotions to the Detriment of the Commonwealth, ſuch ought to know for certain, that οἱ λευκοὶ βόες Μάρκῳ τῷ καισαρι Ἂν συ-νικήσῃς, ἡμεῖς ἀπωλόμεθα.

that it was not Julian, but Conſtantius that kindled the Flames of the Parthian War, out of deſire of Revenge (having been cheated by the Lies of Metrodorus) for that many Armies were loſt, Cities ſeized, Forts taken or deſtroyed, the Provinces exhauſted, and all things tended to Ruine; the Perſians having pierced as far as Bithynia and the Shore of Propontis. In Gall, the Germans were ſo bold, that having haraſſed all that Country, they were about to paſs into Italy over the Alpes; and ſuch were the Miſeries of the Provincials that they had nothing they could account certain, but Tears and Terrors; the Memory of things paſt being grievous, and the Expectation of what was to come ſtill more troubleſom. All theſe Diſorders this young man, being thither ſent under the Vizard of Cæſar, redreſſed, and dealing with Kings no otherwiſe than ſo many ignoble ſlaves, with wonderful Celerity diſpatched. That he might in the ſame manner reſtore matters in the Eaſt, he ſet upon the Perſians; and from that Attempt had brought back both matter for a Triumph, and a Sirname (of Parthicus after which he ſorely thirſted) had the heavenly Decrees been anſwerable to his illuſtrious Councils and Exploits. Some there are indeed, who though often beaten will yet unadviſedly fight again; and others who though they have ſuffered ſeveral Shipwracks, will ſtill Court the ſame Dangers they formerly underwent; but who is he that can affirm this Prince, who was ever victorious, to have done the like?

Vide Valeſii Annot. de Metrodoro.

59. Reader, all this while thou peruſeſt Ammianus in another Language, who having been preſent in this Expedition, and an Eye-witneſs of what paſſed, is rather to be made Uſe of in this matter than any other, eſpecially than Zoſimus, who tells another ſort of Story concerning this Journey, differing not only in Circumſtances, but in Names. Others relate ſome other Circumſtances of his Death, which are not much to be heeded, nor of Conſequence whether they were true or not. Concerning his Character, Pagan writers fully agree with Ammianus, whoſe great Affection to him is moſt evident, and that for ſuch Reaſons, as the contrary Arguments have, poſſibly, cauſed others to be as ſevere, as he is indulgent to his Memory. That we might ſhun this dangerous Rock of Partiality we have not omitted any thing remarkable alleaged by himſelf or his Friends in his Commendation, but to make it more expreſſive, given it in their own terms, or manner of Speech, though often harſh; and therefore may be excuſed, if in another place, wherein his Actions in reference to Religion are to be ſcanned, we make a ſevere Scrutiny into his Virtue, ſo much celebrated by one ſort of men. Here we ſhall only ſay in ſhort, That it cannot be denied, but that he was a man of Excellent Parts, and that ſuch as ſay the contrary incur the other Extreme, and deſerve part of that Cenſure which ſo juſtly falls heavy upon lying Zoſimus. His Atchievements againſt the Germans were extraordinary, conſidering his young years, and that he had been Educated in the Study of Letters, not of Arms, and was accuſtomed to the Pallium, not the Chlamys. His abſtinence, as to Corporal Pleaſures, was to be admired, and other things were very commendable in him, if he did not abſtain and act on purpoſe to be ſeen of men. But, whereas his Admirers are wont to aggrandize his Actions againſt the Germans by the number of the Kings of ſuch Nations as there he maſtered; they ſeem very impertinent in ſo doing, to ſuch as very well underſtand, that theſe Nations were but Tribes or Clanns of the ſame Countrey, and theſe Kings but Reguli, and the ſeveral Sons of the ſame Reguli, whoſe Kingdoms may be more truly termed Pagi than Realms. And, in my poor judgment, all Partiality and Prejudice put aſide, they cannot conceal theſe Flyes which appear ſo noxious in the ſweet Ointment of his Virtues; viz. that extraordinary Vain-glory and Oſtentation with which he appears more to have ſwelled, than any man that ever we read of, if his Hiſtorian hath given us a true Account of his Speeches, and the general and conſtant manner of his Demeanour. But the Efficacy of his Pagan Religion could not reach ſo inward and potent a Vice, which makes its fortification in the Heart; nothing could do it but that from which he thought fit to Apoſtatize. However, Scholars are to rejoyce, that the great Honour procured to Learning, from the Conduct of Armies, and Succeſs of Arms, by Epaminondas and Xenophon, was really continued and augmented by him. And yet poſſibly, he was in the number of thoſe Princes, who had the more of Fame, becauſe they had ſo little of Life; Time and Temptations diſcovering the frailties of glorious, but not well-founded beginnings: to be ſure he altered much from that Clemency he firſt pretended toward Chriſtians, and ſhewed the virulency of his Humour. But now we find him dead; and, as he himſelf ſaid of Conſtantius, Let the Earth, according to the Greek Proverb, lye light upon him. We ſhall only add, that he died on the twenty ſixth of June, in the ſecond Year of his Reign, and the two and thirtieth of his Age; in his fourth Conſulſhip, which he bore with Salluſt, A. D. CCCLXIII.

CHAP.

THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

CHAP. II.
The Middle State or Condition of the Empire. From the Death of Julian to that of Theodoſius the Great.

SECT. I.
From the Death of Julian, the laſt of the Family of Conſtantine, to that of Jovian; the ſpace of Seven Moneths and odd Days.

Great Contention about a new Emperour.

A.D. 363.

1. JULIAN being dead, the next day early in the morning the Officers, with the Principals of the Legions and Troops, met in Council, the Enemy now lying round about them. Great and turbulent Diſſention there was about the Election of an Emperor, whileſt Arintheus and Victor, who remained of Conſtantine his Courtiers, laboured to have one of their own Faction: and on the other ſide, Nevita and Dagalaiphus, with the Commanders of the Galls, endeavoured to prefer a Man of their own Acquaintance and Intereſt. At length they all pitch'd upon Saluſt the Prefect, a very Worthy Perſon; but he excuſing himſelf by Infirmity and Old Age, when they were at a ſtand not knowing what to do, ſome few made mention of Jovian, and in ſo deſperate a caſe he was elected. He was the Principal Premicerius, or chief of the Domeſtick Protectors, the Son of Varronian, who was of the Rank of Comites, and very Eminent, being a Native of Singidunum in Pannonia, who having loſt many Children, was commanded in a Dream to call his next Son by the Name of Jovian, and had lately retired to a Private Life. The Army lying abroad, to the extent of four miles, upon the Acclamation and Shout of Jovianus Auguſtus, thoſe that were in the Front miſtook the Name, and thinking Julian to be recovered, out of an ill-grounded Joy much more augmented the Solemn Cry; though finding afterward their miſtake, they turned it into Tears and Lamentations. Jovian thus promoted, an Enſign-bearer of thoſe Souldiers called Joviani, who had been commanded by Varronian, and maligned his Officer, fearing that he who had detracted from the Father ſhould now be puniſhed by the Son, fled over to the Perſians, and getting ſpeech of the King, acquainted him with the Death of his Enemy, and how by a company of contentious Fellows, in a tumultuous manner, one Jovian was choſen a kind of Emperour, who formerly had been but a Protector, and was now no better than a Coward. Sapor gladly hearing the News he had ſo long wiſhed for, and elevated by freſh hopes, gathered his Men together for a freſh Onſet, with reſolution to fall on the Rear of the Roman Army. The Entrals of Beaſts being conſulted for Jovian, as Ammianus tells us (though ſurely not by his Command) he being of a Religion oppoſite to all ſuch Superſtition, promiſed Security if he removed, but deſtruction if he continued within the Trenches.

Jovian is choſen.

At Zoſimus & Zonaras poſt Joviani tandem mortem, Imperium omnium conſenſu delatum eſſe Saluſtio narrant, quod quidem ipſe ſenectutem cauſatus conſtanti animo recuſavit: filio verò quod adhuc is junior eſſet, deferri noluit.

The Army marcheth,

2. Iſſuing out of the Camp he was preſently attacqued by the Perſians with their Elephants placed in the Front. By them both Men and Horſes were much diſturbed, till the Joviani and Herculiani killed ſome, and opened their way to the Horſe; and then being ſuccoured by the Legions of the Jovii and Victores, did great Execution, with the loſs of Julianus, Macrobius, and Maximus, three valiant Tribunes and principal Officers of the Army. They being buried as the time and urgency of Affairs would permit, Jovian proceeded to a Caſtle called Sumerſe, when it was now almoſt Night; but there the Body of Anatolius was found and committed to the Earth alſo in a tumultuous manner, and ſixty Souldiers, who (together with the Palatine Guards) had betaken themſelves to a neighbouring Caſtle after the Fight, recovered the Army. The day following they encamped as they could in a Valley, and drew a Line for their defence, which they ſecured by ſharp Stakes, and left but one Paſſage out of ſufficient capacity. Hereupon the Enemy infeſted them both by A Diocletiano, cui Jovii; A Maximiano, cui Herculei cognomen acceſſit.

Arms and Words, reviling them as Traitors and the Murderers of an Excellent Prince, for they had heard that Julian fell by the Hand of a Roman; and a Party of their Horſe had the confidence to break into the Camp well nigh as far as the Emperors Pavilion, but were beaten back with great loſs. Diſcamping thence the night following they came to Charcha, a place ſafe enough, where the Enemy did not at all infeſt them; and on the fifth of July reached a City called Dura, the Carriage Beaſts being now ſo tired, that they that governed them marching on foot, had been cut off by the Saracens, but that they were relieved by ſome of the Light Horſe-men. The Saracens had been lately offended by Julian, to whom having recourſe for the Penſions formerly allowed them, they had this Anſwer returned, That a warlike and vigilant Emperor was wont to have Steel, but no Gold. About this place they were forced to ſtay four days, for the Perſians ſtill dogged them at the heels; and when they turned head to give them Battel, again retreated, and ſo forced them to ſpend the time in Delays. But now they were told by ſome buſier than the reſt, that they were near their own Confines, and thereupon the whole Army required, and that in a multuous manner, that they might paſs over the River Tigris. The Emperor and the Officers earneſtly oppoſed it, ſhewing that now upon riſing of the Dog Star, the Waters were exceedingly increaſed; and further urging, that moſt of them could not ſwim, and that the Enemy had ſeized the further Bank, they deſired them not to precipitate themſelves into ſo manifeſt danger. But they were impatient of Contradiction, and proceeded as far as to Threats: whereupon he commanded the Galls, who were accuſtomed to ſwimming, firſt to take the Water, that if they periſhed in the Attempt, the reſt might be taught by their Deſtruction to learn Obedience; but if they came to Shore, the Paſſage might be proſecuted with the greater confidence.

Differt à Dura Meſopotamiæ, cùm civitas eſſet trans Tigrim ſita.

Mutinies, and will needs paſs over Tigris.

3. Some of theſe Galls entering the River in the night ſooner recovered the further Bank than was imagined, and killing the Perſian Guards whom they found aſleep, thereof gave notice to the Army. The Souldiers having underſtood their ſucceſs by their Signal, were hereby violently moved to take Water, where ſome Undertakers engaged by the uſe of Bladders to frame a ſufficient Bridge for their Tranſportation. Whileſt this they endeavoured to accompliſh to ſmall effect, Sapor the King of Perſia was not a little perplexed in his mind. He being abſent of late had underſtood how matters had paſſed ſince his departure, that ſo many Men were ſlain, and ſo many Elephants killed, as he had not been accuſtomed to hear of, and conſidered that by theſe continual Exerciſes and Labours the Romans were rendered more hardy and ſerviceable, and after the fall of their late Emperor would not have reſpect ſo much to their own ſafety, as meditate Revenge even to ſuch extremity, as either to overthrow the Difficulties wherewith they were ſurrounded by a notable Victory, or elſe finiſh the courſe of their toil and hardſhip by death it ſelf. Moreover, he knew that further Supplies might ſpeedily be gathered out of the neighbouring Provinces, and indeed that another Army lay in Meſopotamia, not much inferiour to this. He was ſenſible that his own People was much haraſſed and diſcompoſed by frequent loſſes, and waſting of the Country, and began to apprehend ſeveral diſadvantages, and that the iſſue might be pernicious on his own ſide; but hearing of this bold Attempt of five hundred Galls, he reſolved to offer Jovian Conditions in a time ſo critical, when the Bridge could not be completed by reaſon of the ſtrong Current, and all Proviſions being ſpent two days before, the Souldier was enraged with Anger and Famine, and deſired to end his days rather by the Sword, than by ſo pitiful a death as that of Starving. But the Conditions he propounded by the Surenas and another Nobleman, were hard and perplexed, and four days were ſpent in the Treaty, managed on the Roman part by Saluſt the Prefect, and Arintheus, the Army in the mean time languiſhing with Famine. He pretended he was moved by Humane Compaſſion, to permit the Retreat of the Remainders of Julians Army; in conſideration whereof he would ask but his own, which the Emperor Maximian had ſo unjuſtly taken from him. He demanded the five Regions beyond Tigris, viz. Arzanena, Moxoena, Zabdicena, Rhehimena, and Corduena, together with fifteen Caſtles, beſides Niſibis, Singara, and Caſtra Maurorum, a Fort of very great conſequence. Ammianus tells us, that it had been better to have fought ten times over, than to have yielded to the leaſt of theſe things, but the fearful Prince was perſuaded to grant them by a company of Flatterers, who terrified him with the Name of Procopius, as who undoubtedly npon the report of Julians Death would ſet up for himſelf, having an Army at his devotion for that very purpoſe. He hardly obtained, that the Inhabitants of Niſibis and Singara might be removed into the Roman Territories; and conſented to a thing which our Hiſtorian terms pernicious and impious, which was, that he ſhould not aſſiſt Arſaces King of Armenia againſt the Perſians, though Sapor inclines to give them good Conditions.

A Truce for 30 years upon what terms.

though a conſtant and faithful Friend of the Empire. This Sapor preſſed upon two accounts; that he might be revenged on Arſaces for having waſted Chiliocomus at the Emperors inſtance; and be capable of invading Armenia at his pleaſure. And hereupon it happened afterwards, both that Arſaces was taken Priſoner, and that part of Armenia bordering on the Medes, with Artaxata, was during theſe Diſturbances ſeized by the Parthians. For performance of the Conditions Hoſtages were exchanged; on the Roman part Nevita, Victor, and Mellobaudes, Eminent Tribunes of the Army; on the Perſian, Bineſes, one of the chiefeſt of the Nobility, and three other Satrapa's of note and quality.

Various Reflections by Writers upon it.

4. This Peace thus concluded for thirty years, and religiouſly ſworn to, is as remarkable as any Paſſage of theſe Times; and various are the Reflections which Writers make upon it, according to the diverſity of their Inclinations. That it was very ignominious all agree, the Romans having not been accuſtomed to part with their Territories, though ſometimes they received notable Defeats. Some held there was no neceſſity of making it, as Ammianus by conſequence; for if what he writes be not a groundleſs Conjecture, Jovian might eaſily have marched away before the Treaty began, and while the Perſians were making the Overture, into Corduena, a Country fertile within his own Dominions, and diſtant but an hundred miles. Others ſay, that the Agreement was neceſſary, but blame him for not breaking it ſo ſoon as he was in a capacity to do it: and Eutropius inſtanceth in War made notwithſtanding ſuch Accords, upon the Samnites, Numantines, and Numidians; adding that this Peace was not ratified, but that Jovian fearing an Æmulator, therein little conſulted his Glory. If the Peace was neceſſary, Jovian can neither be blamed that he made it, nor that he did not break it. It was Julian who was the Author of the neceſſity, whom not onely Chriſtian Writers accuſe of raſh Ambition and Wilfulneſs as to this point; but Ammianus too, as we have lately ſeen, for he was little better than fool-hardy in the matter of burning of his Ships; for although this courſe hath been taken otherwhiles, as might be inſtanced in ſeveral, who did it to cauſe their men to fight, by ſeeing all hope of Eſcape cut off from them; yet hath it been practiſed either by thoſe, whoſe great Temerity hath overtopped their Prudence, or in caſe of ſome extraordinary matter to be obtained by the fortune of one Battel, when the meanneſs of the preſent Condition of the Perſon, in reſpect of that great Fortune he ſhould arrive at by the ſucceſs of ſo hazardous an Enterprize, hath prudently excited him to venture Life and all. Such young, ambitious, and raſh Perſons as Alexander the Great, and others, the Conqueſts of whom are to be aſcribed to Fortune, not to Conduct, might well have been by Juvenile Heat excited to ſuch an act of Deſperation: or the Kingdom of England might eaſily have tempted a Duke of Normandy to burn his Ships, and lay Life and all things at the ſtake. To which we may adde, that if ſometimes ſuch Extremities have been imbraced by thoſe who have been excluded from their Rights, or caſt out of Poſſeſſion, the juſt indignation thence conceived, and the miſerable eſtate to which they have been reduced, have afforded ſufficient Arguments, not onely for their Excuſe, but Commendation. But all ſeem to be wanting to Julian, upon an exact ſcrutiny into this matter: For to conſider the Ends of his entering upon this War, the Reputation and Safety of the Empire, could onely be ſufficient Motives to the Undertaking. But Reputation was through his natural vain glorious Temper, as his Friends confeſs, turned into Ambition and ſtubborn Opiniaſtrity, while to purchaſe the Title of Parthius, he would as in other particulars, ſo in this eſpecially of burning his Ships, ſacrifice not onely his own ſafety, but that of his whole Army, contrary to the Counſel and Prayers of all his Officers. That ſafety which he ought in reaſon to propoſe to himſelf, could be no other than that of the bordering Provinces of the Empire, to preſerve them from Conqueſt or Devaſtation. But by this raſh Attempt he endangered more to preſerve the reſt, not onely in expoſing to ruine his own Perſon, upon the ſafety of which much more might have depended than poſſibly did at this time, but that of the Army alſo, which being deſtroyed, the Deſtruction of the Provinces muſt needs follow, and probably ſome other Attendant on ſuch a Diſaſter. Indeed had the Empire of Rome, or his Condition as Lord thereof, been contemptible in compariſon of what he was about to obtain, the venture might have had advantage; but in this caſe the ſtake was much greater than what he could rationally expect to win. And yet the Kingdom of Perſia, though not to be named in the ſame day with the Empire of Rome, was too great a Priſe to be won at one caſt, or with ſuch a lucky hit as was that of Alexander. One Battel would not do it, nor many more: many Armies he could not but expect out of the Overthrows and Ruines of ſome, which poſſibly he might have defeated. And he found it was a thing practicable to waſte the Countrey, and caſt him and his Forces into ſuch neceſſities as he could not ſupply; eſpecially having, by the unadviſed burning of his Fleet, cut off Succours both of Proviſions and Men.

Of the neceſſity of the Retreat Julian was Author.

For Jovian could not have proſecuted the War as he left it.

Nor ought he to have broken the Truce once made.

5. Such was the Conduct of Julian in this Action; the courſe of which had Jovian proſecuted, and carried on the War where he left it, with the ſame Deſigns, whatever great Arguments Ammianus tells us that Sapor had to treat with the Romans, he might poſſibly have been guilty of a greater overſight than that Error was he committed in making the Peace; and ten times over he might have fought, and twenty to them, ere Julians Project could have been accompliſhed. Whether he could have gentilely run away, or made a Retreat without a Truce, ſaved his Men by flight, and the Provinces by his Protection, is more difficult to be reſolved, than to take the bare word of Ammianus, whoſe ſtory concerning the danger of paſſing the River, a man will think little conſiſtent with this Affirmation, that he might have eſcaped into Corduene, but an hundred miles off: and had this Retreat been eaſie, or ſo poſſible, why doth this Hiſtorian, as well as others, ſo tax Julian for burning his Ships, and thereby cutting off all ſecurity for a Return into his own Dominions? To be ſure the danger the Army was now in was extreme, as well by the Multitudes of Perſians, which on all ſides preſſed upon them, as by Famine: and this Zoſimus affirms, whom we have reaſon enough to credit in this point, though the ſeries of his ſtory in reference to this Expedition be obſcure and inſignificant, in compariſon of that of Ammianus, an Eye-witneſs. And he adds, that notwithſtanding the Peace, and that they had leave to return at their eaſe, yet ſcarcely at laſt with great toil and loſs they arrived at Niſibis. What then would in probability have been the iſſue, had the Multitudes of Perſians every where way-laid them, and cut them off, while they alſo ſtrugled with Famine? As for the Aſſertion of thoſe who held he was to have broken the Peace when out of danger, it is not worth taking notice of; for much more ignominious had been ſo great a breach of Faith, and violation of the Law of Nations. If ſuch Covenants be not performed, though diſadvantageous, what Truſt will be given by Men one to another? If no Truſt, no Entercourſe amongſt Nations: all things muſt run to extremity. He that keeps no Faith, no Faith will be kept with him. All men will ſtand aloof from ſuch a Prince, and behold him not as a Creature fit for Humane Society, but an Animal of a more ſavage nature, deſtined onely for the Affliction of Mankind.

The Army paſſeth the River Tigris.

And proſecutes its Retreat.

Meſſengers ſent by Jovian to eſtabliſh his Intereſt in the Weſt.

6. The Peace (moſt ignominious however) being religiouſly ſworn to on both ſides, Ammianus Marcellinus further tells us, that the Romans retreated to find a more convenient place for paſſing the River, being ſorely diſtreſſed both with Hunger and Thirſt, which conſtrained ſome to venture over by ſtealth, who were either drowned, or being got to Land were knock'd on the head by the Perſians and Saracens, or elſe taken and ſold for Slaves. But being arrived at the deſigned place, and the Word once given for taking the water, incredible it is with what alacrity each one ſtrove to prevent his Fellow, ſome making uſe of Bladders, and others of other means and helps. The Emperor, and ſome few about him, ſerved themſelves of thoſe few Boats that were remaining of the burnt Fleet, and afterward cauſed them ſo often to croſs the River, till all were got over. In the mean time the Perſians began a Bridge at a good diſtance, with a deſign to fetch off all Straglers, and Cattel that ſhould come behind; but their Plot being diſcovered, they deſiſted. The Romans freed from this fear began their Retreat, and by great Journies came to Hatra, an old Town ſituate in the middle of the Deſart, and long before deſerted, which Trajan and Severus, though both great Warriours, labouring to raze, were well nigh deſtroyed with their Armies. It being here known, that for ſeventy miles in this dry and barren Countrey no Water was to be had, but ſuch as was ſalt and ſtinking; neither any thing to feed on except Abrotanum, Wormwood and Dracontium, with other ſuch unſavoury Herbs; ſweet water was provided, and Camels killed to mak as good Proviſion as was poſſible. After a March of ſix days, wherein not ſo much as a little Graſs could be found, Caſſianus the Dux of Meſopotamia, and Mauritius a Tribune, having been ſent before upon this Errand, met them at Ur a Perſian Caſtle, and that very ſeaſonably with Proviſions, which the Army under Conduct of Procopius and Sebaſtian living very frugally had ſpared. From this place another Procopius a Notary, and Memorius a Tribune, were diſpatched away for Illyricum and Gall, to give notice of Julians Death, and the Promotion of Jovian. They had Inſtructions to perſuade Lucillianus, the preſent Emperors Father in Law, who had given over all Imployment, and retired to a private life at Sirmium, to accept of the Codicils or Commiſſion they carried with them of a Magiſter Militum of both ſorts; and to haſten to Milan, there to order matters as ſhould moſt ſuit with his Intereſt. By more ſecret Letters he deſired him to get ſuch Attendants about him as he could certainly truſt, to put in Execution his Orders: And one Malarich, who was his familiar Friend, and lay then in Italy, he very prudently conſtituted Magiſter Militum in Gall, in the room of Jovinus; for hereby he both removed a man very powerful, and whom he had reaſon to ſuſpect; and obliged one of ſo mean Condition, by preferring him to ſuch a Command. The Meſſengers were further enjoyned, to report all things that had lately happened with advantage; and having ſifted all mens Inclinations, to return with the beſt Intelligence they could, upon which future Councils might be founded. Yet made they not ſuch haſte, but the news of the late Diſaſters had flown to ſeveral places before their Arrival.

The Army diſtreſſed by Famine.

7. In the mean time all Proviſions again failed, and the Army was ſo grievouſly diſtreſſed with Famine, that a little ſupply they had of a very few Carriage Beaſts, preſerved Mans Fleſh from being offered up to the ravenous Tyrant; and one Modius of Flower was ſold for no leſs than Ten Aurei. At length they came within ſight of Niſibis, and pitched their Tents without the City; for the Emperor, though earneſtly intreated by the Inhabitants to enter and lodge in the Palace, as his Predeceſſors had done, pertinaciouſly refuſed, as aſhamed that a City ſo impregnable whileſt he was in it, ſhould be delivered up to a revengeful Enemy. Now was one Jovian (the chief of the Notaries) ſuddenly taken away as he ſate at Supper, and being caſt headlong into a deep Pit, was overwhelmed with an Heap of Stones; for that having after the Death of Julian been mention'd as worthy of the Empire, he had not ſince that time demeaned himſelf modeſtly, but was often taken notice of to whiſper matters relating to that Affair, and frequently to entertain the Officers. The day following Bineſes, a Noble Perſian, zealous to perform with all expedition what his King had enjoyned, earneſtly preſſed the Emperor for Performance of the Conditions of the Peace, and he accordingly permitted him to enter Niſibis, and take Poſſeſſion. Being ſeized of the place, by a Signal given from the Caſtle, he required all the Inhabitants to be gone, who now earneſtly beſought Jovian, that they might not be compelled to quit their Native Seat, affirming that they of themſelves were able, without any publick Charge, to defend the place: but he was not to be moved in the point, leſt he ſhould incur the Crime of Perjury, as he pretended, but indeed fearing other things, if we believe Ammianus and others. This cauſed Sabinus, a Townſman of chiefeſt Eminency both for Birth and Riches, to ſay openly, That Conſtantius, though ſometimes beaten by the Perſian in ſo heavy a War as lay upon him, and driven to ſo great neceſſity, as in his flight to feed on a Cruſt of Bread, which he begged of an old Countrey Woman; yet to his dying day had loſt nothing of his Territories: Whereas Jovian in the very beginning of his Reign had parted with the very Bulwark of his Provinces; which in former times had ſtill been protected by the vigorous Oppoſition of this Town. But the Emperor was deaf to all that could be ſaid, ſtill urging his Oath, and the Inviolability of it. And now he was preſented with a Crown, which after earneſt refuſal, when he had at length accepted, one Sylvanus, an Advocate, with great confidence cried out, So maiſt thou, O Emperor, be crowned by the reſt of the Cities.

Niſibis according to Agreement is put into the hands of the Perſian.

A miſerable ſight of the Inhabitants quitting the City.

8. Exaſperated herewith he commanded all within three days to leave the Town, and appointed a Party of Souldiers to turn them out, who threatning all that refuſed with Death, the Walls and all the Streets were crouded with a Multitude, which by Tears and other ſigns ſhewed all Paſſion imaginable, and imbraced the very Doors and Poſts of the Houſes at their Farewel. As every one could moſt commodiouſly diſpoſe of himſelf and his, forth they paſſed; but being turned out in haſte, they hurried away ſome of their beſt things, and the reſt of their ſtuff, though much in quantity and of great value, they left behind for want of Beaſts to convey it. Here our Hiſtorian falls into an Expoſtulation with the Fortune of Rome, not ſo much for the Qualification of the perſon to whom ſhe had committed the Reins of Government, as for the Circumſtances under which he lay in reference to a Rival, the fear of which cauſed him, out of a deſire to come into the Weſtern parts to neglect Niſibis, and eaſily give up that City, which ever ſince the days of Mithridates had preſerved the Eaſt from being overrun by the Perſians. He repeats his Obſervation, how the Romans never from the Foundation of the City parted with their Territories; and approves of their ever breaking an Ignominious Peace.

An hoc verum fuerit vide Valeſii Annot. in locum.

9. The Inhabitants being driven out, the City was delivered up, and together with it all the Forts in the Countrey, by Conſtantius the Tribune. Now was Procopius ſent with the Body of Julian to be buried in the Suburbs of Tarſus, as he had ordained;

Sect. I.

A.D. 363.

How matters went in Gall upon the Negotiation of the Meſſengers.

dained; which having performed he went away, hid himſelf, and never was diſcovered though diligently ſought for; till long after he ſuddenly appeared in Purple at Conſtantinople. Theſe things thus appointed, after a March of ſeveral days, at length they reached Antioch, where after a very little ſtay Jovian, now diſtracted with various Cares deſired to be gone, and ſparing neither Man nor Beaſt came in a very cold ſeaſon, and hardeſt Winter weather to Tarſus in Cilicia. Having given order for the beautifying of Julians Tomb, (whence his Body, as ſome write, was afterward removed to Conſtantinople) he proceeded thence by great Journies as far as Tyana, a Town of Cappadocia, and there Procopius the Notary, and Memorinus the Tribune, met him, and gave him an account of their Negotiation; though Lucillianus (through procurement of a corrupt Officer) was killed by the Souldiers. For, having entered Milan with Seniauchus and Valentinian, two Tribunes, when he underſtood that Malarich refuſed to accept of the place of Magiſter Militum, he haſted away to Rheims, where applying himſelf unſeaſonably, while matters were not yet ſettled, to examine the Accounts of one that had been an Actuary, this man conſcious of his Frauds, ran away to the Souldiers, and making them believe, that Julian was ſtill alive, ſo incenſed them againſt him as a Traitor, that in a Tumult they killed him and Seniauchus too; but Valentinian, who was afterward Emperor, eſcaped by the care and direction of him with whom he lodged. This ill News was ſomething ſweetned by better out of Gall, where the Souldiers willingly owned the new Emperor. To Valentinian, who came along with the Meſſengers, was given the Command of the ſecond Schole of the Scutarii. Vitalianus, one of the Company called Heruli, who long after was honoured with the Dignity of Comes, and managed matters badly in Illyricum, was made one of the Domeſtick Protectors. And Arintheus was ſent away with all ſpeed to ſucceed Jovinus in Gall, upon refuſal of Malarich, with Orders to animadvert ſeverely upon ſuch as ſhould be Tumultuous, and ſend up in Chains to the Court thoſe that ſhould be Authors of any Seditious Attempt.

Jovian is Conſul with Varronian his Son.

And dies ſuddenly.

A.D. 364. Joviano & Varroniano Coſs.

10. Being arrived at Ancyra, and providing for the Solemnity as the Time would permit, he there entered his Conſulſhip, wherein he aſſumed as Collegue Varronian his Son, (for his Father whom he intended was dead whileſt he was upon the way) a very young Child, who cried and ſtrugled when he came to be carried in the Curule Chair, according to the Cuſtom; and being by no means to be kept in it, thereby was portended in the Opinion of our Author, what followed very ſoon after. For, Jovian ſtill travelling weſtward, and coming to Badaſtana, a Town ſituate upon the Borders of Bithynia and Galatia, was there found dead in the night, and afforded matter for various Diſcourſe: Some ſaid he was ſtifled by the Dampneſs of his Chamber, which had been newly plaſtered; others by the Smoke of Coles, of which Hiſtories indeed and the Books of Phyſicians afford us many Examples, nothing being more ſuffocating than the Vapour of Charcole, eſpecially joyned with the ſteam of freſh Lime or Plaſter) and ſome conceived it might come from a Surfeit. But there were not wanting, who thought him ſpent by the tedeouſneſs of the Journey; and Socrates writes, that it was by a ſtoppage in the Lungs, which might be occaſioned by the former external cauſes. He adds, that at this place he was met by many Senators of thoſe of the greateſt Nobility, amongſt whom was Themiſtius the Philoſopher, who then ſpake before him his Oration intituled Conſul, which afterward he rehearſed at Conſtantinople in the Audience of the whole Multitude. Ammianus obſerves, that Jovian and * Scipio Æmilianus had one and the ſame kind of End, and that no Inquiſition was made after the Death of either of them. As for his Character he adds, that in doing buſineſs after Dinner, and in jeſting merrily and freely with thoſe about him, he choſe to imitate Conſtantius. That he was ſtudious of the Chriſtian Religion, ſometimes Magnificent, indifferently well Learned, very good natur'd, and probably (had he lived) would have had a careful regard to the making of Officers, as might be judged by thoſe few he had onely time to promote. As to Vice, that he was given to Gluttony, Wine, and Women, which Faults he thinks might have been corrected by a ſenſe of his preſent high Condition. Eutropius writes, that ſetting aſide the Peace he made with the Perſian, he was otherwiſe neither a Coward nor Imprudent; that he was courteous, and naturally liberal: and with his Death he concludes his Ten Books, being an Abridgment of the Roman Hiſtory, having himſelf been alſo preſent in this Expedition. Victor deſcribes him as beautiful in Body, pleaſant in Converſation, and ſtudious of Learning. Ammianus ſaith, he was very tall, and his Limbs of a proportionable largeneſs, ſo that ſcarcely could an Imperial Habit be found fit for him; of grave Geſture, pleaſant Countenance, and gray-ey'd.

Alii ſcripſerunt, eum comeſtis fungis recentibus venenatis necatum fuiſſe. Chryſoſtomus affirmat, venenata potione extinctum, ejuſdemq; filio Varroniano præ imminentium diſcriminum metu, alterum oculum erutum eſſe.

* Hic non obſcurè innuit, eum proximorum inſidiis ſtrangulatum fuiſſe. Vide Valeſ.

His Character.

11. So died Jovian in the eighth Moneth of his Reign; and ſuch is the Character given of him, which can amount to little on any account, none being able to ſay how he might have proved, as neither his Predeceſſor himſelf, had they had thoſe Opportunities and Temptations, for practice of good and evil, which are wont to be plentifully afforded in long Governments. Some Laws there are extant in Theodoſius his Code, which are wont to be aſcribed to Julian; but the Dates of them (if true) evidently ſhewing, that they were made after his Death, they are to be reſtored to Jovian as their Author, with an account of what they principally concerned. Julian died as we have ſeen in the Moneth of June, and yet there are ſeveral Edicts ſaid to be his, though dated in that of October and after. By the firſt of them, what Writers tell us concerning the Luxury of this Age, and that particularly as to Building, is ſomewhat illuſtrated. Ammianus taxes the Souldiers, amongſt other things, for not being ſatisfied without they lived in Marble Houſes; and by a Law of Julian, which we have already mentioned, concerning Africa, it appears how the Curſus publicus was wont to be burthened by conveyance of this kind of Stone in that Province for private Buildings. Moſt commonly it hath been found, that Hoſpitality and other good qualities have gone down moſt, when ſtately Houſes have gone faſteſt up; yet however this tending to the Ornament and Beauty of the Empire, whether Julian or Jovian was the Author, an Edict was made, by which for prevention “ of the ſcarcity and dearneſs of Marble, Licence was granted to every one that “ pleaſed to dig for it, that by that means many good Veins might be diſcovered. “ But if the Date would permit it, it might eaſily be gueſſed that Julian made this Edict, and thereby aimed at the rebuilding and ornament of the Pagan Temples, more than the luſtre of other Buildings. Whether he made this Law or not, that he was no Author of the next which follows, there are more than one convincing Arguments. As it was the Cuſtom of bountiful Princes to give or aſſign Lands or Eſtates to private perſons, as they ſaw occaſion; ſo was it uſual, and with very good reaſon, that when the Treaſury was exhauſted, and there was preſſing occaſion for Money, an Impoſition of Gold or Silver was laid upon thoſe Eſtates, which having been received in free gift, it was much more reaſonable that they ſhould be charged than the Inheritances of other perſons, or ſuch Poſſeſſions as they had purchaſed by their Care and Labour. Now hereupon aroſe a Caſe, whether if ſuch Impoſitions were to be laid upon ſuch Lands thus freely given, they were not alſo to be extended to others, that had been confiſcated, and for ſuch Reaſons as pleaſed the Prince, had been again reſtored to the former Owners or their Children. This queſtion by an Edict directed to Aginatius the Conſularis of Byzacena from Mopſueſtia, on the twelveth of November the Emperor decides in behalf of thoſe to whom ſuch Lands were reſtored. He affirms “ it abſurd and not agreeable with the Tranquillity of his time, that ſuch as had been “ proſcribed ſhould be rendred obnoxious to the Collations of Gold and Silver, which “ had been impoſed by Conſtantius, of Bleſſed Memory; for as much as there “ is a vaſt difference betwixt thoſe that enjoyed what they had by the Munificence of “ the Prince, and ſuch as had deſerved to have their own reſtored to them. Indeed the Law is ſo favourable in this caſe generally, that reſtored Eſtates ſeem as if they had never been taken away; and Reſtitution doth not create any new Title, but cauſeth the old one to return, and to be in force, as the Interpreters of the Feudal Laws affirm, when a Vaſſal is pardoned by his Lord, that no new Grant is to be made of his Fee, but the old Tenure onely renewed; and a Fee which hath been forfeited and reſtored, is not to be accounted to have belonged to the Lords Domain, or by any ſuch Forfeiture incorporated with it. Obſervable it is, that to Conſtantius is attributed the laying of the Impoſitions upon Lands freely given by the Prince, and reaſon he had to lay them, he and his Father having granted many Poſſeſſions and Goods, formerly belonging to the Temples of Idols, as the Pagans in vain complained. For this reaſon we may be aſſured Julian would never have ſaid he was Divæ Memoria, or of Memory ſuitable to that of their Divi, being ſo far from it, that having an inveterate grudge to Chi and Chappa, he ever upon occaſion makes mention of him and his Father without any note of Honour, as other Princes of what Religion ſoever, are wont to do toward their Predeceſſors. Nay, ſometimes when he abrogates their Conſtitutions, he will not deign ſo much as to name them. This is a ſufficient proof that he was not Author of this Edict, which bearing Date from Mopſueſtia, further evinceth its Original to have been from Jovian. For we ſee that Jovian from Antioch travelled into Cilicia, a Town of which Region was this Mopſueſtia, ſo called from being the Habitation of Mopſus, an old Poet or Vates of thoſe Quarters.

Laws by their Dates ſeeming to have been made by him.

L.2.de Metallis & Metallariis Cod. Th.l. 10. tit.19. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt. ut temporaria.

L.1. de Collatione Donatarum, &c. Cod.Th.lib.11. tit. 20. Abſunt hujus tit. L.L. omnes à Cod. Juſt. earum loco unica lex poſita ex Novella Theodoſii 33. Vide Gothofr. in l.

Sect. I.

One againſt the Frauds of the Numerarii.

A.D. 364.

12. On the twenty ſeventh of November following was publiſhed at Viminacium, a City of Illyricum, and directed to Mamertinus, Præfectus Prætorio of that Diſtrict, an Edict againſt the Frauds of the Numerarii, who had the management of Tributes in their hands, and thence opportunity to do very great miſchief. As Julian formerly, ſo now he ſubjects them to torture in Examinations, a courſe taken onely with vile or mean perſons, and not onely thoſe that were meaneſt in condition, but even ſuch as belonged to the Præfectus Prætorio, and this reaſon is given for it, that they were wont to have Auditores or Aſſiſtants, who were not to be endangered or prejudiced by their Accounts, but each one was to ſtand upon his own Legs. On the nineth of December another Edict bears Date made in behalf of the Suarii: Theſe were a Body, Company, or Society of men, whoſe Imployment it was to provide Hogs Fleſh for the ſervice of the People of Rome, or of Conſtantinople, and that it ſeems from the time of Aurelian the Emperor, to whom is aſcribed the firſt and free Allowance of this ſort of Fleſh to the Romans, being divided and diſtributed man by man. For there were certain Provinces of Italy, in which the Poſſeſſors of the Lands paid an annual quantity of Lard or Hogs Fleſh in way of Tribute; as Campania, Lucania, Brutium, and Samnium. And though at laſt it was paid in ſpecie, yet afterward Conſtantine left it to the diſcretion of the Countreymen themſelves, whether they would pay it ſo, or the value of it in Money, to prevent Abuſes frequently committed by the Suarii, in reference to the Weight thereof; for it was ever to be weighed, and they were not to truſt their Eyes alone in this matter. When Money was paid, it was to be at Market-rates, or at ſuch prices as then were uſually paid in the ſeveral places. Such order did Conſtantine take; who alſo to ſupply the Number of thoſe Suarii, which in his days was very much leſſened, forbade any to be excuſed from the Charge, either by pretence of any Dignity, or any Reſcript of the Prince himſelf. And as for thoſe who had already deſerted their ſtation, he commanded they ſhould either be forced back to the Service, or hire others to diſcharge it for them. But ſtill it was in the power of the Tenants to pay in ſpecie or in Money, as was ſaid. Now by another Conſtitution belonging to Jovian or Julian, and directed to Apronianus, Præfect of the City, Money is ordered to be paid in Campania, in lieu of all ſuch Fleſh; and a Method and Standard is declared as to the Payment: wherein could be no ſuch miſcarriage, as in the weight and conveyance of it in ſpecie. A Market-rate was to be allowed by the Tenants to the Suarii, (who at their own peril ſhould therewith provide Fleſh it ſelf for the People) not exceeding ſix Folles for every Pound, (the Silver ſort of Folles are here to be underſtood;) which whoſoever exacted above, ſhould be bound to pay ſo much to the Treaſury. But whereas it was found by experience, that the Officials of the greater Officers were wont to be burthenſom to the Provincials, and make uſe of their power to harraſe and fright them out of their Money; Order now is hereby taken, that neither thoſe belonging to the Præfect of the City gather this Money, nor the Suarii themſelves, but the Officers of the ordinary Governor, or the Conſularis of Campania, who at his own peril was to ſee to the due management of the Levy, and Return of the Money which was to be paid, as the Market went in Campania it ſelf, and not as the Price held at Rome. And Campania here ſeems eſpecially to be mentioned, both becauſe it ſerved Rome, as a mighty Storehouſe, with Hogs Fleſh, (as alſo it did with Wine and other things;) and for that it was under the Juriſdiction of the Præfect of the City, being part of the Urbicarian Dioceſe. This Law might well enough be Julian's, and a miſtake made in the Date thereof. But another follows, which is rather to be aſcribed to his Succeſſors, as contrary to his Humour ſo violently bent to force perſons to the Services of Corporations. “For this Edict dated at Antioch on the one and twentieth of December, excuſeth from ſuch Services ſuch as had ſerved as Souldiers upon the Limits, for the ſpace of ten years, being intended as an Encouragement to them that had ventured their Lives againſt the Perſian. In favour of theſe Souldiers Jovian made another Law concerning their gathering of Forage; for as Julian, to enure them to Labour, had yielded they might fetch it at twenty miles diſtance, that they might not be too much put to it, and be too long from their Colours, he ordains, that they be not forced to fetch it any further.

Vide Paratitlon & L.L. tit. 4. Cod. Th. l. 14. de Suariis, Pecuariis, &c.

L. 5, 6. de Decurionibus. Cod. Th. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

L. 9. de Erogatione militaris annonæ. Cod. Th. l. 7. tit. 4. & Cod. Juſt. L. 2. eod. tit.

SECT.

SECT. II.

From the Death of Jovian to that of Valentinian, preceding the Irruption of the Barbarous Nations into the Empire. The ſpace of Eleven Years and ſome Ten Moneths.

A.D. 364.

Valentinian choſen Emperor.

1. THE Body of the deceaſed Emperor being with due Rites prepared and ſent to Conſtantinople, to be interred with his Predeceſſors; the Army diſlodged and came to Nice, the Metropolis of Bithynia. There the Officers falling into a ſerious Debate about the Election of a new Prince; one Equitius, an odd-humoured man, Tribune of the firſt Schole of the Scutarii, was named by ſome few of the meaner ſort, but quickly rejected; and after him Januarius, one joyned in Affinity with Jovian, and then commanding in Illyricum; but he being being neither approved becauſe ſo far off, Valentinian was choſen by univerſal conſent, at this time Tribune of the ſecond Schole of the Scutarii, and left at Ancyra, with Orders to follow after Jovian. He was the Son of one Gratian a Pannonian of the City Cibale, and ſirnamed Funacius, for that five Souldiers were not able to wreſt from him a Rope he carried in his hands: and upon this account being taken into the Army, afterwards aroſe to great Preferment. Meſſengers were diſpatched away for Valentinian, but being at ſuch a diſtance, for ten days ſpace there was none that ſate at the Helm of the Commonwealth; onely Equitius and Leo, who ſerved under Dagalaiphus the Magiſter Equitum, in the Accounts of the Army, took as much care as they could for ſecuring his Intereſt till his Arrival. Coming to Nice he would not ſtir out nor be ſeen on the Biſſextile Day, as unluky to the Romans. Towards Evening, by the Advice of Saluſt the Præfect, command was given, that under Pain of Death none of the greateſt Quality, or ſuſpected to affect the Empire, ſhould ſtir out the next morning: But as ſoon as it was Light all the Army was drawn together in the Camp, and Valentinian aſcending a lofty Tribunal was declared Emperour, adorned with the Imperial Habit, and ſaluted Auguſtus, on the fifth before the Calends of March. Preparing to make a Speech, when he ſtretched out his Arms to gain Affection, a Seditious Noiſe aroſe amongſt the ordinary Souldiers, who required that another or ſecond Emperor might be choſen. This at firſt was looked on as a matter of no moment, and procured by ſome of the Malecontents: but the Stir continuing, and growing more violent, there was juſt reaſon to apprehend an univerſal Tumult. Which Valentinian having more cauſe to fear than any other, yet courageouſly again lifting up his right hand, adventured to check ſome he perceived to be more peremptory and unquiet, and after a little diſturbance got the liberty of going thorough his Harangue to this purpoſe.

Ammian.l.26.

Repreſſeth by a Speech ſuch as would have him had a Collegue out of hand.

> 2. I exceedingly applaud my ſelf, and ever ſhall, you moſt Valiant Defenders of the Provinces, in the favour you have conferred upon me, by devolving on me the Government of the Roman World, when I neither expected nor deſired it. What was in your own power, while the Choice was not yet made, you have (I hope) laudably beſtowed, having preferred to the higheſt Pitch of Honour a Perſon, whom from his Youth hitherto you have experimentally known to have lived as unblameably, ſo not without Splendour. Attend therefore quietly, I beſeech you, to what (though with mean Expreſſions) I ſhall propound to you for the Publick Good. Conſidering and weighing with my ſelf as a Man, what the heavy Burthen of Empire is, and the Multiplicity of Accidents ever attending ſo great a Charge, I nothing doubt or contradict, but that having a Collegue is very proper for all Events. But we are eſpecially concerned to aim at Concord, by virtue whereof even mean and contemptible Beginnings receive ſtrength and growth. And this will eaſily be compaſſed, if you will have but a little patience, and permit me to buckle to mine Implement. I hope Fortune, that is wont to aſſiſt good Counſels, will give me Temper and Moderation, after which I aſſure you I ſhall moſt earneſtly aſpire. For as wiſe men ſay, Not onely in Government, wherein Dangers are both greater and more imminent; but alſo in private and ordinary Affairs, it may behove a man to unite with one, whom he formerly judged his Enemy, but not eſteem him as ſuch, after he is once united with him. On my part I promiſe you all good Offices, and require that, continuing conſtant and loyal, you refreſh your ſelves in your Quarters, where you ſhall ſpeedily receive what is wont to be“ given after a Promotion of this nature.

3. Having ended his Speech, an unanimous Conſent was given to what he had ſaid, even by thoſe who had endeavoured the contrary with very much earneſtneſs; and now with Enſigns diſplayed and a numerous Train he is brought to his Palace. There calling together the Officers as one reſolved to follow their Advice, he asked them whom they thought fit to be joyned with him in the Empire. Whereat when all others kept ſilence, Dagalaiphus anſwered with confidence, That if he bare reſpect to his Friends and Relations, he had a Brother; if to the Commonwealth, it were convenient that ſome other ſhould be found out. He was inwardly moved with the liberty of this Speech, but ſuppreſſed his Anger, and the ſecond day after his Promotion he ſet forward, and with ſpeed marched to Nicomedia, which he entered on the firſt of March. Here he ſet over his Stable his Brother Valens, with the Dignity of Tribune; but departing to Conſtantinople, there conſidering the weight of his Affairs, as an eaſe to his Burthens he reſolved no longer to defer it, but on the twenty ſeventh of March bringing him forth into the Suburb Septimus, (ſo called from being ſeven miles from the City, where Valens adorned the Tribunal with Marble Stairs and Tables, and generally it was uſed thenceforth by ſucceeding Princes as the place of their Coronation;) he declared him Auguſtus with univerſal conſent, for none dared to oppoſe it. Thus promoted he carried him back with him in his Chariot, habited with the Imperial Robes and Diadem, which ſignified him to be equal with him in Power, though he obeyed him more like ſome Apparitor in the Judgment of Ammianus. The Solemnity being over, both Emperors were ſeized with violent Fevers, which held them long, but both recovered; and then, as they were far more dextrous at making Inquiſition, than at compoſing of matters, they gave in charge to Urſatius the Magiſter Officiorum, a cruel Dalmatian, and Juventius Siſcianus the Quæſtor, to make inquiry into the Cauſe of their Diſtempers; out of deſign (as Ammianus and Zoſimus will have it) to caſt dirt on the Memory of Julian, as having been bewitched by his Friends; but the thing came to nothing, no Diſcovery at all being made. Now at this time it was, that as if an univerſal Alarm had been ſounded throughout the Empire, the fierce and barbarous Nations round about aroſe, and invaded the neighbouring Limits. The Allemans at the ſame time waſted Gall and Rhætia, the Sarmatæ and Quadi infeſt Pannonia, the Picts, Saxons, Scots, and Attacots, with continual Miſeries afflicted Britain; the Auſtoriani and other Mooriſh Nations troubled Africk more than ever; roving Companies of Goths made Depredations in Thrace; and the Perſian King began to lay hold on Armenia, pretending that after the Death of Jovian, with whom it was that he had entered into a League and concluded a Peace, nothing ought to hinder him from recovering what had belonged to his Predeceſſors.

He aſſumes his Brother Valens for his Collegue.

The Barbarous Nations up on all ſides

4. The two Brothers and Emperours ſpent thirty days in Conſtantinople, and therein applied themſelves to the Reformation of ſuch Abuſes as were repreſented to them. We formerly ſignified how Conſtantine the Great, to encourage ſuch as built and inhabited his new City, aſſigned a large quantity of Bread to be diſtributed to the Inhabitants. Hence is this Bread termed in the Edicts of Princes, Bread of Houſes, Bread of Buildings, and the like, to the Houſes it being fixed and appropriate for their Maintainance and Repair. This was the ſence of Valentinian; and ſuch, by a Conſtitution bearing Date of the twenty ſeventh of March, he declares it and ordains, that it be lawful to none to ſell their Houſes, and yet reſerve the Bread to“ themſelves. In caſe any Houſes were depopulated, or by any means fell to ruine,“ and this Bread came to have no Owner, he declares that it falls to the Treaſury.“ Partly from this, but eſpecially from many other Laws, it appears how great the care and endeavour of Valentinian was, for the due ordering of this Charity of Conſtantine, and alſo for ſupply of both Conſtantinople and Rome with Proviſions. For ſupply of theſe Cities much Corn was yearly brought from Sicily, Ægypt, and elſewhere, as we have already ſaid, and laid up in the publick Granaries: the Overſeer whereof was the Præfectus Annonæ, who was under the diſpoſition of the Præfect of the City, as the Notitia ſets him. Now for the better ordering of theſe Proviſions Valentinian, by another Edict of the eighth of April, directed to Voluſianus the Præfect of Rome, commands that his Officers ſhould have nothing to do with the“ ſaid Proviſions. In the next place, that he the Præfect ſhould do nothing with-“ out the advice and conſent of the Præfectus Annonæ. Next, that the old Proviſi-“ ons, or ſuch as had been laid up in the foregoing Præfectſhip, ſhould be ſpent be-“ fore the new were touched. Again, if the old Corn was ſo ſpoiled, that it would“ not ſell without complaint and diſturbance, new ſhould be mixed with it. And for“ the

The Emperours lying at Conſtantinople, take care for the victualling of that City and Rome.

Panes Ædium, Panes Ædificiorum.

*L.*1. de Annonis Civicis, Cod.Th.

Panes caduci.

Publica Horrea.

*L.*1. *de Conditis in publicis Horreis,Cod. Th.l.*11.*tit.*14. & l. 1. Cod. Juſt.eod. tit. hinc deſumpta eſt reciſa hujus l. prima ſententia velut temporalid.

the better performance of all that was enjoyned; he wil have the Præfect himſelf make“ choice of a Keeper and Meaſurer, who in reſpect of his honeſty and prudence may“ be fit for ſuch a Truſt. Some Interpreters have been miſtaken in ſeveral reſpects about this Law; in taking this Bread to be the ſame with the Panis Gradilis or that which was beſtowed freely by the Emperours upon the People; whereas it is to be underſtood of ſuch Corn and Proviſions as were provided only for ſupply of the City, but ſold out at reaſonable Rates. And they think this mixing new with old Corn, to be againſt the Rules of honeſty, whereas it is ſtill practiſed in other States, and then the grain is ſold to the Bakers. And whereas this Law is dated with the Conſulſhip of Divus Jovianus and Varronianus, and yet bears in its Front, for Authors, Valentinian and Valens, there's one that goes about to reconcile this great difficulty, by this ſalvo, that Jovian firſt made the Law, but his ſodain death hindred the publication of it; and therefore the following Emperours now effected it. But though Jovian and Varronian were both dead; yet was it the cuſtome to have the Conſulſhip of the year, ſtill noted by their Names; only with diſtinction of the word Divus, to ſhew them deceaſed.

Amaya quem refutatum vide a Goth. in Com. ad h. l.

They make a Partition of their Officers, and march,

5. From Conſtantinople the Emperours paſſed through Thrace to Naiſſus, and in a neighbouring Village called Mediana, diſtant ſome three miles from the City, being now quickly to part aſunder, made a Diviſion of their Officers. Valentinian took to himſelf Jovinus, who not long ſince had been by Julian advanced to be Magiſter Armorum, in Gall, as alſo Dagalaiphus, who had been preferred by the late Emperour to the like Command. To follow Valens into the Eaſt, was Victor appointed, one whom he had alſo promoted, and with him was joyned Arintheus; as for Lupicinus he had been alſo by Jovian already made Magiſter Equitum, for defence of the Eaſtern Parts. To Equitius was given the Command of the Forces in Illyricum, and Seronianus though out of Service, was again taken in, and girt with the Military Girdle, becauſe a Pannonian; and being appointed to wait on Valens, was ſet over the Schole of the Domeſticks. They alſo divided the Forces of the Empire, and being come to Sirmium, each now furniſhed and attended as pleaſed Valentinian, he departed toward Milan; and Valens the contrary way, toward Conſtantinople and the Eaſt. Thus much Ammianus tells us in ſhort, not mentioning in expreſs terms the Diviſion of the Empire, which yet is eaſily to be concluded from this Relation. It's evident enough from that and other paſſages, that Valentinian reſerved all the Weſt (which had fallen to the ſhare of Conſtantine the younger, and Conſtans) to himſelf, viz. all Illyricum, with Macedonia, Italy, Africa, Gall, Spain and Britain; and to Valens his Brother, left all the Eaſt, with Thrace and Egypt; which Diviſion is to be reteined in mind, as for other Reaſons, ſo eſpecially, for a diſtinct knowledge what Laws after their parting aſunder, had Valentinian, and what had Valens for their Author; for according to the Cuſtome, though a Conſtitution was made by one Prince, without the knowledge or concurrence of the other, yet it bears the Names of both, and his in the firſt place who was Senior in the Government. But, before we come to ſpeak either of the Laws, or other Acts of them when parted, we muſt acquaint the Reader with other Edicts made by them while ſtill together in their Progreſs through Thrace, and the quarters adjoyning.

Valentinian Weſtward toward Milan, and Valens toward Conſtantinople Eaſtward.

How the Empire was divided betwixt them.

6. The firſt in the Code which bears date after thoſe made at Conſtantinople, is an Edict ſaid by the Subſcription to have been dated at Antioch, which is not to be underſtood of the great City of Syria, but an Iſland of this Name near the City of Conſtantinople. This relates to the Proviſions of the Army (in the care whereof it appears not only from the Laws, but Hiſtory, that Valentinian was very accurate) and ordains that the Domeſtick Protectors, who not only waited on the“ Prince, but ſerved alſo in the defence of Places in the Provinces, and in this reſpect“ were under the diſpoſition of the Magiſtri Militum, ſhould have theirs allowed“ them according to the Market Rate, in money by the Præfect of the City of“ Rome, to whome the care of ſuch matters belonged. As he was very careful that ſuch as were in ſervice ſhould be duly ſupplied, ſo by conſent of all Hiſtorians, he was a moſt ſevere Exactor of Military Diſcipline, and that appears alſo by his ſeveral Laws concerning this Subject, wherein he imitated the prudence and juſtice of a Maſter toward his Servants; who as he is careful they want nothing, but have Wages duly paid them, ſo ſtrictly requires that his work be not neglected. His firſt Edict of this nature, bears date from Hadrianople on the twenty ninth of April, and ſeems to have been occaſioned by what Ammianus Marcellinus writes concerning the Barbarous Nations; at this very time infeſting the Empire on all quarters, and particularly the Goths their troubling of Thrace, where now the Emperours

l. 10. de Erogatione militaris Annonæ Cod. Th. lib. 7. Tit. 4. Dat. x. Kal. Maii. Antiochiæ Divo Joviano & Varroniano Coſs. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

A Law made by them, while together, for the better proviſion for Souldiers.

Sect.3.

A. D. 364.

rours were in motion. The Veterani, or Emerite Souldiers, as we formerly hinted, enjoyed ſuch great Privileges, that when there was any vehement occaſion which preſſed the Empire to a greater, and more ſodain ſupply than ordinary; their Sons were called out to ſervice, and that as is thought, firſt by an Edict of Conſtantine the Great, upon occaſion of the Sarmatian War; whoſe Example his Succeſſors followed, by publiſhing their Letters of Summons throughout the Cities, upon ſuch emergencies. This now doth Valentinian; and to encourage them, declares,“ that they ſhall have the Pay, not uſually given to Tirones, or new raiſed“ men, but ſuch as was due to thoſe that had ſerved a longer time; which was“ larger than the other: If theſe Sons of the Veterani were unfit for the Wars,“ by reaſon of their want of health, the inability of their Bodies, or the unproportionableneſs“ of their ſtature or limbs, that then they ſhould be beſtowed in other“ Imployments, as amongſt the Officiales of the Proconſuls, Conſulares, Correctores and“ Preſidents; in caſe they refuſed to ſerve in the Wars, having none of theſe defects“ nor excuſes, he ſubjects them to the ſervices of Corporations; but not ſuch as“ were utterly rendred unfit by any diſeaſe, or other neceſſary Impediment.

By another they call the Sons of Veterani into the Field.

L.5.de re militari cod.Th.lib.7. Tit. 1. Dat. 3. Kal. Mai. Hadrianopoli Divo Joviano & Varroniano Coſs.

19. For the ſervice of Corporations, he ſhewed alſo much Zeal, the Splendour of them, as he himſelf ſaith, being a thing very acceptable to him; and in order to this, the very next Edict, now mentioned in the Code, was ordained by him. But he proceeded in a middle way, without thoſe extravagancies committed by Julian. For the nomination of the Curiales, he thought fit afterwards, that none ſhould be made ſuch, but thoſe that were choſen by the Curiæ themſelves; inſomuch, that by way of puniſhment he would have none condemned to thoſe Offices, no not the Tabularii, who in due time had not given up their Accounts. But even Merchants themſelves, if they were owners of any Lands, he permits to be nominated to theſe Services, and commands the Sons of the Veterani, who had been Curiales, to be appointed to theſe Imployments. The Imployments, or Burthens, he will have by degrees impoſed on the Curiales, and not for them to begin with the greateſt. From them none ſhould be excuſed by any Dignity: namely, that no Curialis ſhould be admitted a Senator, or enjoy the privileges of that Order, till ſuch time as he had paſſed through all the Offices, nor be received to the Government of a Province, except he had obtained both Senatorian Dignity, and the Government together, or been priviledged by ſome Palatine ſervice; and even then he muſt ſubſtitute his Sons in his room. By warfare none ſhould excuſe himſelf, except he had therein ſerved five years, and yet, in ſuch caſe his Sons muſt alſo attend the ſervice of the Corporation for him. Not by being in Orders, without paſſing away his Eſtate to one that ſhould ſucceed him; or to the Curia it ſelf. Neither by betaking ones ſelf to the Body or Company of thoſe belonging to the Fabricks. The Privileges of the Curiales this Emperour alſo Confirms; and eſpecially of thoſe that Exerciſed amongſt them the Pagan Prieſthood, or were Principals, ſaving them harmleſs from all injuries, and diſpenſing with them from being forced to appear any where beyond the bounds of their own Corporation. Theſe and other particulars appear in thoſe eighteen ſeveral Conſtitutions made by Valentinian concerning this Subject, and ſtill extant; from conſideration of which Gothofred juſtly wonders both at Libanius, and Ammianus Marcellinus, who with ſo many words complain of the deſolation of Corporations, after the death of Julian; which they will have to have been ſo great, that in ſome of them but one Curialis, or three at the moſt, were remaining, What Accidents might happen in ſome certain places, in ſo vaſt a Compaſs as that of the Roman World, none can determine; but in general, we are to believe the Laws ſtill extant, rather than heed their great Zeal to the memory of their Julian, who alſo was out, as to this point of Government, and that by the confeſſion of the moſt ingenuous of thoſe two Perſons.

Much zeal they ſhew for the ſervices of the Curiæ.

L.. 57.de Decurionibus vide Gothofr. in L.h.& in L.8. de Cohortalibus. Cod. Th. lib. 8. Tit. 4.

20. And many other things there were innovated by him, which Valentinian now found reaſon to repeal; and, at the beginning of his Reign, to put them into their former courſe. From another Law made at Hadrianople, in the thirteenth of March it ſhould ſeem, that He had leſſened the Privileges of ſome of the Companies appertaining to the City of Rome, and particularly of the Navicularii, of whom ſome belonged to Africa. It was their work to bring wood for the ſupply of the Bathes, and other publick ſervices of that City, which not being in capacity to be well furniſhed, but by incouragement of thoſe whoſe duty it was to convey ſuch neceſſaries, Valentinian now renews the Privileges formerly granted to“ them, as not long after by another Edict, all Immunities whatſoever which had“ been given to any Bodies or Companies of Rome by the old Laws, or any of his“ Predeceſſors. As moſt Emperours, who expreſſed zeal for the Publick Service, were vide quæ affert Goth. in L.10. de Naviculariis.

Incourage the Navicularii.

L.1.de Privil. Corporatorum urb. Romæ.Cod. Th.L.14.Tit.2.

Sect. 2.

A.D. 364.

Regulate the Curſus publicus.

L.L. 17, 18, &c. de Curſu publico, Cod. Th. l. 8. tit. 5. L. 19.

The Power of the Præfecti Prætorio increaſeth.

L.L. 3, 4. de Legatis & Decretis, &c. Cod. Th. l. 12. tit. 12.

were wont to have a ſpecial regard to the Curſus publicus, to direct the uſe thereof, and prevent the too great Burthen of it. So he by eighteen ſeveral Conſtitutions demonſtrated his care as to this particular, of which eighteen no fewer than eleven he made within the bounds of very little more than one and his firſt year. By one directed to Symmachus, Præfect of Rome, he abridges the Liberty formerly uſed by him or his Predeceſſors, in granting the uſe thereof, reſtraining it onely to neceſſary caſes, wherein Power was alſo wont to be given to Governours of Provinces, to grant the ſame Licence. But from this as well as other Inſtances may be ſeen, how contracted the Power of the Præfects of the City was at this time, when that of the Præfecti Prætorio daily increaſed. Had not Conſtantine leſſened their Authority, how dangerous it would have been to thoſe who bore the Title of Emperours, evidently hence appears; that notwithſtanding the Diminution, yet again they got very much ground in the Advancement of their Power. About this very time by ſeveral Laws Valentinian confirms the Cuſtom of their examining ſuch Petitions or Complaints, as were to be ſent to himſelf from the Cities or Provinces, requiring that firſt they ſhould be brought to the Governours of the Countries or ordinary Judges, and there be entered in their Offices; but thence tranſmitted, without any alteration or diminution, to the Præfectus Prætorio, who examining the matter, ſhould therein take order of his own Authority, if it might be done; or elſe, tranſmit them to the Emperour himſelf, if he thought them fit for his notice. If ſo he doth, he will have but one Meſſenger of the City or Province to come along with the Miſſive, both for ſaving Expence, and to prevent the Burthening of the Curſus publicus. Yet ſometimes, as appears by Hiſtory, more Perſons were wont to be ſent on thoſe Errands.

Valentinian takes care for providing Rome of Neceſſaries.

L.L. 3, 4. de Piſtoribus. L. 2. de calcis Coctoribus. Vide Chronol. legum ad An. 364.

Canon Frumentarius.

L. 1. de Canone Frumentario urbis Romæ, Cod. Th. l. 14. tit. 15.

L.L. 5, 6, 7. de Pœnis, Cod. Th. l. 9. tit. 40.

L. 8. de Annona & Tributis, Cod. Th. l. 11. tit. 1.

L. 11. de Operibus publicis, Cod. Th.

21. But amongſt the Laws he made at this time, very remarkable is one large Conſtitution, whereby he demonſtrated his extraordinary care for ſupplying with Victuals the City of Rome, which now, as we may therefore collect, was under ſome preſſure in reference to Proviſions. “ Therein he takes order that the People ſhall be ſerved with good Bread, regulates matters belonging to the publick Bakers, who were a Company obliged (both they and their Children) to this Service; provides for the ſupply of Corn, the Repair of the publick Granaries, and the Privileges of thoſe who burnt the Lime for ſuch publick uſes. There was yearly a great quantity of Grain brought to Rome out of Africa, Sicily, and Sardinia eſpecially; of which ſome (as we have already hinted) was made into Bread, and gratis beſtowed on the People by the Emperours, called Panis Gradilis, and the reſt was ſold by the Bakers, and with it made that ſtyled Panis Oſtienſis, who had their Store-houſes in the City for the keeping of it, (at this time about three hundred.) “ And of this Valentinian orders two hundred thouſand Modii, and no more, of the very beſt, to be ſold them at reaſonable rates, that they might not obtrude ill Bread upon the Citizens. Further, leſt any Deceit ſhould be uſed in the Conveyance, he will have the Corn to be carried by the ordinary Porters belonging to the Wharf, and that there might not want Aſſiſtance at the Bakehouſes, as Conſtantine the Great had ordained; That ſuch as were condemned for leſſer Crimes ſhould be ſent to thoſe Houſes, he renews or reinforces the Law in this particular. And this ſame year upon his travelling Weſtward, when he granted a General Pardon and Indemnity, he yet excepted out of it ſuch as had been condemned to this Drudgery. And laſtly, leſt any of the Corn wont to be brought to Rome ſhould be interverted, he abſolutely forbids any Money to be received in the room thereof. All this Endeavour of his for ſupply of Rome was promoted by Symmachus, who was now Præfect of that City, to whom theſe Laws are directed, and of whom Ammianus gives this Teſtimony, That having ſucceeded Apronianus, he made all things more plentiful there than uſual, and built a ſtrong and moſt beautiful Bridge, to the great contentment of the People. This we muſt conclude was with the knowledge and conſent of the Emperor, becauſe this very year, by another Edict directed to him, he forbids any new Work to be raiſed in that City without his Order, although he gives free leave to repair any Building that was decayed.

22. But though ſuch was his Reſolution in relation to Rome, which being too great already, there was reaſon to reſtrain the Extravagancy of Building, he made ſhortly after another Law, importing a quite contrary Command, becauſe relating to another place, and for a quite different reaſon. He and his Brother now lay at Naiſſus or Mediana, three miles diſtant from it, and near to that part of Dacia called Dacia Ripenſis; but now they were ready to part, the Barbarous Nations were all up round about, and theſe Quarters were threatned with the Inrodes of the Goths amongſt others. For the ſafety of them therefore he directs an Edict to Tautomedes,

the

For repairing and raiſing Forts upon the Borders.

L. 13. de operibus publicis, Cod.Th. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt. quia temporaria & hiſtorica eſt. Vide Gothofr. in L.

the Dux of this ſame Dacia, bearing Date of the nineteenth of June from Mediana, and therein commands him both to repair the old Towers or Burgi that were“ in his Limit, if any there were that needed it; and further to build new ones in all“ convenient places: which if he neglected to do, he tells him, that when the time of his Command ſhall be expired, he ſhall be compelled to raiſe up ſuch at his own Charge, as he neglected to build by the Labours of his Souldiers, and at the pub-“ lick Charge, during his Government. That theſe Towers or Burgi were wont to be built upon the Limits, hath already been ſaid; and this may be added, that uſually it was by the Manual Labour of the Souldiers, who at idle times were imployed upon ſuch like Works as fortifying of places, or making common Cauſeys or High Ways into the Provinces. And about this very time from Inſcriptions it appears, that ſuch Towers were raiſed in ſeveral places by the ſame means. Saluſt was now Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt, Mamertinus governed in the ſame manner Italy, Africa, and Illyricum; and Germanus had the overſight of Gall. Valentinian being gone to Milan, and Valens to Conſtantinople, both of them took Conſular Ornaments: but all this year the Roman Empire was grievouſly diſtreſſed: For the Allemans brake thorough the Limits of Germany, enraged for that their Embaſſadours ſent to the Court had brought back far leſs Gifts and Preſents than had been uſual; which therefore they caſt away, and in ſcorn and indignation trode upon them. Urſatius the Magiſter Officiorum dealt ſomething roughly with them, being an angry ſevere man, which they returning home aggravated as a mighty Affront, and irritated thereby theſe moſt fierce Nations. And about the ſame time Procopius in the Eaſt endeavoured to uſurp. The knowledge of all which was brought to Valentinian as he was travelling toward Paris about the beginning of November.

The Allemans break into the Empire.

Procopius uſurps in the Eaſt.

23. Againſt the Allemans he ſent Dagalaiphus, who had but little work at preſent, they being timely retreated after they had done what miſchief they could. But as for the Rebellion of Procopius, he knew not what to do in that matter, not being certain whether he had uſurped upon the Death of his Brother Valens; ſo lame was the Intelligence he had received from Equitius, to whom the Information was ſent by one Antony a Tribune, who commanded in the Midland Dacia. He conferred on Equitius the Dignity of Magiſter, and deſigned to march preſently into Illyricum, leſt the Uſurper ſhould ſeize upon Pannonia; for he remembred with what ſpeed Julian overran all thoſe Parts, when he ſet up for himſelf againſt Conſtantius. But thoſe about him remonſtrated, how by leaving the Weſt he muſt neceſſarily expoſe Gall to the Inrodes of the Northern Nations; and the Cities ſent their Meſſengers to pray, that he would not forſake them in this their neceſſity, when his very Preſence and Name would be ſufficient to awe and reſtrain the Fury of the Barbarians. And he yielded to their Requeſt, being convinced by their Reaſons, often ſaying, That Procopius was but Enemy to him and his Brother, whereas the Allemans made War upon the Empire. Reſolving then not to ſtir out of Gall he went to Rheims, and now being ſollicitous about Africk, leſt any Attempt ſhould be made upon it, he ſent away Neotherius, who at preſent was no more than a Notary, (though afterwards he arrived at the Dignity of Conſul,) with one Maſaucio, a Domeſtick Protector, who was well acquainted with all the dangerous places of that Province; and Gaudentius, one of the Scutarii, whom he had long known to be faithful to him. Now Ammianus finds himſelf even haraſſed betwixt the Affairs of the Weſt and the Eaſt, which happening at the ſame time, he is at ſome ſtand in what method to relate them. But we muſt needs take notice, that of the Journey of Valentinian into Gall, he ſaith as good as nothing, nor of the long ſtay he made in Italy before he came thither, which we find by the Dates of many Laws; and by theſe Laws we can trace his ſteps whitherſoever he moved. For though nothing paſſed all this while, of which Ammianus thought fit to take notice; yet in many things, and of moment, he took order, which related to the Civil Government, and provided for the Safety and Intereſt of the ſeveral parts of the Empire by various Edicts, out of which we muſt obſerve ſo much as is material for our purpoſe: As great advantage coming to the Reader from the knowledge of ſuch Paſſages, as from the Relations of Wars and Commotions, with which moſt Hiſtorians ſatisfie themſelves.

Valentinian thinks to go againſt him.

But is diverted by his Attendants and the Cities.

24. As he proceeded in his Journey toward Italy, he took Arelape and Emona, two Cities of Noricum, in his way; and being arrived at the later, he reſolved not to omit the Acknowledgment uſually made of a Prince at his firſt coming to the Empire, by the payment of that Gold called Aurum Coronarium, of which we have already ſpoken. By an Edict directed from this place, on the twenty eighth of Auguſt,

Sect. 2.

He requires the Gold called Aurum Coronarium.

A.D. 364.

l. 2. de Auro Coronario Cod. Th. lib. 12. Tit. 13. Dat. 5. Kal. Septemb. Emonæ Divo Joviano & Varroniano vv. c. c. Coſs. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt. l. l. 5. 6. de luſtrali Conlatione. Cod. Th. lib. 13. Tit. 1.

to Mamertinus the Præfectus Prætorio, he requires that payment of this Gold“ be made by all; Senators and ſome few others excepted, who had been privileged“ by a Law he mentions, not now extant. For it being a mark of ſubjection,“ the Decuriones were only ſubject to it, not Senators; for the honour of whom Princes had a great reſpect, as accounting them part of their Body, and who had a payment of their own peculiar to them, viz. that called Glebalis Collatio, and another ſort of Gold known by the name of Aurum Oblatitium. Indeed the ſtate of the Empire was ſuch at this time, by reaſon of the motions of Barbarians, that it had required all Supplies that fairly might be procured. Therefore in this year ſo dangerous, were publiſhed two ſeveral Edicts for the payment alſo of the Luſtralis Collatio, or the Chryſargyrum, ſometimes exacted from Traders or Merchants, falſly by Zoſimus ſaid to have been invented by Conſtantine the Great. There were, it ſeems, three ſorts of Perſons that traded, which held themſelves excuſed from this payment, viz. the Palatines, or ſuch as belonged to the Emperours Houſe, Clerks, or Eccleſiaſticks; and others that bore themſelves high upon their Places and Dignities. But the Emperour Valens, by one Edict commands that none of them all ſhould“ be favoured; not the firſt, becauſe this money did not concern their ſervice or attendance“ at Court, but their Traffick, which was the thing obnoxious to it;“ not the ſecond ſort, becauſe if they were good men, they did not traffick for themſelves,“ but to aſſiſt the poor and needy; and as for the great ones, they ought“ not to play the Merchants, or, if they did, they were beſt able to pay, and ought“ to do it in the firſt place: This firſt Edict was made at Conſtantinople, on the ſeventeenth“ of April, but there was need to re-inforce it again by another dated“ on the eighth of September, wherein the Emperours ſignifying, that they had“ made an Indiction, as the Phraſe was, or laid ſuch an Impoſition of Gold and Silver“ upon Traffickers, they expreſly declare that, none ſhall plead any privilege“ from it; for as much as they had commanded all perſons whatſoever, of what Degree“ ſoever, to undergo this burthen for the aſſiſtance of the Commonwealth,“ none being to be admitted with their Exceptions, but thoſe who ſold only their“ own growths, ſuch as they had upon their own Lands, without buying on purpoſe“ to ſell again. For here as we formerly ſaid, lies the difference; none being“ to be eſteemed Traders or Merchants, but ſuch as buy and ſell the ſame Commodity.

And other ways raiſes money, for which now there was great occaſion.

l. l. 9, 10. de Petitionibus &c. Cod. Th. lib. 10. Tit. 10. l. 3. de Conlatione fundorum. Cod. Th. lib. 11. Tit. 19.

He provides for the Relief of Africk,

25. Much about this ſame time he variouſly provided for the Relief of the Province of Byzacena in Africk; by reſtraining of Informers, (whom a year after he ordered“ as Enemies of Mankind, to be puniſhed with death) and of thoſe that quitted“ the ſervices of their Corporations; and whereas ſuch as held that ſort of Lands“ called Emphyteuticarii, were liable to a double Payment, viz. of Corn, and of“ Gold; that of Corn he would have paid at three ſeveral times in the year, becauſe“ they were ſuppoſed to have it ready by them, but Gold at what time in“ the whole year they could beſt do it; for it was not to be ſuppoſed they were“ provided of it; but when they had ſold off their Corn. As he took care for the eaſe and relief of the Provincials of Africk, ſo being come to Aquileia, much more for them of Italy; for the benefit of whom he publiſhed, the remainder of this year, many Conſtitutions, whereof the firſt to Artemius now Corrector of Lucania, whom he taxeth for having neglected the actings of ſome things according to the Rules he had preſcribed. In this large Conſtitution, divided now into ſeveral Laws, he gives order for the maintenance of the Privileges of his Palatines, or Courtiers,“ as that they ſhould not be forced to be Suſceptores or Receivers of Tributes;“ as neither ſuch as ſerved in the Offices of the Magiſtri Militum, whom he declares“ to be of the nature of Souldiers. He forbids the Exactions uſually made“ upon the People, by theſe whoſe work it was to look to the Waggons, and Beaſts“ belonging to the Curſus Publicus, but eſpecially concerns himſelf, for the due“ Adminiſtration of Juſtice. To this end he commands that a Judge have a ſpecial“ care that He hear no Cauſes, either Civil or Criminal, in any By-place, or private“ Room; but when he gives Sentence, it ſhall be upon the Bench, the doors of the“ Secretarium being open, and Acceſs given to all Perſons. For the place where the“ Judge or Governour of a Province heard Cauſes, was called by the Name of Secretarium, as that of the Emperour, Conſiſtorium; It being by a Velum or Hanging cloſed, for keeping out the multitude when there was occaſion for Conſultation, or any other Act that required privacy after the Debate of the matter was over. He further reprehends a fault which was common in thoſe daies, and from which“ the gravity of Judges was not a ſufficient Bar, and that was haunting of the Theatres,“ to gaze upon the Spectacula, or publick Shows, whether when made at the“ charge“

And publiſhes ſeveral Laws for the benefit of Italy.

vide Chronol. legum hujus Anni.

l. 2. de Officio Rectoris Provinciæ Haue Anthemi Cariſſime nobis. Dat. Cal. Octob. Aquileiæ Divo Joviano & Varroniano Coſs. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt. vide Goth. in h. l. & præcedentem.

charge of others, or afforded to the People by the Judges themſelves. Moreover there was great Robbing practiſed at this time in Italy, which indeed never was, nor at this preſent is free from Banditi; for prevention whereof, when other means failed, Valentinian reſolved to forbid even the Uſe of Horſes, as that which eſpecially conduced to the motions of thoſe ſodain Incurſions, and the ſpeedy retiring of the Thieves to their lurking places. The Uſe and having of Horſes he prohibits “ to all the Inhabitants of theſe Provinces, viz. Piconum, Flaminia, Apulia, Calabria, “ Brittii, Lucania and Samnium, five ſorts of Perſons excepted, theſe were Senators, “ the Honorati, the Governours of Provinces, the Veterani, or Emerite Souldiers, “ and Decuriones, the ſeveral ranks and conditions of whom he concluded “ would put them upon higher deſigns than thoſe of Robbing. Particularly, the Honorati “ were ſuch as had born Honourable Offices, whether Military or Civil, were not of the Curiæ or Corporations, as ſome have miſtaken; but others, to whom were equal in Dignity the Principals or Primates in the Cities, though ſometimes the Honorati be alſo compared with Senators. For thoſe in the Country, or the Provincials as they are ordinarily called, were uſually diſtinguiſhed into the three Ranks of Honorati, Decuriones, Poſſeſſors, or Freeholders, and Coloni or Tenants. But beſides the true and Original ſort of the Honorati, who had born Offices, there was another which obtained this Degree, by the Letters Patents of the Prince. Both ſorts had many Privileges, as of entring the Towns and Cities in their Chariots, Leave to come to the Senate-Houſe, and ſitting on the Bench with Judges, except they themſelves had Cauſes to be heard. In this Caſe, Zeno the Emperour appointed them a place below the Judges, but above the common Croud; as is now practiſed in France towards Princes themſelves, when their matters are heard in the Chambers of Juſtice. But as to this Law againſt the Uſe of Horſes, it ſeems to have been chiefly occaſioned by the great Droves of Cattel, with which ſome of theſe Countries, to which it hath relation, very much abounded. And for this Reaſon, five days after the Date of it, by another Conſtitution, he provided for the ſecurity of Campania, which pleaſant and fruitful Countrey was alſo full of Cattel, and ſerved Rome with Proviſions. To prevent the ſtealing and driving of them “ away, he forbids the Uſe of Horſes, both to thoſe that looked to his own Herds “ there, and to the Stewards and Officers of Senators, who were apt to bear themſelves “ high upon the Grandeur of their Maſters, and prohibits the travelling abroad “ with any ſort of Weapon to all in general; ſuch only excepted as ſhould obtain “ Leave of wearing them from himſelf.

L.1.Equibus equorum uſus conceſſus eſt, &c.Cod.Th.lib. 9.Tit.30.Abeſt à Cod. Juſt. ut cæteræ omnes leges hujus Tituli.

Honorati, who they were.

De Honoratis vide fuſius diſſerentem Gothof. ad L. un. de Officio Judic. Civilium Cod. Th. lib.1.Tit.8.

L.2.Quibus Equorum uſus &c. & L. unic. Quorum uſus interdictus eſt. lex unica.Cod. Juſt.eod.tit.

The Uſe of Horſes forbidden.

26. But ever muſt it be ſuppoſed that Souldiers were alſo to be excepted from this Inhibition, who were not bound to lay down Arms, till diſmiſſed by Authority, or that they had ſerved up their time, and were become Emerite or Veterane. To theſe either he or his Brother had now an eſpecial regard; and as they deſerved maintenance and due Incouragement, to fix and aſcertain it, they publiſhed another “ Conſtitution, at the latter end of this year, whereby to all their Subjects, “ or Provincials in general, they made known the Confirmation of ſix ſeveral Priviledges, “ or Inſtances of their Munificence unto them. The firſt is that they may “ chuſe their Habitation where they pleaſe; which to all it was unlawful to do “ without the Indulgence or Leave of the Prince. In the ſecond place they give “ them Immunity from all Civil and Perſonal Charges or Services, or rather confirm “ that which had been granted by former Laws. In the next they permit them to “ ſeize to their own Uſe any Vacant Lands as they were termed, or ſuch as were “ derelict or owned no Maſters, which, within ſo vaſt a compaſs as that of the “ Roman Empire, muſt often fall to the Publick, and for theſe Lands, or others they “ poſſeſſed, they ſhould pay no Rent, or yearly acknowledgement. And fifthly, “ for the improvement of thoſe grounds, they ſhall receive at the publick expence, “ from the Governours of Provinces, both Cattel to till, and Seed wherewith to “ ſow them, which proviſion Conſtantine the Great, had formerly made, but not in “ the ſame proportion. For whereas he, without any diſtinction, had ordered to each Veterane one yoak of Oxen, and an hundred Modii of Corn; they by this “ Edict both increaſe the Allowance in ſome ſort, and make a difference of Perſons, “ allotting to ſuch as had the Dignity of Protectors, two pair of Oxen, and an hundred “ Modii of Grain, and to the reſt one pair a piece, and fifty Modii. For “ ſuch as enjoyed the honour of Protectors, were in ſeveral reſpects more privileged than the reſt: In criminal Cauſes they were not judged by the ordinary Magiſtrates, but by the Præfectus Prætorio, and had larger Immunites both from that called Luſtralis Collatio, and the ordinary Cenſe. And in the laſt place, they grant them “ Immunities for their Slaves, and Families, which they ſhould bring upon ſuch “ Lands “

Except to Souldiers.

L.8.de Veteranis Cod.Th.lib. 7.Tit.20. Dat. 15.Kal.Decemb. Divo Joviano & Varroniano Coſs. vide Com.

Great Priviledges and Immunities to Veterane or Emerite Souldiers.

Lands. This Conſtitution containing a more full Enumeration of the Privileges of thoſe old Souldiers, of whom and of which we often make mention, is more than ordinarily to be taken notice of.

L.6. de Bonis Proſcriptorum, &c. Cod. Th. l. 9. tit. 42.

Dat. 7 Cal. Decemb. Mediol. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

He is kind to the Children of condemned perſons, by an Edict in their behalf.

15. As Valentinian hereby took care for the Reward of ſuch as had well deſerved of the publick; ſo by another Edict dated a few days after, he provided againſt the immoderate puniſhment of ſuch as had been offenders againſt the Laws. Conſtantius had formerly granted the Eſtates of condemned perſons, the Crime of Treaſon onely excepted, to their Children if any could be found within three Degrees or Deſcents; but he by this Edict extends it to all their Poſterity without exception; “ ſo as not onely Poſthumi are thereby included, but even all Deſcendents in infinitum. “ And now this year, which ſtill bore the Names of Jovian and Varronian his Son, drew to an end, and gave way to the firſt Conſulſhip of the two Brothers. It was the Cuſtom, that upon the Deſignation of new Conſuls Meſſengers were wont to be ſent into the Provinces with the News; as alſo upon any other occaſion of publick Joy, as of a Victory, the Triumphs of the Emperours, making of Peace, and other matters. Theſe Meſſengers were alſo wont to exact Money as a Reward from the poor and mean, as well as from the rich, which was termed Sportula; and this was alſo wont to be taxed or levied by the Governours of the Provinces, which proved a great Vexation and Burthen to poor people, as Ammianus complains of it in the time of Conſtantius. If Credit may be given to the Flouriſhes of Libanius, Julian had reformed this Abuſe, although no Laws we find of his made upon this ſubject: However it was now become ſo grievous and intolerable, that Valens lying at Conſtantinople, ſixteen days before he entered upon the Conſulſhip, thought fit by an Edict to obviate this impending Miſchief. Thereby he commands, that “ when upon occaſion of any new Conſuls ſuch Meſſengers were ſent abroad, upon “ their behalf no Impoſition ſhould be laid, nor any one dare to exact or require any “ Contribution. Indeed if any of the Honorati or Curiales would of their own accord “ give any thing, they might freely do it. In caſe any Governour of a Province “ laid any ſuch Impoſition, ſuffered it to be exacted, or connived at any perſon “ offending againſt this Law, he fines him in twenty pounds of Gold, and his Officers “ in forty. Now this might have its deſired effect upon the Eaſtern Parts, and “ in the Diſtrict of Valens: But it ſeems it reached not that of Valentinian, nor had that Operation to prevent another Edict of his, which bears date on the eleventh of January following, and conſequently of his aſſumed Conſulſhip. By this Law, “ to the Meſſage about new Conſuls he adds Victory, which probably at this time “ he had obtained over the Allemans in Gall, and other publick Rejoycings: and “ as to the Penalty, will have the Governours pay the double of what was given, and “ their Officers four fold. And this by a ſecond Conſtitution dated from the ſame “ place, after four years he reinforces; but neither in it, in this whereof we now “ ſpeak, nor that preceding of Valens, is there any Penalty laid upon the Meſſengers “ themſelves: Which Defect being juſtly to be wondered at, Theodoſius the Great afterward ſupplied. Obſervable it is, that to thoſe Apoſtles or Meſſengers of good tidings, the word Euangile or Meſſage of good tidings in the Goſpel alludeth, and many things contained in the Scripture, wherein S. Paul, in the Prefaces to his Epiſtles, ſhews how far that of our Saviour excels all other Euangiles whatſoever, it proceeding not from any mortal man, as was the Roman Emperour, but from God himſelf; not concerning any ſudden Accident lately befallen, but what was long expected, not concerning any Earthly Kingdom, or the Birth of an Emperours Son, but an Heavenly one, and the Son of God, with other Inſtances noted by Learned Gothofred, out of that Apoſtles Writings.

Valenp reforms an ill Cuſtom of Oppreſſion uſed by the Meſſengers of good News.

L.L. 1,2,3. Ne quid publicæ lætitiæ nuntii, &c. Cod. Th. lib. 8. tit. 11.

16. About this time ſome Entercourſe paſſed betwixt Valens and the Nations bordering upon Ægypt, without the Pale of the Roman Empire. For, four days before his Entrance into the Conſulſhip, or the twenty eighth of December, he ſigned an Edict to Victor the Dux of Ægypt, importing an Order to ſeal up the Pacquets “ of ſuch Embaſſadors as ſhould come from them, that they might be brought “ ſafe to his preſence, and opportunity of adding or inſerting any thing into their Letters “ or Inſtructions of the Reguli which they brought, might be prevented. By “ theſe Nations or Gentiles, as the Law calls them, muſt be meant the Axumitæ, Homeritæ, Saracens, and other People inhabiting near that Countrey, which were under the Government of Reguli in thoſe days, as is evident from ſeveral Teſtimonies; it being now the Cuſtom to call all Nations, that were not ſubject to the Empire, by the Name of Gentiles. As ſoon as they ſet foot upon Roman Ground, or arrived in Ægypt, their Pacquets were to be ſealed up, to prevent their falſifying their Letters they brought, which they might be induced to do at this time, ſeeing the Empire Entercourſe betwixt Valens and the Nations bordering upon Ægypt.

Cùm Legati Gentilium venerint obſignari eorum tabulas, oportet, &c. L. 5. de Legatis & Decretis, &c. Cod. Th. lib. 12. tit. 12. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

Sect.2.

A.D, 364.

embroiled in Wars, which at ſetting forth neither they nor their Superiors had expected; or animated by ſome Malecontenes, who out of hatred to thoſe that at preſent reigned, might be deſirous to embroil them in further Troubles. But beſides the truth of the Letters, he expreſſes his Deſign to be, that the number of them might be preſerved, poſſibly to ſee if any were directed to private hands, to ſuch as held correſpondence with thoſe Nations, that thereby their Intrigues and Plots might be diſcovered: A thing often practiſed by other Princes. So Arcadius afterward, when the Barbarous Nations raged in the Empire, commanded all Carriers or Conveyers of Letters to be ſtopt, and their Pacquets ſealed up and brought to his Preſence. And the Cuſtom is in France, that when the Popes Legates arrive there, their Faculties (as they call them) or Mandates, are to be carried to the Parliament. Concerning theſe Forein Embaſſadors we ſhall onely further ſuggeſt, that they had granted them by the Laws the uſe of the Curſus publicus.

A.D. 365. Valentiniano & Valente A.A. Coſs.

Vide Chron. Hiſt.Cod.Th.ad An.365.

17. Valens paſſed moſt of his Conſulſhip at Conſtantinople, and Valentinian made his abode at Milan, till the Moneth of September of the ſame year. During this their firſt Conſulſhip Symmachus was the Præfect of Rome, to whom were directed this very Year thirteen Conſtitutions, whereby Valentinian provided for the Maintenance and further Convenience of that City. Severus of that City was Vicar, and Mamertinus was Præfectus Prætorio over Italy, Illyricum, and Africk; Saluſt of the Eaſt, and Germanianus of Gall. Faventius was Vicar of Italy, and Clearchus of Aſia. Valentinian amongſt other matters provided for, by ſeveral Conſtitutions, in the beginning of the Year, which tended to the ſecurity and emolument of the Subject, thought fit alſo to take care of the publick Revenue, without which neither he nor his People could be preſerved in ſafety: And this he did by revoking all Privileges and Immunities granted to any perſons, thoſe to Souldiers“ onely excepted. But about a Moneth after his Brother Valens from Conſtantinople,“ by another Conſtitution provided, That without his knowledge no extraor-“ dinary Charge ſhould be impoſed by any Officer, not the Præfect upon the Pro-“ vincials of his Diſtrict; according to the Teſtimony of Ammianus concerning him, that the Eaſt never had a Prince which more hated Oppreſſions, he taking care for its ſafety and conveniences no otherwiſe than of his own Houſe; and being a moſt grievous Proſecutor as well of Oppreſſors as Thieves and Robbers. And as he by an Edict at this time provided againſt the former ſort, ſo Valentinian by two others“ publiſhed through Italy and the Alpes, which now ſtood in great need of Relief“ againſt High-way Men, took care for ſuppreſſion of the other. For as from other Laws lately ſpoken to it appears, what Diſorders of this nature were committed in ſeveral Provinces of Italy, to which for this reaſon he thought fit to forbid the uſe of Horſes; ſo from thoſe of which now we write, it is evident that the Alpes ſwarmed with ſuch as had forſaken their Colours, and betaken themſelves to thoſe Mountainous and inacceſſible places; the Italians, who for ſeveral Ages had alienated their Minds from Warfare, not well enduring the Service. For prevention of which Miſchiefs he now condemns to the Mines ſuch as ſhould harbour any that had deſerted their Colours, if of mean Condition; if of higher Degree, he deprives them of half of their Eſtates: and in this Puniſhment involves the Officers of all Governours of Provinces, who ſhould relieve ſuch in their Company, and not diſcover them. By the Direction of theſe Edicts it appears, that the Alpes were ſeparate, and not eſteemed in thoſe days as part of Italy; for though ſome of them were reckoned to belong to it, others appertained as Appendices unto Gall: and indeed the Alpes Cottiæ alone belonged to Italy, but the Maritime Alpes, as Peninæ and Graiæ unto Gall.

Valentinian revokes Privileges againſt paying of Money.

L 3.de Immunitate conceſſa, Cod.Th.

Valens forbids the raiſing of any without his knowledge.

L.11. de Extraordinariis, Cod. Th.l.11. tit.16.

L.1.de Deſertoribus, &c. Cod. Th.l.7. tit.18.

An Edict of Valentinian againſt High-way men.

Impp. Valentinianus & Valens. Edict. duo per Italiam & Alpes. Vide Gothofr. in L.

18. About the ſame time that Valentinian ſhewed ſo much indignation againſt ſuch as fled from their Colours, Valens was as much concerned about ſuch as refuſed to come firſt to them. Being now making Preparations againſt the Perſian, or rather in fear of the Goths their Incurſions into the parts near Conſtantinople; by an Edict directed to Petronius Patritius, his Father in Law, of whom we ſhall hear more ſhortly, he declares to all Veterane or Emerite Souldiers, that they ought to“ preſent ſuch of their Sons as were able and fit for Service to be liſted. And further“ ordains, That if any of them had, to conceal themſelves and ſhun the Service, got to“ be Officers or Attendants to the Governours of Provinces, they ſhall be forced“ thence, and obliged to the Burthens of Corporations, though old and weak as they“ are. For the better Encouragement of all, both that were actually in Service, and to be liſted, Valentinian ſhortly after took care for the more certain furniſhing of them with Clothes, which in this Age were provided for Souldiers at the Publick Charge. He will have the Suſceptores, or ſuch as got them together, to be made“ either Valens ſummons the Sons of Veterani into the Field.

L.7. de filiis militar. apparit. & Veteranorum, Cod. Th. l.7.tit.22.

Sect. 3.

A.D. 365.

Both of them take care about the Clothing of Souldiers.

L. 1. de Militari veſte Cod. To. lib. 7. Tit. 6.

either out of the Principals of Cities, or elſe out of theſe Honorati who had obtain-“ ed this Degree, not for their former ſervices, but by Patents, or Codicils. For “ prevention of Frauds, to which long Employment gives opportunity, he will have “ this of theirs to be but Annual; and in Africk, if any fault ſhould be committed in “ the choice, the blame ſhould lie upon the Officer or Attendants of the Proconſul “ of that Province, who had the Election in his Hands. By this we find that at this time the Souldier was ſerved with clothes in kind, though afterward he uſually received money in lieu thereof. And for the time when they ſhould be furniſhed “ and brought in, Valens provided at the latter end of this ſame year, by another Con-“ ſtitution; requiring that it ſhould be from the firſt of September, to the firſt of “ April, which if the Governours of the Provinces ſhould neglect to ſee performed, “ (for to their care it belonged) they and their Officers were to be puniſhed at the “ diſcretion of the Præfectus Prætorio, under whoſe diſpoſition they were. But this “ Conſtitution was made ſome time after, when Valens lay at Marcianopolis againſt the Goths, whom while he watched, that no miſchief might befal the Provinces from their Inroads, a dangerous flame brake out within the Borders of the Empire.

L. 2. eod. tit.

Ammianus lib. 26.

19. We have formerly made mention of one Procopius a Kinſman of Conſtantius, and Julian, to whom the latter was reported, when he invaded Perſia, to have left order, that if he heard of his death, he ſhould inſtantly aſſume the Purple. He was born and educated in Cilicia, a man cloſe, and of few words; but being of good Morals, he was preferred, and long continued a Notary and Tribune. After the death of Conſtantius, he began to look higher, was prefered to the dignity of Comes, and now appeared to ſome, who more narrowly obſerved him, a Perſon, that if opportunity ſhould ſerve, would be ready to diſturb the publick Peace. Julian when about to invade Perſia, left him in joint Power with Sebaſtian, in Meſopotamia, with a ſtrong party of men; and as was ſaid, the report went, that if he himſelf miſcarried, he bade him declare himſelf Emperour; but hearing of the promotion of Jovian, and how one of the ſame Name, and chief of the Notaries having been propounded by ſome few Souldiers as worthy of the Empire, was put to death, he had not now the courage to make any ſtir, but withdrew himſelf into places far remote. Underſtanding there that he was diligently ſought after by Jovian, and weary of that retired and deſolate condition, joyned with Penury and Obſcurity, he ſtole ſecretly into the Country about Chalcedon, where concealing himſelf in the houſe of a Friend, one Strategius a Palatine, he often came to Conſtantinople, and being unknown by reaſon of the meaneſs of his Habit, and his meagre countenance, diligently hunted after News. He had the contentment to hear Valens rail'd on, for oppreſſions, and invading the Rights of other men; but eſpecially for his conniving at his Father in Law, Petronius, a man deformed both in Body and mind, who had been ſodainly preferred from the Command of the Souldiers called Martenſes, to the Dignity of a Patritian, and with all ſorts of exquiſite Torments raged both againſt innocent, and guilty Perſons to find out debts owing to the publick of no ſmaller ſtanding, than ſince the time of Aurelian. So cruel, inexorable and raging an Inquiſitor had never been known, with whom Cleander under Commodus, and Plautianus the Præfect under Severus, were not to be compared. Many Families he ruined as well of Military men, as others, who ſorely diſpleaſed with the preſent poſture of Affairs, deſired an Alteration above all things. This fully gratified the Humour of Procopius, who waited an opportunity, how by this means to prefer himſelf to the higheſt Dignity.

Procopius the Kinſman of Julian & Conſtantius incouraged by hearing Valens rail'd on.

Hæc aliter Zoſimus ſuo more, nempe Juliano mortuo Procopium ad Jovianum veniſſe eique Chlamydem purpuream tradidiſſe at rogaſſe ut militiæ ſacramento ſolutus domum reverti ſineretur. Quo impetrato Cæſaream Cappadociæ ſe Contulit. Poſtea ſuſpectus à Valentiniano & Valente comprehendi eſt juſſus ſed milites miſſos fruſtratus in Euxinum portum aufugit, &c.

Zoſimus lib. 4.

20. Winter being over, Valens haſted for Syria, to make head againſt the Perſian King, who was tampering to get Armenia into his Hands; and being come into Bithynia, received Intelligence how a certain Nation of the Goths, as yet untouched, had deſigned to invade Thrace. However he reſolved to keep on his Journey, but ordered a ſtrong party both of Horſe and Foot, to defend the places where the Incurſions of the Barbarians was moſt feared; and upon this occaſion, as is moſt probably conjectured, he directed his Edict concerning the bringing of the Sons of the Veterani into the Field, to Petronius his Father in Law, who ſeems in his abſence to have been left in Thrace, and the parts near Conſtantinople. The Emperour being thus removed to a great diſtance, Procopius tired out with his private neceſſities; and reſolving that a death how grievous ſoever, was to be preferred before ſo miſerable a life, caſt the Die of his Fortunes very raſhly, and entred upon a moſt bold and adventurous Enterprize: Having acquaintance with ſome of thoſe Souldiers that were to march for Thrace, by great promiſes he laboured to draw

Courts ſome Souldiers.

draw them over to his Deſign, and with them that whole Army. Diſtracted with various thoughts of Hope and Fear, he met them at a place about Conſtantinople, called the Baths of Anaſtaſia, from a ſiſter of Conſtantine, where by thoſe mercinary Souldiers, he was received with promiſe of ſafety, and a ſhow of Honour, though indeed, but in the nature of a Priſoner, or in ſuch manner as the Prætorian Bands, having ſet the Empire to Sale, received Julian after the death of Pertinax. There ſtood he amongſt them like a Ghoſt, or one newly riſen out of the Grave, without the Habit of a Souldier, but cloathed like a Courtier, with a Coat imbroidered, and from the groin downwards, being after the faſhion of a Page, yet with a Pike in his right Hand, and a Purple Coat thrown upon his left Arm; he appeared indeed like ſome Player upon the Stage. In this ridiculous manner having fawningly implored their aſſiſtance, and promiſed them great matters, he was carried by the Souldiers who incompaſſed him, and ſhewed publickly in the City; though in their paſſage through the Streets, in great fear they were to be knocked on the head with ſtones, or tyles caſt down upon them from the houſes.

21. Yet the people made no oppoſition, nor yet ſhewed him any countenance, though deſirous of change; eſpecially by reaſon of Petronius. Having aſcended the Tribunal, a ſtrange amazement ſeized on all men, which was accompanied with what is uſual, a deep ſilence: Hereat he was ſtrangely diſmayed, and imagining that now the means for bringing him to a ſpeedy end, for which he had often wiſhed, rather than the continuance in his former condition, was at hand, he was ſeized with a trembling in all his limbs, and therewith ſtruck dumb for a long time. At length he ſo far recovered his ſpirits as to ſpeak ſomething with an interrupted and faint voice, concerning his Deſcent from the Imperial Family of Conſtantine, and this was followed by the applauſe of a few perſons hired before hand, and then by the Acclamations of the ordinary ſort in a tumultuous manner, giving him the Title of Emperour. Thus cheared, in an hudling manner, they haſted with him to the Palace, accompanied with none but thoſe of baſe condition. Afterward many came to him, either perſwaded, or on their own accords, and others, not hearing this ſtrange and ſodain alteration, ſlipped away and haſted to the Emperour, amongſt whom he that uſed moſt ſpeed was Sophronius, at preſent a Notary, but afterwards Præfect of Conſtantinople; who overtook Valens, at Cæſarea in Cappadocia, as he was ready to march through Cilicia, for Antioch. The knowledge of matters how they ſtood at Conſtantinople diverted the thoughts of Valens, and he reſolved to return by the way of Galatia, and by a ſpeedy retreat to cruſh the Rebellion as it were in the egg. While he haſted back by great Journeys, Procopius procured ſome Perſons impudently to affirm, that they came out of Gall, and that Valentinian was dead in that Province, where all men would willingly ſubmit to the new Prince. And that ſo audacious a deſign, might not want anſwerable proſecution, Nebridius, who through the Faction of Petronius, had been made Præfectus Prætorio, in the room of Salluſt, and Cæſarius the Præfect of Conſtantinople, were both caſt into Priſon. The Government of the City was committed to Phronemius, and Euphraſius was made Magiſter Officiorum, two Learned Galls; and matters belonging to the Camp, were intruſted with Gomoarius and Agilo, recalled to the Military Girdle, indiſcreetly as the Event ſhewed. And, becauſe Julius a Comes who Commanded the Forces now in Thrace, was feared, leſt he ſhould come ſodainly upon the Rebels, Nebridius was forced to write to him in Valens his name, to haſten to Conſtantinople, where he was alſo ſecured. All things thus ſeeming to favour them, Araxius was by procurement of Agilo his Son in Law, made Præfectus Prætorio; and on many others, Offices and Imployments at Court were conferred. For ſo did Ambition and Covetouſneſs ſway, that though this to wiſe men could appear little more than Pageantry, and ſome were conſtrained to accept of theſe fine things, yet others made friends and that by money, to come at them.

Upon the Emperours Abſence Uſurpes.

Upon News thereof Valens returns Weſtward.

In the mean time Procopius diſpoſeth of Places.

And his Affairs ſeem to be in a good poſture.

22. Procopius his Eſtate now ſeemed reaſonably well ſettled, and for the preſerving of it in this poſture, a ſufficient Army was to be raiſed, which was eaſily enough done, thoſe Troops which were to march for Thrace, being by great promiſes allured to ſwear Allegiance to him, and that with bitter Execrations; who had alſo the advantage of ſhewing them the little Daughter of Conſtantius, which he carried in his lap, and thereby his nearneſs in Blood both to him, and Julian. And it made a greater Impreſſion that Fauſtina the Childs Mother had that day upon ſome other occaſion put on the Habit of Empreſs. Now were certain Perſons ſent to draw Illyricum to his party, but armed, beſides blindneſs and madneſs, with no other materials, than Medals ſtamped with this new Emperours Image, and other

ſimple allurements, whom Equitius that Commanded in thoſe parts ſeized, and put to death with much torture; but fearing he might himſelf be ſo treated, he Fortified the Paſſages toward the North, viz. that of Dacia Ripenſis, the moſt Famous one of Succi, and the other in Macedonia, known in Greek by the Name of Acontiſma. By this means was the Uſurper hindred of his Deſign upon Illyricum, and thereby miſſed of a notable Advantage; while in the mean time Valens travelling through Galatia, upon notice how far matters were gone at Conſtantinople; was ſtruck with ſuch conſternation, that he thought of caſting off the Purple, and had certainly done it, if thoſe about him had not plyed him with powerful motives to the contrary; by the advice of whom, he ſent before the Jovii and Victores to break into the Camp of the Rebels. While they were on their way, Procopius, lately returned from Nice, in five days ſpace having gathered together thoſe called the Divitenſes, and a promiſcuous number of ſuch as had forſaken their Standards, went as far as Mygdus, a Town of Phrygia, ſcituate on the River Sangarius. There the Legions met, and being ready to join, when now the Arrows flew very thick, he boldly ſteped forth alone, as to provoke ſome enemy to fight, but eſpying one Vitalianus, whom its uncertain whether or no he knew, he gently ſaluted him in Latin, kiſſed his hand, and gave it him; and when all wondred what he was about, he mildly upbraided him and his fellow Souldiers, for taking the part of a miſerable Pannonian, who robbed and ſpoiled all men, and ſo far he inſinuated himſelf, that though they were come thither animated with Anger and Reſolution to fight, they were by his ſpeech and behaviour mollified, nay, quite changed, and vailing their Enſigns to him, which was the uſual ſign of Defection, paſſed over to his Party. Inſtead of the warlike ſhout to Battel, which the Barbarians termed Barritus, they ſaluted him Emperour with loud voices, and lucky acclamations, and with univerſal Conſent accompanied him to his Pavilion, affirming, after the manner of Soldiers in ſuch caſes, that Procopius was invincible.

23. This Acceſſion ſo ſeaſonably made to the ſtrength of Procopius, one Rumitalca a Tribune, who, after his coming over, had received the charge of the Palace, upon mature advice, haſted with ſome Souldiers by Sea, to that City of old called Drepanum, at this time Helenopolis, and thence with all ſpeed, went and ſeized upon Nice. To beſiege it Valens had ſent Vadomarius, who had exerciſed the Command of Dux, and was one of the Alleman Kings, while he himſelf went on to Nicomedia. Thence he paſſed, and with all his might laid ſiege to Chalcedon, from the Walls whereof, many railing ſpeeches were caſt againſt him, and amongſt the reſt they called him Sabaiarius or Beer-drinker, Sabaia being a ſort of ſmall Drink made in Illyricum, of Barley or Wheat, as at preſent our Beer or Ale, and in Pannonia, where in the Town Cibalis Valens was born. Being tired out by ſcarcity of Proviſions, and the pertinacious reſolution of the Defendants, he reſolved to diſcamp and be gone, when thoſe that lay in Nice, ſodainly making a Sally bore down all before them, and under Conduct of their ſtout Captain Rumitalca, deſigned to ſurprize Valens, which had been effected, but that he had notice of their coming in the very nick of time, and ſlipped away by the Lake of Sunona, and the every way winding River Gallus. By this means Bithynia came into the hands of Procopius, and Valens returning with all the ſpeed he could make, to Ancyra, there was revived by the welcome news of the coming of Lupicinus with conſiderable Forces out of the Eaſt; wherewith now entertaining new hopes, he ſent Arintheus an excellent Commander, againſt the Rebels. He being come as far as Dadaſtana, where Jovian died, found there to ſtop him one Hyperechius, formerly an Apparitor to the Caſtrenſis of the Palace, with whom as a deſpicable fellow, diſdaining to fight, he ſent to his men to lay hold on their Leader and bind him, which they preſently did. In the mean time one Venuſtus an Apparitor belonging to the Comes Largitionum, under Valens, having been formerly ſent to Nicomedia, to fetch gold to pay the Souldiers that ſerved in the Eaſt, upon what had lately hapned, betook himſelf ſpeedily to Cyzicus with what he had collected. There he met with Serenianus the Comes Domeſticorum, who being ſent to ſee to the Treaſure there, defended the City with a tumultuous ſort of men; and this City, that to Bithynia he might joyn the Helleſpont, Procopius had reſolved to attaeque.

Valens lays Siege to Nicomedia.

In danger of being Surprized.

Mira de Arinthæo tradit Baſilius M. in Epiſt. c.186.) qui illius viduam de morte viri Conſolatur. vide Vales. in locum.

24. The accompliſhment of his Deſign was deferred, by reaſon that the Defendants had Chained up the Haven, and thereby barred all beaked Ships of acceſs, and beſides highly plied their buſineſs from the Walls. After that the Iuduſtry of all the Captains in Council, and of the Souldiers in fight, was rendred uſeleſs, one Aliſo a Tribune, a cunning Warrior, found means to cut the Chain, which done, the place was eaſily taken, and Procopius coming thither, pardoned all he found therein,

Sect.3.

A.D. 366.

therein, except Serenianus, whom he ſent Priſoner to Nice, with order that he ſhould be carefully look'd to. Now did he beſtow on Hormiſda, the Son of that Hormiſda of the Royal Bloud, who came out of Perſia to Conſtantius, the Dignity of Proconſul, with Power both in Civil matters, and thoſe relating to War; as in old time was the Cuſtom. He had demeaned himſelf with great Moderation and Humanity hitherto, and being ſought for by a Party which Valens had ſent through By-ways into Phrygia to entrap him, he eſcaped through his ſingular diligence, and reſcued his Wife that followed him, when near being taken; a Lady rich and noble, by whoſe Modeſty and Reſolution he afterward eſcaped imminent dangers. But Procopius now puffed up with his ſucceſs, and not conſidering the Viciſſitude of Human Affairs, commanded the Houſe of Arbetio to be rifled, (which as belonging to his Friend he had formerly ſpared) out of indignation, that being ſeveral times ſent for he had deferred his coming, pretending the Incommodities of Sickneſs and Old Age. He could not but apprehend, that from this act great Inconveniences would ariſe, yet imagining that at his pleaſure he could paſs into the Eaſtern Provinces, he neglected his Affairs, and grew remiſs. Onely he attempted to draw the Cities of Aſia to his Party, and gave greateſt heed to ſuch as could beſt adviſe him how to ſcrape up Money, for the better ſuſtaining of that great Shock which muſt neceſſarily come upon him. Theſe things thus fell out toward the middle of Winter, in the ſame year that the two Emperours bore the firſt time the Title of Conſuls.

Procopius grows Tyrannical.

Gratian and Dagalaiphus Conſuls.

A.D. 366. Gratiano Nb.P. & Dagalaipho Coſs.

25. The following year, which was known by the Conſulſhip of Gratian the Son of Valentinian and of Dagalaiphus, when Spring was well advanced, Valens having joyned Lupicinus, with a ſtrong Army marched to Peſſinus, a Town formerly belonging to Phrygia, but now to Galatia, which having reinforced ſo as to withſtand the Impreſſion of any ſudden Accident, by the foot of the high Mountain Olympus he proceeded into Lycia, with purpoſe to fall upon Goamarius, who was ſupine and careleſs in the Management of his buſineſs. But it much incommoded his Affairs, that the little Daughter of Conſtantius with Fauſtina her Mother, was by Procopius his order carried up and down, and ſhewed to the Souldiers, whom he enraged by the ſight, and provoked to fight for that tender Branch of that Imperial Stock, to which he himſelf was related; As the Macedonians (it's ſaid) being to fight with the Illyrians, placed their Infant King in his Cradle, even in the Field before their faces. Therefore to obviate this miſchief he ſtudied all manner of ways, and drew off from Procopius his lately diſobliged Friend Arbetio, that by the intereſt and favour of one of Conſtantius his Captains, the Minds of the Souldiers might be mollified. Neither did he fail of Succeſs; for Arbetio being reverenced for his high place and venerable Age, quite turned their Hearts. He told them Procopius was no better than an High-way man; called them his Sons, and Partakers in his former Labours, though now miſled by the Tricks of this deſperate and obſcure Fellow, whom he adviſed them to quit, as one who muſt at length neceſſarily be ruined and forſaken by all men. And this had ſuch Influence upon Goamarius, that though he might eaſily have eſcaped, he went over to the Emperour, who quickned by this ſucceſs haſted into Phrygia, and there near to Nacolia preſented Battel to the Rebels. Now did Agilo, moved by the danger wherein he ſtood, revolt alſo from Procopius, and moſt of his Men (for he was General) followed his example, carrying their Targets under their Arms, or upon their Heads, and their Banners or Standards not erect, but in a negligent poſture, which was the manifeſt ſign of Defection. Procopius amazed at ſo unexpected an accident, quitted his Horſe, and betook himſelf into the adjoyning Woods, and was followed by Florentius and Barchalbas a Tribune, whom Neceſſity and no good will had drawn to ſide with him. Having wandered the greateſt part of the night, when the Moon ſhone ſo bright that they feared they ſhould be diſcovered, they bound Procopius, and preſented him to the Emperour, who both commanded his Head to be ſtruck off, and them two alſo to be put to death, without any right conſideration in the Judgment of Ammianus. For, had they betrayed a lawful Prince, Juſtice it ſelf would have pronounced them duly puniſhed; but if a Rebel and Diſturber of the publick Peace, for ſo ſignal a Service they rather ought to have been highly rewarded. But ſuch was the end of Procopius and his Uſurpation, at the Age of forty years and ten moneths; a man not uncomely of Body, nor of mean ſtature, but who went always ſtooping, and look'd ever upon the Ground, by reaſon of his Melancholick Diſpoſition: Not unlike that Craſſus, whom Lucilius and Tully reported, but once in his whole life to have laughed. Yet was he not cruel, but abſtained from Bloud; a thing to be wondered at in the Hiſtorians Opinion; whereas indeed it is not known what he might have proved.

Valens draws off Arbetio whom Procopius had diſobliged, and thereby doth his buſineſs.

For by the perſuaſion of Arbetio the Army revolts from Procopius.

Who is delivered up and put to death, together with Deliverers.

25. So went matters in Phrygia Salutaris, the Report whereof coming to Marcellus the Protector, the Kinſman of Procopius, and Governour of Nice, he there in the dead time of the night cauſed Serenianus, who was kept cloſe priſoner in the Palace, to be ſlain: Which happened luckily for ſeveral perſons; for being a moroſe cruel man, and much favoured by Valens, both as his Countryman, and for the ſuitableneſs of his Diſpoſition, had he overlived the Defeat of Procopius his Party, in all probability he would have procured the Deſtruction of many, as well innocent as other perſons. This done, Marcellus ſeized ſpeedily on Chalcedon, and with the Countenance of a few, whom Poverty and Deſperation had driven, and now kept, in Rebellion, put on the Purple, being deceived in two particulars whereon he relied. He had heard, that a Power of Goths was coming to the aid of Procopius, and theſe he believed he might eaſily draw over to his own Aſſiſtance. And he was utterly a ſtranger to what paſſed in Illyricum, where Equitius perceiving that the whole ſhock of the War would be turned upon Aſia, for that he heard nothing of what had happened near Nocolia, reſolved if he could, to become Maſter of Philippopolis, as very commodious for Aſſiſtance of Valens; but a little after, when this preſumptuous act of Marcellus was heard of, a Party of ſtout Souldiers was ſent, who ſurprized and committed him like a Slave to Chains and Priſon, whence he was brought out the next day and tortured to death, together with his Complices, having onely one good thing performed, if we believe Ammianus, that he made away Serenianus, than whom (in his Opinion) Phalaris himſelf was not more cruel. However, there followed a ſevere Inquiſition after Offenders, and a moſt horrible Slaughter, as well of innocent as guilty perſons; Valens his Ears being open to all Complaints and Informations, though never ſo unjuſt or ill grounded, and made by thoſe who having had ſome relation to the Court, were merely induced to this practice by a vehement Thirſt after the Wealth of their Neighbours. Many were baniſhed to Iſlands, and many were turned on begging, no Moderation being had, till the Emperour had glutted himſelf with Bloud, and both his Coffers and thoſe of his Followers were filled by Confiſcations and Rapines.

Marcellus his Kinſman ſeizes Chalcedon, and puts on the Purple.

Is taken and tortured to death.

Valens very ſevere in puniſhing this Rebellion.

Tnemiſtius & Libanius humanitatem ejus in hac re contrà prædicant. Valeſ.

26. So were the Remainders of this Civil Tempeſt diſſipated in the Eaſtern parts of the Empire; and all thoſe Concuſſions ceaſed, which were accompanied if not ſignified by ſtrange preternatural Motions of both Land and Sea. For while Procopius his Rebellion was yet but little advanced, on the one and twentieth of July, in the Conſulſhip of the two Emperours, there happened ſuch horrible Earthquakes throughout the World, as neither true Hiſtorians have related, nor ever Fables themſelves repreſented to us. A little after the day dawned, there was a great Tempeſt of Thunder and Lightning, which was followed by ſo dreadful a Trembling of the Earth, that the Sea alſo, ſhaken therewith, deſerted the Shore and its ancient bounds for a great ſpace, and the depths of its Chanel were diſcovered; multitudes of Fiſh were ſeen to ſtick in the Mud, and the unequalneſs of its bottom appeared, here Hills and there Valleys, which never had before ſeen the Sun, ſince at the original of all things they were firſt overwhelmed with the Flouds. Many Ships were left on the dry ground, and ſwarms of people flew thither to catch Fiſh; when ſuddenly the Sea, as diſdaining to be impriſoned, returned to its former place with ſuch fury, that not containing it ſelf therein, but tranſported beyond its bounds, by the violence of its Rage and Motion; it overturned Houſes and other Buildings innumerable, drowned many thouſands of Men, and overwhelmed numbers of Ships; great Veſſels were by the violence of theſe Guſts blown upon the tops of Houſes, as it happened at Alexandria; and ſome near two miles from the Shore, as Ammianus (who relates theſe things) ſaw one himſelf near Methone a Town of Laconia. This Prodigy we cannot take to have ſignified any thing relating to Procopius his Rebellion, ſo much as that dreadful Inundation made into the Roman Empire by the Northern Nations, which ſhortly after happened, and the Ruine of the Weſtern Provinces, which followed thereupon.

Such Earthquakes as never were heard of in any Age.

Ammian. ad calcem l. 26. Socrat. l. 4. c. 3. Hieron. in Chr.

27. In ſuch eſtate we muſt leave matters in the Eaſtern Parts, while we inquire how Valentinian managed his Affairs in the Weſt. He had forbidden the uſe of Horſes in the Provinces about Rome, as was lately ſaid, for prevention of Robberies ſo much practiſed in theſe Countreys; but the Prohibition being ſo general, that Publick Buſineſs was thereby much obſtructed, as he had diſpenſed before with Senators, the Honorati, Governours of Provinces, and the Veterane Souldiers as to this matter, as alſo with thoſe called Suarii; ſo now with the Palatine Officers, through the Province of Picenum, by an Edict directed to one " Valentine the Conſularis of this Province, which is to be underſtood of that called " Picenum Aunonarium, and not of the Suburbicarian Picenum, which at this time had

L. L. 2, 3, 4. Quibus equorum uſus conceſſus eſt, &c. Cod. Th. l. 9. tit. 30.

Sect.3.

A.D. 366.

had not its peculiar Governour; all the Suburbicarian Provinces having now one Conſularis ſet over them. At this time great Complaints there were in Africk, concerning the Inequality of Taxes laid upon Lands. It was the Cuſtome that the Emperours ſent into the Provinces certain Officers called Inſpectors, to view and conſider what barren grounds there were, what were fit to be exempted from Payment; and accordingly the Owners of them were wont to be relieved. But hereupon an Inconveniency was diſcovered to ariſe to the Publick Revenue, for ſeveral rich men that poſſeſſed other fertile grounds, were obſerved to take the advantage and get off; which Valentinian judging not at all requiſite from any Rules of Charity, forbad it ſhould be practiſed for the future, commanding “ that ſuch as poſſeſſed both good and bad, ſhould pay for them all together, “ the fertile making Compenſation for the barren. And whereas there were further heavy Complaints in this Province of Africk, that the Subject was burthened by an unequal charge of Carriages, for the conveyance of the Proviſions belonging to the Army, (in which ſort thoſe of Britain, were in former time much haraſſed, as appears by Tacitus, and other Provincials in other places much agrieved) which Diſorder proceeded from the Knavery of the Tabularii, or the Officers that managed the Conveyance; this Emperour by another Edict Commands, that by Tortures they be deterred from all ſuch Practices for the time to come, and that the burthen of Conveyance be impoſed on ſuch as lay neareſt to the Manſions, or limits where the Army lay, and not on thoſe at great diſtances. The occaſion of this Law ſeems to have proceeded from what Ammianus Writes of the Auſtoriani, and other Mooriſh Nations, their more than ordinary infeſting the Limit of Africk in theſe days.

*L.L.*10,11.de Annona & Tributis. Cod.Th. lib. 11.*Tit.*10.

He brings up the Defenders of the Cities or People.

28. Theſe were Inſtances of Valentinian his care for the Eaſe of the Provinces, as to theſe particular Caſes; but he provided for their Emolument in a more general way. For about this time it was, that thoſe Officers were created by him, whom they called Defenſores Civitatum, now being made the firſt mention of them in the Laws. They were Perſons Choſen by the general Conſent of Cities, and Townſmen; of approved wiſdom and fidelity, out of the Municipes, Pleibeians, or thoſe they called Honorati, and their work was to defend the Places, as their Name imported; in which reſpect, they were further termed, Locorum Defenſores, Defenſores Diſciplinæ, Parentes Plebis, and Defenſores Plebis, reſembling in ſome meaſure the old Tribuni Plebis of the City of Rome. “The poor they preſerved and reſcued “ from the Violence of the rich Merchants, from the Inſolence of the Governours “ of Provinces, as alſo from Inferiour Officers belonging to the Ports, and Cuſtomes; “ all other Perſons that were to Pay Taxes, from the capacity of Collectors; and in “ Concluſion, from the Inſolence of Thieves, Murderers, Adulterers, and other Criminals. “ To this end, the People had recourſe to them, and they had power to make full Inquiſition “ into ſuch Offences. Yet could they neither puniſh by Fine, or Impriſonment; but “ ſent away the Offenders with their Examinations, and their Caſes ſtated, to the Ordinary “ Judges, or to the Prince himſelf. To their care alſo it appertained that “ the Curiæ of Corporations, or other Bodies in Companies, ſhould be conſtantly “ ſupplied; that none ſhould make uſe of the Curſus Publicus, without Licence duly “ obtained. Inventaries of the Eſtates of Pupils, or thoſe under Age, were “ made before them, and Actions might be entred, for they had power of ſearching “ Records, if the Governour of the Province was abſent. But by an Edict “ now directed to one Seneca, by this Title of Defenſor, he is forbidden to intermeddle “ in any Cauſes, exceeding the ſumm of fifty Solidi. They continued in “ their Office for the ſpace of five years, and Majorianus Ordained, that for their Confirmation therein, the Emperours Conſent ſhould be neceſſary.

*L.*1.*de Defenſorib. civitatum Cod. Juſtin. lib.*1.*Tit.*55. & Cod.Th. lib. 8.*Tit.*15.*L.*4. *Vide Paratitlon. de Defenſoribus Civitatum. Cod. Th. lib.*1.Tit. 11.

29. But this is chiefly remarkable, as to thoſe Officers, thus newly made, that Valentinian gives it in ſpecial Charge to this Seneca, lately mentioned, that he “ ſhould take notice of, and carefully obey that Law, whereby was Commanded, “ that thoſe that bore any publick Office, ſhould buy nothing in the place ſubject “ to their Juriſdiction, during the time of their Power. For ſuch indeed was the “ Law of the Empire, that they ſhould not only not buy, but neither receive or accept by way of gift, any thing during their Adminiſtration; leſt they ſhould make uſe of their Power, to wrong or oppreſs any of thoſe that were ſubject to their Authority. And by reaſon of frequent miſcarriages in this kind, doubtleſs this ſeverity was firſt introduced, which ſometime extended ſo far, that it reached to places even beyond the Juriſdiction of thoſe Imployed, whither the awe of their Power might reach, though the proper effects thereof could not; but this as extravagant was afterward Contracted, and the Prohibition as to Vim illius legis aſpicito eiq; parito qua proinde Conſticutum eſt ut publicum Munus agitantes nihil in ſuſcepto mercarentur Officio. Dat. v. Kal. Jul. Vide Paratitlon de iis quæ adminiſtrantib. &c. Cod. Th. lib. 8. Tit. 15.

Sect.3.

Obviates abuſes Committed by the Governours of Provinces.

Place, was confined within the Diſtrict of the Magiſtrate; who within thoſe his own Bounds, could not make any Bargains or Purchaſe; though he was Native of a place remote, and whether he did it publickly, or privately. He might only purchaſe what had belonged to his Father, leſt his Family ſhould be wronged; but in any other Circumſtances if he was found trucking, all his Contracts were abſolutely Null, and the thing ſo bought or given, returned to the Seller, or Giver, from him that poſſeſſed it, whoſoever he was, if within five years, after the Magiſtrate returned to a private life, he challenged it: Otherwiſe it was Confiſcate, and in both Caſes the Purchaſer loſt his money, or the Price, in whatſoever it conſiſted. “This by another Conſtitution of this ſame Year, Valentinian inforces,“ and will have none of what Dignity ſoever excepted, whether they were“ Illuſtrious, of the Rank of Spectabilis, or Clariſſimi: and he enumerates thirteen“ ſeveral ſorts of Inferior Officers, aſſiſtant or ſubſervient to the Magiſtrates. By“ an other Conſtitution of this ſame year, he forbids all the Magiſtrates or Judges“ to receive any Petitions or Letters concerning any Buſineſs, when they are retired“ at Home, but only in Court, and that they Commit none to Priſon, till the Accuſer“ of the Party had Entred into the Record, or Book, kept for this purpoſe, his“ Accuſation relating to the nature and manner of the Crime Committed.

L.5. de iis quæ adminiſtr. vide Goth. in L.

L.3. de Officio Rectoris Provinciæ Cod. Th. lib.1. Tit.7.

L.4. de Cuſtodia R orum Cod. Th. lib.9. Tit.3.

And variouſly provides for the Convenience of Rome.

30. By various other Laws he ſtill provided for the conveniences of the City of Rome, both in relation to its Buildings, and ſupplying of it with Proviſions,“ which he would have imported in kind, and no mony taken in lieu of them, as“ had been practiſed by the Officers, who had the care of them, to ſee them“ brought in and laid up. That there might be nothing omitted, which would conduce to plenty; for the regulating of Bakers, and ſetling their Concerns, he provided in ſeveral Edicts; and not only took order in their matters, but went as far as to Ordain what was requiſite for the carriage of Corn, or other Neceſſaries, from one place to another, wherein yet he ſtill ſerved another Publick End. There were a ſort of men called Catabolenſes, we may term them Loaders or Carriers, whoſe imployment it was to load the Corn Landed at the Haven, upon Carriage-Beaſts, and ſo to convey it to the Publick Granaries, or thence to the Bake-Houſes, as there was occaſion. “For ſupply of their“ Number, he Ordains, that Libertini (or ſuch as had been ſlaves, but had obtained“ their Freedom) ſhould be forced to this Imployment, in caſe they were“ worth thirty pounds of ſilver, or had received Eſtates from their Maſters, either“ by their Teſtments, or by way of gift in their life time; provided it was nothing“ belonging to the Body or Company of the Bakers; for then they ſhould“ be forced to the Services, and burthens of that ſort of men, who being alſo no“ better than Publick Servants, this very year, he utterly forbad any one of them“ ever to be freed from that Service, or permitted to paſs from one Bake-Houſe“ to another. But it muſt be known, that in this Age whereof we Write, it's found that Princes bore ſome ſpleen to the Libertini, or thoſe that had been Slaves, as we may have further occaſion to diſcover, chiefly becauſe they abounded with Wealth, through the bounty of their Maſters, who were inclined to an extraordinary kindneſs, nay, profuſeneſs to them. To put ſome ſtop to this humour, Valentinian ſubjected them to this almoſt another kind of Slavery; although if they had received any Lands from their Lords, that were Senators, they ſhould notwithſtanding, be Subject to the uſual Payments relating to Senatorian Lands. This Edict bears date on the ſeventh of July, and is ſaid to have been read in November following, in the Pantheon at Rome. The Pantheon was that Famous Temple built by Agrippa, which being burnt, was ſoon after repaired, and dedicated to all the Gods; but afterwards, by permiſſion of Phocas, and procurement of Boniface the Fourth, Biſhop of Rome, was turned into the Church of our Lady, and all Saints. This Law ſeems to have been publiſhed in it; not only becauſe of the confluence of Pagans to it in thoſe days, of which perſwaſion moſt of thoſe Publick Bakers, and Catabolenſes might be, but for that it was near to their Work-Houſes, and Stables, being in the Ninth Region of the City.

L.1. Tributa in ipſis ſpeciebus.

Vide L.L. 8, 9, 10. de Piſtoribus & Catabolenſibus. Cod. Th. lib.14. Tit.3. & Goth. in Comm. dicti ſunt Catabolenſes à καταβάλλειν quod eſt onerare atq; hinc forſan Caballum à καβάλλειν, pro καταβάλλειν Doribus.

Dat. Non. Jul. Lecta in Pantheo Non. Nov.

31. Having diſcovered great Frauds to be often committed by thoſe that managed the Publick Revenue; and chiefly how they were wont to let out the money to Intereſt; or make other Bargains, to their own advantage, and his loſs; and chiefly in the Dioceſs of Africk; by an Edict, directed to Dracontius the Vicar thereof, (which was received at Adrumetum, the uſual place where the Vicar reſided, on the ſeventeenth of November) he Condemns thoſe that make“ ſuch Contracts with theſe Officers, in a fine amounting to the four fold value“ of the ſumm. But as the Revenue was diminiſhed by ſuch Frauds, ſo was both it and the Eſtates of private Perſons very much abated, by reaſon of the ſcarcity city of Coyn, and eſpecially of the Golden, which cauſed him ſome years after to raiſe the value of it ſomething higher than it had been in the Reign of Conſtantine. At preſent he conſidered how he might increaſe the Metal, which if it could be done, there would be no need that the other courſe ſhould be taken; and this was by giving encouragement to ſuch as had an inclination to fetch it out of the Bowels of the Earth. It was the Cuſtom generally allowed, as at this day, That Mines of Silver and Gold appertained to the Sovereign Authority; and as to the Commonwealth or Empire of Rome, the Mines belonging to it were wont to be digged and wrought by ſuch as were condemned to that Drudgery, who being maintained no otherwiſe than as Slaves at the publick charge, all the Profits accrued to the Treaſury: Particularly at Carthage, in Mines of Silver were imployed in old time no fewer than four thouſand men, the effect of whoſe Labours was a daily Product of twenty five thouſand Drachms. But ſuch was the Condition of this Age in reference to Coin, that Valentinian it ſeems found himſelf obliged to an extraordinary courſe of permitting private perſons to ſearch for Oar, under certain Limitations and Conditions. Being now come to Paris, whither (as we ſaid) he travelled out of Italy, by an Edict directed to Creſconius the Comes Metallorum, he took order herein, com“manding him to require by way of Tribute or Impoſition Eight Scruples from eve“ry ſuch Undertaker, but this in Oar * or Powder of Gold, not in what was through“ly melted and refined, whereof twelve Ounces || were to be eſteemed of equal va“lue to fourteen of the other. The reſt they ſhould take to themſelves, yet ſo as the“ Treaſury muſt have the Right of Preemption at a competent and indifferent rate.“ The Comes Metallorum, to whom this Law is directed, was a peculiar Officer under Valentinian. Of this Comes we have ſpoken heretofore from the Notitia of the Empire, which mentions ſuch an Officer in Illyricum, under the diſpoſition of the Comes Sacrarum Largitionum; but in the Weſt no ſuch Comes is mentioned, for the Comes Auri his Office was of another nature, relating to the Payment of Gold in what ſort ſoever made.

L.10. de Jure Fiſci. Cod. Th. lib.10. Tit.1.

He permits private perſons to ſearch for Oar upon terms.

L.3. de Metallis & Metallariis, Cod.Th. l. 10. tit. 19. Dat. 4 Id. Decemb. Pariſiis.

 Balluca dicitur. Vide Goth. Com.*

† L.4. eod. tit.

32. Valentinian being come to Paris about the beginning of November, and the later end of his Conſulſhip which he bore with his Brother, continued there the laſt two Moneths of the Year, and ſome part alſo of the following, till he was called further Northward by the Motions of the Barbarians upon the Borders. For while Procopius was driving on his Deſign in the Eaſtern Parts, the Allemans having recruited themſelves, and reſumed their former Courage, which had been ſo greatly abated, Ammianus tells you, by the Courage and Conduct of Julian, renewed their Incurſions into Gall, and cut off two Comites, Carietto and Severianus, who oppoſed their Motions. This Defeat being underſtood, Dagalaiphus was ſent from Paris to redeem the Credit of the Roman Arms; but he delayed his March, pretending that he alone was not of ſufficient ability to graple with ſo powerful an Enemy; and he being afterwards ſent for back to receive the Conſular Ornaments, with Gratian, Jovinus the Magiſter Equitum was fitly furniſhed and diſpatched away in his room; who marching with great warineſs and circumſpection, near a place called Scarponna, twelve miles from Mets, came ſuddenly upon a great number of Barbarians, and cut them off before ſuch time as they could arm themſelves. Having deſtroyed this, he went to ſeek another Party, which with the ſame caution having alſo ſurpriſed at the ſide of a River, while they were drinking, combing, and waſhing themſelves, he treated them in the ſame manner. There remained a third Body, which animated by his good fortune, he hoped to attacque with the ſame ſucceſs, but found them not in the ſame poſture, but prepared fully for an Engagement in the Catalaunian Plains. Here he was obliged to entrench himſelf, and in the morning drew out his Men in a larger compaſs than uſual, that he might not encourage the Enemy by a view of the ſmalneſs of his Numbers in compariſon of theirs; and though his Men were inferiour in Numbers, yet in Reſolution they far exceeded, all but Balchobaudes, a Tribune of the Armatura, a great Braggadocio, but (as uſually ſuch are) of ſmall performance; who (the Fight continuing till the evening) ran away, and endangered the Defeat of the whole Army. Yet by the Generals care and endeavour the Souldiers were not ſo diſcouraged, but that preſſing ſtill upon the Germans, at laſt they had the better, and killed ſix thouſand, with the loſs but of two hundred men, and as many wounded. The Night having put an end to the Diſpute, early in the morning Jovinus ſhewed himſelf in the Field; but the Barbarians, of whom four thouſand were wounded, would have no further to do with him, but ſhifted away. At his return from the Purſuit he found that their King, who had been taken Priſoner with a few others, was hanged by a Party of the Haſtarii or Aſcarii, whom he had ſent to plunder the Camp. Being enraged at ſo baſe an act, ſo impudently committed without order from their Superiours, he reſolved to ani-

Ammian. l.27.

Jovinus defeats the Allemans near Metz.

Sect. 2. A.D. 366.

animadvert upon the Tribune, and had condemned him, but that the Fact was evidently found to have been done by the violence and rage of the Souldiers. Then marched he back to Paris, on his way whither the Emperour met him to do him Honour, and afterward deſigned him Conſul; the Joy being increaſed by a ſight of Procopius his Head, which Valens ſent much about the ſame time to his Brother. This is the Account we have of the War againſt the Allemans, and the Battel fought by Jovinus againſt them, from Ammianus. Zoſimus (according to his cuſtom) tells us another ſort of Story: That the Emperour himſelf met the Enemy, and giving them Battel, the Romans were beaten and put to flight. That the Legion of the Batavians being found guilty of ſo much Cowardiſe, he condemned to be diſarmed and ſold for Slaves; but all the Army proſtrate before him beſought him, that he would not put ſo great a Diſgrace upon them, and promiſed him for the time to come they ſhould behave themſelves like Men, and as became Romans: To which he yielded, requiring them onely to make good their words by ſome evident act. Hereupon the Batavi reſumed their Arms, and engaging a ſecond time againſt the Germans, the Barbarians paid for their former ſucceſs at a very dear rate, an infinite Multitude being ſlain, and very few returning home with the News. Thus he, without any mention of Jovinus.

ὑπαντήσαντος δὲ αὐτοῖς τοῦ Βασιλέως, &c. Lib. 4.

33. But to return to our more certain Guide: Ammianus tells us further, That after this Battel ſeveral other Skirmiſhes happened in Gall, which he thinks it not worth the while to relate. And though what he adds next after this, he judges not to be of that nature, yet we can hardly put more value upon it. About this time a kind of Prodigy there was ſeen in that part of Tuſcia called Tuſcia Annonaria, (for thoſe Reaſons formerly alledged) where in a Town called Piſtoria, about nine of of the Clock, in the view of many Spectators, an Aſs mounted the Tribunal or Judgment-ſeat, and there brayed very loud and long, to the Aſtoniſhment both of thoſe who heard it, and heard of it. Great wonderment there was what it ſhould ſignifie; and at length the Riddle was unfolded, when one Terentius, a mean Man born in Rome, and a Baker, (Piſtor in Latine) as a Reward for having accuſed Orphitus (who had been Præfect) of Oppreſſion, was preferred to be Corrector of that Province; but bearing himſelf as ignorant perſons are wont, very arrogantly, and being found guilty in ſome matters belonging to the Company of the Navicularii, he ended his Life (as was reported) by the hands of the Hangman, at ſuch time as Claudius was Præfect of Rome. But this happened ſome years after, for during the late Motions that City was governed by Symmachus, who had ſucceeded Apronianus in that Command, a Perſon Eminent for Learning and Modeſty, by whoſe procurement it abounded with all Conveniences more than ever it had wont: Which Teſtimony of the Hiſtorian is largely confirmed by the many Laws concerning this ſubject. He alſo built them a moſt beautiful Bridge, with which the Multitude was very much pleaſed for the preſent, but ſhortly after made him too ſenſible of its fickleneſs and ingratitude; for upon a meer Rumour raiſed by an obſcure Fellow, without any witneſs or ground, that he ſhould ſay, He had rather caſt his Wine upon the Lime-kilns, than ſell it at the rate which they hoped for; they burnt a beautiful Houſe that he had beyond Tiber. After him to Lampadius, who had been Præfectus Prætorio, was committed the Government of the City; a man of that humour, that he would take it heinouſly if he was not commended for his graceful Spitting; as if he did that alſo with greater wiſdom than his Neighbours: but otherwhiles he was ſevere and well enough managed his matters. When he was Prætor, and made his Magnificent Shews according to the cuſtom, though he was free above the ordinary rate; yet not able to bear up againſt the Petulancy of the Rabble, which ſtill importuned him with its noiſe to beſtow more upon unworthy perſons, to manifeſt that he was Liberal, and yet a Deſpiſer of the Multitude, he ſent for ſome poor men out of the Vatican, and with great Gifts enriched them. But yet to ſhew his vain humour, one thing our Author ſaith will ſuffice, which though of ſmall reckoning in it ſelf, yet may be a Warning unto Governours: In all parts of the City, which had been adorned at the Expences of ſundry Emperours, he cauſed to be engraven his own Name, not as a Repairer but a Founder: With which Diſeaſe (though he might better do it) Trajan the Emperour alſo laboured. Lampadius too was much moleſted by the tumultuous Citizens, eſpecially at one time when the Rabble had certainly fired his Houſe adjoyning to the Bath of Conſtantine, had they not been beaten off by Stones and other things, caſt from the tops of Houſes by his Servants and Friends; and he himſelf was forc'd to run as far as the Bridge Milvius, before he could ſecure his Perſon. The cauſe of this Diſorder was, for that in raiſing his new Buildings, and repairing the old, he made not proviſion for the Expence in the ordinary way out of the Tributes or Revenues; but as there was need of Iron, Lead, Braſs, or any ſuch Materials, he ſent out his Apparitors, who took them away from the Owners without any price or recompence. His Succeſſor was Juventius, from Quæſtor of the Palace, a Pannonian by birth, a Perſon of Prudence and Integrity, who made it his buſineſs to render his Government peaceable, as well as acceptable for plenty of all things. But he was alſo plagued by the Seditious Humour of the People, and that by reaſon of a Contention of two perſons for the Biſhoprick, which we ſhall abundantly hear of in its more proper place.

Several Præfects of Rome, and their Actions.

Valens invades the Territories of the Goths to no purpoſe.

34. While matters proceeded thus diſorderly in Gall and Italy, Thrace enjoyed as little quiet. Valens thought he had juſt cauſe to make War againſt the Goths, for having aſſiſted Procopius in his Uſurpation, and he had the conſent of his Brother therein, according to whoſe pleaſure and direction he ordered his Affairs. But firſt was ſent to them Victor the Magiſter Equitum, to know the reaſon why they, being a Nation at peace and in League with the Romans, would joyn with a Rebel, who had raiſed War againſt his Lawful Sovereign. In anſwer to his Demands they produced the Letters of Procopius, wherein he affirmed that the Empire belonged to him as the Kinſman of Conſtantius; and thence they argued, that it was but an Error they had committed, and ſuch as was very capable of Excuſe. But Valens judged it quite contrary, and declaring their Anſwer to be frivolous, when Spring was well advanced marched againſt them, and having rendezvous'd his Forces near a Fort called Daphne, paſſed them over the River Iſter by Bridges, as Darius formerly had done, beyond which (as that Perſian King of old time) he could find no Enemy to engage, for out of fear they all fled to the Mountains of the Serri, which could not be paſſed but by ſuch as were ſkilful in the ways. That he might not yet return without having ſomething performed, nor be ſaid to have miſ-ſpent a whole Somer, he ſent Arintheus, the Magiſter Equitum, to ſurprize certain Families wandering in the Plain, which had not reached their Companions, and ſo he returned, having neither done nor received any great harm. The year following he made Preparations for another Invaſion with the ſame alacrity, but was ſtopped in his Career by the immoderate overflowing of the Danow, and conſtrained to ſtay near a Village called Carporus till Autum was already paſt, whence he retreated, and took up his Winter Quarters at Marcianopolis, as he had done the year before, being not able to enterprize any thing by reaſon of the greatneſs of the Inundation.

He orders Money to be paid in the room of furniſhing Horſes for the War.

Colonis obnoxiis & adſcriptis terræ.

Stratores.

L. 1. de Equorum collatione, Cod.Th. l.11. tit.16.

L.2. de Tironibus, Cod. Th. lib. 7. Tit. 13.

L. 2. de Militari Veſte, Cod. Th.l.7.tit.6.

35. That both theſe years he reſided ſome time at Marcianopolis, a City of Myſia inferior, and belonging to the Dioceſe of Thrace, is evident by the Subſcriptions of ſeveral Laws, and of thoſe ſome relating to Martial matters. Amongſt other Burthens impoſed on the Subjects of the Empire, as we have already hinted, was that of finding Horſes for the Wars or other publick ſervice; ſometimes on one ſort of People, otherwhiles on another, but eſpecially on ſuch who as Villains were bound and appropriate to certain Lands. Ordinarily they had been wont to diſcharge this Duty in kind, and furniſh Horſes as there was occaſion; but now did Valens think fit to require Money in the room of them, either for that he found much fraud to be practiſed the other way, they often proving lame and unſound when to be uſed, (to prevent which Abuſe yet there were ſeveral Officers wont to be imployed;) or rather becauſe under this pretence of Publick Service the Husbandmen were overburthened and diſfurniſhed, to the great hinderance and decay of Tillage. Therefore that he might be ſufficiently provided for this preſent War to the beſt eaſe of the People; he now by an Edict required, that three and twenty Solidi ſhould be paid for every “ Horſe; which Rate (however to him it ſeemed reaſonable) was by following Prin- “ ces thought Exceſſive, and brought down; who had in this ſubject great occaſion to exerciſe their Indulgence, the poor Provincials being often much harraſed by this Payment. But, as Valens thought fit there ſhould be made an Exchange of Horſes for Money, ſo by another Edict made the following year in this very place, and in relation to this very War, we find that there was the ſame courſe taken ſometimes for Men or Souldiers. For hereby he declares his own Eſtate or Poſſeſſions to be free from “ finding of Tirones or new Souldiers, if Men themſelves were to be provided; but “ otherwiſe chargeable, if Gold or Money in the room of them. For the Cuſtom herein varied, not onely according to the variety of Times, but of Places alſo, ſome Countries and Provinces exceeding others in the ſtrength and agility of their Inhabitants; the reaſon why the Thracians were eſpecially made choice of for the Wars, and other Nations low of ſtature, and of ſlender Limbs, uſually rejected, and Money taken in their place. But further, while Valens lay in Quarters at Marcianople, to provide for his Souldiers againſt the Winter in that cold Climate, by another Edict directed to Auxonius the Præfect, he cauſed a ſufficient Supply of Clothes to be brought in betwixt the beginning of September, (whence at this time Indictions commenced) and that of April, being indeed as other Writers obſerve) exactly careful to ſupply his Armies with all Neceſſaries.

36. Three years he ſpent in this War againſt the Goths, and in the third Somer re-invaded their Countrey, by a Bridge of Boats laid over the River at Novidunum. He fell upon the Gruthungi, a moſt Warlike Nation, the chief Magiſtrate of whom, Athanarich by Name, a very powerful man in that Tract, oppoſed him with ſuch Force as he could make; but the Emperour forced him to ſeek for ſafety by flight; and having nothing of greater moment performed, retreated to his wonted ſtation of Marcianople, the moſt convenient place to winter in, in all theſe parts. The ſeaſon for Arms being over, the time proper to Conſultation ſucceeded, and ſome Accidents there were which gave both ſides occaſion to think of Peace. By reaſon of the Prince his Abſence the Eaſt was expoſed to great danger; and the Barbarians were much diſtreſſed by the diſcontinuance of Commerce for ſo long a time, which conſtrained them to ſend Embaſſadours, and beg a Ceſſation in a ſubmiſſive manner. The Emperour as yet bearing an affection to Juſtice, and the Conveniences of his People, ſent away Victor and Arintheus, who agreed on the Place and Preliminaries of a Treaty. Athanarich affirmed, That his Father had made him ſwear never to tread on Roman Ground, and it was no whit becoming the Majeſty of the Emperour to go to him, and therefore they met in Boats in the middle of the River, where a Peace was ratified, and Hoſtages delivered on both ſides. This done Valens returned to Conſtantinople, where Athanarich afterwards alſo died, being baniſhed his Country by the oppoſite and moſt prevalent Faction, and was very ſumptuouſly buried after the Roman manner.

A Peace made betwixt him and the Gruthungi.

49. While Valens was thus imbroiled with Wars in Thrace, Valentinian and the Allemans ſeem to have better underſtood one another, though this their Friendſhip not long continued. The year following after the Defeat given them by Jovinus, we find a Conſtitution directed to the ſame perſon, by name, as Magiſter Militum, whom therein he charges to take order with the Duces and Comites, and ſuch as “ to whom the Cuſtody of the Rhine was committed, that they ſhould not permit “ the Souldiers upon the Borders to furniſh thoſe of the Bloud Royal of thoſe Nations, “ nor their Embaſſadours, with Horſes. But he enjoyns that they make uſe of “ their own, till they came to the place where the Curſus publicus begins, of which “ they are allowed to make uſe as well as the Meſſengers of the Provinces; and till “ they there arrived ſufficient Proviſion ſhould be made for rheir Cattel at the ſeveral “ Manſions. This Law bearing date from Rheims a City of Belgica ſecunda, where Valentinian then lay; to whom thoſe Nations having ſuch recourſe, it argues, that for the preſent there was Peace betwixt them. But as the Law doth inſinuate this, ſo on the other ſide, that it ſtood on ſuch terms as obliged him to be watchful, and not to truſt to his new Allies. For this Prohibition concerning the Horſes of Souldiers was founded upon this Reaſon; Leſt by lending or letting them out they ſhould be themſelves disfurniſhed, end thereby the Limits expoſed unto danger. For by reaſon of the Allemans and Francks, their conſtantly feared Incurſions, there were, as is evident both from this Law and Hiſtories, both Duces and Comites placed on the Borders of Gall, who lived after the manner we have formerly deſcribed; and beſides them ſuch as to whom the Cuſtody of the Rhine was committed, viz. particular Præfects or Governours of the ſeveral Prætenturæ or Garriſons upon or near the River. But how little truſt the Emperour gave to the Friendſhip of theſe Nations, further appears by another Edict within leſs than one Moneth, directed to the ſame perſon, and dated at the ſame City of Rheims; where in thoſe days the Magiſtri Militum of Gall held their uſual Reſidence. Therein he declares his Reſolution to “ have his Troops commpletely filled, and for this purpoſe takes notice of and reforms “ another great Abuſe practiſed at this time: It was the ordinary Cuſtom for the Souldiers “ to take a long with them Youths of free and ingenuous condition, and with “ deſign to keep them free as to obligation to Service, to entertain them as Kinſmen, “ Peedees, or Attendants; and thus were ſuch concealed, as intended to avoid the “ publick Service, or liſting themſelves in the Armies: To remove which Inconvenience “ he commands, that the Souldiers produce all ſuch Retainers to their Officers, “ who are enjoyned to preſent them before Jovinus the Magiſter Militum, under “ pain of being put down from their preſent ſtations to more inferiour places in the “ Army. And to ſuch as detect any ſuch Concealers he decrees Advancement. For, “ as there were ſeveral Degrees of Service in the Amy, one more creditable than the other, the Souldiers were often either preferred higher, or diſgraced according to their Deſerts. As ſometimes an Officer from the Degree of Tribune put down to that of

In the mean time the Allemans keep quiet.

But not to be truſted.

L.9. de re militari, Cod. Th. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

Regales.

L.10. eod. tit.

Regradatio, militiæ mutatio, gradus dejectio.

A.D. 366.

of Primicerius, Biarchus, Circitor, or the like. Sometimes reduced to a Tiro, or the meaneſt ſtate and condition. Otherwhile from an Horſeman condemned to ſerve on foot, or reduced from an higher to a lower Degree of the Infantry.

38. Having taken this and other courſes for ſupply of men, it was not his intention that all ſhould be indifferently admitted to the Employment; but by another Law he ſhortly after declared, That the Stature of Tirones ſhould be five Feet and ſeven ordinary or uſual Inches, to be obſerved at all Liſtings under the Vicar of Rome, to whom (Magnus by name) this Conſtitution is directed. Formerly the Stature of Souldiers had been exacted to be of ſix Feet, but this moſt rarely, and uſually it ſtood betwixt five and ſix, ſometimes ſeven, and otherwhiles more, Inches being required. There ſtill wanted for the ſupply of Souldiers, a Law againſt ſuch as by their own procurement were rendered incapable of Military Service: Some cut off their Fingers to prevent it, and ſuch being in thoſe times termed Murci, Conſtantine the Great had thought fit to condemn to the Service of Corporations; which Edict of his Valentinian judged convenient to mention and to eſtabliſh; and further ordaining, that all who ſhould in that manner be obnoxious for the time to come, ſhould be burnt alive; and if he was a Slave, his Lord ſhould, if he knew of it, be very ſeverely puniſhed. But it is to be noted, that theſe ſevere Laws had relation to Italy, where it was a Cuſtom for the Inhabitants to draw their Necks out of the Yoke, and put other perſons in their rooms, having been much of this humour ever ſince the days of Auguſtus. But while Valentinian ſtill lay at Rheims, he not onely acted for the reinforcement and convenience of his Army; ſomething he did for the relief of the Inhabitants of thoſe parts. To ſuch as being abſent upon publick buſineſs had been too heavily taxed, he granted liberty of one whole year to appeal and right themſelves: Whereas to ſuch as were preſent or at home, five moneths were onely allowed. It had been of a long time the manner of Princes, to prevent the counterfeiting of their Inſtruments, to uſe peculiar Characters or a ſelect Form of Writing, which none were to imitate, none were to write but ſuch as ſerved in the Scrinia of the Emperour. But of late the Proconſuls of Africa or Aſia, in their Relations or Conſultations, had began in their Diſpatches made to Court, to make bold with the ſame Characters, which others had dared to practiſe, drawn thereto by their example; and thence came it to paſs, that the Emperours Hand and Letters were counterfeited, and thereby the Provincials cheated of their Money, and otherwiſe abuſed. To obviate ſuch miſchiefs by an Edict, he expreſly forbids theſe Characters to be uſed any where either publickly or privately, but in his own Scrinia, or by the Proconſul or his Office; whoſe Authority otherwiſe was very great. This peculiar way of the Emperours Writing was with the Sacrum Encauſtum or Purple Ink, which was ever forbidden to all ſorts of perſons, even the Proconſuls and Præfecti Prætorio. Yet did the Quæſtor and Præfect make uſe of certain Majeſtick Forms of Speech or Titles, which the Emperours took to themſelves, as Noſtra Serenitas, Noſtra Manſuetudo; but Juſtinian afterwards removed that Cuſtom alſo.

Valentinian determines of what ſtature a Souldier ſhould be.

L.3. de Tironibus, Cod.Th.

L.L.4,5. eod. tit.

Condemns the Murci to be burnt alive.

L. 5. de Cenſu, Cod. Th.l.13. Tit.10.

Forbids Magiſtrates to uſe his Ink or Characters.

L.3. ad legem Corneliam de falſo, Cod.Th.l. 9.Tit.19. Vide Com.

39. From Rheims Valentinian removed further toward Britain, where now the Picts and Scots committed great Outrages; and by the way of Nemaſia (now Nemay, where he ſigned another Conſtitution for the eaſe of the Subject in reference to Publick Payments) came to Ambiani or Amiens. Though ſo far diſtant from Rome, he caſt not off his wonted care for the Concernments of that Place and Country; but being conſulted by the Præfect of the City, by his Reſcript gave order for putting the old Laws into execution, againſt ingrateful and diſobedient Children. Whether by virtue of the Law of the Twelve Tables or otherwiſe, as Ingrateful Liberti, or ſuch as had been ſet at Liberty by their Lords, and afterward demeaned themſelves ingratefully towards them, were again to be reduced into Slavery: So alſo ſuch Sons, as had been emancipated or ſet at liberty, from that Paternal Power which the Roman Laws gave their Fathers, (both over their Perſons and their Eſtates) if they bare themſelves contumaciouſly towards them, if they reviled or unjuſtly handled them, they were again to be reduced under their Authority and Command. But, as we judge from this Conſultation of the Præfect of the City, (whoſe proper Office it was to determine matters belonging to Emancipated Sons and of Freedmen) ſuch had been the Conſequence and Fruit of the Roman Government, or elſe the natural Duty and Obedience of Children, that this Law had ſeldom been put in practice, elſe there would have been no occaſion for the Præfect to have doubted, or any need for him to conſult the Emperour, as he now did, being put upon it by ſome accident, of which we have not any account. Valentinian, as the Father of his Country, thought fit to ſhake off, and ſet forth to their view again, that Rod which had been caſt into a corner, and by laſhing of one to terrifie the reſt, though to L.3. de Ponderatoribus, Cod. Th.

Makes a Law to puniſh Ingrateful Sons.

l. unic. de ingratis Liberis, Cod.Th.l.8.tit. 14.Dat.15Cal. Sept. Ambianis Lupicino & Jovino Coſs.

A.D. 367.

to his own Son, at this time for other great and weighty Reaſons, he ſhewed himſelf very indulgent, the ſixth day after the Date of this very Law.

40. Ammianus writes, that about this time he had fallen dangerouſly ſick, and when both he and others expected nothing but Death, at a private meeting of ſuch Galls as ſerved him, one Ruſticus Julianus had been mentioned for his Succeſſor, one who had born the Office of Magiſter Memoriæ, but in the Opinion of the Hiſtorian a Perſon as greedy of Mans Bloud as a ſavage Beaſt, which he abundantly ſhewed when he governed Africk with Proconſular Power. This was with greater reaſon oppoſed by others, who with better pretence contended for Severus, then Magiſter Peditum, a man indeed very auſtere, but in all reſpects to be preferred before him. But the Recovery of Valentinian put an end to the Hopes and Diſputes of both Parties; for he reſolved when but in the way of Recovery, to give the Title of Auguſtus to his Son Gratian, though at this time but twelve years old, a Youth very handſom, and well enough inclin'd of himſelf, had he not been afterwards perverted by thoſe about him. Having prepared the Minds of the Souldiers, when he came to aſcend the Tribunal, he found no difficult work; for though he could alleage nothing of moment concerning him that was to be preferr'd; yet with the ſight of his own perſon, he inculcated the Merits of his Family, and being himſelf now recovered, and eſtabliſhed, eaſily induced them to conſent, and to proclaim Gratian Emperour in equal power. Eupraxius of Cæſarea, a Moor, and at this time Magiſter Memoriæ, firſt of all others acclaimed The Family of Gratian deſerves as much; and being made Quæſtor out of hand, continued a moſt juſt and painful Judge, never deviating from thoſe Rules, which by Juſtice and univerſal Indifferency were preſcribed him. Upon this new Promotion many perſons exerciſed their Wits, and chiefly in commendation of his Perſon. But his Father is noted by the Hiſtorian for having exceeded the former Rule, in nominating his Brother and Son not Cæſars but Auguſti. For in ancient times (you hear Ammianus) no man took to himſelf a Colleague with equal Authority, except the Emperour Marcus, who made Verus his Adoptive Brother Partner with him on equal terms.

But Gratian his own Son he makes Auguſtus.

Huic non contradicunt exempla Severi & Diocleſiani, qui non Collegas ſibi primum Auguſtos, ſed initio Cæſares tantum adſciverunt.

41. Matters having thus ſucceeded both according to the will of the Prince and Souldier, Mamertinus the Præfectus Prætorio was accuſed by Avitianus, formerly Vicar, of Extortion, and upon that account was Vulcatius Rufinus preferred to his place; a man very fit for the Imployment, and to be reverenced for his gray Hairs; but ever ſeeking occaſion to indulge his covetous humour. By his procurement Orfitus, who from Præfect of the City had been ſent into Baniſhment, was reſtored to his own Countrey and Eſtate. And now the Humour of the Emperour, however cruel, yet hitherto for his own ends covered and with violence ſuppreſſed, could not but diſcover it ſelf. Diocles, who had been Comes Largitionum in Illyricum, he commanded to be burnt alive, for very ſlender faults by him committed; as alſo Diodorus, who had been Agens in rebus, he ordered to be put to death, together with three Apparitors of the Vicar of Italy, for no other reaſon but becauſe Diodorus commenced a Suit againſt a certain Comes, who was going to Court, and the Apparitors of the Vicar (according to their Office) admoniſhed him to appear. And of thoſe perſons the Chriſtians at Milan ſolemnized the Memory, calling the place where they were buried At the Innocents. Many in Corporations he commanded to be ſlain, who were preſerved by the ſeaſonable Interpoſition of Euphraxius the Quæſtor, and Florentius the Præfect. If any declined the Juriſdiction of a Judge, as bearing him capital malice, to be ſure he would (notwithſtanding all Exception made) remit him and his Cauſe to the Award of the ſame perſon. And if any Debtor was found unable to give ſatiſfaction to the Publick, he would pronounce that he ought to be put to death. Returning from Amiens towards Triers, he received News out of Britain, of great Slaughters and Waſte made by the Barbarians in this Iſland; that Nectaridus Count of the Maritime Tract, or as the Notitia terms him of the Saxon Shore, was ſlain; and Fullofaudes a Dux was alſo circumvented by the Enemy. In great haſte and conſternation he diſpatched away Severus, at that time bearing the Title of Comes Domeſticorum, to put ſome ſtop to their Progreſs; but him he ſoon after recalled, and in his ſtead ſent Jovinus with all ſpeed to reinforce the Armies in the Iſland; for ſo the conditions of Time and Place did require. But ſtill worſe News arriving, in what danger theſe Provinces were, he made choice of Theodoſius, a man of eminent note for Military matters, who with a courageous Army both of Horſe and Foot, chearfully undertook what was enjoyned him. Several years before this divers Alarms had been given, as in the tenth Conſulſhip of Conſtantius, and in the third of Julian, who then lying at Paris, and diſtracted by various Cares, thought not

He now diſcovers the cruelty of his Nature.

The Barbarous Nations rage here in Britain.

not fit to come over himſelf, leſt he ſhould have expoſed Gall to the cruel Rapines of the Allemans; but ſent Lupicinus, then a Magiſter Militum, both a good Souldier and very skilful, but proud as far as Inſolence, and concerning whom it might juſtly be doubted, whether he was more covetous or cruel. He brought over with him the Heruli and Batavi bearing Light Armour, together with two Troops of the Mæſiaci, and landed at Rutupiæ, at this day Ribcheſter or Richborow by Sandwich.

Theodoſius ſent to repreſs them.

42. What particular Actions paſſed betwixt him and the Barbarians we do not know; but whatever he did to reſtrain them, by this time they were grown again outragiouſly inſolent. Ammianus tells us, that in that place of his Hiſtory where he had given Account of the Acts of Conſtans Cæſar, he had alſo deſcribed both the Nature of the Ocean, and the Iſland of Britain, according to his Capacity; and therefore he would not repeat any thing thereof to our great loſs and ſorrow, as it happened: For that part of his Hiſtory hath miſcarried, as alſo that of Polybius, wherein this more ancient Writer had deſcribed this Iſland ſo far as it was known in his days. He adds, That it ſhall ſuffice onely to ſay, that at this time the Picts were divided into two Nations, Dicalidonæ or Caledonii, and Vecturiones, beſides whom there were the Attacotti, and the Scots, who roved up and down, and did very great Miſchief; while in the mean time the neighbouring Tracts of Gall were grievouſly infeſted by the Franks and Saxons; and each People ſtrove as it were, which ſhould exceed the other in Rapine, Burnings, and Leading away of Captives. Theodoſius being ſent to put a ſtop to thoſe who harraſed Britain, took Sea at Banonia or Bulloign, and ſafely landed at Rutupiæ; whence, after that the Batavi, Heruli, Jovii, and Victores were arrived, he marched toward Lundonium, an old Town, which Poſterity called Auguſta; and dividing his Forces into ſeveral Parties fell upon the Rovers, while ſcattered up and down and loaded with Booty. The Plunder and Captives he recovered; and having reſtored all to the Owners, except ſome ſmall portion beſtowed on the weary Souldiers, he returned to the City in a triumphant manner, which exceedingly incumbered before with Difficulties, he had hereby reſtored to its ancient, Freedom. Now entering into a ſerious conſideration what was further to be done he found by what he got out of Priſoners and Fugitives, that his numerous and fierce Enemy conſiſting of divers Nations, was not to be maſtered but by Stratagems and ſudden Attacques. Firſt therefore by Promiſes of Impunity he reduced moſt of thoſe who had forſaken their Colours, or ſtragled abroad, to their Arms; and to uſe ſtill greater caution he ſent for Civilis, to govern Britain as Vice-Præfect, a man of an haſty nature, but very juſt; as alſo Dulcitius, one of the Dignity of Dux, and famous for his Military Skill.

Africk alſo in a ſad condition.

43. So went matters in Britain, while Africk ever ſince the beginning of Valentinian had groaned under the Rage and Cruelty of the Barbarians, in no leſs degree; the Incurſions of whom had been furthered by the negligence, ſloth, and greedineſs of the Army. Moſt remarkable was the Rapacity of Romanus the Comes, who ſtrove as it were to exceed the diligence of the Enemy in pilling the Provinces; yet being ſo cunning as to decline the Odium, he made uſe of his Affinity with Remigius, the Magiſter Officiorum, who ever told a fair Tale to the Emperour, and thereby kept him utterly ignorant of the ſad eſtate of that Countrey, what warineſs ſoever he pretended to. And indeed Ammianus writes in plain terms, That Valentinian was the firſt who encouraged and promoted the Inſolence of Military Men, againſt the common good of the Empire; and how it is a matter to be lamented, that puniſhing with all cruelty the ordinary and common Souldier, he connived at the Crimes of the great Officers, who taking courage at this Impunity proceeded in thoſe courſes, as having the Fortunes of all men in their power; whereas of old time there was ſo great care taken, that the Commonwealth might not be oppreſſed through their Inſolence, and too well known Ambition, that ancient Lawmakers choſe rather to have ſome ſuffer innocently, than their Faults to go unpuniſhed. But, at the ſame time the Barbarians brake into Iſauria, where depopulating the Countrey they invaded Pamphylia and Cilicia, which they treated in the ſame manner, proceeding in their Rapines without any oppoſition: At length Muſonius the Vicar of Aſia, who had formerly profeſſed Rhetorick at Athens, fell upon a Party of them, but ſo ill diſciplined were his Troops, that he was circumvented, and cut off with all his Men. The Rovers encouraged by this Succeſs purſued their courſe, till more Forces coming upon them, drove them into the Straits near the Mountains, where being cloſely ſhut up, and finding no means to eſcape, they begg'd Peace by the Perſwaſions of the Germanicopolitans, a People of great Authority amongſt them, whoſe City Germanicopolis was the Chief and Head Together with Iſauria, and other Provinces.

The Barbarians reſtrain'd.

of

Sect.2.

A.D. 367.

of all that part of Iſauria they poſſeſſed, as Seleucia the Metropolis of what of that Countrey belonged to the Roman Empire. Peace being granted them, and their Hoſtages received, they kept themſelves quiet for a good ſpace, attempting nothing of Hoſtility.

Valeſius in notis ad Am. hiſt. l.27.

Prætextatus Præfect of Rome his Acts.

44. At this time Prætextatus exerciſed the Office of Præfect of Rome, and that with ſuch Integrity and Courage, that he might juſtly be reckoned amongſt thoſe few who were both feared and beloved. By his Authority was appeaſed a great Tumult and Diſorder, which had been raiſed about the Election of a Biſhop. He took away Balconies, or Galleries made on the ſides of Houſes, which had been forbidden in the City by ancient Laws, being called Mæniana from one Mænius, who having ſold his Houſe to Cato and Flaccus, then Cenſors, for the building of the Baſilica Porcia, excepted out of the Sale one Pillar, on which he laid Timber that jutted forth, and built a Balcony or Scaffold, whereon he and his Family might behold the Fights of the Gladiators; which Act was imitated by others, till reſtrained by the Laws. Prætextatus further cauſed a Diſtance to be made betwixt publick Buildings and private Houſes; and in every Region appointed certain Weights, obſerving that unjuſt and covetous perſons changed and counterfeited them at their pleaſure. In point of Judicature he had that advantage of others, which Cicero aſcribes to Brutus, that although for favour he did nothing, yet on whatever he did, a favourable Interpretation was put. About this time one Rando an Alleman of Royal Deſcent, having long caſt in his Head how he might do it, fell ſuddenly upon Moguntiacum, not fortified by any Garriſon; and by reaſon that the Inhabitants were buſied by the Celebration of a Chriſtian Solemnity, (as Ammianus writes) eaſily made himſelf Maſter of it, and departed with Plunder, and ſo many Priſoners as he thought convenient. After this Vithicabius, the Son of Valdomarius their King, was murdered by one of his own Servants, that held Intelligence with the Romans, a cunning man, who could be removed by no other means than that of Treachery. Valentinian thought fit to make more than ordinary Preparations to prevent that Hoſtility which thereupon he could not but expect; and taking his Son Gratian along with him, paſſed the Rhine, and invaded their Territories, where for a good ſpace he could light of no Enemy; but at length diſcovered them encamped on an Hill, whence he beat them down, and got a notable Victory. This done, the Souldiers went into their Winter Quarters, and the Emperours to Triers.

Idem.

Itaque efficis, ut cum gratiæ causâ nihil facias, omnia tamen ſint grata quæ facis.

Valentinian defeats the Allemans.

Reſerves to himſelf the Cogniſance of the Crimes of Senators.

45. To Prætextatus the Præfect of Rome Valentinian directed an Edict, by which he demonſtrated how ſtudious he was of the Reputation and Safety of Senators. This Præfect, as we have ſeveral times hinted, was the proper Judge of perſons of that Dignity, ſo as in thoſe days no Judge of a Province could cenſure them for any Crime. However now Valentinian commands, that before the Præfect ſhould“ come to ſentence, the whole Proceſs be tranſmitted to himſelf, to whom he reſerves“ the cognizance of the Cauſe, and the appointment of the Puniſhment: ſo great“ ſeemed his care for men of their Rank and Quality. Yet nine years after his Son Gratian thought fit to alter the form of their Trials, and indeed to abrogate this Law: For by a new Conſtitution he permitted the ordinary Judges or Governours“ of Provinces to have Cognizance of theſe matters. But then again withall he gave“ leave to the Præfect of the City to determine the matter, and alſo to inflict what“ Puniſhment he thought fit; which Valentinian by no means ſuffered. Then whereas formerly it belonged to this Præfect, to hear and determine theſe Criminal Cauſes, in what Province ſoever the Senator lived; Gratian limited his Authority to the Suburban Provinces, giving to the Præfecti Prætorio Juriſdiction over the reſt; and when the Præfect of the City judged them, it ſhould be by the aſſiſtance and concurrence of five other perſons. And ſo did Gratian partly enlarge, and partly diminiſh the Power of the Præfect of the City, whoſe Juriſdiction became in thoſe times more appropriate to the Suburbicarian Provinces, and that of the Præfecti Prætorio more and more increaſed. As Valentinian concerned himſelf for the Privileges of Senators really ſuch; ſo by another Conſtitution, directed ſhortly after to the ſame Prætextatus, for ſuch as obtained the Honourary Title thereof, without the Burthens thereunto belonging. Theſe were they who had diſcharged duly the Palatine or Court Imployments, particularly Notaries, and ſuch as ſerved in the Scrinia, Agentes in rebus, Admiſſionales, and the reſt. When they went out of their Services they were advanced to the Degree of Perfectiſſimi, or, if Comites or Tribunes, to an higher rank of Honour; receiving commonly Letters Teſtimonial from the Prince, directed to the Præfect of the City, being the Judge or Keeper of Dignities. But Valentinian obſerved, that by ſo great Indulgence to all ſorts of perſons, the

L.10. de Pœnis. Cod. Th. l.9. tit.40.

L.13. de Accuſation.

Literæ proſecutoriæ.

A.D. 368.

L.7.de Privil. eor. qui in ſacro palatio militant, Cod.Th. l.6.tit.35.

the Duties incumbent upon Senators were badly performed; and therefore he reſolved to make a diſtinction, which was, that the Privilege of Adlection (as it was called) or of meerly enjoying the Dignity and Privilege of Senators, without being acceſſary to Duties and Implyments, ſhould accrue to ſuch as from the firſt and loweſt degree had arrived at that of Perfectiſſimatus, though without the Prince his Letters Commendatory; but as for theſe of higher Rank, as Comites and Tribunes, they ſhould no otherwiſe obtain Freedom from ſuch Burthens, than by Letters from the Emperour to the Prefect, wherein their Service and courſe of Life ſhould be approved. For ſuch as proceeded to the Rank of Perfectiſſimatus, arrived at it by degrees, paſſing through all inferiour ſtations; but ſuch as were made Comites and Tribunes ordinarily attained it per ſaltum, and for favour: And therefore theſe Letters Teſtimonial in their behalf ſeemed to him to be requiſite. Thoſe that obtained Letters Teſtimonial had alſo other Letters called Tractoriæ, granted by the Præfectus Prætorio, for the furniſhing them with the Curſus publicus, and Proviſions in their Travel homewards. But ſuch were wont to ſell and make Merchandize of them, having no need of them themſelves; which practice this ſame Emperour forbids in his firſt Conſtitution now extant of the following Year.

L.1. de Tractoriis, Cod.Th.l. 8.tit.5. Et de variis Tractoriarum acceptionibus. Vide Gothofr. in L.

Regulates the Phyſicians of the City of Rome.

46. Having otherwiſe well provided for the Suſtenance and Conveniences of the Citizens of Rome, this ſame Year being of our Lord the CCCLXVIII. by another Edict he made as good proviſion as he could for their Health, thereby regulating the number and maintenance of their Phyſicians. Theſe were the Archiatri populares, as they were called, of whom he ordains that each Region of the City have one, beſides thoſe that belonged to the Porticus Xyſti, where the Fencers exerciſed, and to the Veſtal Virgins. Not that we are to imagine, there were but fourteen Phyſicians in all Rome, becauſe there were but ſo many Regions; for many more doubtleſs practiſed in that City, called by the richer and nobler ſort as their Judgments or Fancies directed; but the Archiatri were ſuch as were hired on the publick charge, to viſit the poor and take care of thoſe who could not fee the others as they expected. They had Allowance aſſigned them out of the Annona publica or civica, for out of that Revenue were not onely ſuſtained the Citizens, but Allowances made to ſeveral Officers beſides, as to the publick Phyſicians, to the Veſtal Virgins, to certain called Antiquaries at Conſtantinople, who looked to the publick Library. As Valentinian by this Law allows of their Salaries, ſo he obviates their Avarice, requiring them not to accept of what ſick men and ſuch as were in danger promiſed them; but onely what thoſe who had recovered by their Aſſiſtance would willingly confer on them; according to the Oath of honeſt Hippocrates, who ſwore he would do his beſt endeavour for all ſick perſons, of what ſort, degree, or condition, without expectation of Reward or any Contract. Indeed the Anxiety and Diſtreſs of ſuch perſons in pain hath ſo much pity and regard from the Laws, that immoderate Donations, Obligations, Promiſes, and Sales made by any at ſuch time, and in that condition, have onely the Preſcription of thirty years. And the immoderate Fees of a Phyſician are to be regulated after the Rule of Indifferency by the Judge; this ſame being to be obſerved by thoſe that receive no publick Stipends, as is enjoyned by this Conſtitution. In the laſt place he enacts, That in caſe of the Death of any of the number, the defect ſhould be ſupplied not out of favour to any Great Man his Interceſſion, or the Power of any Magiſtrate, how great ſoever; but by the Choice of the Archiatri themſelves, who having made it with all care and circumſpection, ſhould thereof certifie the Emperour. He ſeems to have been conſulted upon this ſubject by that memorable Prefect of the City Prætextatus, to whom this Edict is directed, as many more.

L.8. de Medicis & Profeſſoribus, Cod.Th.l. 13.tit.3.

Ἄνευ μισθοῦ ϗ συγγραφῆς. Vide Gothofr. in l.

Takes care that the People ſhould not be oppreſſed by Officers and Magiſtrates.

47. While he lay at Coloine to provide againſt the Inrodes of the Franks, he conſidered, that his Subjects of the Northern Quarters might be harraſed even by Friends (though not in ſo great a meaſure) as well as by the Enemy, the Inſolence of Officers as well Civil as Military, in thoſe days being very great. He directed an Edict to Probus the Præfectus Prætorio of Illyricum, to provide againſt thoſe who under pretence of publick Service, would impoſe Burthens or Trouble upon Countreymen. He prohibits the compelling of them to any Service in their own perſons, or by their Slaves or Cattel; or the receiving of any Gifts or Penſions from them. Which later had been ſo ordinarily practiſed, that it became as it were a lawful (or, as the term of the times was, a canonical) Payment: In like manner as Souldiers in this Age were wont to require Suppers, Junkets, and Baths, nay Free Quarter from thoſe that harboured them; and the Tribunes themſelves exacted Gratuities for their Souldiers, beſides what was wont to be ſcrewed out of the People by ſuch as carried joyful News into the Provinces. As the other Practices were forbidden by other L.un. Ne Damna provincialibus, Cod.Th. l.11.tit.11. Dat. Agrippinæ prid. Cal. Octobris.

Laws,

A.D. 369.

Laws, ſo in this whereof we now ſpeak, Valentinian ſhewed his ſeverity againſt the Officials of Governours of Provinces, in three particulars. Firſt, he Prohibits not only ſuch things to be Exacted by Officers; but the Country man himſelf, he forbids “ to Pay them, leſt any excuſe might thereby be pretended for the Crime! “ In the ſecond place he inflicts Confiſcation of Eſtate, and death it ſelf, upon ſuch “ as either ſhould Exact, or receive ſuch Preſents or Services; in the room of which “ Puniſhment, Tribonian in his Law, which he interpolated from this, impoſeth perpetual “ Baniſhment. But, what ſhewes the heavieſt Severity imaginable, In the “ laſt place, he ſubjects thoſe that Voluntarily Pay ſuch Services, or give ſuch Preſents, “ to the ſame puniſhment, as the Exactors and Receivers; It ſeems the Condition “ of the Times requiredit.

L.2.Cod.Juſtin Ne Ruſticani, lib.11.Tit.55.

Valens at the ſame time Confirms the Privileges of ſuch Officers.

48. About the ſame time, Valens in the Eaſt, as if had been on purpoſe to give Incouragement to thoſe Cohortales or Officials of the Provinces, whom his Brother diſcompoſed by ſo Severe a Conſtitution, Reſolved to maintain them of his Diſtirct, eſpecially of Syria, in their wonted Privileges. By an Edict directed to Feſtus the Conſularis of Syria, He Confirms to them all Immunities, which had “ formerly been Granted them by Diocleſian. Theſe were freedom from the Baſtaga, or Carriage by Beaſts, impoſed on ſome ſorts of People; from the Charge of the Navicularii, and from being forced againſt their Wills, to the Services of Corporations, which things had formerly been Indulged by Conſtantine, who Abrogated the Law made by Maxentius to a contrary purpoſe. “In Caſe they “ had paſſed their Determined Time and Courſes, and Namely, that of providing “ Neceſſaries for the Souldiers, which was their main Work, then ſhould they be “ excuſed from any ſuch Services. And as Valens Incouraged hereby the Officers of the Ordinary Magiſtrates, for all that he was rather more kind to the Provincials or Countrey men themſelves, as both ſeveral Laws do teſtifie, and as Hiſtorians and Orators do Witneſs for him. “ About this very time, by a Law, he took “ care that ſuch ſhould have their Defenſores, even as the Cities had theirs; under “ whom they ſhould have their Cauſes in Pecuniary Matters Decided. But it ſeems, “ his Indulgence was abuſed by ſuch kind of Men, who, as we have already ſeen, in the dayes of Conſtantius, when they had their own proper Defenders; yet to ſhun the heavy burthens of Taxes, were wont to flie to the Protection of Great Perſons; and give up all they had into their Hands, oftentimes to ſhun one Evil incurring a far greater Miſchief. To prevent the loſs of the Treaſury, and their own miſery; he directed a ſevere Edict to Auxonius the Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt, Commanding upon pain of death, all Husbandmen, or Tillers of the Land, “ to abſtain from ſuch Applications. And all ſuch as ſhould receive them into their “ Patronage, as often as they could be found upon the Grounds, ſhould pay “ a Fine of ſixty five pounds of Gold, and beſides, half of the Land ſo received “ into Patronage, ſhould be Confiſcate; which he hints to have been leſs than ſuch Patrons were wont to take from their miſerable Clients, for their Protection.

L.11.de Cohortalibus Cod.Th. lib.8.Tit.4.

L.1.eod.Tit.

Paſtus primipili dicitur in L.

Yet Incourages the Provincials.

L.3.De Defenſor.Cevitatum. Cod.Juſtin.lib.1.Tit.55.

Rut puniſhes ſuch as defrauded the publick Revenue, by applying themſelves to Great Men.

L.2. De Patrociniis Vicorum. Cod.Th. lib.11. Tit. 24.

Et non quantum Patroni ſuſcipere conſueverant, ſed dimidium ejus fiſcsm ad ſumat.

A.D. 369. Valentiniano Nb. P. & Victore Coſs.

The Conſulſhip of Valentinian, the Son of Valens, and Victor.

49. The following Year, which was the laſt of the Gothick War, managed by Valens, being of our Lord the CCCLXIX. had for Conſuls, Valentinian, the Son of Valens, with the Style of Nobiliſſimus Puer, and Victor; wherein Olybrius was Præfect of Rome, Auxonius ſtill Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt; Probus of Illyricum, Italy, and Africk; and Viventius of Gall. Valentinian the Emperour continued at Triers till the Month of June, as ſeveral Conſtitutions do teſtifie, imploying himſelf well nigh the whole year in Fortifying the River Rhine; from the begining of Rhetia as far as the Ocean, with great Rampires, Caſtles and Towers all along the Coaſt of Gall; And in ſome places, he raiſed Fortifications beyond the River, in the Enemies Countrey, to hinder the Excurſions of the Francks and Allemans. For this purpoſe he removed from Triers, and by the Date of ſeveral Laws, we find him at Complatum, Martiaticum, Altæ Ripæ, and Briſiacum, at which Places, what Laws of Concernment, and proper for the Readers knowledge he made, it will behove us to mention. Towards all the preparations, in order to his Securing the Provinces, and Reinforcing his Armies, it was neceſſary there ſhould be continual Supplies of Horſes and Materials. Now throughout the Provinces there were certain Companies, or Bodies of Men, deſtined to the Conveyance of the Publick Proviſions, and Neceſſaries for War, or the Prince his Uſe; but often it happened that their work was too great; and for ſupply the Country Man was Preſſed to put to his helping hand, to the great hindrance of Tillage: ſo it hapned at this time, and the Provincials were therewith ſo much oppreſſed, that by an Vide Chron. Hiſtoric. Cod. Th. ad Ann. 369.

Valentinian indeavours to reform ſeveral Abuſes for the Eaſe of the People.

Sect. 3.

A.D. 369.

Edict to Viventius, the Emperour takes notice of it, as an unlawful Practice; and yet that his Occaſions might be ſerved, he Commands that for the time to come, ſuch as kept Victualling, or Tipling-Houſes, ſhould be compelled, as idle Perſons, to ſupply the places of thoſe whom the Countries could by no means ſpare. He took notice of another great Abuſe committed againſt miſerable People, under pretence of Treaſon, or of Eſtates, by other Courſes of Law, falling to the Emperour, as where no Heirs were to be found; for Rapacious Officers, or Malicious Neighbours would affix Titles to Houſes, or Lands, denoting them to belong to the Prince, which by a Law directed to Florentinus the Comes Rei Privatæ, he indeavours to prevent. “He Ordains that upon any ſuch Occaſion, there be Solemn Proceeding had, both by the ſaid Comes, and the Rationales, (under his Diſpoſition) in all the Provinces; that an Account be taken of all perticulars; and the Titles affixed to any ſuch Eſtates, be not made without ſufficient Teſtimony.

L. 1. Ne operæ à Conlatoribus exigantur. Cod. Th. lib. 11. Tit. 10. & L. Un. Cod. Juſt. eod. Tit. primam tantum habet ſententiam.

L. 1. de Incorporatione. Cod. Th. lib. 10. Tit. 9. & L. 3. Cod. Juſtin. de bonis vacant. & incorporat.

50. But, to proſecute further the Reformation he intended, he reſolved to go to work with the Governours of Provinces themſelves, of whom ſeveral he put to death, for their Avarice and Oppreſſion, amongſt whom one Rhodanus the Maſter of his Palace. And lying now at Triers in Spring time, he conſidered that the Governours, or Judges, would ſoon begin their Annual Progreſs, or Viſitation. For it was the Cuſtome for them to lie in Winter in the Chief Cities, or Metropoles of the Provinces, and there Adminiſter Juſtice, and Determine Cauſes; but in Summer, the better to underſtand the Wants and Complaints of the People, to provide for the plenty and cheapneſs of Proviſions, for the Payment of the Publick Revenue, and the like, they were wont to Viſit other Cities and Places within their Diſtricts, and make a Progreſs, or take a Circuit throughout the Provinces; which that they might the better do, they were allowed the Uſe of the Curſus Publicus, and in each City, were entertained for three days by the Curiales, and Merchants. But inſtead of making their abode in the moſt Publick places, where the People might have beſt Acceſs, ſome were wont to betake themſelves to places of Retirement and Pleaſure, where they might ſolace themſelves with ſuch Company and Divertiſements, as they beſt liked. Of this he takes notice, and by a ſevere Edict, directed to Viventius the Præfect, on the firſt of April, Commands, that each of theſe Judges there make his abode where the People may beſt come at him, and not chuſe out any place for Delight; adding further that whoſoever ſhall in a Progreſs entertain any Governour of a Province at his Houſe, ſhall Forfeit the Land whereon it ſtands, to the Publick Treaſury. And by this means he ſaith, theſe Governours may be induced to repair or build up the Manſions, by which are meant either thoſe properly ſo called (wherein the Emperour and the Souldiers repoſed themſelves in their marches, that were furniſhed with Granaries, and Houſes for Proviſions; of which, together with the Manſions themſelves, theſe Governours had the Charge) or elſe Houſes of Judicature, which ſometimes are alſo termed the Manſions of Judges. This Severity Valentinian uſed, to reſtore to the People the ancient Advantage received by theſe Circuits, which to Reinforce, as he by this Law requires the Judges to make choice of ſuch places, as wherein they might give eaſieſt Acceſs; ſo on the other ſide, by Majoranus, afterward were the Agents and Procurators of the Emperours Lands, of the Lands of Senators and Great Men, ordered to give their Attendance upon them ſo long as they continued in thoſe places, for the better Payment of the Publick Duties, wherein often thoſe Officers would be behind. But yet Valentinian his Care for the Uſe of thoſe Circuits, was not ſatisfied by this Law directed to Viventius, for on the ſame day, he gave out another on the ſame Subject, to Probus the other Præfect. In this he requires that thoſe Judges, paſs through all the Villages, and Towns, as ſpeedily and often as they can, and there diligently learn of private Perſons, what Inſolent or Rapacious Act had been Committed by any Compulſor; who, if thereof detected, and his Matter Preſented to the Emperour, ſhould be put to death. This Compulſor was an Officer who Collected the Publick Tributes, or who after the Collector, was appointed to be earneſt with the People, and Compell them to Pay, by whom they were often very cruely handled.

Particularly ſome Committed by the Judges in their Circuits.

L. 4. de Officio Rectoris Provinciæ. Cod. Th. lib. 1. Tit. 7. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt. vide Com.

L. Prox. eod. Tit.

51. Several other Edicts Probus received at this time, ſome of which we ſhall not trouble the Reader with, as not ſo proper for his knowledge. But Valentinian having lately Publiſhed one for the aſcertaining of Confiſcate Eſtates, yet found it not ſufficient; but ſo that he was cheated, either by thoſe that ſeized them, and concealed part of what they found, or by ſuch as begged the Eſtates, and kept him ignorant of the true Value; ſo that he underſtood not the meaſures of his own Bounty. To Probus therefore he directed another Conſtitution, which is eſpecially taken notice of, and by Lawyers eſteemed as moſt Elegant. "That there might remain no place for Fraud, he orders a double Inquiſition to be made: The firſt by the Officers of the Ordinary Judge, or Governour of the Province, who ſhould make a moſt full and Comprehenſive Inventary, and tranſmit it to the Rationalis, belonging to the Comes Rei privatæ, which before this had never been done. Then were the Officers of the Rationalis to take another Account, and ſend up the firſt Survey to the Emperour, that in caſe thoſe belonging to the Ordinary Judge, had concealed any thing, they might be Condemned in the double Value of it. The form of the Inventary, becauſe ſaid to be the moſt exact Pattern of all others, was this: What the quantity of the Ground was, and what its Nature or Quality. How much was Tilled, and what was untilled. How much in Vine-yard, Olive-yard, Arable Paſture, or Wood. What Conveniency belonged to the Place, and how pleaſant or delightful it was. With what Buildings or other Contrivance it was furniſhed. How many Slaves belonged to the Place, whether they were Countrey, or City Slaves, and what were their Qualities, or Indowments? What Husbandmen there were, and what Tenants that held portions of Land; as here in England, by Hides. What numbers of Oxen for the Plough. What and how Diſtinct Herds of Sheep, or Cattel. How much Gold or Silver, Cloaths, or Jewels in ſpecie or in Weight; and of what ſorts. And laſtly, what Furniture, either for a City Houſe, or a Countrey Farm. By this may be ſeen how exact Valentinian, or the Lawyers about him, was in things of this Nature; that as well Moveables, as Immoveables, were Confiſcate to the Treaſury of the Res privata, or annexed to the Patrimony of the Prince; and that this Silver and Gold were not wont to be brought into the Treaſury of the Comes Sacrarum Largitionum; (the Lands being united to the very Patrimony, as ſome have held) for the Law Declares it otherwiſe in expreſs Words.

He takes a ſurer Courſe for aſcertaining Confiſcated Eſtates.

L.7. de bonis proſcriptorum Cod. Th. lib. 9. Tit. 42. & L. 7. Cod. Juſt. eod. Tit.

Quot Caſarii.

Noſtro nectenda Patrimonio.

52. To the ſame Probus, he iſſued out another Edict, which was received at Sirmium, on the ſixth of June, Concerning the finding of Horſes for the War, by ſuch as by Codicils, or Leters Pattents, had obtained Dignities. Thoſe Perſons were obnoxious to various and Extraordinary Services, or Payments, and upon that account, were wont often to be much vexed by the Emperours Officers, who would ſtill be upon them upon all occaſions, and make them pay for their Aery Honours, particularly for Horſes, as well as other matters. Whether now, at the Petition of ſome of them, or induced by other Motives, for their future eaſe, he ſetled this matter ſo, as that "He who had by ſuch Honorary Codicils or Letters obtained the Dignity of Comes, ſhould every fifth year find three Horſes, and He that had procured that of Præſes, only two; the former Honor being eſteemed the greater of them. Having ever a great care, for the ſuſtenance of the Citizens of Rome, by another Edict directed to the People themſelves there, he removed an Abuſe Committed againſt the Publick Charity. Out of the Proviſion made for the poorer ſort, which they termed Annona Popularis, and Civica, twenty loaves of Brown or Courſe Bread, was wont to be ſold to poor people at a ſmall price, or eaſie rate, wherein the Benefit, or Advantage conſiſted. But what was intended for the benefit of the poor, was fraudulently drawn to the uſe of other Perſons, who came in with the poor, and made the ſame Market of this courſe ſort of Bread. As firſt the Officials, or Apparitors of the Ordinary Judges, who had other Allowances belonging to them as ſuch. Then ſome ſent amongſt them their Slaves, who under a Covert of Freedom, laid hold of this occaſion to cheat Indigent Citizens; and beſides theſe, ſuch as had Bread diſtributed to them by reaſon of, or belonging to their Houſes, pretended, and made bold to challenge this Privilege alſo. Valentinian to reduce things to the deſign of their firſt Inſtitution, by this Edict directed to the People, "alters quite the Cuſtom; for inſtead of their twenty courſe Loaves, which containing fifty ounces, were ſold to them at an eaſie rate, he Ordaines they ſhall have gratis, or on free Gift, ſix Biskets of clear Flour, whereof each ſhould weigh ſix Ounces. All Officials Slaves, or any who obtained Bread by right of his Houſe, he forbids to pretend to this Privilege, upon pain of loſing ſuch Allowance, as otherwiſe belonged to him; or of Corporal Puniſhment. If any ſhall ſell his Right to this Bread; to ſuch as Accuſeth and detecteth him, he grants the Allowance, both of Buyer and Seller; if it was received upon other Stairs, or Degrees, Orders how ſuch as had obtained titular Dignities ſhould find Horſes.

L. un. de Oblatione Equorum. Cod. Th. lib. 7. Tit. 23. Abeſt hic tit. à Cod. Juſtin.

Pannis ſordidus.

Reſtores the Advantage received by Bread, to the Uſe of Poor Citizens.

L. de annonis Civicis & pane gradili. Cod. T. lib. 14. Tit. 17. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſtin.

Sect. 3.

A.D. 369.

Degrees, than belonged no the Seller Originally. To this end he Decrees,“ that upon theſe Stairs, ſhould a Table of Braſs be fixed, whereon both the ſort“ and quantity of Bread, ſhould be Ingraven, and the Name of the Perſon that“ was to receive it. And if any cauſed theſe Tables to be falſified, by putting therein“ their own Names, they ſhould be obnoxious to Puniſhments lately recited.“ This Law was Publiſhed at Rome, on the firſt of Auguſt.

Sapor Invades Armenia.

And Murders Arſaces.

Paras the Son of Arſaces ſent by the Emperour to Govern Armenia.

Valeſius ubi ſuprà.

53. But thus ſtood Matters in the Weſt, when Sapor the old King of Perſia, who from the beginning of his Reign, was accuſtomed to Rapines, having for ſome time concealed his Deſign, openly broke that Infamous Peace made with Jovian, by laying hold on Armenia; which, after tampering to allure the Nobility and terrifie the Ordinary ſort, he now openly Invaded. Then having by horrible Perjury drawn Arſaces into his hands, he put out his eyes, and ſent him away to a Caſtle called Agabana, where he was Murdered, and driving out Sauromaces, whom the Emperour had ſet over Iberia, he put in his Place one, Aſpacuras, and Honoured him with a Diadem. Theſe Devices ſo well ſucceeding, he Committed Armenia to Cylax the Eunuch, and Artabanes two Fugitives, whereof one had been formerly Præfect, and the other Magiſter Armorum of that Countrey, with Orders to take and Raze Artogeraſſa a very ſtrong Town, wherein as yet were preſerved the Wife, Son, and Treaſure of Arſaces. They made means to get into the Place, and endeavoured to perſwade the Queen to yield; but were ſo wrought upon by her Lamentations, that they agreed to ſuffer the Beſieged to Iſſue out and ſurprize their Enemies, which being effected, the Queen ſent away her Son Paras into the Roman Dominions, where he was kindly received by Command of Valens, and appointed to reſide at Neocæſarea, a noted City of Pontus Polemoniacus, part of Pontus Euxinus, which according to the variety of Nations, it paſſed by, received ſeveral Names, as, beſides Pontus properly ſo called, Pontus Galaticus, Polemoniacus, and Cappadocicus, for ſo were the Provinces Called. With this kindneſs of the Emperour, Cylax and Artabanes incouraged, ſent to him to deſire Aid, and that Young Paras might be their King. No Aſſiſtance was granted preſently, but Terentius a Dux of thoſe Quarters, was Ordered to bring Paras into Armenia, to Rule, yet without Enſigns of Majeſty; which was Cautiouſly obſerved, leſt Sapor being much irritated, by what had formerly paſſed, ſhould have juſt Cauſe to Object to the Romans, the breach of the Peace.

Sapor Drives him out.

And inveigles him.

Iberia Divided contrary to his mind.

Whereupon he prepares for War.

54. But hereat being above all meaſure inraged, he invaded Armenia, and laid all waſte before him, and therewith were Paras and his two Governours ſo terrified, that without thoughts of any Oppoſition, they betook themſelves to the Mountains, which lay betwixt the Roman Borders, and Lazica, beginning at Rhiſæum, and Inhabited by Free People, which was neither Subject to the Emperour nor the Lazi. The King hunted after them, but to no purpoſe, and therefore having waſted the Country, he laid ſiege to Artogeraſſa, which he took and burnt, and carried away the Wife and Treaſure of Arſaces. There being now ſufficient Advantage given to begin a War, Arintheus was ſent with an Army to aſſiſt the Armenians, in Caſe the Perſian ſhould Invade them, and this Sapor underſtanding, betook himſelf to his Craft; which but ſeldom failed him. He now fell on Courting Paras, and by fair Language inveigled him, repreſenting to him how diſhonourable his preſent Condition was, which he termed no better than Slavery; ſo that the fooliſh Young Man, Cut off the Heads of his Maſters (as Sapor cunningly called them) and ſent them to him. By this means he had aſſuredly been Maſter of Armenia, but that his Men were diſcouraged by the coming of Arintheus, ſo that he only required of the Emperour, that according to the Articles of Peace made with Jovian, no Aid might be granted to that People. This was abſolutely denied; and further Terentius was Commanded, with twelve Legions, to Convey Sauromaces into Iberia, whom, when he now drew near the River Cyrus, Aſpacuras deſired that being Kinſmen, they might Reign together; alleging that he could not yield, nor joyn himſelf to the Roman Side, becauſe his Son was an Hoſtage with the Perſian. The Emperour being hereof informed, was content to Compoſe the Affairs of Iberia in as gentle terms as could be; and Agreed, that whereas the River Cyrus divided the Country, Sauromaces ſhould have for his Share, that Part that lay next to Armenia and Lazica; and Aſpacures receive the other half adjoining to Albania and Perſia, Sapor was vehemently diſturbed at this Agreement; Exclaiming, that, contrary to the League, Armenia was Relieved, his Embaſſy ſlighted, and Iberia Divided without his Concurrence or Knowledge: and he made all poſſible Preparations, both at Home and Abroad, to undo what had been done againſt his Mind.

Sect.2.

A.D. 369.

Maximinus the Præfectus Annonæ at Rome plays horrible pranks.

Ammian. l.28.

55. In the mean time Valens the Emperour was not negligent of his Affairs; but having time enough vacant from ſuch Imployments, by ſeveral Laws amended the State of the Eaſt as he ſaw convenient himſelf, or by the Lawyers was ſuggeſted to him; which Laws relate to ſuch matters as we judge not altogether proper for us here to take notice of. But at Rome horrible Murders were committed at this time by procurement of Maximinus the Præfectus Annonæ, a man of prodigious Covetouſneſs and Cruelty. Being but of mean Birth, as the Son of one of the Tabularii belonging to the Preſident, and meanly Learned, he put himſelf ſo much forward as he got the Government of Corſica and Sardinia, and afterward came to be Corrector of Tuſcia, whence he was preferred to have the care of the Annonæ or Proviſions of the City: And as Impudence and Flattery commonly ſucceed, at length arrived at the Dignity of Præfectus Prætorio it ſelf. Occaſion was given to his enormous Proceedings by one Chilo, who had been a Vicar, and his Wife Maxima. They complained to Olybrius the Præfect of the City, that their Lives were in danger to be taken away by Poiſon, through the Practices of Sericus, Asbolius, and Campenſis, three Perſons of mean Condition. It happened that Olybrius at this time was ſick, and the Complainants impatient of Delay, petitioned that the matter might be referred to the Præfectus Annonæ. The Reference was made, by which opportunity Maximinus ſhewed the Cruelty of his Nature, no more capable of pity or moderation, in the Judgment of Ammianus, than that of a wilde Beaſt upon the Theatre let looſe from its Den upon the Prey. Much ado he made, many Examinations, and by Whipping or other Tortures having furrowed the Sides of ſuch as were ſuſpected, they accuſed ſome Noble Perſons, as having by their Clients managed this Clandeſtine Practice; with whom not able to deal as he did with them of low condition, he moſt wickedly affirmed by way of Conſultation to the Emperour, that ſo great were theſe Miſdemeanours in Rome, that they could not be reformed but by ſevere Proceedings. Valentinian was enraged at this Miſreport; and being by his own inclination (as the Hiſtorian terms him) rather a bitter than a ſevere Enemy to Vices, by one Edict in reference to Cauſes of this nature, which out of deſign he confounded with matters of Treaſon, he ordained, that thoſe perſons ſhould be ſubject to Tortures, whom the Juſtice of ancient Laws, and the Wiſdom of Princes, had thought fit to exempt from bloudy Inquiſitions.

Valentinian ſtrengthens his hands.

Particular perſons cruelly handled.

56. And to ſtrengthen the Hands of Maximinus, he conferred on him the Title of Vice-Præfect, and joyned with him one Leo a Notary, a Pannonian Hackster, who breathed nothing but fury, and was moſt thirſty after Mans Bloud. Maximinus wonderfully pleaſed with the Humour of his Colleague, and tickled by his new Honour, now ſeemed to fly, and not to walk after his Game. Innumerable were the Outragious Acts he committed, amongſt which the Caſe of Marinus was very remarkable, who being a Pleader of Cauſes was accuſed by ill arts to have attempted Marriage with one Hiſpanilla, and for this after a ſlight hearing was ſentenced to death. Beſides him Cethegus a Senator, upon pretence of Adultery was beheaded: Alypius a young Nobleman, for a very ſlender fault ſent into Baniſhment: and other obſcure perſons openly executed, with the ſight of whom every Citizen was ſo affected, that therein beholding his own danger, which he knew not how near his door it might be, he dreamed of nothing but Tortures, Fetters, and Priſons. At the ſame time Hymetius, a man of great worth, governing Africk as Proconſul, being overcome by the grievous Complaints of thoſe of Carthage, who were almoſt ſtarved, gave them Corn out of the Granaries, which were furniſhed for Maintenance of the People of Rome, which yet he ſupplied ſhortly after, there happening a very fruitful ſeaſon. Having ſold then for one Solidus but ten Modii of Corn, and afterwards for the ſame price bought thirty, what gains thence had accrued he accounted for to the Treaſury; but Valentinian ſuſpecting he had ſent leſs than he had gained, puniſhed him by taking away part of his Eſtate. It happened ill, that one Amantius, an Auruſpex, was accuſed to have been hired to appeaſe the Genius of the Emperour, in whoſe Houſe ſome Papers were found, which railed againſt Valentinian as covetous and cruel: He being hereupon conſulted, ſtill gave order for ſevere Inquiſitions. And Frontinus, who had been aſſiſtant upon the Bench to Hymetius, as he who was ſent betwixt them, was cruelly beaten with Rods, and baniſhed hither into Britain; and Amantius himſelf was afterward put to death. Hymetius was conveyed to the Town called Ocriculam, there to be convocated before Amplius the Præfect of the City, and Maximinus the Vicar, in all appearance deſtined to deſtruction, but he appealed to the Emperour, and his Appeal was admitted, by which means he ſtrangly eſcaped ſo imminent danger: For Valentinian referred the matter to the Senate, Sect.2. which after a full hearing of the Cauſe, confined him to Boæ a place in Dalmatia, and by ſo gentle a Sentence incurred the diſpleaſure of the Emperour, who had appointed him to no leſs a puniſhment than that of Death. A.D. 369.

57. The City was wonderfully allarmed by ſo frequent acts of Cruelty, and every one making the Caſe his own, by Decree of the Nobility a Meſſage was ſent unto the Emperour. Prætextatus, who had been Præfect of the City; Venuſtus, who had been Vicar; and Minervius having exerciſed the Power of Conſularis, were the men; inſtructed in ſuch manner, as to deſire that ſo great Puniſhments might not be awarded to Offences, and that none of Senatorian Degree might (contrary to all Law and Cuſtom) be ſubjected to Examination by Torture. When they were admitted into the Conſiſtory, Valentinian denied he had given any ſuch ſevere Orders, and cried out that he was abuſed; but Eupraxius the Quæſtor gently refelled what he ſaid, and by his ſeaſonable liberty of Speech a ſtop was put to ſo direful Proceedings. Yet about the ſame time Lollianus a Youth, the Son of Lampadius, who had been Præfect, was convicted before Maximinus of having copied out a Book of Evil Arts, notwithſtanding his green years, and by direction of his Father, appealed to the Prince; but being ſent for to Court, was delivered into the Hands of Phalangius the Conſularis of Bœtica, and periſhed by thoſe of the Hangman. Moreover, Baſſus, who afterwards came to be Præfect of the City, his Brother Camenius with two others, all of them of the Degree of Clariſſimi, as guilty of ſuch a Crime, had periſhed in like manner, had they not been ſaved by the Intereſt of Victorinus, who was eſteemed the moſt inward Friend of Maximinus. Neither was the other Sex exempt from theſe Calamities, very many of Noble Birth being put to death under pretence of Incontinency. Amongſt theſe were moſt eminent Claritas and Flaviana, who being led to death was ſtripped ſtark naked, ſo as ſhe had nothing to cover thoſe Parts which Nature would conceal; of which Villany the Executioner being convict was burnt alive. Beſides theſe Paphius and Cornelius, both Senators, having confeſſed that they had tampered with Poiſons; were executed, and the Procurator Monetæ in like manner was put to death by his Award. Sericus and Asbolius, formerly mentioned, by all means he endeavoured to induce to accuſe other perſons, and for this purpoſe he ſwore he would neither deſtroy any by the Sword or by Fire; and therefore to keep his Oath he killed them by meer ſtrokes of Plummets: and lying under no ſuch Obligation to Campenſis the Aruſpex, he cauſed him to be burnt alive. Growing confident upon his Succeſs, and ſtrutting in the huff of his Pride, he began to deſpiſe even Probus himſelf, the chief of all the Nobility, who juſtly ſeemed to deſerve that high place he now bore of Præfectus Prætorio. This was perceived by Aginatius the Vicar of Rome, who taking it very diſdainfully that Maximinus was by Olybrius preferred before himſelf in the Examination of Cauſes, ſecretly advertiſed Probus thereof; and added, that if he ſo pleaſed the Coxcomb might eaſily be brought down.

58. Some ſaid that Probus fearing Maximinus, as one now practiſed in Villany, and in great favour with the Emperour, ſent him the Letter of Aginatius, at the ſight whereof he was inflamed with an impatient deſire of Revenge. Another thing happened, which miniſtred further matter for Aginatius his Trouble: He ſpake againſt Victorinus, who by this time was dead, as one that had been aſſiſtant to Maximinus in his unwarrantable practices, and was further ſo inconſiderate, as to threaten to ſue and moleſt Anepſia his Widow, though he had left him a very large Legacy. She being afraid of him, for her ſecurity applied her ſelf to Maximinus, and to make him her ſure Friend, pretended her Husband had left him in his Will three thouſand pounds of Silver. He ſwallowed all ſhe thought to bait him with, and having got this Advantage challenged one half of the Inheritance, and not therewith content invented a way whereby he might devour the whole Patrimony; and this was by marrying his Son to the Daughter of Anepſia, though ſhe was onely the Step-daughter of Victorinus. This done, and having more firmly ſecured his Intereſt, he acted ſtill with more rigour and violence, and ſo extravagant were his Proceedings both againſt poor and rich; as what Ammianus tells us in particular thereof, ſeems almoſt incredible to thoſe that read him. But when he was out of his Office, called to Court, and advanced to be Præfectus Prætorio, he was no whit mended by this better fortune, but did miſchief (ſo Ammianus obſerves) as Baſilisks are wont to do at a diſtance. At this time the Brooms wherewith the Senate Houſe was ſwept were ſeen to bloſſom, which in the opinion of thoſe that took notice of it portended, that ſome of vile Extract ſhould arrive at the greateſt Dignities. And indeed moſt of thoſe that executed the place of the Vicar of Rome being no others than the Creatures of Maximinus ximinus, moſt horridly abuſed their Power. But of theſe Urſicinus ſhewing more favour than was uſual, yet left his Power of Vicar without the uſual Approbation: For he was deſpiſed as Cowardly deferring of buſineſs, and indeed being cautious he informed the Emperour, and referred to him the Caſe of one Eſaias and others, that were kept in hold for committing Adultery with Rufina, one that accuſed of Treaſon her Husband Marcellus, who had formerly been an Agens in rebus. After him ſucceeded Simplicius Homonenſis, who had been a Profeſſor in Grammar, and from that calling became a Counſellour to Maximinus, and was very fit for his turn, by a civil and obliging Carriage concealing the inward cruelty of his Nature. And firſt he put to death Rufina, with all that had either committed Adultery with her, or been privy to the Crime; after whom were puniſhed many as well innocent as guilty. For if you will believe the Hiſtorian, in this bloudy buſineſs he ſeemed to contend even with Maximinus, and endeavoured to demonſtrate himſelf moſt active in deſtroying the Nobility; ſo as to the other Acts of Buſiris, Antæus, and Phalaris, there appeared nothing wanting but the Bull of Agrigentum.

59. Several ſuch Acts of Cruelty happened; but the Caſe of Eumenius and Abienus are mentioned as moſt remarkable: Theſe two had been under Maximinus accuſed, as having had too familiarly to do with Fauſiana, a Woman of Quality, and as long as Victorinus lived had ſecured themſelves ſufficiently; but when Simplicius came to the place, for fear they betook themſelves into ſecret corners, eſpecially after the Condemnation of Fauſiana, and particularly Abienus hid himſelf with Anepſia. Now as unfortunate perſons never want matter of Wo, it happened that one Apaudulius, a Slave of Anepſia being enraged that (according to the cuſtom of Slaves) his Wife had been ſcourged, went by night and acquainted Simplicius how matters ſtood; who preſently ſent his Apparitors, and forced thoſe that concealed themſelves from their Retirements. And Abienus was put to death, as having abuſed the Body of Anepſia, which ſilly Woman cried out with purpoſe to ſave her Life, that in the Houſe of Aginatius ſhe had been practiſed upon by Magical Arts. Simplicius hereof advertiſed the Emperour, upon whom Maximinus at that time waiting, and bearing Aginatius malice for the reaſon we have heretofore related, earneſtly ſollicited Valentinian by a Reſcript to order he ſhould be put to death; but being aware of that Load of Infamy which would fall upon him, in caſe Simplicius, who was known to be his Friend and Counſellour, ſhould execute the Sentence upon a perſon of Patrician Degree, he kept the Precept by him for ſome time, conſidering whom he ſhould truſt with ſo great a piece of Service. At length (as evil Inſtruments are never wanting to wicked purpoſes) one Doryphorianus a Gall, a Fellow impudent even to madneſs it ſelf, he found out and procured him the Place and Authority of Vicar, to whom he gave the Reſcript of the Emperour, and therewith Inſtructions how he might beſt put it in execution; which was by uſing all expedition, for if the leaſt delay happened, he affirmed the man would moſt certainly eſcape. He making all haſte to Rome imaginable, when all perſons came to pay him their Viſits, little minded them, being ſolely intent upon the way and means how to compaſs the death of Aginatius. Having notice that he was at his Houſe in the Countrey, he cauſed him there to be apprehended, and together with him Anepſia, to be brought before him by night, as to hear the Cauſe; but upon his entry he was laid in Chains, and his Slaves, who had been for this purpoſe ſtarved in priſon, were brought forth to accuſe him, and by Stripes even torn in pieces, to conſtrain them to do it, contrary to what the Laws indulged in this caſe of Incontinency. Saying what he would have them, in ſuch Agonies, as ſeemed to uſher in no leſs than very Death, upon theſe words was Aginatius condemned, and without being heard ſentenced and executed, though he appealed to the Emperours; and at the ſame time Anepſia received the like Award. And ſo proſpered for a time the Villainous Projects of Maximinus and his Complices; but Vengeance though often ſlow, yet commonly overtakes ſuch mercileſs perſons: For Maximinus afterward under Gratian bearing himſelf with anſwerable Inſolence, had his Throat cut by the Hand of Juſtice. Simplicius had the like end in Illyricum, and Doryphorianus being condemned and caſt into priſon, the Emperour ſent back into his own Countrey in Gall, and there commanded him to be tortured to death.

The ill Ends afterwards of Maximinus and his Complices.

60. This Maximinus by ſeveral Laws, as well as ſome Hiſtorians, is called by the Name of Maximus; and from the Laws this Story of Ammianus, relating to his Cruelties, receives Confirmation; as it on the other ſide affords light to ſome thing enacted by Valentinian, of which otherwiſe ſo fit an Interpretation could not be given. Ammianus tells us of Reſcripts made by the Emperour upon the malicious Reports of Maximinus; and how the firſt occaſion was given to theſe cruel Acts by the bringing of certain Perſons into queſtion by Chilo and his Wife before Olybrius. And to Olybrius there is ſtill extant an Edict directed under the Title of Præfect of the City, whereby may be too eaſily evinced the facile humour of Valentinian, in reference to thoſe ſevere Courſes. All Perſons of what Quality ſoever, were ſubjected to Tortures, and ſo great a ſence the Nobility had of this practice, that they ſent to the Emperour their Meſſengers with a Petition to put a ſtop to it. “He writes to Olybrius that None ſhould be ſubject to Torture, whom either former Service in the War, or their Birth, or Dignity protected, without his Conſent firſt obtained; except in Caſe of Treaſon, wherein all Perſons he ſaith are of equal Condition. But if any was Convicted to have Forged the Emperours Hand there needed no Conſultation of the Prince in that Caſe, except the perſon were one of the Palatines or a Courtier. Here he declares particularly exempt from Torture the Veterani or old Souldiers, the Curiales, and Perſons of Senatorian Rank, beſides others at preſent Dignified by their Imployments, or the Prince his favour. But he excepts the higheſt Criminals or thoſe that were Guilty of High Treaſon, who indeed by all Law formerly in Force, forfeited all Privileges granted to other Offenders, as alſo did they who were found guilty of Magical Arts, in the Emperours Palace, a Crime which theſe times equalled with High Treaſon it ſelf; in like manner as in this Law, Valentinian conjoins the Counterfeiting of his Hand. And to ſpeak indifferently, by an Edict penned with ſo many exceptions, this Emperour ſeems to have ſo gratified the Nobility upon their Petition, as yet to have left open a door for the indulging of his cruelty upon all occaſions. If any one was accuſed to have Counterfeited his Hand; againſt him Maximinus or any other might proceed without any moleſtation, and if any perſons privileged by former Service, Birth or Dignity were accuſed, he reſerved to himſelf power of Subjecting them to Torture, upon Conſultation; beſides that vaſt latitude given to Accuſations of Treaſon, which he or his Miniſters might eaſily Forge. This our veracity obliges us to obſerve both concerning the humour of this Emperour, and the Privileges granted by former Laws to ſeveral ſorts of perſons, againſt Examination by Torture, of which more hereafter.

Vide Proſopograph. Cod. Th.

A Cunning Law made by Valentinian, whereby he ſeems to have further ſtrengthened the Hands of Maximinus.

L.1. de quæſtionibus Cod. Th. lib. 9. Tit. 35. L. nullus omnino 4 Cod. Juſt. ad leg. Jul. Majeſt. hinc deſumpta eſt; poſteriore tamen ſententia omiſſa, ſed & priori immutata.

61. But Valentinian, at the ſame time, driving on high Deſigns againſt the Enemies of the Empire, thought fit, for prevention of the Excurſions of Barbarians, to Fortifie the Rhine, from Rhætia as far as the Ocean, with great Ramparts, Forts, and Caſtles, where he ſaw convenient, all along the Coaſt of Gall, and by vaſt labour and Charge, (his Men wading up to the Neck while about their work) brought one of them to perfection upon the River Nicer. But indeavouring to raiſe a Fortification in the Enemies Country, when he would not be diverted from his purpoſe by the Fathers of the Hoſtages which had been given up into his Hands, his Men were all Cut off, not one returning with the News of the Defeat, beſides Syagrius, then a Notary, but afterwards Præfect and Conſul, whom in a Rage he Caſhiered and Confined to his own Houſe, for that alone he had eſcaped. In the mean time great Robberies and Murders were committed in Gall, by which, amongſt others periſhed Conſtantianus the Tribunus Stabuli, an Ally of the Emperour, Brother to Cerealis, and Juſtina. But the Audaciouſneſs and Induſtry of the Maratocupreni, Inhabitants of a Town in Syria of ſuch a Name, near to Apamia, is moſt remarkable, who in the Habits of Merchants or Honorati, invaded and rifled whole Towns and Villages. None could be provided for their coming, ſo uncertain was their time and way; for as inconſtant herein they were as the wind, in reference to which ſudden and unexpected Onſets, Ammianus tells us that the Saxons, of all Enemies were in thoſe days moſt dreaded. In like manner, as when a Condemned Criminal was to be put to death, the Rationalis of the Treaſury, with his Apparitors came to the Houſe with their Præco before them, ſounding a diſmal Note, and having Executed the party, ſeized on what was found in the Houſe; ſo theſe Robbers by Companies having found out their prey, imitated the Courſe of Juſtice. But having in this manner inriched themſelves, by the Emperours Forces, they were utterly deſtroyed, not one being left alive; and together with them all their Children, leſt having once attained ripeneſs of Age, they might drive the trade of their Fathers.

Valentinian indeavouring to raiſe a Fort in the Country of the Allemans, loſeth his men.

The Maratocupreni ſtrange Robbers.

Utterly rooted out.

62. About the ſame time Theodoſius here in Britain marched from Auguſta, which the Antients, (our Author tells you) called Lundonium; and with a ſtout Army he had carefully provided, repaired much the weak and tottering Eſtate of the Provincials. Diſcharging as well all the Offices of an active and hardy Souldier, as Theodoſius from London, ſettles matters here in Britain.

Sect.2.

A.D. 370.

of a ſagacious and vigilant Captain, he defeated ſeveral People, whom Pride and Inſolence had thruſt forward to their own ruine, and laid the Foundations of quiet and ſecurity for a long time, reſtoring both the Cities and Garriſons, though in never ſo great diſorder, to as good a condition as ever they had been in. But while he performed this ſignal Service to the State, and ſecured the Countrey, he himſelf was in very great danger: For one Valentine of Valeria, (part of Pannonia) an inſolent Fellow, Brother to the Wife of Maximinus the Horſleach lately mentioned, being for a great Offence baniſhed into this Iſland, impatient of reſt plotted how to deſtroy him, as the onely perſon that was in a condition to withſtand other miſchievous Deſigns he had in his Head. As opportunity preſented it ſelf, by great Promiſes he allured both baniſhed perſons and Souldiers, and prepared them for an Attempt; but ere the Deſign was put in execution, it was diſcovered to the General, who thereupon committed Valentine, with ſome few of his moſt intimate Complices, to Dulcitius a Dux in theſe parts, with Orders to put them to death. But having reaſon to be cautious, as he was a man in Military Skill ſurpaſſing all others of his time, he would not permit any further Inquiſition to be made into the Conſpiracy, leſt by terrour ſtruck into ſo many guilty perſons, the tempeſtuous Troubles of the Provinces at preſent well appeaſed, ſhould again revive. He turned himſelf from this buſineſs, to the ſettling of matters as yet out of order, and chiefly to the fortifying of the Borders; and having recovered a Province which the Enemies had overrun, and reſtored it to its former condition, upon his motion it had a Governour of its own appointed, and by the Prince his command received the Name of Valentia. Theſe Enemies muſt be the ſame with thoſe Ammianus formerly mentioned, viz. the Picts and Scots, whom Claudian the Poet, in his Panegyrick to Honorius, the Grandſon of this Theodoſius, mentions alſo as beaten, and reſtrained by him. The Areans, a ſort of men inſtituted by the Ancients, being by little and little degenerated, he removed from their Stations, it being apparent that (induced thereto by great Rewards) they had diſcovered ſeveral times to the Barbarians what was done or debated by the Roman Officers, quite contrary to the deſign of their Inſtitution: For their charge was to run to and fro, and having made Diſcovery of what the Enemy was about, thereof to advertiſe the Commanders. After he had with much commendation performed this Service, he was ſent for to Court, and (if the Hiſtorian flatter not his Son) left his Charge with no leſs Honour, than formerly had waited on the Induſtry and Fortunes of Furius Camillus, or Papirius Curſor. Indeed Symmachus tells his Grandſon, that for theſe Atchievements both in Britain and Africk he had Statues erected to his Memory; but this may be conceived done after the Advancement of his Family. Cambden alſo brings in Pacatus Drepanus, telling amongſt other things how the Scot was driven by him into his Fens and Bogs, and the Saxon conſumed by Battels at Sea.

Ille leves Mauros, nec falſo nomine Pictos Edomuit, Scotúmq; vago mucrone ſecutus. De tertio Honorii Conſulatu.

Lib.10. ep.22.

The third Conſulſhip of Valentinian and Valens.

A. D. 370. Valentiniano & Valente A.A.3 Coſ.

63. The Year following being the CCCLXX of our Lord, had for Conſuls the two Emperours Valentinian and Valens the third time, Olybrius ſtill continuing Præfect of the City, to whom ſucceeded Ampelius ere the Year was out. Olybrius his Government was too milde and gentle, eſpecially conſidering the great Luxury and Effeminateneſs both of Senators and the ordinary ſort, which Ammianus deſcribes in many words. His onely ſtudy was how to be Complaiſant; he was a bitter Enemy to Calumniators, (yet imployed Maximinus) and to the Rapacity of the Treaſury, and very upright of himſelf in all matters of Judicature; but in his declining years he was given alſo to Luxury, pleaſing himſelf with Stage-Plays, and addicted to Women, though in no forbidden way; and his Succeſſour was much of his humour, for though now and then he made ſhew of Severity, and to reform ſome particulars relating to Taverns and Victualling Houſes; yet again he grew remiſs, and ſo did the more harm by his Inconſtancy. As ſeldom ever did Ruine and Deſolation fall upon any State or Nation, but Vice and Debauchery uſhered them in: So this very Year the Saxons from the Sea in great multitudes fell upon the Borders of the Empire, where they raged with Fire and Sword, and committed grievous Outrages. Againſt them Naunenus a Comes, a good Souldier, who commanded in thoſe Parts, made head, but finding himſelf too weak to ſuſtain the ſhock, therewith acquainted the Emperour, who ſent Severus a Magiſter Militum to his aſſiſtance; and he having the Command of a good Army, ſo diſtreſſed and terrified the Enemy before they came to fight, that they begged peace, which after much debate being found convenient for the Empire, as matters ſtood, was at length granted them; but as they were returning to their own Seats, they were all cut off by thoſe that were ſent to way-lay them, moſt perfidiouſly doubtleſs; although Ammianus not able to excuſe the Crime in the whole, would do it in part by terming them no better than a Company of Thieves and Robbers.

The Saxons infeſt the Coaſts.

After Peace granted are perfidiouſly cut off.

64. This Treachery thus well ſucceeding, Valentinian, who all this Year lay at Triers, ſeriouſly conſidered how he might beſt curb the Inſolence of the Allemans; and Macrianus their King, who ever and anon affronted him by their Inrodes, and notwithſtanding they were frequently defeated, and returned with great loſs, yet were as numerous as if they had not been touched for many Ages together. At length he reſolved to make uſe of the Burgundians againſt them, a warlike Nation, very populous and terrible to all their Neighbours. He held private Intelligence with their Kings, and by Letters promiſed to paſs the Rhine with his own Forces, and aſſiſt them in that work they thought was too much for themſelves alone. They willingly accepted of his Alliance, both becauſe they imagined they were deſcended of old time from the Romans, and becauſe they had bitter Conteſts with the Allemans, about Salt Pits and the Limits of their Countrey. And they were ready at the appointed time; but the Emperour being imployed in building Forts, failed of his word, and they ſent to him that he would come and fetch them off; but as to this, Delays were alſo made, whereat enraged as finding themſelves abuſed, in great wrath they put to the Sword all the Priſoners they had taken, and returned into their own Countrey. A King amongſt theſe Burgundians was by a general Name called Hendinos, and was wont to be depoſed, if under him they had had ill ſucceſs in War, or the Earth had not brought forth Fruits in a plentiful manner: Like as the Ægyptians of old aſcribed ſuch Accidents to their Governours. Their Chief Prieſt they called Siniſtus, being for Life, and obnoxious to no ſuch ſevere Laws as their Kings were. Theodoſius then Magiſter Equitum made war upon ſuch of the Allemans, as for fear of that Nation were diſperſed through Rhætia, of whom ſo many as he took, he ſent by the Emperours Order into Italy, where receiving a fertile Countrey about the Po, they continued Tributaries to the Empire.

The Burgundians abuſed by Valentinian.

The Province of Tripolis in a ſad condition.

65. About this time miſerable was the Condition of the Province of Tripolis in Africk, partly by reaſon of the Incurſions of Enemies, and chiefly through the Deceit and Villany of pretended Friends. The next neighbouring Nation to them were the Aſturiani, a ſort of Barbarians exceedingly addicted to Rapine, who made frequent Inrodes; but being perſwaded or compelled to be quiet for ſome time, more vigorouſly than ever renewed their Hoſtilities upon this occaſion. There was one of their Countrymen, Stachao by Name, who coming within the Roman Pale plaid there ſeveral pranks, and ventured ſo far as to tamper about betraying of the Province, for which he was apprehended, convicted, and burnt alive. Hereat they exclaimed as a moſt cruel and perfidious Act, and like to wilde Beaſts all ran out of their Dens to revenge the death of their Friend and Kinſman; which thing happened when the Emperour Jovian was ſtill living. They were not ſo bold as to attacque Leptis, a City ſtrong both in its Walls and number of Inhabitants; but for three days continued in that fruitful Countrey about it, where they killed all they met with, burnt what ſtuff they could not carry away and took priſoner Silva, one of the Primates of the Town, who by chance was then with his Family in the Countrey. Thoſe of Leptis concerned (as they had reaſon) at ſuch an Accident, deſired Protection of Romanus, who then was newly promoted to be Comes of Africk; but he refuſed utterly to ſtir, except they would make very large Proviſion for him, and beſides furniſh him with four thouſand Camels for his Expedition. The poor people were amazed at his demand, and declared, that after ſo much loſs ſuſtained by the Barbarians, they were in no condition to make ſuch Preparations, which he having heard, after forty days ſhuffling and diſſimulation roſe up and went his way. All their hopes as to aſſiſtance from him being gone, and the time of the General Council of the Province, which with them was Annual, being now at hand, they made choice of Severus and Flaccianus for their Meſſengers, who with certain Golden Images of Victory, which they ſent to Valentinian, as Congratulatory upon his Aſſumption of the Government, as we have ſaid the Cuſtom was, ſhould alſo preſent him with an account of their diſtreſſed Condition. Romanus the Comes, the Council being publick, could not but have notice of the Meſſage deſigned, and he ſent away in Poſt to Remigius, the Magiſter Officiorum, his Couſin (by Craft as well as Kindred) to deſire that he would perſuade the Emperour to refer the buſineſs to the Vicar of Africk and himſelf. The Meſſengers preſented their Petition, and offered to prove the Contents thereof, which Remigius in behalf of his Friend denied. And the Emperour not knowing which Party to believe, the whole matter was Romanus the Comes of Africk refuſes to relieve the People invaded by the Barbarians.

And by his Intereſt in Remigius at Court their Petition comes to nothing.

was put off to conſideration and a further hearing; as is uſual in Courts, where there is an hurry of buſineſs.

66. But, while the diſtreſſed People of Tripolis expected Relief from Court, the Barbarians encouraged by the ſame Motives as put them out of heart, came down again, and made miſerable waſte in all the Tract belonging to Leptis, and Oea, a City placed betwixt it and Sabrata, from which three the Province of Tripolis had its Name. They killed ſeveral Decuriones, and amongſt others Ruſticianus, who had born the Dignity of Prieſthood, and Nicaſius an eminent Ædilis; and no way could there be found of Reſiſtance, becauſe the Charge of the Militia, which at the prayers of the Meſſengers had been committed to Ruricius the Preſident, was lately transferred to Romanus. The noiſe of this Devaſtation flew as far as the Emperour into Gall, and ſo ſtartled him, that he ſent away Palladius a Tribune and Notary, both to pay the Army of Africk their Arrears, and to bring him a true Information concerning the ſtate of Tripolis. But ſtill the Auſturiani, as ravenous Creatures which had got a taſte of Bloud, encouraged by all theſe Delays, renewed their Incurſions, and killing thoſe that could not by flight avoid them, plundered and burnt as formerly; and neither would leave ſtanding any Vines nor other Trees. Mychon, a Citizen of principal note, was caught near the Town, and made his Eſcape before he was bound; but to hide himſelf he fell down into a Pit, and breaking one of his Ribs was taken up again by the Barbarians, and led to the Gates, where he was ranſomed by his Wife, and being drawn up by a Cord to the top of the Wall, died of his Bruiſe after two days. Grown ſtill more and more inſolent upon the liberty they had got to do what they liſted, they attacqued Leptis, and for eight days together continued their Siege; but having ſome of their number wounded, without any effect they went away ſomething diſcouraged. The Townſmen at their wits end, and not hearing what was become of their former Meſſengers, ſent now other two, Jovinus and Pancratius, to inform the Emperour of what they had both ſeen and ſuffered, who coming to Carthage, and there finding Severus and Flaccianus, underſtood from them that their buſineſs was referred to the Vicar and the Comes: And Severus died preſently after, but the other haſtened to the Court with as great Journies as poſſibly they could make.

The Barbarians attempt Leptis, but in vain.

67. But Romanus having heard of the coming of Palladius the Tribune and Notary, whom (as we ſaid) the Emperour ſent with the Souldiers Pay, and to give him Intelligence how matters ſtood in Africk, to ſecure himſelf dealt privately with the Principals of the Army, that the greateſt ſhare of what he brought ſhould be given to him, which he readily enough accepted, and went on his way to Leptis. There he received the miſerable Complaints of the Inhabitants, and by Erechthius and Ariſtomenes (the chief of the Town) was conducted to ſee the lamentable Deſolations of the Countrey, which having beheld he reviled Romanus, and threatned fully to inform the Emperour how matters had gone, who thereupon in great fear and wrath affirmed, that he alſo would turn Informer, and certifie the Prince how he being ſent as a Notary of approved Fidelity, had converted the greateſt ſhare of the Souldiers Donative to his own private uſe; wherewith the Notary being frighted, agreed with Romanus to conceal all from Valentinian, whom at his Return he falſly informed, that they had complained without juſt cauſe. Hereupon was he ſent back with Jovinus, the onely Meſſenger left of the two, for Pancratius was dead at Triers, that together with the Vicar he might hear the Caſe of the Tripolitans; and Valentinian ordered, that Erecthius and Ariſtomenes ſhould have their Tongues cut out of their Heads, for having uſed too free Diſcourſe, as Palladius had informed. The Notary came back to Tripolis in order to the Affair with the Vicar, which Romanus underſtanding, ſent his own Domeſtick, and Cæcilius his Counſellour born in the Province, who ſo wrought upon the Townſmen either by cheating Language or Bribes, (it's uncertain whether) that they utterly denied they had given order to Jovinus to ſay any ſuch thing as he had done to the Emperour; by which the man affrighted, to ſave his Life as he thought, yielded and ſaid he had lied to him. Valentinian hearing thus much from Palladius at his Return, and being naturally inclined to Severity, commanded Jovinus as principal Contriver, and three others as Acceſſaries to Falſhood, as alſo Ruricius the Preſident as a Lyar, to be put to death. Ruricius, who in his Relation was accuſed alſo to have uſed ſome biting Expreſſions, was executed at Sitifis, and the other at Utica, by Sentence of Creſcens the Vicar. Flaccianus having hardly eſcaped the Fury of the Souldiers, when he was heard by the Vicar and Comes, who cried out that the Tripolitans might thank themſelves for not being at firſt relieved, was thrown into priſon, and made his Eſcape to Rome, where he died.

Villanous Practices betwixt Romanus and Palladius.

68. So continued miſerable Tripolis under its cruel Oppreſſions, both from Forein and Domeſtick Enemies; though Juſtice it ſelf, which ſeemed to bewail its Condition, kept its Eternal Eye (as our Author words it) ſtill waking, and the Bloud of the Meſſengers and the Preſident continued their cries for Revenge, which long after came to paſs, according to the uſual Saying, that Murder will out at laſt: For when Palladius was diſmiſſed from his Attendance, and deſtitute of his former Supports of Pride and Confidence, was retired to a Private Life, and Theodoſius was come into Africk to ſuppreſs Firmus, who was there attempting to ſet up for Sovereign; as he was taking a view of Romanus his Moveables, which he was ordered to do, he found a Letter amongſt his Papers of one Meterius with this Inſcription, To his Lord and Patron Romanus; and after ſeveral other matters nothing to the purpoſe theſe words were added, Palladius the forlorn ſalutes you, who ſaith he is diſmiſſed for no other cauſe, than for having lied to the Emperour in the cauſe of the Tripolitans. The Letter was ſent to Court, and Meterius with all ſpeed apprehended, who confeſſed he wrote it, and thereupon Palladius was alſo ſent for, who conſidering of how great a Villany he was guilty, eſcaped his Keepers by night, as they were celebrating a Chriſtian Vigil, and hanged himſelf. Encouraged at the Report hereof Erecthius and Ariſtomenes, who for fear of having their Tongues cut out had eſcaped and hid themſelves, came forth, and gave an account of the whole matter to Gratian, who (Valentinian being now dead) referred them to Heſperius the Proconſul, (the Son of Auſonius his Schoolmaſter) and Flavianus the Vicar, who afterward ſided with Eugenius the Uſurper. They heard the matter with all indifference, and ſubjecting Cæcilius to Torture, he confeſſed how by his Arts the Citizens were perſuaded to belie their Meſſengers; and Remigius afterward died by the Halter, as may be ſhewn in its proper place. This ſtory ſo eminent for the Variety, acquaints us with the corrupt Inclinations of the great ones of thoſe days; and how careful Princes, who ſee by other mens Eyes, and hear by their Ears, ought to be, eſpecially in matters relating nearly to the Safety of their People, and to Bloud: So miſerably was Valentinian gulled through the Treachery of thoſe about him, that by the Tricks of Romanus, and the falſe Suggeſtions of his Magiſter Officiorum, this very year he ſeems to have made an ill-grounded Law upon this very occaſion: For, there is extant an Edict directed to Claudius the Proconſul of Africk, on the ſecond of February, in the Conſulſhip of Valentinianus nobiliſſimus puer and of Victor, whereby it is ordained, That if any Meſſengers come to Court with improbable or ſuperfluous Requeſts, that at their own charge they be ſent back with their own Horſes or Carriage-Beaſts. For, as we have before obſerved, the Meſſengers of the Province were allowed the uſe of the Curſus publicus, and Princes ever pretended to have their Ears open, by free Acceſs to their Complaints. To prevent all idle Addreſſes, Valentinian by other Laws had formerly taken care, as having the Decrees they brought with them firſt entered amongſt the Records of the ordinary Judges of Provinces then, examined, and reported to the Prince by the Præfectus Prætorio. But this further Severity with all probability proceeded from the Arts of the Perſons lately mentioned, and their poſſeſſing of him with Prejudice againſt the Meſſengers ſent from the Tripolitans, the Edict being directed to the Proconſul of that Province.

L.6. de Legatis & Decretis, &c. Cod.Th.l. 12.tit.12.

69. But while they of Tripolis would gladly have tilled their Lands and could not, or reaped the Fruits of their own Labours, there were ſome in Gall who might have done both the one and the other, and would not, as appears by an Edict directed to Jovinus, who was now Magiſter Militum in that Countrey: By this he encourages the Veterani, or old Souldiers diſmiſſed, to till and improve the Lands of ſuch as were abſent and neglected them, aſſuring them they ſhould enjoy the Profits of their Labours, or the Fruits of their own Improvement, without any Rent or Allowance made to the Owners, from whom the Law doth not take away the Inheritance or Dominion of the Grounds themſelves. Two days after the Date of this Law he directed another to Olybrius the Præfect of the City, for Explanation of an Edict made by Conſtantine the Great, (to whom he gives the Title of his Divine Parent) in favour of the Daughters of ſuch as had been nominated to the Prætorſhip, and died before the ſetting forth of their Games, that they ſhould be excuſed from any Charge, if ſo be they had no Brothers. Indeed if ſuch a Candidate for the Prætorſhip left any Sons, there was no doubt but receiving their Fathers Inheritance therewith, they were obnoxious to this Charge of the Games; although generally the Law favoured the Children of ſuch as being onely named to a Place,

died

L.11. de Veteranis, Cod.Th.l. 6.tit.20.

L.17. de Prætoribus, Cod.Th. l.6.tit.4.

Valentinian explains a Law of Conſtantine the Great, which he made in favour of Women.

Other Laws he makes for Incouragement of Learned Men.

As Phyſicians.

L. 9. de Medicis & Profeſſoribus. Cod. Th. & L. Si quis in Archiatri. Cod. Juſt. lib. 10. eod. tit.

died before they came to Execute the Office; but here remained a queſtion, whether in caſe both Sons and Daughters were left Heirs together, the burthen ſhould deſcend upon the Daughters too, according to their ſhare in the Inheritance; which Valentinian, by this Conſtitution, determines againſt the Women, contrary to the general Rule of Law, that thoſe who ſhould not have the Advantage or Honour of a thing, ſhould not be Subject to the Burthen or Inconvenience, for Sons might execute and enjoy the Honour and Dignity of the Prætorſhip, but Daughters could not. But ſuch was the Burthen of this Office, that he thought fit thus to order it, and Ordain the ſame to be practiſed in other Services of this Nature. But to the ſame Olybrius, at this very time, he directed other Edicts of greater Conſequence, for the Incouragement and Advancement of Learning, and the Liberal Profeſſions in that City. We mentioned a Law made by him two years before, Inſcribed to Prætextatus the Predeceſſor of Olybrius for Regulating and Incouraging the Archiatri, or Ordinary Phyſicians of Rome. This now by another he Confirms, both as to the Maintenance, number, and Election of them; but requires greater Caution in the ſupply of every Vacancy, in three reſpects. For, whereas by the former he required the Election to be made by all the Number; by this he will have it perfected by the Conſent or Votes of the Major part, as is more agreeable to Law, and the Cuſtom of all Corporations, or Societies. And whereas in that to Prætextatus he had ſaid only in general, that another was to be Choſen into the Place of the deceaſed, thence a Queſtion aroſe, whether if a Senior died, his Succeſſour ſhould not Succeed in his Seniority; which now he Determines in the Negative, ordering him that came in laſt to take the laſt or inferiour place, the Courſe generally uſed; although a Queſtion happened ſome years after concerning one John, who being a Palatine, or the Emperours Phyſician, challenged the place next to the Chief or Preſident, and ſome were of Opinion, that he ought to have ſuch Seniority as he might have had, had he been Elected at ſuch time as he was entertained in the Prince his Service; but it was determined againſt him. In the laſt place is obſervable that this Law doth not require, as did the former, that the Prince ſhould be conſulted upon the ſupply of a vacant place.

L. 1. de Studiis liberalibus urbis Romæ Cod. Th. lib. 14. tit. 9.

70. This Law ſeems but a part of one large Conſtitution made now, as we ſaid, for the Incouragement of Learned men, whereof another relates to the Liberal Studies of Rome in general, and a third to Advocates. That concerning Liberal Studies is ſtill extant in the Code of Theodoſius, thought not tranſcribed into that of Juſtinian, becauſe Relating to thoſe times, and contains ſeveral Academical Statutes, for Regulating the manners and Converſation of ſuch as Studied at Rome, and the time allotted to them. For in this Age whereof we write, Rome was a Famous Univerſity, abounding with moſt excellent Profeſſors, to hear whom the Youth flocked from all Parts, eſpecially out of Africk, although that Countrey had been formerly the Nurſe of Lawyers, and there, particularly at Carthage, were Schools wherein the Liberal Arts were Profeſſed. But to Rome they came chiefly for obtaining the knowledge of the Law, and of Eloquence; which were taught here for a long time after, even in the dayes of the Gothick Kings. But great was alſo the Corruption of Manners in this City, as Ammianus Marcellinus largely complains, in this very Age; ſcandalous was it grown by conſtant Revellings, and Drunkenneſs, Gaming, Whoring, and perpetual running to the Theatres. Therefore it highly concerned Valentinian, for the Publick good, to provide as much as might be, that the Youth that came thither to Study, might not be corrupted in ſo flexible an Age, and a place of ſo ill Example; and this he did by ſeveral Orders or Rules, than which for accompliſhing ſuch an End, nothing can be more exact. The firſt is that when they came, they ſhould bring with them Letters Dimiſſory and Teſtimonial from the Judges or Governours of the Provinces where they lived; wherein ſhould be expreſt what was their Country, where they were born, and the Quality of their Parents. In the next place, when they arrived they ſhould produce theſe Letters before the Magiſter Cenſus, whoſe duty it was, as alſo of his Officers or Cenſuales, amongſt other things to ſee good order kept; and eſpecially that Strangers demeaned themſelves ſoberly and as became them. Then were they (doubtleſs before this Magiſter) to declare what they would Study, or make Profeſſion of; whether of Greek or Roman Eloquence, Law, Philoſophy, or the like; and ſo underwent a kind of Matriculation at preſent practiſed in Modern Univerſities. But beſides this, the Cenſuales were to know where they lodged, that it might not be in any ſuſpicious Place, or where they might be diverted from their Studies. And they were further to take care that they kept no bad company, nor were preſent at any unlawful or dangerous Meetings.

He regulates the manners of the Students of the Liberal Arts.

71.

Sect. 2. A.D. 370.

71. It was one of the Crimes of this Age and City, that the Theatres were too much haunted, and as Ammianus tells us, Olybrius the Præfect himſelf, to whom this Law is directed, was guilty of the ſame fault; therefore as it was a blemiſh to all that Studied, or were imployed in grave or ſerious Matters, as Eccleſiaſticks, Judges, and Souldiers, to frequent the Spectacula; ſo as pernicious to Learning, he forbids it here to his Scholars; and moreover all unſeaſonable Feaſtings, which either by their length, or the time wherein they were uſed, would hinder them from their Studies, and create in them ill Habits. If theſe Rules and Cautions would not prevail, in ſuch a Caſe the Student that demeaned himſelf unworthily, was publickly to be beaten, or whipped, expelled the City, and being put on Shipboard, carried back into Africk, if that was his Country; which though ſevere, yet was eſteemed no more than requiſite, to reſtrain the Corrupt Humour of the Times. After this he preſcribes the time they were there to Study, which he Limits to the twentieth year of their Age; for this was the uſual period of Studies: a Boy from the twelfth year to the fourteenth, being ſuppoſed to Study Grammar and Geometry, and afterwards in the Univerſity, Rhetorick, Philoſophy, Mathematicks, and the Law; for they Learnt in thoſe dayes the two Languages with eaſe in their Infancy, which we now toil at a long time; and yet Diocleſian formerly permitted the Youth of Arabia, to Study in the Univerſity of Berytus, till the twenty fifth year of their Age, a longer ſpace he would not permit them to avoid the Imployments of their Countries. In the tenth place, he orders the Præfect of the City, to admoniſh the Cenſuales, to whom the Charge of theſe Scholars did belong, every Month to exhibit a Catalogue, and Account of them, as what they were, and whence they came, and who were to be ſent back into Africk, or other Provinces, their term being already expired; except they were ſuch as belonged to any Body, Company, or Society in Rome, which injoyed this amongſt many other Privileges, that their Students could not be forced to quit the place. The laſt Rule is, that the Catalogues, or Accounts of what Students were in Rome, and what were ready to depart, ſhould every year be ſent up to the Prince himſelf, that He finding out the Merits and Qualifications of each, might make uſe of them for Publick Service, as he ſaw convenient. So did a Lady that Reigned here in England, in the laſt Century, require every three years an Account from the Chancelors of the two Univerſities, of what eminent Scholars there were in every Profeſſion, whom as ſhe had occaſion ſhe noted down, and marked for Imployment, to ſend them abroad, or prefer them at home, as their Inclinations and her Service required. This is the ſecond Branch of the large Conſtitution whereof we ſpake. The laſt commands Judges, that in hearing of Cauſes they aſſign Council to the Parties as indifferently as may be, that ſo neither the moſt knowing, nor moſt ignorant, may be all on one ſide. If any Advocate ſhould deny his Aſſiſtance to any party, after the Judge his Aſſignation, he ſhould loſe his place without any Hope of Reſtitution; and if any of the Parties had procured a Combination of Advocates againſt his Adverſary; ſo as to deprive him of equal Defence, he ſhould be eſteemed as one who by indirect Courſes went about to Bolſter up an unjuſt and tottering Cauſe.

L.7. de poſtulando. Cod. Juſt. lib. 2. tit 6.

Gives order about Aſſignation of Advocates.

72. About this time Valens in the Eaſt found his Revenue impaired, by the neglect of thoſe that wrought in his Mines of Thrace, who, it ſeems, not enduring the burthen impoſed upon them, ran away from their work. He had ſent Orders through his own Diſtrict, that wherever they ſhould be found, the owners of the Grounds in which they now imployed themſelves, ſhould ſend them back; and whereas many of them had betaken themſelves into the Neighbouring Countries of Illyricum and Macedonia, he had prayed Aſſiſtance of his Brother, to drive them thence. This Valentinian endeavoured by an Edict directed on the nineteenth of March to Probus Præfectus Prætorio, Remarkable for other hints it affoards, beſides the main buſineſs intended by it. Therein he gives the Title of Dominus noſter to Valens, though his younger Brother, and one Advanced by himſelf. From this Law it is evident, that Illyricum and the Dioceſs of Macedonia, in the Diviſion of the Empire, belonged to him. And hereby we ſee that Illyricum and Macedonia were at this time under the Diſpoſition of Probus, as alſo Italy and Africk, as appears by other Laws. We may alſo obſerve that, at this time Macedonia was diſtinct from Illyricum, as in the Breviary of Feſtus Rufus, which (the year preceding this) he dedicated to the Emperour Valens, though in its general Name Illyricum alſo included Macedonia; and Macedonia and Dacia, (theſe two Dioceſes) afterwards conſtituted the Præfectſhip of the Eaſtern Illyricum, at what time Illyricum was divided, and the Miners Commanded to return into Thrace.

L.7. de Metallis Cod. Th. lib. 10. tit. 19.

Weſtern belonged to the Weſtern Empire, though now when this Law was made, both Weſtern and Eaſtern, as far as Thrace, appertained to the ſhare of Valentinian. Hence comes it that Ammianus makes mention but of three Præfecti Prætorio, under theſe two Princes, and ſignifies Epirus to have alſo been Subject to this Probus, which certainly afterward belonged to the Eaſtern Illyricum. But Valentinian was willing enough to Comply with his Brother, as in other matters ſo eſpecially where any Rigour or Severity could be ſhewed, to which he was very much inclined, as not only Hiſtorians teſtifie, but may ſufficiently appear from the Laws. He had the year before publiſhed a Conſtitution againſt ſuch as ſhould Uſurp the Right of the Panis Gradilis, or the Bread belonging to the poor Citizens of Rome; but the Penalty he thought was not ſharp enough, as depriving only the Maſters of Slaves, Officials and Apparitors, of the uſe thereof. But now, by the Inſtigation, as we may eaſily gueſs, of Maximinus or Maximus. that cruel Blood-Sucker, lately mentioned, who at this time bore the Office of Præfectus Annonæ, he directed another Edict to him, which bears date on the ſame day, as that concerning Miners; and diſcovers the Diſpoſition of both Prince and Officer. Notice was taken that the Agents and Slaves of Senators, and others intruded themſelves amongſt the poor, and, under the Vizard of ſuch, by Favour or Connivance of the Scribe belonging to the Præfect (who was to keep an Account or Catalogue of the Perſons concerned) were admitted to the Allowance; ſuch Agents or Servants as ſhould ſo do, he Commands to be put to the Rack, to know whether they did it without, or with the Conſent and knowledge of their Lords. If without, he Condemns them to ſerve in Chains, in the Bake-Houſe they had ſo defrauded. If their Lords were privy and Conſenting, He Confiſcates their Houſes; though a very ſevere thing it was indeed, that Slaves ſhould be examined by torture againſt their Maſters. As for others who without Right or Title had ſhared in the Allowance, if they had Eſtates, both them and their Eſtates he Condemns to be annexed to the Body, or Company of the Bakers; and if poor, to ſerve in the Houſe with manual Labour. And as for the Scribe, if it hapned through his Corruption or Favour, no leſs a puniſhment he inflicts on him than death.

L. 6. de Annonis Civicis. Cod. Th.

A Severe Law againſt ſuch as intruded amongſt the Poor, and got their Bread.

Valentinian is Indulgent to Widows and Orphans.

L. 6. de Cenſu. Cod. Th. lib. 13. tit. 10.

As alſo to Phyſicians and Profeſſion.

L. 10. de Medicis Profeſſor. Cod Th. lib. 13. tit. 3.

L. L. 71, 72, 73. de Decurioribus.

73. More favourable he was to Widows, and Orphans, at this time, whom he Exempted from Impoſitions uſually laid upon Plebeians, beſides ſuch as entred into Religion, of which we are to ſpeak in another place. As great favour he extended to the Phyſicians, and Profeſſors of the City of Rome, to whom as alſo to their Wives he grants Immunity from all Publick Services, and Burthens, and namely, from the finding of Souldiers; for, having as well as other Citizens Eſtates in the Provinces, upon occaſion of the War with the Allemans, they might be called on to ſet out their Men, as alſo to afford quarter, as well as their Neighbours, from which Burthen he alſo declares them free, to the great Incouragement of Learning. Several other Laws he made alſo at this time, for the better Regulating of Corporations, as that no Promotions per ſaltum ſhould be permitted of any therein, but to be nulled by the Governour of the Province, without any power left in the Court of the Corporation it ſelf, therein to intermeddle. And, whereas thoſe that were Merchants, and payed the uſual Impoſt upon Wares called Luſtralis Collatio, in caſe they Purchaſed Lands belonging to a Corporation, becauſe of the ſaid Impoſt, thought themſelves freed from all Burthens lying upon the Poſſeſſors of ſuch Lands, he declares on the contrary, that by reaſon of the ſaid Lands, they ſhall be obnoxious to all the Duties relating to the Corporation. Nay further, it appearing upon Complaint, that ſeveral Perſons in Africk, with Deſign to evade the ſaid Duties, had aſpired after the Senatorian Dignity, he Commands that they be forced back to them, except they had been made Governours of Provinces (which yet afterwards he would not allow them to be, except they had paſſed through all the Imployments of the Curia) or except they had ſerved in the Palace; for ſuch having diſcharged all Duties there, might be of the Senatorian Rank, and were freed from theſe Burthens; or Laſtly, except ſuch an one had paſſed the Services of the Field, or after finiſhing his Military Courſe, arrived at that Quality. Now there were ſo many of the Gentiles, as this Age called them, or ſuch as were deſcended of the Barbarous Nations, which were no Members of the Empire, ſpread abroad both in the Armies, and elſwhere, that they gave cauſe of Jealouſie, leſt they ſhould Attempt ſomething againſt the Publick Safety; to prevent which, by a very ſevere Law, he forbids Marriage with them, to all Perſons of what Condition ſoever, and that under no leſs a Penalty, than death it ſelf. Hereby he may ſeem to have been ſenſible

L. Unica de Nuptiis Gentilium Cod. Th. lib. 3. tit. 14.

He Prohibits Marriage with Barbarians.

ſible of thoſe Miſchiefs that followed upon Preferment of thoſe men, who not onely being commanded, but commanding Armies, they had great opportunity to involve the Empire in Troubles, which they vigorouſly improved. For, this Law of Valentinian was afterward ſo far nulled, that by Reſcript of the Prince Licence was indulged to make ſuch Marriages; and Ammianus complains, that in his time the Commanders of thoſe Gentiles (of which there were Numbers or Regiments in the Army) were not Romans, but of the ſame original with their Souldiers. They conquered the Provinces by degrees, and in Juſtinians time had ſo far embodied themſelves with the People, that this Law, to which the temper of the times would by no means ſubmit, was (as antiquated) by Tribonian omitted to be put into his Code. It was directed to Theodoſius with the Character of Magiſter Equitum, wherein he had ſucceeded Jovinus at his Return out of Britain.

74. But we may return for ſome time into the Eaſt, when the Winter of this year was over, Sapor King of Perſia having ſufficiently provided himſelf, ſent an Army which brake into the Roman Territories. Againſt it was oppoſed Trajan a Count and Vadomarius, who had been a King of the Allemans, with a conſiderable Force, but with Orders rather to make a Defenſive than an Offenſive War. They governed themſelves according to their Inſtructions, declining an Engagement as much as poſſible, that they might not be reputed Breakers of the Peace, but by neceſſity were forced to make uſe of their Arms, and thereby obtained the Victory. Yet was it not ſo great but the Enemy ſtill kept the Field, and ſeveral Skirmiſhes afterward happened with various ſucceſs, wherewith the Somer was ſpent, and then a Truce was made by conſent of both Parties. Though theſe two Captains were (as we have it from Ammianus) imployed againſt the Perſians; yet Zoſimus tells us, that Valens himſelf moved Eaſtward, but by ſlow Journies, being imployed as he went along in hearing the Meſſages and Complaints of the Cities, which he gratified by granting all juſt things they deſired; that when he came to Antioch he ordered his matters relating to the War with good caution; that having wintered in that City, when the Spring would permit his March, he removed to Hierapolis, whence leading his Army againſt the Enemy, upon the approach of Winter he returned again to the ſame Quarters. Now that he marched into the Eaſtern parts appears ſufficiently from the Dates of ſeveral Laws, which alſo in Winter fix him at Conſtantinople, whatever Zoſimus writes of Antioch, at which City yet he might reſide ſome time during his Expedition. From Conſtantinople he firſt removed to Nicomedia, and thence to Cyzicus, where he ſettled a matter in controverſie betwixt the ordinary Judges of Provinces and their Officials, or Apparitors, viz. the Principes, Cornicularii, Commentarienſes, Adjutores, Numerarii, ab Actis, a Libellis, Exceptores, and the reſt formerly mentioned. It had been a great Queſtion whether they might appeal from their Judges whom they ſerved, who being but Annual might impoſe very harſh Conditions upon them; and yet without ſome Awe there could be no good Goverment of theſe men, who having their Places for Life, would little regard the Menaces of that perſon, who they knew would be out of his Office ſhortly, and conſequently out of capacity to puniſh their Miſdemeanours. Valens therefore took a middle courſe, declaring that in Civil matters Appeal ſhould lie, but not in Criminal Cauſes; for if they neglected their Duty, and their Magiſtrate whom they ſerved had no power of Puniſhment, how precarious muſt his Imployment neceſſarily be?

Ammian. l.29.

L.4.p.742.

A Truce made with the Perſians.

L.17. quorum appellationes non recip. Cod. Th.l.11.tit.36

Valens will not have the Officers belonging to vernours of Provinces appeal from them in Criminal Cauſes.

75. From Cyzicus he removed to Cæſarea in Cappadocia, thence to Antioch, and his next Stage was at Hierapolis, where he created ſeveral Laws! The firſt of them is that famous one, whereby he reſtored to the City of Conſtantinople the old Privilege called Jus Italicum, of which we have already ſpoken upon occaſion of the founding of that City. Being now intent upon the War for the filling up of his Troops, he iſſued out an Edict to Modeſtus the Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt: Therein for encouragement to Tirones or new Souldiers, and they that ſet them forth, he declares, That as ſoon as they were liſted in the Army, if formerly ſubject to the Cenſus or Tax, they ſhould thereupon be diſcharged ipſo facto, and their Wives alſo after they had ſerved five years; Provided they had brought them home to their own houſes: For although Marriage by the Roman Law was accompliſhed by the conſent and affection of the Parties; yet foraſmuch as there was to be ſome evident ſign and declaration thereof, moſt commonly the leading or conveying of the Woman to the Mans Houſe was taken as concluding, and in ſome caſes it was neceſſarily required; ſufficient Proof being otherwiſe wanting, and for prevention of Fraudulent Practices, it being eaſie to pretend Affection and Con-

L.un. de Italico Jure urbis Conſtantinop. Cod. Th.l.14.tit.13

L.6. de Tironibus, Cod. Th. l.7.tit.13.

Gives Rules about Tirones or young Souldiers.

Inde phraſis Uxorem ducere.

Conſent. As for the publick Benediction of Marriage in the Church by the hands of Prieſts, it was not as yet introduced by any publick Law. In the ſecond place he declares what ſort of men ſhall be preſented for Tirones, not any Stragler or old Souldier, but one born and brought up in the Province, one ſubject to the Cenſus, or one of thoſe they called Adcreſcentes or Supernumeraries; for as both in the Field and in the Palace there were thoſe that were in actual Service, and thoſe who were near unto it, kept as Probationers from amongſt whom Vacancies were ſupplied; ſo in like manner in the Provinces, ſome were actually inrolled in the Ceſſe Books, and there were others who were to ſucceed them upon occaſion. Laſtly, he preſcribes the manner of filling up his Troops to be firſt out of the Adcreſcentes of the Army, and if Supply ſufficient could not be had thence, out of the Tirones, or thoſe newly raiſed or to be raiſed for this purpoſe, or elſe out of the Cenſiti, or ſuch as were ceſſed, to whom recourſe ſhould be had in the laſt place, leſt the publick Revenue might be leſſened by freeing ſo many that were obnoxious to the ordinary Tax.

Qui dum ibi moratur, ſecurus interim hoſtium externorum, inteſtinis penè perierat fraudibus, &c. Am.l.29.

76. The Truce being made betwixt the Empire and Perſia, that King returned to Cteſiphon, there to winter; and the Emperour came back to Antioch, where being out of danger of any Forein Enemy, he was not altogether ſo ſecure from domeſtick Treaſon. There was one Procopius a turbulent and reſtleſs Man, who accuſed Anatolius and Spudaſius, two of the Emperours Servants in the Revenue, of conſpiring againſt the Life of Fortunatianus the Comes rei privatæ, a troubleſom exacting perſon in his Office: He brings the matter before Modeſtus the Præfectus Prætorio, who had ſucceeded Auxonius, and procures one Palladius, an obſcure Fellow, as a Sorcerer hired by them, and Heliodorus a Caſter of Nativities, to be put to the Rack. Palladius to avoid the Torture cried out, That theſe were ſlight matters, and not worth the while in compariſon of ſome other clandeſtine Practices, which if they proceeded would put all things into confuſion; and being encouraged to make the Diſcovery, that one Fiduſtius, who had born the Office of Preſident, with one Irenæus and Pergamius, had by ſecret and deteſtable Arts learnt the Name of him who was to ſucceed after Valens. Fiduſtius being controlled by the Accuſer, confeſſed all, and how he with Hilarius and Patritius, two excellent Artiſts in Divination, had conſulted about that matter, and found out, that an Excellent Prince ſhould ſucceed, and they themſelves come to untimely ends for their Curioſity. That when they conſidered who was beſt able to diſcharge the Sovereign Command, Theodorus ſeemed beſt to deſerve it, who had already obtained the ſecond Degree amongſt the Notaries; and indeed the Man was very remarkable, as deſcended of an ancient and noble Family in Gall, though born in Sicily, exceedingly well educated, and for his Modeſty, Prudence, Humanity, and Learning, acceptable to all men both high and low, and ſeeming to deſerve a much higher place than that he at preſent poſſeſſed. Fiduſtius almoſt tortured to death, declared, that what he had predicted was made known to Theodorus from himſelf, by intervention of one Euſerius, a perſon of great Learning and Quality, as having formerly governed Aſia as Vicar. Hereupon was Euſerius committed to priſon, and the Emperour being acquainted with the whole ſtory, breathed nothing but death and horror againſt thoſe that were conſcious of this Practice, exaſperated by the Flatteries of many about him, particularly of Modeſtus, who (to ſecure himſelf againſt the fears of a Succeſſor) omitted nothing of that nature but made him believe himſelf a clowniſh and ill bred man, though he was as quaint in his Expreſſions as ever was Cicero, and that the Stars at his beck would deſcend into his lap. Now was Theodorus apprehended at Conſtantinople, whither he was gone upon ſome private buſineſs; and from the moſt remote parts many were haled away Eminent for their Nobility and Imployments; the Emperour and his Miniſters giving themſelves reſt neither day nor night from bloudy Inquiſitions. The publick Priſons could not contain the Multitudes they endeavoured to croud into them, neither were private Houſes enough found fit for their receipt. And now Theodorus being detained priſoner in a remote quarter of the Territory, the Trumpets began to ſound (as Ammianus phraſeth it) to Bloud and Slaughters.

Certain perſons by Magical Arts endeavour to know who ſhall ſucceed Valens.

Whereupon he breaths nothing but Torture and Death.

77. But he adds, that as an Hiſtorian, who knowingly omits what had been really done, is as much to blame as he that feigns what was never done: So he muſt not deny, neither could it be doubted, but that the Life of Valens was often endangered by ſecret Conſpiracies of ſome Military Men, whom he had purpoſed to expoſe to imminent perils in Thrace. As he took his reſt once in the Park betwixt Antioch and Seleucia, he narrowly eſcaped being murdered by Saluſt one of the Scutarii.

To which we may adde, that Zoſimus accuſeth this Theodorus of Ambition and Tampering about his future imaginary Preferment. Therefore Ammianus concludes, that he had reaſon to defend himſelf by all means to which Prudence could direct; but in this he could never be excuſed, that in the heat of his Pride and Anger he made no diſtinction betwixt the innocent and the guilty; but while there was reaſon to doubt of the Crime, he was fully reſolved as to the Puniſhment; and to thoſe miſerable people word was brought, that they were condemned before they thought themſelves ſuſpected: So reſolute was he in his bloudy humour, which was exſtimulated by his own Avarice, and of thoſe about him, that if there were but any ſhew of Moderation, they branded it as Dulneſs, and procured the Ruine of many wealthy Families. To thoſe Paraſites he gave conſtant Acceſs, but was not to be come at by others of more conſcionable Principles, and was moſt angry in a caſe wherein he ſhould have been moſt void of paſſion; and therefore what they whiſpered he preſently concluded and took all for granted, his Pride not permitting him any ſober Inquiry. Hence it came to paſs under ſhew of Mercy that many were ſent into Baniſhment, and their Eſtates being confiſcated, forc'd all their Lives after to beg their bread.

78. The Præfect and thoſe Summates, to whom, with him, the Cognizance of the Crime was committed, being convened, the Racks, the Plummets, the Cords, and Rods, were brought forth, and amongſt the ratlings of Chains and Fetters, the noiſe of Hold him, Bind him, and Away with him, was heard, which the Serjeants echoed one to another. After a little Prelude to the Tragedy, Pergamius, whom (as we ſaid) Palladius accuſed, when the Judges knew not well in what method to proceed, in a large Diſcourſe accuſed many thouſands as Acceſſory, and required ſeveral to be ſent for from the utmoſt bounds of the Empire. But it being impoſſible to proſecute according to his Allegations, he was put to death, and many in Companies after him; which done, the main part of Theodorus came upon the ſtage. On the ſame day it happened, that one Salia, who was Comes Theſaurorum in Thrace a little before, and had been caſt into priſon, being to be brought forth to his Examination, as he was putting on his Shooes, out of a ſenſe of the great Tryal he was now to undergo, became ſtupified and fell down dead amongſt thoſe that had their Hands upon him. Patricius and Hilarius, when they were produced, differed in their Relations, and for that had their ſides ſufficiently lanced with Stripes: and the Tripos or three footed Engine they uſed, was produced before them, whereby brought to the utmoſt extremity, they confeſſed the whole matter. Hilarius firſt acknowledged, that in reſemblance of that at Delphi, they framed the Tripos of Laurel Twigs; that by Imprecations of ſecret Verſes, and by many and daily Dances being ritually conſecrated, they moved it; the manner of which Motion, when it was to be conſulted upon any ſecret Affair, was this: It was placed in the middle of an Houſe, which was throughout perfumed with Arabian Odours, and thereon was neatly ſet a Charger, every way round and made of divers Metalls. In the utmoſt Ring or Compaſs thereof were engraven skilfully the four and twenty Letters, ſet at a diſtance from each other, ſo that certain Spaces betwixt them were preciſely ſet out: Then one arrayed in white Linen Veſtments, having on Linen Stockings, a Wreath upon his Head, and a Branch in his Hand, having by certain formal Charms obtained the favour of that Divine Power, which was the Author and Director of Divination and Foretelling, ſtood above the ſaid Tripos, ſhaking a Magical Ring hanging at a Curtain; which Ring lighting by jumps and leaps, with diſtant pauſes between, on certain Letters one after another, which ſeemed to ſtay and hold it, made Heroick Verſes anſwerable to the Queſtions demanded, and fully compoſed according to Rythmical Numbers and Meaſures, like the Verſes of Pythia, or thoſe of the Oracle of Branchidæ. There then as they inquired who was to ſucceed the preſent Emperour, for that it was ſaid he ſhould be every way an Accompliſhed Perſon, the Ring as it skipped here and there, quickly made up two Syllables with another Letter, at which one preſent cried out, that thereby Theodorus was portended; neither was there any further Inquiry made into the buſineſs, for they were very well ſatisfied that he was the Man. When he had laid open thus the whole matter to the Judges, he added therewithall, that Theodorus knew nothing of it. Then were they demanded, whether by ſignification of the ſame Oracle they foreknew what Trouble they ſhould come to; and they replied in thoſe moſt known Verſes, which declared deſtruction to thoſe who ſhould ſearch into ſo ſublime matters; and yet withall that the Furies threatened both the Prince himſelf and his Miniſters with Plagues, for the avenging of their Bloud. The Verſes being

De Branchidis, qui loco nomen dedêre, vide Valeſii Annot. in p. 388.

Alii Divinationis hujus alium modum narrant, quidam ἀλεκτρομαντείαν non nemo Necromantiam. Vide eund. ibid. Sed fides potiùs Ammiano, qui hoc vixit tempore, adhibenda eſt.

Sect. 2.

A.D. 370.

ing produced and read, they were ordered to withdraw, by this time almoſt dead with tortures.

79. Then to clear further the evidence, were produced a great Company of the Honorati, in the number of whom, lay the depth of the Conſpiracy; but every one indeavoured to devolve the burthen from his own ſhoulders, to the back of another. At length Theodorus was Commanded to ſpeak, who firſt applied himſelf altogether to Intreaties. that the Inquiſitors would intercede for his Pardon; but afterward being conſtrained to ſpeak further to the point, profeſſed that the Reaſon why he did not diſcover the whole Practice to the Emperour, was, for that Euſerius, who firſt diſcloſed the matter to him, expreſly forbad him, declaring that what ſhould come to paſs, was not to be effected through the prevalence of any Ambitious Paſſion, but by the abſolute neceſſity of Fate. And Euſerius, being tortur'd Confeſſed as much; yet however, Theodorus was Convicted by the Evidence of his own Letters, written, though cunningly, to Hilarius, whereby he ſignified that he did not doubt of the Succeſs, but was at a loſs how to find out a convenient opportunity, to put the Deſign in Execution. They being ſet aſide, Eutropius who then Governed Aſia with Proconſular Power, and probably was Authour of the Breviary of Roman Hiſtory Dedicated to Valens, was accuſed as Acceſſary to the Crime, but was diſmiſſed, after that Paſiphilus the Philoſopher, though all indeavours were uſed, could by no torture be forced to Accuſe him. But Simonides a young man, who Profeſſed alſo Philoſophy, could not deny but that from Fiduſtius he had been made acquainted with their Practices, and out of a firm Reſolution of mind would not reveal it. Now the whole Diſcovery being made, the Emperour Conſulted, with one Breath Commanded that all ſhould be put to death; which was Executed upon them, to the Horrour of Multitudes that beheld the Spectacle, all having their Throats Cut, except Simonides, whom becauſe of his extraordinary Reſolution, he Commanded to be burnt alive. After him many of all Sorts and Conditions, like ſo many Sheep were Butchered, Execution being firſt done, and then the Merits of the Cauſe enquired into, ſo that the Hangmen were quite ſpent with their labours, firſt of Torturing, and then Killing theſe miſerable Creatures. Not long after, Maximus the Philoſopher, the greatneſs of whoſe Reputation equalled his Name in thoſe dayes, having Confeſſed that he heard what had been predicted by the Oracle, but out of Reſpect to his Profeſſion, had concealed it, though he alſo fore-told that the Conſultors would loſe their lives, was brought home to the City of Epheſus where he was Born, and there Beheaded, when he was now ſick of an Incurable Diſtemper; the Great Maſter of Julian, the late Emperour. Before this, to allay the Envy and Diſpleaſure of the People, for ſuch Carnage as was made, an infinite Number of Books were got together, and burnt in the ſight of the Judges, as dangerous, and Prohibited, whereas indeed they were ſuch as Treated of various profitable Subjects, as the Liberal Sciences, or the Civil Law.

Horrible ſlaughters thereupon.

80. And together with the Books, periſhed a great man of Law, one Diogenes, eminent for his Noble Birth, Wit, Eloquence, and mild Diſpoſition, whoſe only Crime it was that he had a great Eſtate, having not long before governed Bithynia. Alypius, who had diſcharged the Office of Vicar here in Britain, was outed of his Eſtate, and ſent into Baniſhment, his Son Hierocles having been maimed by tortures, and hardly eſcaped Execution. Palladius the Contriver of all theſe Villanies, in the mean time purſued his courſe; and by his Tricks brought ſo many into trouble, that he filled all the Provinces with Lamentations. To the end that the very Wives might not have time to bewail the miſeries of their Husbands, when an Account was taken of the Houſhouldſtuff of the Dead, by theſe Officers who did it, there were caſt in, amongſt the writings, ſome Charms or ridiculous Enchantments, which brought into Court before thoſe Judges, who had neither Regard to Law, Religion, nor Conſcience, thereupon they were ſeized, and as well young, as old, without any Defence made, were deprived of their Eſtates, and after all their limbs had been broken by torture, carried out in Chairs to Execution. Hereupon, throughout the Eaſtern Provinces, ſo great a Terror ſeized upon all ſorts of Perſons, that they burnt their Libraries, for they eſteemed themſelves in no better a Condition, than were the Gueſts of Dionyſius the Sicilian Tyrant, over whoſe Heads, as they ſate at meat, he cauſed Swords to be hanged by ſingle hairs of Horſes. The great Manager of all thoſe Intrigues, together with Palladius, was Heliodorus, a Pleader of Cauſes, whom they called the Mathematician, a diſſolute inſolent fellow, who preſcribed to Valens all his Methods, and after other manifold Forgeries, at length informed a-

gainſt

Sect. 2. A.D. 370.

gainſt that excellent Couple of Conſuls, Euſebius, and Hypatius, two Brothers, and nearly Allyed to the Emperour Conſtantius, as if they aſpired after the Empire; and withal he added this lie, that Euſebius had already provided himſelf of Imperial Robes. Valens was glad of the Occaſion, and however by no means could their Innocence be overborn, it ſo evidently appeared; yet ſtill did he make much of the Accuſer, and they were both ſent into Exile, and heavy mulcts impoſed on them, which they paid; but ſhortly were they recalled, the money returned, and they reſtored to their former Dignities. Yet for all this, the Emperour would ſtill proceed, and by many ſad Inſtances ſhewed how it fares with a People, when the pride of a Soveraign Prince is joyned with ſowerneſs and ſeverity of Nature.

81. Heliodorus, how its uncertain, chanced to die; and being to be buried, many Perſons of Quality were Commanded to precede the Corpſe; and amongſt others the two late Conſuls, and Brothers but now mentioned. Neither could he himſelf for ſome time, by any means be perſwaded from being preſent, but at length being prevailed with, he Commanded the Nobility to go before (as the Cuſtom was; not to follow, as the uſe is at this day) on foot, with their Heads bare, and ſome with their hands folded together: a fit poſture for ſuch as had been formerly Graced with Conſular Ornaments, wherewith to Honour the Carkaſs of a Raſcal, who having firſt come to Corinth to ſell Fiſh, when it happened that the Man of the Houſe was ſick, and could not attend a Cauſe he had to be heard in Court, he adventured to appear for him. Having heard the Pleadings of thoſe at the Bar, he was tickled with a great deſire of becoming Advocate himſelf, and joyning this practice to his other Trade, grew ſo Famous, that, as Confidence uſually procures Clients more than skill, he was more imployed than any man, and though laught at, and ſcorned by ſober and underſtanding Perſons, yet he derided them again, and putting on ſuch a Countenance as not to be daſhed, he got great Wealth, became Advocate of the Treaſury, and obtained further Preferment. Here Ammianus cannot abſtain from exclaiming, and falling very foul upon Valens, for expoſing ſo many Perſons of Honour to ſo much Contempt; and further he tells us, that one thing elſe there happened, that made up the Roll of his Virtues. Generally he was ſo ſavage and unmerciful, that he was unwilling that death it ſelf ſhould put an end to the torments of Condemned Perſons; yet there being one Pollentianus a Tribune, a fellow of a naughty life, Convict of ripping up a Womans Belly alive, and by taking out the untimely Birth, as he words it, of Conſulting therewith, the Infernal Manes, concerning the Change of the Imperial Government: out of reſpect to their acquaintance and Familiarity, though to the Regret of Men of all Ranks and Conditions, he cauſed this Criminal to be diſmiſſed, both with ſecurity of his life, and enjoyment of his Eſtate and Preferment. But Juſtice ſtill watched how, and when, to Revenge the death of theſe Innocents, and the Furies as he ſaith, inraged by their death, kindled the Flames of Bellona. Yet in the mean time, miſchiefs befell the Provinces of Aſia upon another occaſion.

The Cruelty of Feſtus Proconſul of Aſia.

82. There was one Feſtus, Born at Trent, a man of very mean Parentage, and a ſworn Brother of that bloody Maximinus formerly mentioned, who, as Fate would have it, going into the Eaſt, firſt had the Government of Syria Committed to him, and thence was preferred to be Magiſter Memoriæ, which Office having Diſcharged with ſuch mildneſs as became him, he arrived at the high Truſt and Imployment of Proconſul of Aſia. All this while, when he heard of the Cruel and inſufferable demeanour of Maximinus, he made a ſhew of great diſlike, but when he underſtood how a man ſo undeſerving, meerly for ſuch Services, was Prefered to the Præfectſhip, he was inflamed with a deſire of Compaſſing the like Honour by the ſame means; and like to a Player, having changed his Habit, preſently began to act another ſort of Perſon, ſtill imagining he ſhould be Præfect in a very ſhort time. And ſo he beſtirred himſelf, as to imitate what his Friend had done at Rome. A Philoſopher called Cæronius, one of no ſmall deſert, he killed with exceſſive and cruel torments; for that in a Familiar Letter written by him to his own Wife, he uſed a form of ſpeech which was but proverbial, and tending to cauſe the Reader or Hearer to give greater Attention, and receive a greater Impreſſion of what was written or ſaid. A ſilly old Woman that pretended to Cure Agues by a Charm, he put to death, though ſhe had lately Cured his own Daughter, and was ſent for to it with his own Knowledge and Conſent. There was an Eminent Burgeſs of a Town, amongſt whoſe Papers was found the Nativity of one Valens Cal-

Valeſius eundem fuiſſe exiſtimat cum Rufo Feſto, qui etiam Breviarium Imperii Scripſit ad Valentem, non ad Valentinianum.

σὺ δὲ νόει, καὶ στέφε τὴν πύλην.

Calculated; whereupon he was Examined, upon what account he had pried into the Fortune of the Emperour. He affirmed that his own Brother of that Name, was the man, and he was already dead, which, though he offered to prove, yet could he not be heard; but being before mangled with tortures, was put to death A certain young man was obſerved in the Bath, to touch a Marble ſtone by the Fingers of both his hands, one after another, to put them to his Breaſt, and to ſay over the ſeven Vowels, which he imagined was a Remedy againſt the Pain of the Stomach; but for ſo doing he was judicially convented, tortured, and then beheaded. So ſad was the Condition of the Roman Subject in the Eaſtern Parts; while in the Weſtern our Author tells us, he finds all things confuſed or out of order. For now was Maximinus (ſo much ſpoken of) become Præfect; and by reaſon of his Power and Authority had opportunity of doing miſchief himſelf, and of exciting the Emperour to Acts of Severity, who with the greatneſs of his Fortune too often intermingled his Licencious Will; and being naturally very cruel, when there was none other to adviſe him but Maximinus, would fall into ſuch Fits of Paſſion, that not onely his Countenance, but his Voice, his Colour, and his wonted manner of walking would change.

Maximinus made Præfect, and governs Valentinian.

The cruel effects thereof.

83. One of his Pages, a well-grown Youth, being appointed in Hunting to hold in a Slip a Spartan Hound, becauſe he let him go ſooner than the Game required, the Dog falling upon him and biting him, was beaten to death, and buried the ſame day. The Maſter of one of the Fabricks or Forges, having made him a Currate exquiſitely poliſhed, when for his Workmanſhip he expected a Reward, he commanded to be put to death, becauſe it was ſomewhat leſs in weight than he ordained. Epirates a Prieſt he commanded to be ſlain, becauſe he would not diſcover Octavianus, who had been Proconſul of Aſia, and having been accuſed of ſome miſdemeanour, had concealed himſelf in his Houſe. Conſtantianus, one of the Stratores, or thoſe that had the charge of providing Horſes, for venturing to exchange ſome of thoſe he was ſent into Sardinia to make choice of, was by his command ſtoned to death. One Athanaſius a Charottier, being forewarned by him to forbear ſomething of no conſiderable conſequence upon pain of being burnt, when found to have committed the crime, notwithſtanding he had taken great pleaſure in his Sports, was by his order reduced to Aſhes. Africanus, an induſtrious Pleader of Cauſes, having (as the manner was with Advocates) governed a Province, when he deſired to be removed to a better Imployment, and Theodoſius the Magiſter Equitum moved him in his behalf, his Anſwer was, Go, Comes, and change his Head, who deſires to have his Province changed: And ſo the poor man loſt his Life for but endeavouring that which was commonly practiſed. A certain obſcure Fellow accuſed Claudius and Saluſt, two Officers in the Army, who from the number of Joviani had been advanced to the Command of Tribune, for that when Procopius uſurped, they had ſpoken kindly of him. The matter was diligently inquired into, but nothing could be made of it; which when Valentinian perceived, he ordered the Magiſter Militum, who had the hearing of the Cauſe, to baniſh Claudius, and condemn Saluſt to death, promiſing that when he ſhould be led as to Execution he would ſend him a Reprieve; but this being done, Saluſt neither eſcaped death, nor was Claudius (or Cladius, as ſome Copies have it) freed from his Baniſhment till the death of the Emperour. Other matters Ammianus lays to his charge, but the particulars are not to be made out, the Copies of his Hiſtory, which now are extant, being in thoſe places ſo marred and imperfect. However he tells us, he was afraid to recount all he could ſay, leſt he ſhould be thought out of deſign to ſearch into the Vices of him, who otherwiſe was a good Prince, and moſt ſtudious of the Publick Safety. But one thing he thinks ought not to be concealed, which was, that he kept two She Bears, that were wont to feed upon Mans Fleſh; the one he called Mica aurea, and the other Innocentia, and was very careful that they ſhould lie near his own Bedchamber, and want nothing to maintain their Fierceneſs. And Innocentia, after he had ſeen many Carcaſes devoured by her, as one that had well deſerved Liberty, he let go looſe into the Woods. Theſe are evident Proofs of the Cruelty of his Nature; yet was he moſt watchful and ſagacious for the ſafety of the Empire, neither can any of his Detractors ſay, that he ever failed in that point.

84. Such is the Account we have from Ammianus concerning the Cruelties of both the Brothers. That raging of Valens in the Eaſt upon the matter of a Succeſſor is atteſted by the generality of Writers, though with ſome difference of Circumſtances. Socrates the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtorian writes, That the Devil procured ſome that were

Sect.2.

Socrates bears witneſs as to the Cruelty of Valens upon the buſineſs of a Succeſſor.

A.D. 371.

Lib.4.c.15.

were given to thoſe Arts, by Necromancy to enquire, who it was that ſhould ſucceed him in the Empire: That after his manner he gave no plain and direct Anſwer, but one very obſcure and doubtful, as that the Mans Name began with four Letters, ΘΕΟΔ, and that it was compounded. The Fame hereof ſo far ſpread, that it came to the Emperours Ears, who neither attributing things we call Caſualties, nor referring the knowledge of things to come, nor the beſtowing of Sceptres, to the Power of God, whoſe Providence ruleth all things; but forſaking the Precepts of Chriſtian Religion, which he colourably pretended, put divers perſons to death, who he imagined might be capable of the Imperial Dignity. He diſpatched out of the way ſuch as were called Theodorus, Theodotus, Theodoſius, Theodulus, or the like; in the number of which was one Theodoſiolus a Nobleman, whom he ſent for out of Spain, and commanded to be killed. Hereupon many out of fear of their Lives changed their Names, which at their Birth had been given them by their Parents. That Valens was very ſevere againſt Diviners, Fortune-tellers, or ſuch as caſt Nativities, we are aſſured by a Law made by him about this time, to the enacting of which we may well enough conclude, that the Diſcovery lately mentioned gave occaſion. It is directed to Modeſtus the Præfectus Prætorio, who (as we ſee by Ammianus) was imployed in the Tryal of Offenders; and it ſeems to have been no other than the Anſwer to the Conſultation of him and his Fellow Judges, in the matter of Theodorus, Euſerius, Eutropius, and Simonides the Philoſopher, whereby the Hiſtorian tells us he commanded, that they ſhould all be put to death. The Edict forbids the Practice of Mathematicians, by which is to be underſtood, the Art of Divination univerſal, and not as confined to Genitures. It inflicts no leſs than Death upon any who ſhould be found to exerciſe it publickly or privately by day or by night, and as well upon the Learner as the Teacher, for this reaſon, becauſe the fault of learning Prohibited matters is full as great as that of teaching. Yet the Severity of this Edict conſiſts in the large extent of it; otherwiſe it was ever accounted High Treaſon by the Romans, to pry into the Nativity or Fate of the Emperour. Tacitus writes, that this amongſt other Crimes was laid to the charge of Lepida, that ſhe conſulted the Chaldæans concerning the Family of Cæſar; and Paulus delivers it for Law, that whoſoever conſults concerning the Safety of the Prince, or deep State-Myſteries, any Mathematicians, theſe they called Arioli, Aruſpices, or Vaticinatores, ſhould die for it, together with him that gave the Anſwer.

A Law of his extant againſt Mathematicians.

L.8. de Maleficis & Mathemat. Cod. Th.l.9.tit.16.

Neque enim diſſimilis culpa eſt prohibita diſcere quam docere.

Vide Lindenbrogii Obſervat.in Ammian.l.29.p.423.

Gratian the ſecond time and Probus are Conſuls.

A.D. 371. Gratiano A.2. & Probo Coſs.

85. The following Year, which was the CCCLXXI of our Lord, wherein Gratian the ſecond time and Probus were Conſuls, Valentinian ſpent in Gall, and the moſt part at Triers; Valens moſt at Conſtantinople, and ſome part at Ancyra. The Præfect of Rome was Ampelius, who had ſucceeded Olybrius; Modeſtus was Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt, Probus of Italy, Illyricum, and Africk; and Viventius of Gall. Maximinus was ſtill the Præfectus Annonæ and Vicar of the City of Rome; and thoſe cruel Practices there againſt the Lives of Senators upon the account of Sorcery, carried on by him and his Agents, extended to this time, as may be collected from certain Laws. Ammianus writes, that the Nobility tired out with thoſe perpetual Inquiſitions, when every man conceived his own Life in danger, ſent a Meſſage to Valentinian, which was carried by Prætextatus, who had been Præfect of the City, aſſiſted by Venuſtus and Minervius, to intreat that Puniſhments might not exceed the quality of Offences, and Senators might not be expoſed to Torture contrary to the Law. When the Meſſengers were admitted into Conſiſtory, the Emperour (as we have ſeen) pretended ignorance of any ſuch Practice, and ſaid he was abuſed; till Eupraxius the Quæſtor by his gentle way of Speech convinced him of other things. Amongſt other matters whereof the Senate complained, it ſeems one was, that they were forbidden the uſe of the Aruſpicina, and that they were generally involved in the crime of Sorcery; and they prayed for a general Act of Indulgence and Oblivion to the whole Senate. In anſwer to this he tells them, he cannot grant Indulgence to the whole Senate, leſt he ſhould accuſe the whole; foraſmuch as Indulgence takes off the Penalty, but not the Infamy of the Crime; but if it was deſired for one or two Criminal Perſons of that Order, it ſhould not be denied. As for the Aruſpicina, he denies that he reckons either that or ſome other ancient Rites, amongſt the unlawful Magical Arts; and for this he appeals to the Laws made by him in the beginning of his Reign, of granting free Exerciſe of Religion to all his Subjects; neither doth he diſallow of the uſe of the Aruſpician, ſo it were innocent. But whereas many perſons of Senatorian Rank were accuſed as guilty of Magick, and they deſired to decline the Juriſdiction of Maximinus, as we

Other Laws atteſt the cruel Practices of Maximinus.

L.5. de Indulg. Criminum.Cod. Th.l.9. tit.38.

L.9.de Maleficiis,&c. Cod. Th. ubi ſupra.

L.10. de Maleficis,&c. ibid.

we may well conjecture; he declares the Præfect of the City (in conformity to other Laws) to be the true and proper Judge of ſuch perſons. And in caſe the matter could not be decided by him, he requires that the Parties concerned, with the whole Proceſs, be tranſmitted to Court to his own hearing; by which Reſerve he cuts off the uſual cuſtom of Conſultation in ſuch difficult caſes, and all hope of the Priſoner to eſcape Condemnation, if he himſelf was ſo reſolved. This Edict concerning the Præfect of the City his being Judge, is directed to Ampelius, who was then Præfect, and of whom Ammianus makes mention, in that Hymetius was heard by him, and Maximinus the Vicar, and appealing to the Emperour was referred back to the Senate, which incurred his Diſpleaſure, by inflicting upon him no greater puniſhment than that of Exile. In the laſt place Valentinian forbids Ampelius to ſend for any man out of his own Juriſdiction, or that was abroad in the Provinces, which yet the Præfectus Prætorio had liberty to do.

L. 2. de Officio Præfecti Urbis, Cod. Juſt. l. 1. tit. 28.

86. To this Ampelius are directed ſeveral other Conſtitutions of this ſame year, to be taken notice of either here or in another place. Valentinian continued at Triers till about the end of June, and then by Subſcriptions of other Laws we find him at a place called Contionacum, thought to have been the ſame with Gentzingen: For Ammianus aſſures us, that he had a great care of the Limits of the Empire; inſomuch that if any Enemy was diſcovered from the Watch Towers once to ſtir, he was quickly apprehended. But his principal deſire and aim was, either ſecretly or by open force to get into his hands Macrianus King of the Allemans, one who exceedingly incommoded the Roman Affairs, as Julian had formerly intercepted Vadomarius. The place of his Abode being diſcovered by ſome Fugitives, leſt making a Bridge might cauſe an Alarm, he paſſed his men over the Rhine by Boats, and Severus (who had the command of the Infantry) being ſent before, when he was come at the place called Aquæ Mattiacæ, out of juſt fear he ſhould be overpowered by the numbers of the Enemy, made an Alt: The other Troops being all come up, they proceeded together, when the Moon was riſen, and poſſibly might have executed the Deſign they were ſent on, but that the Officers were no way able to keep the common Souldiers in order, but contrary to their expreſs Command they would burn and ſpoil what they met in their way, and by Fire and Noiſe, diſcovered their Approach to the Kings Guards, who ſuſpecting what was intended, put him into a Chariot, and conveyed him into a place difficult of Acceſs amongſt the Mountains. The Emperour then diſappointed of his hopes, neither by default of himſelf nor of his Captains, but the Intemperance of his Souldiers; (which often coſt the Romans very dear) after he had waſted the Enemies Countrey for fifty miles upward, returned melancholy to Triers. There he bore his Misfortune (to uſe the Compariſon of our Writer) as a Lion would do whoſe Prey had eſcaped his hungry Jaws. But while the Allemans were yet in terror, (for they were frighted though not much hurt) he appointed Fraomarius to reign over the Bucinobantes, a People inhabiting juſt over againſt Mentz. But Fraomarius found it not worth his while, his ſmall Kingdom being quickly overrun, (or his Pagus, as Ammianus truly terms it) and therefore the Emperour ſent His Majeſty over into Britain with the Power of Tribune, over the Regiment of the Allemans, which at that time here flouriſhed, both in reſpect of the Number of Men and their Courage. Moreover, to Bitkendus and Hortarius, two principal men of the ſame Nation, he gave Commands, of whom Hortarius was by Florentius the Dux of Germany convicted, to have held Intelligence with Macrianus and others of the Barbarians, and the truth being found out by Torture, was burnt alive.

Valentinian his Attempts npon the Allemans.

Regem Fraomarium ordinavit.

Quoniam recens excurſus eundem penitus vaſtaverat pagum.

87. Such was the Succeſs of Valentinian in the Field, when he endeavoured to make thoſe Priſoners he could not catch. We ſuppoſe his Deſign more proſperous which he now had, for the ſafe-keeping of his own Subjects when committed to Priſon. From Contionacum, which lay ſomewhere betwixt Triers and Mentz, he directed an Edict to Probus the Præfectus Prætorio, wherein he declared, that the ſafe Cuſtody of Priſoners belonged to the Commentarienſis, one of the Officials of the ordinary Judge, who had his name from writing the Commentaries, or keeping the publick Books concerning Malefactors and condemned perſons, which in old time was wont to be preſerved in the Ærarium amongſt other Records. The Optio was principal Maſter of the Gaol, but under him the Commentarienſis looked to the Priſoners, provided them Neceſſaries, and gave an account of their Number and the Qualities of their Perſons and Crimes to the Judge upon occaſion; and he had under him inconſiderable mean People, whom as we at this day call Keepers and Turnkeys, ſo they in thoſe days termed them Cuſtodes, and afterward Clavicularii, who

He makes a Law for the ſafe keeping of Priſoners.

L. 5. de Cuſtodia reorum, Cod. Th. l. 9. tit. 3.

who afterward became a Proverb for their Vileneſs. Sometimes the Commentarienſis was imployed to apprehend Priſoners, when tried he brought them to the Bar; and (as our Clerks of Aſſize) recorded all that happened at their Trial: For all which Services he had his Adjutant when the caſe required. But great Miſchief was taken notice to have followed from theſe deputed to this charge, as Eſcape of Priſoners, becauſe they judging themſelves not to be principally concerned, were negligent in their buſineſs, which provoked Valentinian by an Edict, to require the Priſoner ſo eſcaping of the Commentarienſis himſelf, and forbidding his Excuſe, or laying the blame upon ſuch obſcure Fellows, and that by no leſs than his ſuffering the ſame Pain and Forfeiture which the Criminal himſelf ſhould have undergone. But in caſe he was forced by ſome neceſſary occaſions from his charge, he ſubjects the Adjutant or Deputy, to the ſame Penalty, in caſe a Priſoner was miſſing. At this time there was a Practice taken notice of in Africk, that much tended to the leſſening of the Publick Revenue, which was, that ſuch as had been made Heirs by the Teſtaments of their Relations or others, would enter upon thoſe Lands that were good, but refuſe to receive the barren or more unfruitful, becauſe they would not pay the Tribute or Impoſitions due from them. To reform it, Valentinian by his Reſcript directed to Creſcens the Vicar of that Dioceſe, commands, that ſuch as had by Teſtament left them Lands both good and bad, ſhould either take to the whole Inheritance, or quit it all.

Reforms an Abuſe in Africk.

L. 17. de Annona & Tributis, Cod. Th. l. 11. tit. 1.

And in the unequal Marriages of Women of Senatorian Rank.

88. He was alſo about this time informed, that the Nobility or Senatorian Rank at Rome was very much diſhonoured by Clandeſtine Marriages; eſpecially by the younger ſort of Widows, who being emancipated or diſmiſſed from the Power or Authority of their Fathers, were wont to be wrought upon and enticed to Bargains of this nature by ſeveral perſons, who made a Living of making Matches; by whom they were cheated, and joyned with mean, beggarly, and every way unfit and unequal men. To prevent this for the time to come, he wrote to the Senate, and gave expreſs order, that no Widow of a Senatorian Family, under the Age of five and twenty, although ſhe were emancipated, ſhould marry again without her Fathers conſent firſt obtained, if he was living. If her Father was dead, the Approbation of her next Kindred he required, as Severus his Predeceſſor had formerly done in the Marriage of Pupils, or thoſe who had not arrived at Puberty. But whereas it might happen, that the Humour of the Kindred might be unreaſonably averſe to that of the Woman, or perhaps being to ſucceed her in her Inheritance, in caſe ſhe died without Children, they might out of deſign oppoſe her Marriage; therefore when any difference ſo happened betwixt her and her Kindred about her Choice, the matter ſhould be determined by the ordinary Judge, who in caſe there was an Equality in Merit and Fitneſs in the men contended for, was to determine in favour of the Widow. This was in conformity to other Laws, which, when the Mother and Kindred cannot agree about the choice of an Husband for a young Maid, refer it to the Cognizance of the ordinary Judge or Governour of the Province. As to that prevalent Objection, That the next Kindred might hinder the Marriage out of deſign, he ordains, That ſuch as were to gain by her death, if ſhe died without Children, ſhould not intermeddle, but the matter referred to thoſe at further diſtance, who had no ſuch Expectation. But beſides this Cuſtom at Rome, there was another thing relating to Marriage, which about this ſame time he thought fit to reform: Conſtantine the Great, to work ſuch Reformation in Manners as was ſuitable to the ſtrictneſs of the Chriſtian Profeſſion, amongſt other things earneſtly deſired to take away the uſe of Concubines; which that he might the more eaſily effect, he encouraged ſuch as made uſe of them and had no lawful Wives, to change them into Wives by lawful Marriage, and making ſuch Children as they had by them before Marriage completely Legitimate. But as he would encourage them by this Privilege to marry the Mothers, ſo on the other ſide he could not but think it Policy to deter them from living in that diſſolute condition, by taking from their Natural Children (for ſo were they called) in caſe they would not marry their Mothers, certain Privileges allowed them by the Law; as that in caſe there was neither Legitimate Children, Father, Mother, Brother, Siſter, Uncles, or other Kindred, they were allowed to inherit. This rigour now Valentinian thought fit to mitigate, not reſtoring the former Privilege in full, which he did by an Edict directed to Ampelius Præfect of the City, ordaining, That if ſo be a man had Legitimate Children, or left a Father or Mother, and had alſo a Concubine and Natural Children by her, he might leave them or her a twelveth part of his Eſtate; and in caſe he had none of the ſaid Legitimate Relations, of his whole Eſtate divided into twelve he might leave them three.

L. 1. de Nuptiis, Cod. Th. l. 3. tit. 7.

L. 1. de Naturalibus liberis, &c. Cod. Th. l. 4. tit. 6. Vide Com. Gothofr.

Sect.2.

three. This his Brother Valens at firſt did not approve of, but afterward confirmed for the ſake of Libanius the Sophiſt, who having never been married, but had a Son by a Concubine, when he was now about ſixty years old and like to die, was ſollicitous for this his Natural Son, that he might have wherewithall to live.

89. Another Law there's extant of this year, in like manner directed to this Ampelius, which acquaints us that the Inquiſitions about Sorcery, and the Proſecution of Senators upon that account, of which too largely we have heard from Ammianus were not yet ceaſed. Whether it was upon deſire of the Senate, and complaint againſt the Cruelties of Maximinus, by one Law before mentioned Valentinian declared the Præfect of the City to be the proper Judge of Senators, but ſtill (as may be gueſſed) to have a reſerve for his own Severity, he ordered him in caſe any difficulty occurred which he could not determine, not to conſult him, but to ſend both the accuſed Party and his Proceſs to the Court, as we have already recited. But with this was joyned another Reſcript, by which appears the Diſſimulation either of the Præfect, or the Emperour himſelf, or both. It declares, that the Senate ought to have the liberty of the Curſus publicus whenſoever they have occaſion of ſending their Meſſengers to him, which he proves by Reaſons drawn from the Practice both of the People of Rome, and of the Provincials; for if they had the Privilege of making uſe of it upon ſuch occaſions, much more ought the Senate to have it, the Members of which he deſires often to ſee as his Colleagues. We find elſewhere, that they ſent their Meſſengers to him with Complaints, to which Ampelius might give his Aſſiſtance by obtaining this Edict, or hereby the Emperour was deſirous to cover his Rigour to them, as by the obliging term of Colleagues, it being not unuſual ſtill for Princes to profeſs themſelves of their Body. By the Date of this Law we find him at the later end of the Year returned again to Triers from his Expedition; during which we muſt ſee what was done by his Brother Valens in the Eaſt.

Declares that the uſe of the Curſus belongs to the Senate.

L.22. de Curſu publico,Cod.Th. Dat.Treviris 8 Id.Dec. quam miſerè eam interpolavit Tribonianus vide apud Gothofr. in Com.

90. The firſt thing we find him imployed in at Conſtantinople was about the Publick Revenue, for ſupply of the Rolls, when any died that was obliged to the Cenſus or Impoſition. In ſuch a caſe by a Conſtitution inſcribed to Modeſtus the Præfectus Prætorio, bearing Date on the fifteenth of January, he orders, that the Number be made up out of the Adcreſcentes, or ſuch as were to be next inrolled, living in the ſame or ſome neighbouring Countrey. His pleaſure is, that none but Governours of Provinces make this Supply, and for this end that the Plebeians, whom it concerned that they ſhould not be burthened, and their Defenſors ſhould appear before them, and produce the Names of ſuch as were fit to be inſerted; and they were to hear all Allegations and Complaints, and determine the matter. Which was much better than to leave it to the partial Affections and Intereſt of the ſeveral Defenſors, or Plebeians themſelves. This was to be practiſed in caſe of Mortality; but if any had deſerted their Habitations, and withdrawn themſelves, then was no ſuch ſupply required: but the Fugitives were to be ſought for and brought back. And this it behoved him to take care of, for there were ſeveral perſons, whom their Dignity and Imployments privileged from theſe Payments, amongſt whom were the Sons of thoſe that ſerved in the Palace or Palatini, and ſuch of their Slaves as they had purchaſed by Money gotten in the publick Service. By a ſecond Conſtitution directed this year to the ſame Præfect, and from this place, appears how mean the Dignity of Senators was there at this time; and on the contrary, to how great a degree the Repute of the Navicularii was advanced. Thereby he takes care for ſupply of the Body of theſe men through the Eaſt and the Dioceſe of Ægypt: For their Encouragement, he allows them for every ten thouſand Modii of Corn they ſhould tranſport freedom from the Impoſition of Wine, Corn, and the like for every fifty Acres of Land, though not from that of Horſes and Clothes. For the making of their Ships he will have Materials afforded by the Provincials; but the charge of repairing them muſt lie at their own doors. In the next place he will have tranſmitted to himſelf the Names of them all in two ſeveral Liſts, whereof the one to repreſent thoſe that were of the old ſtanding, and the other of ſuch as were newly admitted. And he gives them of the Eaſt all the Privileges which belonged to their Brethren of Africk, on condition that they and their Eſtates remained for ever obnoxious to the Charge and Office. In the laſt place he himſelf gives a Liſt of ſuch perſons, as out of whom the choice of Navicularii might be made; as firſt out of the Adminiſtrators and others of the Honorati, who had obtained this Dignity by Codicils or Letters Patents, (to whom in common, notice was wont to be given, if there happened any extraordinary occaſion) thoſe of them excepted which ſerved in the Palace, who were Valens in the mean time takes care of his Revenue.

*L.7. de Cenſu, Cod.Th.l.*13. *tit.*10.

*L.*14.*de Navicularii*s, Cod. Th. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

And indulges the Navicularii.

A.D. 372.

L. 74. de Decurionibus, Cod. Th. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

Inanes verò umbras & caſſas Imagines Dignitatum Codicillis ſectantes, nihil adjuvari præcipimus.

And the Curiales.

L. 76. eod. tit. ibid. Lex omnibus 31. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

not tied to this Duty. Alſo from amongſt the Decuriones, and ſuch as anciently had ſerved in the Imployment; out of the Primipilares; and even from amongſt the Senators themſelves, if any of them deſired with their Eſtates to be joyned to the Company. Yet by another Law did he provide for the Honour and Eaſe of the Senators of Conſtantinople, (whence theſe three bear Date) in diſcharging them from the Duties of Corporations, if they had by their Merits aſcended to Places of Dignity; otherwiſe if they had only obtained Honorary Titles by Codicils, (againſt which he inveighs) he exempts them from all ſuch Privileges, except they had got the Honorary Dignity of the greater ſort of Magiſtrates, as far as the Conſularitas. And alſo taking care that Corporations might not be unſerved, by another bearing date on the thirteenth of July from Ancyra, to the ſame Modeſtus, he prohibits Curiales their concealing themſelves in the Houſes, and under the Protection of their Patrons the great men, impoſing Infamy upon ſuch as ſhould harbour them. For there were great Abuſes committed by theſe Patronages in all Ages, as well in that as other reſpects; yet ſtill they continued from the time of Romulus. The firſt uſe of them we have obſerved out of Dionyſius Halicarnaſſæus, in the Hiſtory of the Foundation of Rome.

The Conſulſhip of Modeſtus and Arintheus.

A.D. 372. Modeſto & Arintheo Coſs.

L. 8. de filiis militar. apparit. & veteran. Cod. Th. l. 7. tit. 22. L. 78. de Decurionibus ib. & L. 12. de Cohortalibus ib. l. 8. tit. 4.

Valentinian calls the Sons of the Veterani into the Field.

Firmus uſurps in Africk.

91. For the Year next enſuing, which was the CCCLXXII of our Lord, and the fifteenth Indiction, Modeſtus and Arintheus were Conſuls, Ampelius was Præfect of Rome till the Moneth of Auguſt, and then was ſucceeded by Bapo; Clearchus executed the like Office at Conſtantinople; the Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt was Auxonius, and Probus ſtill of Italy and the other Dioceſes. Valentinian for the moſt part reſided at Triers, and ſometime at Naſſonacum, thought to be a place in the Foreſt of Ardenne; and Valens either at Antioch or Seleucia. Valentinian lying in Gall took care for ſtrengthening the Northern Parts againſt the Attempts of the Allemans, Quadi, and Marcomanni, and that by ſeveral Laws. The Sons of the Veterani he ordered to be forced to Service, wherever they had beſtowed themſelves, though in the publick Offices of Cities, or thoſe of the Governours of Provinces, onely ſuch as were obnoxious to Civil Imployments, or the Duties of the Curiæ, he ſignifies he had given order to the Illuſtrious Comites, and the Magiſtri Equitum and Peditum, that they ſhould not meddle with; or if they had forced them into the Field, they were to remit them to their ſeveral Concernments. That he was juſtly moved to reinforce his Troops, for the carrying on of his Deſigns, we ſhall ſee preſently, when firſt we have given the Reader an account of grievous Commotions which now happened in Africk, becauſe we would willingly follow the order which Ammianus in his particular Narrations hath taken without breaking them off. One Nubel, a petit King, but the moſt potent in Mauritania, dying, left behind him Sons both legitimate and begotten of Concubines, whereof one called Zamma being murdered by his Brother Firmus, this act gave original to great contention: For Zamma was much beloved by Romanus the Comes of thoſe Quarters, who reſolved to omit nothing that might conduce to a full Revenge of his Death, but very much ſollicited the matter in the Emperours Court, where his Relations endeavoured to render Firmus every way odious to Valentinian. He willingly ſuffered all the Complaints againſt him to be read; but on the contrary, whatſoever his Friends alleaged in his behalf was coldly received; for when they urged that his Anſwers might be peruſed, Remigius the Magiſter Officiorum, the Ally and Friend of Romanus, would affirm, that amongſt ſo many great and weighty Affairs of the Empire, thoſe frivolous and ſuperfluous matters ought not to interpoſe. This being made known to the Moor, he thereupon apprehended that his Defence being caſt aſide, he might be condemned as an Enemy or Contumacious Perſon, and ſo at length be ſurprized and ſlain: To prevent which if poſſible he revolted, and with a Diadem aſſumed the Title of King.

Theodoſius ſent againſt him.

92. It was thought convenient to ſuppreſs him before he ſhould grow too ſtrong; and to this work was Theodoſius appointed, with no great Force taken out of the Souldiers called Comitatenſes, bearing ſtill the Dignity of Magiſter Militum; a Man (Ammianus tells us) of greateſt Eminency in thoſe days, and to be compared with Domitius Corbulo and Luſius, whereof the one in the days of Nero, and the other under Trajan, were famous for many gallant Actions. Departing from Arles he paſſed the Sea, preventing all noiſe of his coming, and landed at a place called Igilgitanum, belonging to that Province known by the name of Mauritania Sitifenſis. There by accident he found Romanus, whom, without taxing him with any Miſdemeanour, he ſent away to put in order the Foreguards, and he being gone into that part of Mauritania called Cæſarienſis, he diſpatched away Gildo the Brother of Firmus, who yet continued in obedience to the Romans, together with one Maximus, to apprehend Vincentius, who having ſerved as the Deputy of Romanus, had been Partaker with him in his Villanies and Rapines. But when all his men were come over, he haſted to Sitifis, and gave order that Romanus ſhould be taken into cuſtody by the Protectors. While he lay in the Town he was ſomething perplexed in his thoughts what courſe to take for his men, that had been accuſtomed to cold Climates, and were now come into an hot Countrey, as alſo what way he ſhould lead them; and he knew not well how to manage his buſineſs with the Enemy, or any way entrap him, who was uſed to flie to and fro, and not engage but in ſudden Onſets. However Firmus was ſore diſmayed at the coming of ſo eminent a Captain, and betook himſelf to Intreaties both by Meſſengers and Letters, craving pardon for what was paſt; which he would not take upon him to defend, but was driven to it by intolerable Injuries, the truth of which he would engage to make good. Theodoſius thought fit to comply with him, and promiſed him pardon upon receipt of Hoſtages, which having declared he went to the Muſter of the Forces belonging to the Dioceſe of Africk at Panchariana, where he had appointed the Rendezvouz: There he cheared the Minds of the Souldiers by good words accommodated to the Exigency of Affairs, and then returned to Sitifis, now deſirous of ſome Action. For he had wrought a good Correſpondence betwixt the Souldiers of the Dioceſe and thoſe he brought over; and he had got the love of the Countrey by his obliging Carriage; and this thing in particular, that he would not ſuffer it to be burthened with the Maintenance of the Army, uſing this Expreſſion, that The Harveſts and Stores of an Enemy are the Granaries of Valiant men. But beſides his Civil Demeanour, the Emperour himſelf at this time ſeems to have courted in ſome meaſure the Military Men of this Countrey. For there's an Edict extant directed about this time to theſe Moors of Sitifis, of whom Ammianus ſo often ſpeaks, whereby he declares, that if any one was found to have ſerved five years in the Army, and had well demeaned himſelf, though his Grandfather and Father both had been Decuriones, yet he ſhould be himſelf free from the Nexus Curialis, as it was termed, or Service of Corporations, but not his Children; and the diligence of twenty five years in the attendance of the Judges of Provinces, ſhould onely capacitate a man to obtain that Privilege. Reaſon there was indeed that Valentinian ſhould pleaſe the Souldiers in ſo critical a time, rather than any other ſort of perſons; but much more there was to reconcile all Parties to him, if what Zoſimus writes be true, that the Moors themſelves revolted, and put the Purple upon Firmus, out of Impatience that they were haraſſed by the Rapines of Romanus. He adds, that the Report hereof diſturbing Valentinian, with all ſpeed he cauſed certain Troops, which lay in Pannonia and the upper Myſia, to quit their Poſts, and paſs over into Africk.

L.6. de re militari, Cod.Th. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

Lib.4.p.744.

He defeats two Nations of Africk.

93. Theodoſius from Sitifis marched to a place called Tubuſuptius, adjoyning to the Mountain Ferratus, and there he diſcovered the Treachery of Firmus, who thither ſent to him other Meſſengers, but without any Hoſtages, as had been agreed. Refuſing to hearken to what they delivered, after full deliberation he reſolved to fall with ſpeed upon the Nations of the Tyndenſes and Maſiniſſenſes, who were but meanly armed, and commanded by Maſcizel and Dius, two other Brothers of Firmus. He eaſily worſted and made great Slaughter of them; which done, he waſted the Countrey, and razed the Borough of Petra, built lately by Salmaces another Brother, in the Shew of a City. Encouraged by this Succeſs, with wonderful Celerity he went and poſſeſſed himſelf of another conſiderable Town, where he cauſed to be laid up Plenty of Proviſions, that in caſe he made further progreſs into the Inland Countries, he might have a Store much nearer at hand. In the mean time Maſcizel rallied his broken Forces, and venturing a ſecond time to engage, received another Defeat, hardly eſcaping with his Life by the ſwiftneſs of his Horſe; which Firmus hearing, and conſidering with himſelf how he had now loſt two Battels, ſent ſome Chriſtian Biſhops to intercede for him, accompanied with the Hoſtages he had formerly promiſed. The General courteouſly received them, eſpecially upon promiſe that his Men ſhould be ſupplied with Proviſions, and gave them ſo good an Anſwer, that the Moor having ſent ſome Preſents before him ventured to give him a Viſit, but upon an Horſe he thought might bring him off, if he liked not the Prelude of his Entertainment: Yet amazed at the Majeſty of the Roman Empire, which appeared in the glittering of the Enſigns, and eſpecially in the face and demeanour of Theodoſius, he alighted from his Horſe, and bowing himſelf near to the ground, with tears bewailed his Folly and Raſhneſs, and begged pardon for his Firmus comes in perſon and begs pardon.

Offence. Becauſe it behooved the State of Affairs that it ſhould be ſo, he received him with a Kiſs, as the Emperours were wont to do Governours of Provinces; and now being full of hope, he procured Neceſſaries to be brought to the Army, and leaving his Hoſtages departed, promiſing alſo to ſend back the Priſoners he had taken when he firſt revolted. And within two days he ſurrendred Icoſium, together with the Military Enſigns, and other things he had taken, amongſt which was a Sacerdotal Crown, for the Pagan Prieſts were wont to wear ſuch Golden Ornaments. The General proceeded to a place called Tipaſa, where the Embaſſadors of the Mazices met him, who had joyned with Firmus in his Revolt; to whom when they begged pardon, he gave no more comfortable Anſwer than this, that he would make War upon them, and with that comfortable Meſſage bid them return into their own Countrey.

Hearing that Firmus meant deceitfully, he marches to ſecure himſelf and the Army.

94. Thence marched he to Cæſarea, a wealthy and noble City in former times, which now finding waſte and deſolate, he therein beſtowed the Firſt and Second Legions, to put it into order, and fence it againſt any freſh Attempt of the Barbarians. While yet he continued in this Town, he had ſo good Intelligence, as fully to diſcover that Firmus meant nothing leſs than Peace, and onely watched for an opportunity by an unexpected Attacque to deſtroy him and his Army, whereupon he proceeded and took up his Quarters at Sugabarri, a Town of Mauritania Cæſarienſis, where he ſeized on the fourth Cohort of the Sagittarii, that had revolted to the Rebels, whom (to ſhew himſelf no way cruel) he onely puniſhed by depoſing them to the loweſt Service in the Field, (a courſe of Diſcipline we formerly obſerved uſual with the Romans) and commanded them with part of the Regiment of Foot called Conſtantiani to come to Tigaviæ, (another Town of the ſame Mauritania) together with the Tribunes, of whom one had put a Wreath inſtead of a Diadem about the Head of Firmus. He animadverted upon them, as alſo on Bellenes and Fericius, two principal men amongſt the Mazices, whom being brought Priſoners by Gildo and Maximus, he cauſed to be put to death. This wholeſom Severity ſhewn, he took and razed a Fort named Gaionatis, which having a ſtrong Wall about it, was the ſecureſt Refuge of the Moors; and this done, he went forward to the Caſtle of Tingitanum, and by way of the Mountain Ancorarius fell upon the Mazices, who were gathered together in one Body; and being indeed an hardy People, made at firſt a vigorous Reſiſtance, but were overthrown and all put to the Sword, except ſuch as cried for Quarter after they had made a Retreat, which (the time requiring it) was granted them. But for all this ſo great Multitudes of the Moors from other Quarters poured themſelves down upon him, that being but three thouſand five hundred ſtrong, he thought not fit to hazard the Emperours Army againſt ſuch Numbers, and therefore keeping a mean betwixt a Fight and a Flight, he gave ground, and by degrees retired. Hereat the Enemy took ſuch heart, that they purſued and ſtopt up the Paſſages ſo, that all the Romans had been loſt; but that by an happy miſtake the Moors took ſome of their own Countrey-men for a freſh Supply come in to Theodoſius, becauſe they ſaw ſome Romans at the Head of them. Affrighted hereat they fled, and opened the Paſſages in ſuch manner that his Men eſcaped.

Is in danger of being deſtroyed.

Being overpowered by Numbers he betakes himſelf to craft, and breaks the Enemy by delaying.

95. Theodoſius made a ſafe Retreat to a place called Muzucanum, where perceiving on what terms the matter ſtood, he reſolved his buſineſs lay not in the Field at preſent, but that he muſt betake himſelf to the Arts and Stratagems of Fabius Maximus. He ſent ſome that were expert in the Art of Perſuaſion, to draw the Neighbouring Nations into an Aſſociation, partly by good words and partly by threatnings; and herewith drew out the time in length, and broke them by delays, as Pompey overcame Mithridates. For Firmus ſenſible hereof, though he was ſufficiently provided of Guards, yet quitted the Field, together with thoſe Multitudes he had with charge and pains brought together; and taking opportunity of a ſtill and dark night retired toward the Mountains Caprarienſes, at a great diſtance, and by reaſon of the craggy Rocks and Precipices, for the moſt part inacceſſible. The Multitude amazed at his departure, and now without an Head, ſoon was ſcattered, by which means Theodoſius ſeized upon his Camp, and when he had waſted the Countrey at his pleaſure, ſet over the ſeveral parts thereof ſuch Governours as he could truſt. Firmus heard that he purſued him, and to eſcape his hands, with a few Servants made all the haſte he could to be out of danger; for which purpoſe he caſt away his moſt precious things he had brought along with him, that they might not hinder his Flight. But for all this the Moors rallied again, and

Sect. 2.

A.D. 372.

and having poſſeſſed the Hills, took advantage of a Truce they had obtained of the General in his Return, to provide themſelves of a great Supply of the neighbouring Æthiopians, who in ſuch heaps ruſhed upon him, that he was again glad to retire, though his men ſtruck their Bucklers againſt their Knees, and earneſtly deſired to try their Fortune with them. He went and took a Fort, where Firmus had beſtowed the Roman Priſoners, whom ſetting at liberty, he puniſhed thoſe that had been the Betrayers and Keepers of them. Now he had Intelligence, that Firmus himſelf was fled into the Country of the Iſaflenſes, whither therefore he reſolved to purſue him, and he demanded him, together with his Brother Mazaca and others, to be given up into his hands. This they ſtoutly refuſed, and not onely ſo, but very malapertly inſulted with their numerous Forces, whom yet he ventured to engage, and that with ſuch Succeſs, that after a total Rout, though Firmus eſcaped very difficultly, yet was his Brother Mazaca taken Priſoner, and ſo dangerouſly wounded, that he died as ſoon as he was dreſſed. The General after this Victory thought fit to animadvert upon the Iſaflenſes, whom he puniſhed ſeveral ways. Euaſius an Eminent Perſon amongſt them, with Florus his Son, and ſome others openly convicted to have ſided with the Rebels, he cauſed to be burnt alive.

96. Yet did not this ſo much diſcourage Firmus, but being again ſore pinched by Theodoſius, he fled unto them for ſuccour a ſecond time; and Igmazen a King of thoſe Tracts, very rich and potent, when the Roman General purſued him, bore himſelf very high and ſawcily againſt him in his behalf: For he made ſo far bold as to confront him, and demand what he was, and what his buſineſs was there. He anſwered, That he was an Officer of Valentinian the Lord of the World, ſent thither by him to ſuppreſs a Robber or Thief, whom except he would ſpeedily deliver up into his hands, he ſhould utterly periſh together with the Nation he ruled. Igmazen yet could not forbear Reviling him; and away he went in very great wrath. The next morning betimes he preſented him with the ſight of near twenty thouſand men in a Front, behind whom ſtood great numbers of Auxiliaries, and amongſt them were the Jeſſaleni, though they had promiſed the Romans a ſupply both of Men and Victuals. The Romans were a ſmall Company in compariſon of them, but encouraged by former ſucceſs, took good heart, and placing their Flanks cloſe together, fitted their Targets in the ſame manner one to another and therewith making a kind of Rampart, ſtood their ground, and defended themſelves. From morning to night the Fight laſted, and when it grew towards the evening Firmus appeared upon a tall Courſer, and with a loud voice endeavoured to perſuade the Romans to deliver up their General, who, he affirmed, ought to be abhorred by them as a Bloudy Man. And though his words upon ſome had no other effect than to provoke them the more to fight, yet others thereupon left the Field. Therefore when it was dark, and there was no fighting, did Theodoſius draw off to a Caſtle not far diſtant, where he muſtered his Men, and ſuch of them as Fear and the Words of Firmus had cauſed to quit their Stations, he puniſhed ſeveral ways, ſome by cutting off their right hands, and others by burning them alive. Very careful he was all the night to ſecure himſelf againſt the Attempts of the Enemy, of whom thoſe who adventured to ſet upon the Camp, he either forced to retreat, or took them Priſoners.

97. Thence with haſte he departed, and fell upon the Jeſſalenſes by ſuch ways as they little expected, and having utterly waſted their Country, by the way of Mauritania Cæſarienſis he returned to Sitifis, where after great Tortures almoſt to death, he cauſed to be burnt Caſtor and Martinianus, who had been great Aſſiſtants to Romanus in his Rapines. Not long after he turned his Arms again upon the Iſaflenſes, and at the very firſt made great ſlaughter of them, which ſo diſordered Igmazen the King, who had not been wont to be beaten, that conſidering in what danger his Affairs ſtood, and into what miſchief he ſhould force them if he continued obſtinate, he ſecretly withdrew himſelf out of the Army, and humbly beſought Theodoſius, that Maſilla, a principal man amongſt the Mazices, might come to him. By him he held Correſpondence with him, and adviſed him by frequent Skirmiſhes to tire out his Iſaflenſes, ſo that he might more eaſily draw them off from the Intereſt of Firmus, to which they were very much inclined. The General obſerved his Directions, and by frequent Alarms ſo wearied them, that they ran away man by man, and Firmus having lurked here and there, when he conſidered how and whither to make his Eſcape, was ſtopt and ſecured by Igmazen. He now underſtood how matters had been carried by Maſilla, and perceiving there was no hope of better

Sect. 2.

Firmus driven to ſuch ſtraits, that he hangs himſelf.

A.D. 372.

ter Fortune, he reſolved to deſpiſe that Life which he could not ſecure, and therefore having drunk plenty of Wine, (a courſe often uſed by ſuch as were reſolved to lay violent hands upon themſelves) when his Keepers were faſt aſleep, by reaſon they had taken as great a doſe, he roſe from his bed, and creeping on all four found a Cord, which happened to be ready for his purpoſe, and putting it upon a Nail that ſtuck in the Wall, therewith he hanged himſelf, to the great grief of Igmazen: For he ſorrowed much, that he was deprived of the glory of carrying him alive to the Roman Camp; but however reſolving to make as much advantage as the occaſion would permit, he laid the Body upon a Camel, and having got ſafe Conduct by means of Maſilla, went and preſented it to Theodoſius, having ſhifted it to a Pack Horſe. The General joyfully received it, and in a Triumphant manner returned to Sitifis, where he was ſolemnly and joyfully received by all ſorts of People.

A.D. 374.

Vide Valeſii Annot. in Ammian. l. 29.

Theodoſius after all his Services was put to death.

A.D. 377.

98. Such is the Account Ammianus gives us of the Arms of Theodoſius, but what became of the General himſelf after his Victories he tells us not; either out of reſpect to his Son the Emperour, in whoſe time he wrote; or out of forgetfulneſs, or elſe the Copies we now uſe are defective. But what is omitted by him, or obliterated in his Books, we muſt by no means paſs by, that this Theodoſius, after all his brave Atchievments in Africk, was upon the malicious Suggeſtions of certain Courtiers put to death, which he generouſly underwent, after he had (according to his own earneſt deſire) been baptized at Carthage. But this happened four or five years after, according to the courſe of the Hiſtory we purſue, which, having in an uninterrupted Method delivered what we can ſay of Firmus his Rebellion, brings us back to the Motions of the Northern Nations, upon account of which we ſaid ſeveral Laws had been made. For whileſt Theodoſius was ſo Imployed in Africk, the Quadi ſuddenly took Arms, a People at this time not much to be feared, but very formidable in former Ages; witneſs the Seige of Aquileia, carried on by them and the Marcomanni, the razing of Opitergium, and many other Bloudy Actions performed by them, to which with great difficulty a ſtop was put in Diocleſians days by Maricus, who to meet them brake through the Julian Alpes. But at this time whereof we write, they had too great cauſe of complaint and quarrel. Valentinian from his very firſt coming to the Government, had burnt with a generous indeed, but extravagant deſire of fortifying the Limits of the Empire. To this purpoſe he built Caſtles and Forts, as in other places, ſo beyond the River Iſter, upon the very Lands of the Quadi, as if they had been under his own Dominion; at which they were very much diſcontented, and to remove the Eye-ſore did what they could by Meſſages to hinder the Proſecution of his Deſign. But Maximinus that cruel Incendiary, of whom we have already too much ſpoken, being now advanced to the Præfectſhip, and tranſported partly by his Pride thereupon, and his natural humour of Domineering, by Letters rebuked Æquitius, who was then Magiſter Militum in Illyricum, as a careleſs and improvident perſon, that the work was not performed; and he bragged, that if his little Son Marcellianus was but made a Dux in Valeria, the Fort would in a ſhort time be finiſhed. And his Son Marcellianus was accordingly advanced to that Command, and not at all degenerating from his Fathers high-flown Humour, renewed the Work, which for ſome time had been intermitted. Hereat Gabinius their King much concerned himſelf, and in modeſt terms deſired, that no cauſe might be given of Jealouſie and Diſcontent betwixt his People and the Subjects of the Empire. Marcellianus ſeemed to like well of what he urged and invited him with others to a Feaſt; but breaking all the Laws of Hoſpitality cauſed him to be made away ere he departed.

Valentinian diſobliges the Quadi.

Quod ſi parvo ſuo Marcelliano deferretur poteſtas, &c.

Gabinius their King perfidiouſly murdered.

Thereupon they and other Nations break into the Roman Territories.

99. This put not onely the Quadi, but all the neighbouring Nations into a mighty rage, who bewailing the Kings death fell ſpeedily into the Roman Pale in the time of Harveſt, and ſo unexpectedly attacqued the Reapers, that they made great Slaughter of them; which done, they repaſſed the Danube with very large Booty. And it miſſed but little, that the Daughter of Conſtantius, as ſhe was at Dinner in thoſe Quarters, being on her way in order to be married to Gratian, had been ſurprized by them; but Meſſala Governour of the Province attending her, in good time put her into a Chariot, and with all ſpeed imaginable conveyed her to Sirmium, twenty ſix miles diſtant from that place. Here was now reſident Probus the Præfectus Prætorio, ſo much talked of, a man ſo little acquainted with the Attendants of War, that he was out of meaſure affrighted at the Slaughters and Rapines he now heard committed, and ſcarcely able to look up, prepared him ſwift Horſes to make an Eſcape: But he was (though with much difficulty) prevailed with to ſtay;

for

Probus the Præfectus Prætorio aſhamed to fly fortifies Sirmium.

for they laid before him how upon his departure the whole Garriſon would quit the place, which muſt thence neceſſarily fall into the Enemies hands. Since he could not without ſhame remove, he reſolved to ſecure himſelf as well as he could by Fortifying the City. He ſcoured the Ditches that were choked up, and being naturally given to Building, he repaired the Walls, which in ſo long a time of Peace, had been utterly neglected, and were run to ruine, defraying the Charges thereof out of the Money laid up for building of a Theatre. Beſides this he ſeaſonably ſent for a Cohort of the Sagittarii, which lay in the very next Station, to aſſiſt in caſe of a Siege; which, the Barbarians duly conſidering all Circumſtances, thought not fit to lay to the City. Their intent was to hunt and proſecute Æquitius, who (as their Intelligence gave them to underſtand) was the Contriver of Gabinius his Death; and they reſolved to purſue him into the far diſtant Parts of Valeria. In their way they were encountered by the two Legions Pannonia and Mæſiaca, both which made up a conſiderable Army, and ſuch as had they been unanimous, would have proved invincible. But whereas Conſent and Union were the onely means to make them Victorious, they fell into contention about Honour and Precedence, which the Sarmatæ were not ſo dull but ſpeedily to apprehend; and therefore without ſtaying for the ſolemn ſign of Battel, they firſt ſet upon the Mæſiacan Legion, which ſo little expected any ſuch matter, that very many of them were killed before they could buckle on their Armour. Animated by ſo great ſucceſs, they then attacqued the Pannonian, and putting it to the rout, deſtroyed all whom ſpeedy flight had not conveyed beyond danger.

The Enemy cuts off two Legions.

Young Theodoſius, Son to him lately mentioned, notably defeats the free Sarmatæ.

100. Whileſt theſe Legions had through their own folly ſo ill ſucceſs againſt ſome of the Sarmatians, the Army that fought under Theodoſius the Dux of Mæſia, a very young man, (who afterward arrived at the Imperial Dignity) by the good Conduct of their General, whoſe Wiſdom and Courage exceeded his Years, got notable Advantages againſt ſuch of that Nation as were termed Free Men, (in oppoſition to the Slaves of whom we ſpake formerly) who having invaded the Roman Pale, were often worſted by him; and though Numbers of them flocked about him, and imagined they ſhould overpower him, yet ſtill had he the better; and if you will have the Expreſſion of Ammianus, ſo great a Slaughter he made, as therewith to ſatisfie the ravenous Appetites both of Birds and Beaſts. The Barbarians then finding that no good was to be done, but that notwithſtanding all their Attempts they were ſtill beaten back, deſired Peace; which having obtained, they for ſome time obſerved, being kept in awe by a great ſupply of Gallican Souldiers, which were ſent for defence of Illyricum. While theſe Diſorders happened in the Northern Quarters, in the Southern little Diſturbance was made, but by the River Tiber, which by reaſon of exceſſive Rains ſwelled to an extravagant proportion. All the lower parts of Rome it overwhelmed, while the Hills themſelves ſeemed to apprehend a danger; to which the Inhabitants having fled, were thither purſued by Famine, and late enough reſcued from its Violence by Proviſions carried to them in Boats from the neighbouring Parts. This ſeaſonable Supply doubtleſs they ought in a good meaſure to the care and vigilance of Claudius their Præfect, who carried himſelf in his place with great temper and ſerenity, and reſtored many things which had been by the force of Time brought into diſuſe. Amongſt others he raiſed the Porticus, which had its name from Good Event, adjoyning to a Temple ſo called in the North Region of the City, near to the Baths of Agrippa. Such is the continued ſeries of theſe Affairs, as they are related by Ammianus, who hath herein tranſported us too far; for when the Commotions began in Africk about the Revolt of Firmus, Ampelius (as we ſaid) or elſe Bapo was Præfect of Rome, and not Claudius, whoſe Government happened ſometime after.

Tiber overflows to an extraordinary proportion.

Bonum Eventum præcipuè colebant Agricolæ.

Valentinian reforms an Abuſe in the Army concerning the Adcreſcentes.

L. 11. de re Militari, Cod. Tr. l. 7. tit. 1. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

101. To reaſſume therefore Civil Matters where we left them, when we began to ſpeak of the African Wars, ſeveral other matters of conſequence we find done this Year, as well by the one Brother as the other. Valentinian having a conſtant Eye upon the Northern Enemies, and for that purpoſe having imployed Severus the Magiſter Peditum againſt Macrianus King of the Allemans, found reaſon to reform an Abuſe he perceived in his Army. There were thoſe they called Adcreſcentes in every Regiment, who (as we have already ſaid) were Supernumerary Souldiers; or rather being liſted in the Army never fought, but were in readineſs to ſucceed ſuch Souldiers as died or were diſmiſſed. Some of theſe were not as yet fully grown or fit to bear Arms, but were exerciſed by the Officers of the Camp, though others of them were able enough for Service, and both ſorts were wont to be provided for at the Publick Charge. But the Emperour now, to ſave Char-

Sect.2.

A. D. 372.

*l.*1.de Præfect. Præt. ſive Urbis,*Cod.Th.l.*6.*tit.*7.

*L.*1.Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. hinc deſumpta.

Publiſhes a Conſtitution about the Place and Precedence of his great Officers.

ges ſo ill beſtowed upon unſerviceable perſons, by an Edict directed to Severus commands, That no Maintenance be allowed to the firſt or younger ſort out of“ the Publick Stores, but that till they be able to bear Arms they be ſupplied with“ Neceſſaries by their Parents. While he lay at Naſonacum he directed a large Conſtitution to Ampelius the Præfect of Rome, concerning the Rank and Place of the greateſt Officers. Thereby he declares the Præfect of the City, the Præfectus“ Prætorio, and a Magiſter Militum to be equal in Degree and Dignity; for as“ yet there were onely theſe three which were Illuſtrious by peculiar Title, neither“ till now was the Magiſter Militum equal with the other two. But he now“ thought fit to confer on all the like Degree with this Caution, That after the Diſcharge“ of their Offices, and their returning to a Private Life, they ſhould take“ place of one another according to their Seniority in their Imployments, or the“ Dates of their Patents, like as they had done when they were in Power. This“ Rule he would have obſerved when they met upon the Bench of any Judge,“ when they ſaluted the Governour of a Province, or at any ordinary Aſſemblies;“ but not in the Senate Houſe, or at his Privy Council, where he would have the“ ancient Laws about Precedence to be in force. For, the Honorati, or thoſe who“ had born Offices, were permitted to ſit with the Judges of Provinces in their Secretaria,“ or places of Judicature, and to be preſent in the Senate and other Publick“ Meetings. And whereas Valentinian makes mention of other Rules of Precedence of ancient Date in the Senate Houſe, but tells us not what they were; we may well believe that the Cuſtom was for the Præfect of the City, and the Præfectus Prætorio, to take place in a Civil Aſſembly (as Civil Magiſtrates) of the Magiſter Militum; the Præfect of the City firſt, as the Head of the Senate in thoſe days.

*L.*1. de Quæſtoribus,&c. *Cod. Th.l.*6. tit. 9. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

L.un.de Magiſtris Scriniorum,Cod.Th.l. eod.tit. 11.

*L.*1.de Comitibus Rei Militaris,Cod.Th.l. 6.*tit.*14.

*L.*4. de Honorariis Codicillis, *Cod.Th.l.*6. *tit.*22.

102. Such was the Order he would have obſerved amongſt thoſe great Officers of the City and Provinces. By another part of this Conſtitution he ſettles the matter“ of Precedence betwixt ſuch as gave him their conſtant Attendance in the Palace,“ declaring that the Quæſtor, the Magiſter Officiorum, and the two Comites“ Largitionum, ſhould take place of Proconſuls, which till the making of this Law“ they had not done. In the third place he provides, that the Magiſtri Scriniorum“ (viz. the Magiſter Memoriæ, Epiſtolarum, and Libellorum, to whom afterward“ was added the Magiſter Diſpoſitionum) ſhould precede all Vicars of Præfects, a“ Privilege which had not formerly belonged to them, which equalled them with“ Proconſuls and Governours of Provinces, above whom ſhortly after they were alſo“ advanced. And whereas there were many deſerving Commanders in his Armies,“ who being as it were the Deputies of the Magiſtri Militum, were termed“ Comites Rei Militaris, and appointed to defend ſome particular Provinces of the“ Empire. Such of theſe Perſons as had been ſo imployed in Parts beyond the Seas,“ (by which are to be underſtood in this Age the Provinces of Africk in reſpect to“ Italy and Rome eſpecially; and alſo theſe Provinces of Britain) and had already obtained“ to be Comites of the firſt Rank, ſhould take place next to or near Proconſuls.“ It was thought to be a matter of greateſt Merit to have commanded Armies in places that were barren, dry, difficult of Acceſs, and far ſeparated from any Succour; for even ſuch as had been ſent on a Meſſage to the Emperour from beyond the Seas, were excuſed from Duties for two years ſpace. Theſe Comites in particular were he of Africk, as lately Romanus, the other of Tingitana, of Britain, and of the Littus Saxonicum, or Saxon Shore here in this Iſland. Theſe often were advanced to be Magiſtri Militum, but by no means are to be confounded with them, who by Dignity were Illuſtrious; for they were ſubject to their Command as well as the other Comites Rei Militaris of the Provinces, whom they onely excelled in having ſome of them obtained to be Comites of the firſt Rank, but ſtill by Dignity were but Spectabiles. In the laſt place the Emperour Ordains, That ſuch“ as by Codicils or Letters had obtained the Titular Dignity of Magiſtri Equitum,“ ſhould in like manner be inferiour to ſuch as were practically, or by Office Proconſuls,“ the Dignity of whom was very great. Theſe are the ſeveral parts of this Conſtitution directed to Ampelius, at whoſe inſtance it ſeems to have been made, for he himſelf paſſed through moſt of theſe Imployments.

Valens provides for the Citizens of Conſtantinople in ſeveral reſpects.

103. As Valentinian provided for the Dignity and Precedence of his principal Officers, ſo this ſame year did his Brother Valens much conſult the Encouragement and Advantage of the Citizens of Conſtantinople, and that various ways by one and the ſame Conſtitution, (though divided now into ſeveral Laws) directed to Clearchus the Præfect of that City. In the firſt part thereof he provides, That none“ ſhould

Sect. 2.

A.D. 372.

ſhould ſell the Annona Civica, or the ſhare of the Publick Bread, but it ſhould become“ void by ſuch Sale, and ſome other of the ſame Rank be capable of having“ that Allowance, not thoſe of any other Rank: For whereas there were three ſeveral“ ſorts of Men that had this Allowance, viz. thoſe called Populares, or of the“ People, Militares or Souldiers, and Palatini or ſuch as ſerved the Emperour in his“ Palace, he forbids that any Confuſion be made by the Aſſignation of what belonged“ to one ſort to another. Hereby he conſulted for the Maintenance of the Inhabitants, that the Publick Allowance ſhould not be appropriated to unfit or undeſerving Perſons: And he further took care for the Improvement of their Knowledge and Ornament of their Minds. Near twenty years before, Conſtantius had erected a Publick Library in this City, and appointed a Keeper or Curator of it, with ſome under-Officers and a Publick Stipend; for which he is much commended by Themiſtius. But further by this Conſtitution Valens appoints to the well ordering“ and management of it ſeven others by the name of Antiquaries, for the making“ up of new Books, and mending of the old. Of theſe four were to be Greeks,“ and three that ſpake and wrote in the Latin Tongue; the greater number of“ the firſt kind, becauſe Greek was the Language of the place, and there were more“ Books compoſed in that than in the other. And for their Maintenance he aſſigns“ them a Portion of the Popularis Annona, which was taken back to the publick Granaries“ by the death of the former Poſſeſſors, or any other voidance; foraſmuch as“ he ſays that they alſo had Title to it, being of the Body of the People. Further, for the better keeping of the ſaid Library he Ordains, That there be appointed to that Charge other under-Officers by the name of Conditionales, ſo called as others were, for that by reaſon of their Condition they were ſubject to Queſtions and Tortures. In the laſt place, as for the Maintenance and Studies of the Inhabitants of this City, ſo he provides for their Pleaſure and Recreation: Whereas heretofore the Prætors had obſerved no certain day for entering their Office, and celebrating the uſual Games, but were wont to ſhift it off from one time to another; he ordains expreſly,“ That New Years Day, or the Calends of January, ſhall be the Day to be obſerved“ by them all four, upon pain of forfeiting half as much more as the Charge of“ the Paſtimes they were to be at. He might think them the more obliged to do“ this, becauſe ſcarcely a moneth before for their Encouragement he had ordered,“ That out of his own Stables four and twenty Horſes ſhould be lent to thoſe two of“ them, who were at the greateſt Expence for exhibiting their Curule Games.“ About four moneths after in this ſame Year his Brother Valentinian publiſhed an“ Edict, for the ſearch after ſuch as abſented themſelves by reaſon of the Expence,“ and the leſſening of the Charge; requiring that the Senate, which had petitioned“ him in this matter, ſhould report to him the Wealth and Sufficiency of each perſon“ choſen to that Office, that he might determine of it according to the Ability of“ the Party.

L.7. de Annonis Civicis, &c. Cod.Th. l. 14.tit.17. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

L.2. de Studiis liberalibus urbis Romæ, Cod. Th. l.14.tit.9. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

L.20. de Prætoribus, Cod.Th. Dat. 8 Id. Maii

L.19. de Prætorib. Dat. Id. April. ad Senatum.

L.21. de Prætorib. Dat. 11 Cal. Sept. Naſonaci ad Bapponem. P. V.

Is indulgent to the Navicularii.

104. As Valens found reaſon to be indulgent towards the Inhabitants of Conſtantinople, ſo alſo to give relief to the Body of the Navicularii, who brought them their Proviſions, in caſe a Shipwreck happened without their fault: In ſuch a caſe the Navicularius is required to betake himſelf immediately to the Judge of the“ Province, where the matter was in Controverſie, and there prove the Shipwreck“ before him by Witneſſes, whether Strangers that ſaw the Misfortune, or by Mariners,“ who were ſubject to Examination. Then was a Report thereof to be made“ to the Præfectus Prætorio, particularly to Modeſtus of the Eaſt, to whom this“ Law is directed; but the buſineſs to be tranſacted within the ſpace of one Year,“ which was thought large enough for Ships that ſailed from Syria Phœnice or Syria“ Cœle. For, this Law was publiſhed at Berytus, a moſt Eminent City of the former in other reſpects, and for that a very rich Trade was driven from hence of very choice Merchandize ſent to the Court, as of Purple, Silks, and other things; ſo that though Tyre was now the chief City and Seat of the Conſularis, yet were Laws ſent thither to be publiſhed: And at this time Valens lay at Antioch in Syria Cœle, or at Seleucia, not far diſtant from it. Thus we ſee how indulgent Valens was at this time to ſeveral ſorts of his Subjects, but in the mean time he forgot not the publick Revenue, and Service due to the Commonwealth. For not long after was another Edict publiſhed at Berytus, from him directed to Leontius the Conſularis of Phœnice, requiring that all Merchants whatſoever ſhould pay the Gold or Luſtralis“ Collatio, as well ſuch as traded in Purple as others; giving this reaſon, that Immunities“ granted to ſome perſons were injurious to the People in general. Now ſo great was the eſteem of Purple, and thoſe other ſorts of Wares, that it procured to the Mer-

L.1. de Navicularis, Cod. Th. l.13. tit.9. & L.2. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. ubi quàm hallucinatus eſt Tribonianus, vide in Com.

Requires the Luſtralis Collatio of all Merchants.

L.9. de Luſtrali Collatione, Cod.Th. l.13. tit.1. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

Sect.2.

A.D. 373.

L.L.6,7. de Murilegulis, Cod. Th.l. 10. tit. 20. & Cod. Juſt.l. 5. eod. tit.

Merchants as conſiderable Privileges; which now Valens thought fit to recall, and by two other Laws under ſevere Penalties he forbade at the ſame time private per-“ſons to entertain or conceal ſuch as wove or made up the Clothes that were provided“ for his Souldiers.

The fourth Conſulſhip of Valentinian and Valens.

A.D. 373. Valentiniano & Valente A.A.4 Coſs.

Ammian. l.30.

105. The next Year, which was the CCCLXXIII of our Lord, had for Conſuls Valentinian and Valens the fourth time; it being the tenth of their Reign. Valentinian ſeems to have reſided at Milan, and Valens at Conſtantinople. While ſuch Miſchiefs happened as followed the Death of the King of Quadi, ſlain by the Treachery of the Roman Captain, another Diſaſter fell out in the Eaſt, occaſioned by the Treacherous Murder alſo of Paras the King of Armenia. There were ſome turbulent Perſons, amongſt whom one Terentius, a Dux of the neighbouring Parts, who never ceaſed to write to the Court ſtrange things againſt him, though he was now arrived at Mans Eſtate, and ſtill inculcating the Death of Cylax and Artabannes, affirmed him inſolent and a great Oppreſſor of the People. Hereupon, as deſigning ſtrange matters in his Head, he was invited to Tarſus in Cilicia, and being there received in an Honourable manner befitting his Dignity, was kept no otherwiſe than a Priſoner. When he perceived he was neither permitted to go to Valens, nor could learn from any the cauſe of his Reſtraint, it made him very ſolicitous and inquiſitive; and at length he diſcovered by ſome ſecret Intelligence, that Terentius had written to the Roman Commander to diſpatch away ſome other perſon into Armenia, to be King in his ſtead; leſt he going back into his Countrey, ſhould out of indignation conceived for his ill uſage, withdraw himſelf and that Countrey, from the Empire to the Alliance of the Perſian. Hereupon concluding with himſelf that his Deſtruction was near at hand, except he evaded it by ſudden flight, he reſolved with three hundred truſty men, who had attended him out of Armenia, to force his paſſage and be gone; and having very ſwift Horſes, when the day was almoſt ſpent they made their Attempt, with more Courage than Conſideration. The Governour of the Province, ſtirred up by his Apparitor that had Charge of the Gate, overtook him in the Suburbs, and would have perſwaded him to return; but out of fear of his own life, was glad to break off his Diſcourſe, ſo vehemently was Paras bent upon it. Neither had a Legion better ſucceſs that was ſent after him, againſt which he turned and made head, and ſo terrified both Tribune and Souldiers, that they made more haſte back than they had uſed in the purſuit. He was now much delivered of his Fears, but for all that made what ſpeed he could, and in two days and as many nights reached Euphrates; which being at a great loſs how to paſs, at length he and ſome few made a ſhift by Barrels joyned together to get to the other Bank, and the reſt ſwom over as well as they could, and after endeavoured to reach the place they deſigned. In the mean time Valens had notice of his Eſcape, and taking it for granted that he would renounce the Alliance, diſpatched with a thouſand Archers and other light armed men, Daniel and Barzimeres, whereof the firſt bore the Dignity of Comes, and the other held the place of Tribune of the Scutarii. They knew the Countrey very well, through which he paſſed altogether a ſtranger, and by more compendious ways overtook him, and dividing their Forces ſeized upon two Paths lying at three miles diſtance, by one of which he was to paſs: But a Traveller, who coming this way had diſcovered the Ambuſhes laid to intrap him, taking another croſs way, made known to him the danger, and lead him through that woody place to the common Road, by which he got ſafe to Armenia, where he was not a little joyfully received. But Daniel and Barzimeres, who had been ſent to hunt him, were as much ſcorned and derided for having thus miſſed of their Prey; which ſo greatly affected them, that to make ſome amends for their ſuppoſed Sottiſhneſs or Treachery, they caſt about how they might ſome other way deſtroy Paras; and to this purpoſe thought beſt to make uſe of the Credulous Humour of the Emperour, whom they made to believe that he was very expert in Inchantments, and knew thereby how to waſte and debilitate a mans Body inſenſibly, which he eaſily applied to his own Perſon. And hereupon he conceived implacable malice towards him, and conſulted daily with them or others how his Deſtruction might be brought about, either in a publick or private manner. At laſt, private Orders were ſent to Trajan, who in Armenia commanded the Roman Forces, to accompliſh it as well as he could; and he managed the matter with ſuch cunning, by inſinuating himſelf into his Company, frequenting his Table, and by preſenting him with kind Letters from Valens, that he prevailed with him to accept of a Dinner at his Houſe. An extraordinary Entertainment there was made, no want of any thing that might provoke him to eat and drink to ſuch a pitch, as would give the Entertainer moſt fit Opportunity to bring about his Deſign, who withdrawing from the Table as forced by ſome neceſſary occaſion, ſent in a Fellow provided for the purpoſe, who cut the poor Prince in pieces, as he vainly endeavoured to defend himſelf. Thus the Table which (as our Writer obſerves) was ſacred and intaminate upon the very Euxine Sea, was made a Snare to him; which thing Fabricius Luſcinus (he who rejected the Offers of Timochares, or (as ſome wrote) of Nicias the Servant of King Pyrrhus, who offered to poiſon his Maſter) if dead men have any ſenſe of Humane Affairs, could not but bewail.

Sect.2.

A.D. 373.

Paras King of Armenia baſely murdered.

For which Valens deſervedly ſuffered in his Reputation.

106. Valens with all good men ſuffered loſs of Reputation by ſo unworthy an act; and yet Sapor the King of Perſia was very much afflicted upon the Report of it, conceiving he had loſt a great Opportunity of ſtrengthening his Intereſt by the Acceſſion of ſo conſiderable a Friend, as before this he doubted not but Paras would prove. But the Roman Army in theſe Quarters taking more Courage at what had happened, he thought it beſt to ſend one Arſaces on a Meſſage to the Emperour, to perſuade him to ruine that Armenia, which had been the cauſe of ſo much miſchief, or elſe to give way that the Diviſion of Hiberia might not be obſerved hereafter; but the Roman Garriſons removed, and that Aſpacures, whom he had preferred, might be ſuffered to reign over the Armenians. To this Valens anſwered, that he was reſolved to ſtand to the laſt Agreement, and maintain that Treaty to the utmoſt. And Sapor made a Reply, but when Winter was now almoſt ſpent, and that founded upon light and frivolous pretences; for he affirmed the Controverſie could not fully be decided, but by the Intervention of thoſe who were imployed by Jovian at that Treaty, ſome of whom he certainly knew to be dead. The Emperour upon this Meſſage thought fit to ſend away Victor the Magiſter Equitum, and Urbicius the Dux of Meſopotamia, towards Perſia, to deſire, that, as he pretended he would be content with his own Dominions, and ſuffer Armenia to be at its own liberty; and to aſſure him, that except he would ſuffer his men to paſs up and down as they ought, he would enter into ſuch a courſe as he was very unwilling to be forced to do. Theſe Inſtructions were good enough, had the Embaſſadours kept cloſe to them; but herein they were overſeen, that they accepted of ſome ſmall Territories in Armenia, which were offered to them, without any Warrant ſo to do; and not having any other thing effected, they returned home. After them was ſent the Surenas, the ſecond in place from the King, whoſe Offers were rejected though he himſelf was magnificently entertained; and then were great Preparations made, that Valens in Spring might with three Armies invade Perſia; to which end he ſent to purchaſe the Aſſiſtance of the Northern Nations. Sapor thus fruſtrated of his hope, was exaſperated above meaſure; but concealing his Indignation, when he perceived the Emperour to be Arming, he ordered the Surenas to reduce what had been gotten by Victor the Comes, and Urbicius; and to cut off if poſſible thoſe Souldiers which were appointed to the Defence of a place called Sauromaces, which things took effect and were not to be cured; the Goths at this time ſtriking a terror into thoſe who ſteered the Helm of the Empire. While theſe things happened in the Eaſt, Vindicative Juſtice (as Ammianus obſerves) concerned it ſelf for what Villanies had been committed in Africk, in relation to the Affairs of Tripolis lately related. Now was Remigius, who ſo favoured and aſſiſted Romanus in his extravagant acts committed in that Province, reduced to a private life, after that Leo was made Magiſter Officiorum in his ſtead, and was intent upon his Countrey Concernments about Mogontiacum or Mentz, where he was born. Being thus reduced, Maximinus now advanced to be Præfectus Prætorio deſpiſed him, and making it his buſineſs to do miſchief, laid hold on one Cæſarius who had been his Domeſtick, and afterward came to be Notary to the Prince, and tortured him to make him confeſs what Remigius did, or how much he received to be aſſiſtant to Romanus in his cruel Practices. Remigius having notice hereof, being purſued by an evil Conſcience, or overcome by fear, to prevent all other Inconveniences hanged himſelf.

Valens makes great Preparations for war with Perſia.

Remigius the wicked Inſtrument of Romanus hangs himſelf.

Valens takes care to ſecure the Lives and Fortunes of his Subjects.

107. Valens, however he dealt with the Armenian Paras, yet by ſeveral Laws at this very time, took care that his Subjects ſhould not, by any ſlight, or other indirect courſe, be deprived of their Lives or Eſtates. Therefore in caſe of Appeal “ he required that the whole Proceſs containing Evidences or Inſtruments, Acts of “ Court, Teſtimonies, Confeſſions, and all other things tranſacted in Judgment, “ ſhould be tranſmitted to him, when he himſelf was the Judex ad quem. More- “ over he ordained, that none ſhould be convened or judged out of his own Pro- “ vince, which muſt be underſtood when there he was to be had; otherwiſe the “

L.35. de Appellation. & Conſultation. Cod. Th. l.11. tit.30.

Judge

Sect.2.

A.D. 373.

Judge of one Province might ſend to another to ſeize and remit a Criminal, which had fled out of his Juriſdiction, as is evident by many Laws. But whereas by the old Law had been provided, That when one perſon accuſed another of any Crime, he was to write down his own Name, and at his peril undertake to proſecute or make good his Charge; this either through the Negligence or Cruelty of the ordinary Judges was at this time much neglected. He thought therefore to reinforce that Law by another Edict, by which he declares, That whoſoever brings into queſtion and danger, the Fame, Fortunes, Life, and Bloud of another Perſon, muſt expect the Puniſhment due to the Crime which he cannot prove. And yet further againſt Defamations he declares to be in force not onely the old Laws, (as the Edictum perpetuum de Calumniatoribus, the Lex Cornelia de Injuriis, and others) but alſo later Conſtitutions of Princes. In this ſame Edict he provides againſt raſh Accuſations, by preſſing that no Accuſer is to be heard without entring his Name, and taking the thing upon himſelf, as was lately ſaid: But eſpecially he condemns Libels, or Accuſations having no Name of Author affixed to them. Whatever his Practice was, ſuch were his Laws, and agreeable to them his Profeſſion made to the Senate of Conſtantinople, and mentioned by Themiſtius, that the Commonwealth laboured under a greater Burthen when oppreſſed by Calumniators, than when overpowered by Barbarians. In reference to the renewing of Appeals he alſo ordained, That the Party ſhould do it within three moneths, and thereof give notice to his Adverſary.

L.L. 10, 11. *de Accuſationibus & Inſcriptionibus, Cod. Th. l.*9. tit. 1.

*L.*8. *de famoſis libellis, Cod. Th. l.*9. tit. 34. Vide Com.

108. Valentinian this Year further concerned himſelf about the Prætorſhip, that chargeable and troubleſom Office incumbent upon Senators. He commands the Prætor to be named ten years before he ſhould come to the Charge, as the Cuſtom formerly had been; and that within five moneths after he ſhould be informed of his Nomination by the Officers of the Præfect of the City, under pain of their forfeiting ten Pounds of Gold. Having had notice he allows him ſeven moneths to deliberate whether he ſhall accept of the Burthen or make his Excuſe; ſo that from the Deſignation to the Notification and Excuſe an whole year ſhould intervene, the uſual fatal term (as it is ſtyled) of Excuſes in Civil Matters. Of ſuch Excuſes the Præfect of the City muſt have Cognizance, and a ſelect number of Senators, in which none muſt be reckoned who had given their Vote for the Election of the Party, it being preſumed that they might deſire and endeavour to confirm what they themſelves had done. Theſe Judges he ſeverely charges to admit no frivolous Excuſes, nor any unreaſonable Propoſals on either ſide, on pain of being eſteemed and declared publick Enemies, for having thereby diſhonoured that ſublime Body of the Senate. Him that unjuſtly excuſed himſelf he will have, as unworthy of the Honour, to be incapable of the Prætorſhip, beſides a Mulct impoſed upon him if his fault was great; otherwiſe if but ſmall, he ſhall be conſtrained to accept the Charge. If he had a juſt and fair Plea, he excuſes him from the Burthen; as by another Law, (which ſeems but a part of one and the ſame Conſtitution) all thoſe who for their Merit had obtained the Dignity of Conſul or Præfectus Prætorio by Codicils or Letters Patents. This very Year Gothofred thinks Voluſianus to have been Præfect of Rome, and therefore draws back thoſe Laws, which in the old Chronology of Theodoſius his Code are ſaid to have been directed to him in the CCCLXV Year of our Lord, and the ſecond of Valentinian, to that whereof we now write. For in that Year was Symmachus Præfect of the City; and Ammianus Marcellinus writing of the Præfects which were in the time of Valentinian, after Apronianus, reckons them in this order, Symmachus, Lampadius, Juventius, Prætextatus, Olybrius, and then Ampelius; ſo that Voluſianus muſt have born the Office after all the reſt. The firſt of the Laws drawn back to this Year, and directed to him, is concerning the Prætors alſo, for renewing one formerly made by Conſtantine, whereby was ordained, That if ſuch as were to celebrate the uſual Games abſented themſelves, according to the Degree of their Dignity, they ſhould be condemned to pay a certain quantity of Wheat. This he declares ſhall continue fixed and inviolable, although it was often changed, aboliſhed, and reſtored. The Mulct impoſed by Conſtantine was the Payment of Fifty thouſand Modii, from which he excepted thoſe that were under the Age of ſixteen years; and ſometimes diſtinguiſhed Quæſtors from Conſuls and Prætors, as Valentinian by this his Confirmation excepts thoſe to whom he himſelf had given Licence to be abſent; as by another Law thought to be part of this very Conſtitution, the Palatini or principal Officers in his Palace.

*L.*22. de Prætoribus, &c. Cod. Th.

Terminus fatalis.

*L.*23. ejuſd. tit.

In Chron. Hiſtorico ad An. 373.

*L.*18. de Prætoribus.

*L.*67. de Decurionibus, Cod. Th. Vide Com.

Sect. 2.

A.D. 373.

109. Other Laws there are ſtill extant directed to this Voluſianus, whereof ſome appertain to the Jus privatum, and regulate the way of Proceedings in Suits, and are not ſo proper for our Cognizance. Another there is which aſſigns the manner and meaſure of finding Lime both to the Inhabitants of Campania and Tuſcia. Conſtantius had formerly by his Edict allowed to the Burners of Lime a certain quantity of Wine, viz. an Amphora for every three Vehes, and as much to the Carriers or Conveyers of it for every nine hundred pounds weight, paid by the Poſſeſſors of ſuch Grounds, as were obnoxious to this Impoſition. But Valentinian now thought fit to change this Wine for Money, allowing for every Vehis one Solidus, and that not all to be born by the Poſſeſſors of the Lands, but a third part by them, and a fourth by the Arca Vinaria, of which we have ſpoken heretofore. Such Provinces of Italy as abounded in good Wines were obliged to afford Wine to the City of Rome, and Campania with the chief, which is much celebrated by Poets in that reſpect, as well as by other Writers. And Tuſcia alſo was compriſed in the number. But whereas heretofore thoſe Poſſeſſors of ſuch obnoxious Lands were very much oppreſſed by the ordinary Judges and their Officers, who aſſumed the Power of Exacting of them Wine for as great a quantity of Lime as they pleaſed; the Emperour oppoſeth this Grievance by limiting what they were to find to three thouſand of the leſſer ſort of Vehes. And in the third place he allots this Allowance to its ſeveral Iſſues or Receipts, viz. to the maintenance of the Aqueducts one half or fifteen hundred Vehes, (ſo great care there was at this time and ever had of them) and the other half to the publick Works of the City. But out of this Allowance he excepts that which was wont to be made by Terracina, or that which the Ancients called Anxur, the Hill whereof, on which it ſtood, had a great Quarry of that Stone, of which Lime was wont to be made, and appropriated to the repairing of the Haven and Watch-Tower or Pharus of Hoſtia. For the Emperour Claudius, to encourage Navigation, built there a moſt ſtately Tower, in imitation of that of Alexandria, on which he ordained Lights to be conſtantly kept by night; beſides a moſt large Haven for the Reception of all ſorts of Veſſels, which Pharus was afterward repaired by Antoninus Pius, and both of them had not onely ſuch a quantity of Lime appointed to the Repairing of them, but a Company or Body of Artificers, and an Apparitor or Overſeer ſent from the Præfect of the City, as is rationally conjectured. In the next place he pardons to the Decuriones of Tuſcia no leſs than nine hundred Vehes of Lime which they were wont yearly to pay; for this Burthen had lain upon them as ſeveral others did upon the Curiales, or the Senators of Cities or Corporations. But with this condition he remits it, that if afterward there happen to be any neceſſity for raiſing ſome publick Work, upon notice given to him thereof by the Conſulares, he ſhall determine how much Lime they ſhall find for the effecting of it; from which is collected, that Tuſcia of old did not contribute this Stone for the uſe of the City, but for the Works which were raiſed within its own Towns, at the diſcretion of its peculiar Governours called Conſulares Tuſciæ. Another Edict we find inſcribed in like manner to this Voluſianus, out of reſpect to the Præfectus Prætorio, by which Title he is ſtyled in the ſame Inſcription: It declares, That if any one having been caſt by the Sentence and Judgment of the Præfect, had thought fit to ſupplicate the Prince, in caſe he was then alſo overthrown, there ſhould be no more place for Supplication for the ſame matter or cauſe. For ſuch was the Dignity of this great Officer, that out of reſpect to his high Condition no Appeal lay from him, but for Honours ſake it was called a Supplication. The laſt Law that bears his Name is by Title of Præfect of the City, as indeed he was, occaſioned it ſeems by a Difference betwixt him and the Præfectus Annonæ, concerning the Management of Corn. The Emperour declares, That the Care thereof be incumbent on them both, that ſo the one Præfect be not defrauded of his due; nor yet the Power of the other be abridged, but to that end that the Inferiour acknowledge the Preheminence of the Superiour, and the Superiour own what belongs to the others Imployment.

l. 3. de Calcis coctoribus, Cod. Th. l. 14. tit. 6. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

Valentinian changes the Wine allowed to Burners of Lime into Money.

Arma Chalybs, Frumenta Libes, Campanus Iacchum. Sidonius. Vide Com.

L. 5. de Precibus Imperatori offerendis, Cod. Juſt. l. 1. tit. 19.

Provides for the Honour of the Præfectus Prætorio.

L. 1. de Officio Præfecti urbis, &c. Cod. Juſt. l. 1. tit. 28.

A.D. 374. Gratiano A. 3. & Equitio Coſs.

The third Conſulſhip of Gratian with Equitius.

110. For the CCCLXXIV Year of our Lord, Gratian the young Emperour, the third time, with Equitius bore the Name of Conſul. Maximinus from Præfectus Annonæ had ere this been advanced to be Præfectus Prætorio; Eupraxius was at this time Præfect of Rome, having formerly executed the ſeveral Offices of Magiſter Memoriæ and of Quæſtor, and toward the later end of the Year was ſucceeded by Claudius; and of the ſame City Simplicius was Vicar. Valentinian was now buſied in raiſing a Fort near Baſil, (by the Inhabitants of thoſe Parts called Robur) after after he had waſted the Territories of the Allemans, when News was brought from Probus the Præfect, that the Barbarians had invaded Illyricum. This he would not eaſily believe, but to fetch a true account of the buſineſs, he diſpatched away one Paternianus a Notary, by whom being informed that the Barbarians had indeed broken into the Roman Pale, he fully reſolved by all means, and all ſpeed he could make, to chaſtize their Inſolence, not doubting but to drive them back by the very appearance of his Army. But ere all this was known and reſolved, Autumn was already ſpent, and beſides the ſeaſon of the Year, ſeveral other Reaſons there were to perſuade him to ſtop his Journey; which thoſe about him (though with extraordinary difficulty) did ſo much improve, that overcome therewith he put off his Expedition to the following Year. The greateſt Argument uſed was the neceſſity of oppoſing Macrianus the King, who added ſo much Courage and Reſolution to the innate Ferity of his Nation, that nothing ſeemed ſtrong enough to withſtand his Attempts. Therefore did the Emperour remove from Milan near to Mentz, whither the proud King alſo came to an Enterview with him upon the River Rhine, and it had ſo good ſucceſs, that a Peace was agreed and ſworn to, which Macrianus kept inviolable to his Death, and died at laſt in France; for having invaded it with all ſorts of Hoſtility, he was circumvented by the Wiles of Mellobaudes, a warlike King of that Countrey, and ſlain. This Peace thus eſtabliſhed, Ammianus brings Valentinian into his Winter Quarters at Triers, and there leaving him viſits the Court of his Brother Valens in the Eaſt, where he finds all out of order. This Prince, as he was by nature very rigid, delighted in hearing Cauſes, that he might ſhew his Severity upon ſuch as he ſhould find to be in the wrong. But his Courtiers concluding that their Trade would be ſpoiled, through that light he would receive by the Advocates, uſed their utmoſt endeavours to diſſuade him from that practice, as a thing infinitely below him. And they found Modeſtus his Præfectus Prætorio, a Clown nothing vers'd in Antiquity, but perfectly a Slave to the Court Eunuchs, to be fully compliant with them, who would always tell him, that it was below His Majeſty to condeſcend to hear ſuch frivolous matters. This Modeſtus was that Domitius Modeſtus, who had formerly in the Reign of Conſtantius been Comes of the Eaſt, and when Julian came to the Government, was accuſed as having too much defended his Cauſe. But this Emperour being come into the Eaſtern Provinces, he feigned himſelf a Pagan, and thereby not onely appeaſed his Anger, but obtained to be Præfect of Conſtantinople, which Office he again executed when Valentinianus Nobiliſſimus Puer and Victor were Conſuls, in the ſixth year of this Emperour Valentinian, wherein he finiſhed a moſt magnificent Ciſtern in that City, which he had begun in his firſt Præfectſhip, and from him being placed in the eleventh Region thereof, it had the Name of Modeſtiaca. We have already ſpoken of his egregious Flatteries, and not likely to hear more of him, we further adde, that he had a Son by name Inſtantius, who alſo attained to be Comes of the Eaſt.

The Barbarians invade Illyricum.

A Peace made upon the Rhine.

Periit autem in Francia poſtea, &c. Ammian. ubi prius.

Vide Valeſium in Annot.. ad Ammian. l.30.

Great Corruption in the Courts at Conſtantinople.

III. Hereby it came to paſs, that both Judges and Advocates did what they liſted, and made a Market of all mens buſineſſes, delegating them to unfit perſons, as their Intereſt and Profit ſuggeſted to them. And here our Hiſtorian falls into a great and long Invective againſt the Advocates or Orators of this time, for their Rapacity, Ignorance, and Impudence thereupon commonly following; and the more to ſet them out he compares them with thoſe of the Greeks and Romans in former Ages: And though he makes them as bad as bad can be, yet that he is not therein very extravagant, or acted wholly by Malice and Prejudice, ſome Laws made at this time ſufficiently convince us, which by preſcribing the Remedy, do to underſtanding perſons ſufficiently make out the Diſtemper. For theſe very Emperours by ſeveral Edicts thought fit to ordain, That no man ſhould be Judge and Advocate, both, in the ſame Cauſe, that they ſhould not break forth into opprobrious Language, for which they are ſo ſeverely taxed by Ammianus; neither make any Contract before hand with their Clients, nor refuſe ſuch Fees as they thought fit freely to give them; that they ſhould not induſtriouſly protract Juſtice; that the Honorati, or ſuch as had born Offices, exerciſing the Function of Advocates at Rome, ſhould thereby receive no Benefit or Reward, nor ſit on the Bench with the Judges, but in the place we have formerly ſaid to belong to them, or ſtand as Advocates were wont to do. But Valentinian concerned himſelf not onely in matters relating to Civil, but to Military Concernments alſo; for at the Suggeſtion of Probus the Præfectus Prætorio he ordered, That when there was neceſſity for ſome new Work to be raiſed, if the third part belonging to the City con-

Vide L. 2. de poſtulando Cod. Th.l.1. tit.10. Cum Com. Gothofr. & L. 6. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

L. 18. de Operibus publicis, Cod.Th.l. 15. tit. 1. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

concerned could do it, it ſhould be lawful to make up the Summe out of the Revenue of other Cities. For Cities or Corporations had certain Revenues appropriate to them, and particularly Tributes or Tolls; and of theſe Revenues part was ordained for Maintenance of publick Works, as a third by Valentinian in this Law whereof now we ſpeak; to which Service certain Lands were deſtined or appropriate. In like manner by the ancient Canons and Eccleſiaſtical Laws, of the Revenues belonging to Churches, four parts or portions were made; whereof one was aſſigned to the Biſhop for ſupport of his Dignity; a ſecond to the Prieſts, Deacons, and Clergy; a third to the Reparation of Churches; and a fourth to the Relief of the Poor, Infirm, or Strangers. Which Aſſignations were alſo made by the Laws of the Lombards.

Valentinian orders one City to aſſiſt another.

112. To Probus he gave out another Edict not long after, for clearing a Doubt concerning the Puniſhment of a notorious Crime, but too frequent in thoſe days. It had been the Opinion generally both of Heathen and Chriſtian Writers, That it was a Sin to kill Infants, although by reaſon of a depraved Cuſtom in ſome places they were ſcarcely reckoned amongſt Mankind, before they were delivered to Nurſes. But however the Puniſhment due to the Offence was uncertain, the Offenders being moſt commonly but baniſhed; till Valentinian now thought fit by this Edict to make it no leſs than Capital, as eſteeming it altogether a Piacular Crime. The Law was propoſed at Rome, and is rationally thought intended chiefly againſt the Practice of Strumpets, which too ordinarily made away their Baſtard Children, both then and in all Ages beſides. But as our Emperour thought fit to prohibit the Murdering of Children, ſo alſo the Expoſing of them, by another Conſtitution, which commands each Parent to take care of his own Iſſue, under pain of undergoing what the Law impoſeth in that caſe; and if the Lords or Patrons of any Children did ſo expoſe them, he declares them thereby freed from the Dominion of ſuch Lords, and to belong to thoſe who had taken Compaſſion of them in ſo great miſery. So frequently were Robberies now committed about Rome, and chiefly by reaſon of the harbour and retreat they had to ſeveral places in the Countrey, that upon the Relation of the matter by Simplicius the Vicar of the City, Valentinian by his Reſcript thought fit to declare, That whoſoever received and concealed a Malefactor, ſhould be liable to the ſame Pains and Forfeitures, as the Criminal himſelf ought by the Law to undergo. As he was ſevere againſt Malefactors, ſo this Somer as indulgent towards Painters, to the Art of whom he naturally bore a great Affection, and which had in all Ages indeed, wherein Barbariſm did not prevail, been much prized; ſo that the former Roman Laws gave to men of this Profeſſion Immunity from all Services. But their Privileges he ſo enlarged now by a Conſtitution directed to Chilo the Proconſul of Africa, That no fewer than nine ſeveral Immunities he conferred on them, whereof the firſt freed them from the Capitatio, or Paying for the Heads both of themſelves, their Wives, and Children. And whereas in the ordinary Cenſus or Tax, Lords were wont to pay for their Slaves, but eſpecially for ſuch as were Barbarians, or not born within the Roman Pale; he alſo diſcharges Painters of that Burthen, as to this particular.

Forbids the Killing,

L. 1. *ad legem Corneliam de Sicariis, Cod. Th.l.*9. *tit.*14. & *L.*8. *Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Canonizata etiam eſt de pœnis, diſt.*1.

And the Expoſing of Infants.

*L.*2. de Infantibus expoſitis, Cod. Juſt.

Severe againſt ſuch as harboured Thieves.

*L.*1. de his qui latrones,&c. *Cod.Th.l.*9. tit. 28.

Indulgent to Painters in an high meaſure.

*L. ult. de Excuſationibus Artificum, Cod. Th.l.*13. tit. 4. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

113. Moreover for ſuch Pictures as they made themſelves, though they trafiqued with them, he would not have them pay the Luſtralis Collatio or Impoſition on Merchandize, as they were obliged for what they bought to ſell again. And whereas there were certain Pergulæ or Shops belonging to the Publick, where Wares were expoſed to ſale, and Profeſſors of the Liberal Arts were wont alſo to teach for Reward, (till Theodoſius the Younger took away the Cuſtom, that the Publick Profeſſors in the Capitol might have more Encouragement) he ordains, That Painters ſhould have the uſe of them Rent-free. Neither will he have them obnoxious to the Metatus, or harbouring any Souldiers or others againſt their will, which Privilege was alſo allowed to Phyſicians and Profeſſors; but he alſo exempts them from the Juriſdiction of the Pedanei Judices, or inferiour Judges, thereby granting Authority over them onely to the Governours of Provinces or Vicars, which Immunity is ſingular, and not to be found granted to any other ſort of men. In like manner was it not indulged to others, to remove and change their Habitations when, and as oft as they pleaſed; which yet he permits his Painters to do. He alſo diſcharges them from Services by Horſes and otherwiſe. And in the laſt place he permits not the Judges to conſtrain them to draw the Pictures of the Emperours themſelves without Wages or Reward: From which we may learn, that the Governours of Provinces were wont unjuſtly to exact, as other ſervices for nothing, ſo this alſo of painting the Emperors, when their“ Pictures were to be placed ſomewhere in publick, or given to the Inhabitants of“ ſome City or Town. But this Edict concerns the Africans, who otherwiſe were alſo very ingenious; and particularly in Architecture: And it has this limitation, that theſe Painters were to be of ingenuous or free condition; otherwiſe, if Slaves, they ſhould not enjoy any of theſe Immunities; and this was in conformity to the ancient Cuſtoms of Rome, which at firſt forbad any of ſervile condition to exerciſe this Art, though afterwards they intruded into it. “But, as much as any other, is that part of this Conſtitution remarkable, which inflicts no leſſer puniſhment on the Infringer of“ theſe Priviledges than what belonged to Sacrilegde, or violation of the Laws. So ſevere he was in this particular, out of a peculiar Inclination he had to Painting; wherein, as thoſe affirm, who wrote his life, he himſelf was very skilful, as well as in writing a very Good Hand, and to theſe he added the Art of Emboſſing, in which alſo he was very well ſeen. “Another Law he Enacted this year whereby he allowed five years time to proſecute a man that had ſtoln his Neighbours Wife, but no longer; leſt Mariages well ſetled, to the content of both“ Parties, ſhould be diſturbed, or Children born of ſuch Marriages ſo well ſucceeding,“ ſhould be injured. By the laſt Law extant in the Code, and bearing his Name this year from Triers (where he was now returned from Robur, whence the former Edict was dated) he ſignifies That he had formerly in more general words“ given order, that all Judges whatſoever when they gave Sentence, ſhould read“ it out of a Writing; to which he now further adds, that if the Sentence was not“ ſo reduced into Writing, it ſhould not deſerve that Name, neither ſhould there“ be any need to appeal from it. This was agreeable to what the Civil Law of Rome had formerly determined in this matter; though there was this Difference as to Judges; that the Clariſſimi and Spectabiles were bound to read their Sentences, themſelves; but the Illuſtres, as the Præfecti Prætorio, might have them read by one of their Officers.

Sect. 2.

A.D. 374.

He allows but five years to proſecute him that had ſtoln his Neighbours Wife.

L. I. de Raptu. Virginum & viduarum Cod. Th. lib. 9. tit. 24. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt. unà cum cæteris Legibus hujus tit.

L. I. de Sententiis ex periculo recitatis. Cod. Th. lib. 64. tit. 17. & L. ult. Cod. Juſt. eod. Tit.

114. Valens all this year made his Abode at Antioch, where he took care for preſerving Gold, and its value within the Empire; “by forbidding that any of that metal ſhould be given to the Barbarous Nations in exchange for Merchandize;“ and by prohibiting any Coin to be made of that which private Perſons brought“ into the Mint. If a Judge to whom diſcovery was made did not puniſh a Merchant“ ſo offending, he ſubjects him by that Law to Animadverſion himſelf; and“ ſo great an eſteem was there of Gold in this Age, that not only he forbids it to“ be alienated to Barbarians; but what they had of it already, by ſome cunning“ device he would have got out of their Hands. But after this manner paſſed the two Brothers this year; and entred upon the following or the CCCLXXV of our Lord, which in ſome Books hath no Conſuls aſſigned, but only marked thus: After the third Conſulſhip of Gratian Auguſtus, and of Equitius; but in others, Pontius Paulinus is noted, though alone, to have born this Office. The Spring being now well advanced, Valentinian removed from Triers, and haſted into Illyricum, which, the foregoing year, had been waſted by the Sarmatæ and Quadi. In his way he met with Ambaſſadors from the former, who caſting themſelves down at his Feet, deſired he would put a favourable conſtruction upon all he had heard concerning thoſe that ſent them; for he ſhould find them guilty of no ſuch crimes as were laid to their charge. This they often repeated; and his Anſwer was, that in that place he would determine nothing, but judge as he found when he came into the Country which was ſaid to have been injured by them. Being come to Carnutum or Carnuntum, on old decayed Town of Illyricum, but conveniently ſeated for defence of the Country, he took care for the effectual preſervation of the Borders; but when it was expected that, as a ſevere Prince, he would animadverte upon thoſe Governors, by the negligence or treachery of whom the Provinces had been expoſed to the violence of the Barbarians; therein he utterly fruſtrated the expectation of the people, neither made any Inquiry into the death of Gabinius the King, nor other moſt conſiderable miſdemeanours; his humour inclining him to rigidity againſt inferiour Perſons, but towards theſe of high condition to ſo much eaſineſs, that he would ſcarcely give them an angry word. Probus was the only man he purſued with hatred, whom he never ceaſed to taxe and threaten after he ſaw him, and that for very plain and urgent Reaſons. For this man, having arrived at the Præfectſhip, and continued long time in his Office, (as by the many Laws of ſeveral years directed to him is moſt evident, beſides the teſtimony of Hiſtory) conſulted not the Dignity of his Place, nor the Nobility of his Houſe, but acted more according Valens takes care for keeping Gold within the Empire.

L. 2. de Commerciis Cod. Juſt. lib. 4. tit. 63. L. 8. de falſa moneta. Cod. Th. lib. 9. tit. 21.

After the third Conſulſhip of Gratian and Equitius.

A.D. 375. Poſt Conſ. Gratiani. A. III. & Equitii V. C.

Valentinian goes into Illyricum.

Yet puniſhes not the great Offendors.

according to what his own appetite and the flatteries of theſe about him ſuggeſted, than the principles of moderation could ſuffer.

Probus the Præfect very much to blame.

Clamours out of Epirus, againſt him; as well as Pannonia.

115. Perceiving the Emperor to be very much inclined to the getting of money, he did not, as often other conſcientious Miniſters, divert him from ſuch courſes as he was bent to purſue; but followed and humoured him in his way, how pernicious ſoever; whereby came it to paſs that both Rich and Poor were often moſt miſerably oppreſſed, and turned out of all they had. So great were the publick Burthens, and the Tributes increaſed to ſo unſufferable a proportion, that for fear of undergoing the extremity of puniſhment for what they were not able to perform, many perſons of good Quality fled their Countries, and others were perpetually kept in Priſon, from which they were freed by offering violence to themſelves, their preſſure and deſperation were ſo great, while Valentinian, greedy of gain, gave no great heed to Accuſations of that Nature, not conſidering or imagining them to be of near ſo great importance as indeed they were, and too late he found it. But beſides, for what the Pannonians had ſuffered, clamours were now made out of Epirus upon this occaſion. It had been an ancient cuſtom during the Commonwealth, for the Provincials, by their publick Meſſengers, to praiſe and extoll thoſe in the Senate, by whom they had been governed; which cuſtom firſt had its riſe from the Greeks, who were wont to flatter their Magiſtrates. Afterwards the Senate gave no heed to, but diſcouraged ſuch formal and forced commendations; and in the time of Nero a Senatuſconſultum was made, forbidding the Governours of Provinces to propoſe any ſuch matter in the publick Councils of their Diſtricts, and all Perſons to undertake ſuch meſſages. Yet was the cuſtom renewed, as is evident from ſeveral Authors; and not only did the Provincials of their own accord, give this Teſtimony, concerning their Governours; but by this time it was come to that paſs, that they were of courſe conſtreined to do it. In this number were the People of Epirus, and they compelled one Iphicles, a Philoſopher, to undertake the meſſage, who being a Couragious man, when the Emperor took notice of him, and demanded whether his Country-men thought well of their Præfect, he anſwered him in Greek, that they commended him, but ſore againſt their Wills. With this Anſwer Valentinian was put into diſorder, and began to ſearch narrowly into his Actions; and inquiring after the Perſons of Quality of that Province, when he heard that one was hang'd, another was fled beyond Sea, another had made away himſelf, and a fourth had been tortured to death, he fell into a mighty rage, being exaſperated by the ſuggeſtions of Leo, the Magiſter Officiorum, who gaped after his place; but had he come to be Præfect, would ſo have demeaned himſelf, that when compared with his, the Government of Probus would have been extolled to the skies. However, this is that great and famous Probus who had Lands throughout the Roman Provinces; who by his great gifts and Intereſt procured the greateſt Imployments, and gaped as a Fiſh out of the Water, when he was not ſwimming in the Current of ſome Prefectſhip, as Ammianus ſpeaks of him, Indeed he bore ſo many Offices that he may ſeem never to have been without ſome Command or Magiſtracy. For he was firſt Proconſul of Africk in the Conſulſhip of Datianus and Cerealis. After that, four times Præfectus Prætorio, and laſt of all Conſul with Gratian, A. D. CCCLXXI. He was the Son of Cælius Probinus, the Grandſon of Petronius Probianus, who had both been Conſuls, and from his Grandfather had the name of Sextus Petronius Probus.

Vide Valeſ. in Annot. ad Amm. lib. 30. p. 424.

Lib. 27.

Vide Valeſ. in locum.

116. In reference to the Complaints of the People of Epirus, there are two Laws ſtill extant; which, though they be aſſigned, according to their Date, to the preceding year in the Chronology, yet are rationally thought by Gothofred to have been occaſioned by theſe very Grievances and Complaints. They are both directed to Zoſimus the Præſident of New Epirus, in which Office he had ſucceeded Paulinus, and ſaid to have been delivered at Apollonia, a City of that Country, in which was an excellent breed of Horſes. The firſt of theſe Laws ſignifies to the ſaid Zoſimus, “That Valentinian had ſent a general Edict throughout the Provinces, that only one Solidus ſhould be demanded by thoſe they called Stratores for the trial and approbation of an Horſe; and that the Provincials ſhould obſerve no other than one certain Shape, Stature and Age in ſuch as they were bound to find for publick ſervice. For we muſt know, that, as the Romans in thoſe days called any one by the name of Strator who ſadled the Horſe, and aſſiſted his Maſter in mounting him; ſo of theſe ſorts of Grooms, there was in the Palace of the Emperour a certain Schole or Company, all young men, over whom was ſet the Tribunus Stabuli; yet under the Diſpoſition of the Magiſter Officiorum. It being preſumed, that by reaſon

L. unic de Stratorib. Cod. Th. lib. 6. tit. 31.

L. unic. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

Valentinian indeavours to reform Abuſes committed by the Stratores.

of their Imployment they had ſkill in Horſes, from amongſt them were conſtantly the fitteſt Perſons choſen out, and ſent into the Provinces, to try and approve ſuch as were found by the Subject by way of Tribute; and as in reſpect of their Imployment abroad, they were joyned in Reputation with Domeſtick Protectors, the Agentes in Rebus and others; ſo often did they commit Extravagancies and burthen the People; eſpecially if the Superior Officers connived at them, as probably did Probus the Præfect. Therefore for Reformation of this Abuſe Valentinian“ writes to Zoſimus, who being nearer at hand, as having his Reſidence at Apollonia,“ was capable both to know and correct it; which he injoyns him, under“ pain of his Office being fined for every ſuch Neglect an hundred pounds of Silver.“ Amongſt other Complaints put up by the Epirotes, this alſo it ſeems was“ alleaged, that the Præfectiani, or Apparitors of the Præfectus Prætorio, did grievouſly haraſſe the Country by their Exactions and greedineſs of Gain, for ſo Valentinian in another Edict tells this ſame Zoſimus, though by Imperial Authority all ſuch Oppreſſion had been ſtrictly forbidden. For, they depending upon the Higheſt Dignity next the Emperour, and not ſubject to the Ordinary Governours of Provinces, in Collecting Tributes, and otherwiſe, made Uſe of their power to terrify the poor People, for which Reaſon they had formerly been forbidden to have any thing to do in the raiſing of Tributes. Now he expreſly“ Commands, that none of them be permitted to Execute the Office of Exactor,“ neither have the Charge of the publick Granaries, leſt they ſhould imbezel the“ Corn or other Proviſions, which it would be difficult to Recover out of their“ Hands; nor have as much as the Imployment of a Curioſus or Stationary, who“ had Care of the Curſus Publicus, and was wont to diſcover Criminal Perſons to“ the Judges. If any ſhould diſobey this Order, he wills him to be put down to the“ Imployment of Suſceptor (which was inferior to his Quality, as belonging to the“ Officers of the ordinary Judges of Provinces) and that his Name be tranſmitted“ to his own Perſon.

L.un 1.Ne Præfectianus &c. Cod. Th. lib. 12. tit. 10. l. 2.Cod. Juſt. de Apparitorib. Præfect Præt. hinc interpolata eſt.

Fauſtinus ſtrangely put to Death.

Valentinian invades the Country of the Quadi.

117. But to proſecute our Story; Valentinian lying at Carnutum three Months together in the Summer time, viz. June, July, and Auguſt, made preparation of all Neceſſaries, if occaſion ſhould ſerve, for Chaſtiſing the Quadi, who had cauſed very great diſturbances in thoſe Quarters. There in the preſence and ſight of Probus, Fauſtinus the Siſters Son of Juventius the Præfectus Prætorio of Gall, after Torture, periſhed by the hands of the Hangman, having been accuſed of killing an Aſſe for the Exerciſe of ſome ſecret Arts, though he denied he had any ſuch Intention; and it was further laid to his Charge, that when one Nigrinus in a jeſting manner deſired Him to make him a Notary, he ſhould laugh, and bid him firſt make him Emperour, if he would be ſo preferred; but this Drolling coſt both of them their Lives, and was the Deſtruction of more beſides them. Now was Merobaudes with a Party of Foot, and with him Sebaſtian a Comes ſent to waſte the Borders of the Enemy; and Valentinian departed with Speed to a place called Acincum, whence paſſing over his Men on a Bridg of Boates, he Invaded the Territories of the Quadi in another quarter. They hearing of his coming, from the Mountains obſerved his Motions; and when he appeared, fled into the remoter parts of the Country, with their Wives and Children; where when they found themſelves alſo Attacqued by Merobaudes and his Party, they were amazed, and more eaſily overpowered; of whom many being killed, and their Houſes burnt, the Emperor returned in ſafety with all his Army. He ſtaid at Acincum till the year was allmoſt ſpent, deſirous to find out ſome convenient place in thoſe Frozen Tracts, wherein to Winter; but could light of none ſo fit as Sabaria, although that too was far from convenient. Paſſing therefore on by the Rivers ſide which he fortified all along as he ſaw need to require, with Caſtles and Garriſons, he came to Bregetio, where he was admoniſhed of his approaching Fate, by ſeveral Signes, as our Writer gathereth. For, a few days before, Blazing Stars appeared, and at Sirmium, the Palace, Court-houſe and Forum were all ſtruck with Thunder; while he continued at Sabaria an Owle pearched upon the top of his Bath, and there making an unpleaſing noiſe, could not be driven away by all the Stones and Arrowes the multitude could caſt. Being to march from that place, he reſolved to paſs out at the ſame Gate he came in, as thereby to ſignify that he ſhould return back into Gall, but the Gate having been neglected a long time, was now choked up, and by no means could the Port-Cullis be raiſed, though there was all endeavour poſſible uſed; ſo that the time being much ſpent, he was forc'd to take his way through another Gate. The night before he died, he thought

Sect.2.

A.D. 375.

thought he ſaw his Wife ſit by him in a ſorrowful Poſture, in an ill Habit, and with her Hair hanging upon her Shoulders, which Ammianus believes to have been his Fortune, or Genius, now ready in that rueful manner to depart. When in the morning he came out with a ſad and dejected Countenance to mount, the Horſe would not admit him, but reared; and while his Strator miles as Marcellinus calls him, ſtrugled to put him into his Saddle, againſt his Will his Hand gave him a Blow, which thereupon he commanded to be Cut off. And the Innocent Young Man had periſhed, but that Cerealis the Tribunus Stabuli with danger of his own ſafety, deferred the Execution.

They ſend their Ambaſſadours and beg Peace.

118. After this came the Ambaſſadors of the Quadi, and with all Signes of Humility, begged pardon for paſt Offences, which the ſooner to obtain, they offered a Supply of Soldiers and other things, whereof it was convenient enough for the Emperor to accept: For he was not ſufficiently furniſhed with Proviſions, neither would the Seaſon of the Year permit that he ſhould attempt any thing more againſt them at this time; and therefore, it being reſolved that they ſhould be heard, they were admitted into the Conſiſtory. There, while they ſtood with Body and Mind both dejected, and were commanded to declare what they had to ſay, they made the uſual Excuſes, and confirmed them by Oath, that what of late happened, was not by any Deſigne or common Conſent of the beſt of their Nation, but committed by a Ravenous ſort of Borderers living upon the River, whom they affirmed to have been provoked by building the Fort we lately ſpoke of, contrary to all Juſtice and the Roman Intereſt. With this their Diſcourſe, Valentinian was inraged above meaſure, and with a great noiſe upbraided their whole Nation as ingrateful. Being a little pacified, he ſunck down, as if he had been ſtruck from Heaven, and ſeemed deprived of Life and Voice altogether: his Blood ſtopped, and he was ſeized with cold Sweat, which thoſe about him perceiving, that he might not die in a Croud, conveyed him into his Chamber. There, being laid on his Bed, though drawing on, he had his Underſtanding perfect, and knew all that were with him, whom they of his Chamber had importuned to come in, leſt it ſhould be imagined that he was made away. The heat he felt inwardly was ſo great, that a Vein neceſſarily was to be opened, (as our Hiſtorian deſcribes his Diſeaſe) but no Phyſitian could be found; he having diſpatched them all away, to take care of the Army which was now ſeized with the Plague. At laſt they light upon one, who pricked him ſeveral times, but could not make him bleed, his moiſture being either conſumed by the violence of his Fever, or his Veins dried up by the coldneſs of the Climate where he Reſided. Being ſufficiently ſenſible that nothing but Death was to be expected, he would have ſpoken and given order in ſome Matters; but was hindred by Convulſions which ſhewed themſelves in a moſt violent Hickough, and various Contorſions of his Limbs; ſo that, fully overcome by the Fury of his Diſtemper, which betrayed its Malignity by the Blew Spots wherewith it beſpred his Skin, after long ſtrugling he breathed out his Laſt, in the five and fiftieth year of his Age and of his Reign the twelfth, which to compleat he wanted an hundred days.

To whom giving Audience, he falls into a Rage and Fit.

Of which he dies.

119. Such is the Account which Ammianus gives us of his paſſage out of this World, according to the Printed Copy of his Hiſtory now moſt in Uſe, though the Text ſeems neither well to agree with it ſelf, nor with other Writers who ſpeak of the ſame Subject. For they generally ſay that he died Bleeding, or rather of Bleeding, and ſome, by voiding it from the Stomach, and others out of the Lungs; ſo that inſtead of ſtopping of the Blood, in Ammianus, is rather to be read Blood ſuddainly guſhing forth. In ſuch Malignant Fevers as the Spots betrayed His to be (and probably as Malignant as the Peſtilence wherewith his Army was at this very time afflicted) ſuch Symptomes as theſe whereof the Hiſtorian diſcourſeth, are frequent enough, extravaſation of Blood, ſymptomatical Sweats, Hickough, Convulſions and the like; although Ammianus, amongſt other ſorts of knowledge to which he affectedly pretends in his Book, ſeems little to have underſtood that of Phyſick. And yet leſs reaſon had a far later Author than he to pretend to it, who ſpeaking of his End, ſaith he died of a ſudden Effuſion of Blood, which he makes the ſame Diſeaſe with an Apoplexy; and in this Apoplexy, he adds, that though he loſt his Voice, yet he Expired in his perfect Senſe or Underſtanding. He further writes that moſt Authors affirmed him to have Contracted this Diſeaſe by his great Intemperance in Diet, and yet it is commonly reported that his Veins were opened by his extraordinary Paſſion, at the Audience given to the Ambaſſadors of the Quadi; in particular, Socrates relates, that he fell into that Exclamation and Fury, upon ſeeing the ſaid Ambaſſadours to be of vile and abject Condition, and that he demanded whether the reſt of the Sarmatæ were ſuch men as they. They anſwered that they were; for he had now before him thoſe of higheſt Quality of that Nation; whereat he was wonderfully incenſed and brake out into a vehement Indignation, that the Empire of Rome ſhould have ſo ill luck as to fall into his Hands; during whoſe Government ſo beggarly and baſe a ſort of Barbarians could not content themſelves to live quietly within their own Bounds; but muſt Rebell, take Armes, and ſo boldly make War againſt it. He ſtrained himſelf ſo much in declaiming againſt them that, as he ſays, he opened every Vein in his Body, and brake the Arteries aſunder, out of which iſſued ſo large a Stream of Blood that he died in the Caſtle commonly called Bergitium.

Pro repente cohibito ſanguine legend. erumpente ſubito ſanguine.

120. His Fathers Name (as we hinted before) was one Gratian, who had the Sirname of Funarius, becauſe he was ſo ſtrong in his Arms that five Souldiers could not wreſt a Rope from him. This Gratian being for his ſtrength taken notice of, was preferred, and by degrees aroſe to the Dignity of Protector and of Tribune, and at laſt came to be Comes rei Caſtrenſis in Africk; where being ſuſpected of Rapine he gave over his Employment, and long after had the ſame Command over the Britiſh Army. At length being diſmiſſed without any thing laid to his charge, he returned to a Private Life, and was afterward heavily fined by Conſtantius, for that during the Civil War he was ſaid to have entertained Magnentius in his Paſſage. Valentinian his Son having the advantage of his Intereſt and Repute in the world, improved it ſufficiently by his own Merits till he arrived at the higheſt Dignity upon Earth; and thereto had the opportunity alſo of raiſing his Brother, with whom he reigned in perfect Concord. In his Government the firſt thing he applied himſelf to was the care and defence of the Borders, of the Forts and Caſtles ſtanding upon Rivers, (which he principally attended all his life;) and to protect Gall from the Allemans, who had grown confident and daring upon the death of Julian, the Prince whom alone they feared after the Emperour Conſtans. And his Felicity was ſuch, that he reinforced the Army with a very great Supply; and ſuch was his ſucceſs in building new Forts where there was want, as well as repairing the old, that not an Enemy could paſs into the Roman Pale undiſcovered. He made uſe of induſtrious Captains, whom he rendered ſuch by his own Induſtry; and where the Lions Skin was too ſcant, he enlarged it by that of the Fox. For having aſſumed his Son Gratian, to the Dignity of Auguſtus, to prevent Competition he cauſed to be made away Vithigabius the Son of Vadomarius King of the Allemans, a young Man in the flower of his Age, who ceaſed not to animate his Countrymen againſt the Romans; after which he gave them a notable Defeat at Solicinium, having narrowly eſcaped being circumvented, and being deſtroyed by them. Having thus cautiouſly managed his matters againſt them, he turned his Arms againſt the rage of the furious Saxons, who ever ruſhed on in all deſperate Enterprizes without fear or wit; and though by ſomething fraudulent, yet a convenient Stratagem, eaſed them of that Burthen of Booty which they had pilfred from the Maritime Tracts. In like manner he reſcued the Britans from the Violence and Inroads of their Enemies, of whom having made ſuch Slaughter, as ſcarcely any were permitted to eſcape alive, he ſettled them in their former Security and Repoſe. By the ſame vigorous courſe of Proceeding he ſuppreſſed Valentine the Pannonian Exile, before it was well known what he was attempting; delivered Africk from thoſe Miſchiefs wherewith it was ſuddenly ſeized, when Firmus drew the Mooriſh Nations to revolt; and had done the ſame by Illyricum, if he had not been prevented by death from perfecting what he was in a fair way to accompliſh. In concluſion it may be ſaid of him, That though he did great things by his Captains, yet many things he did himſelf, that he was of a quick Wit; and by his Experience in Military matters fit to manage the greateſt Concernments of War, which would have more appeared, could he have taken Macrianus King of the Allemans, as with great induſtry he endeavoured to do, after he had eſcaped the hand of the Burgundians, (whom he had ſtirred up againſt that People;) which with great ſorrow he underſtood. This is the ſummary Account Ammianus gives us of his Actions, to which he ſubjoyns a Character leſs neceſſary than the other; for from the general Carriage of this Prince, ſuch as we have related it, he draws the Character; but in the ſummary Account of his Actions he gives us hints of ſuch things as he had not deſcribed formerly at large.

A ſhort Account of his Government.

His Vices.

121. For his Vices; although he counterfeited a ſhew of Clemency, yet was he cruel by his very nature, delighting in Inquiſitions after Offences, condemning many to death upon ſlight occaſions, and never being known to have ſaved any once condemned, contrary to all Example even amongſt the ſevereſt Princes. He was taxed for Covetouſneſs, as to which yet ſome endeavoured to excuſe him, as prompted to ſome Actions harſh and violent, by the great Loſs and Charge ſuſtained by the Empire in the Wars againſt the Perſians, whereby the Treaſury had been much exhauſted. This made him both juſtly and unjuſtly fly upon the Fortunes of his Subjects, and ſeize their Eſtates into his hands right or wrong; in like manner as Aurelian is ſaid to have done, to recruit the publick Coffers, which had been dreined dry by Gallienus, and the Calamities of his time. He was envious above meaſure, hating all that were Eminent for Learning, Riches, Nobility, Valour, and Gayety in Apparel; as Hadrian his Predeceſſor is ſaid to have done. Againſt Cowards he would moſt bitterly inveigh, and yet ſhew too much fear and dejectedneſs himſelf upon ſlight occaſions; which Humour being obſerved by Remigius the Magiſter Officiorum, when he perceived him diſturbed and angry for trivial things, he was wont to pretend Intelligence from the Borders ſignifying that the Barbarians were up in Arms, whereat he would grow as cool, milde, and ſerene as ever was Antoninus Pius. When he made choice of Judges, he never wittingly promoted any cruel or ill-principled men; but when it ſo happened, he boaſted of them as ſo many Lycurgus's and Caſſii, termed them the Pillars of Juſtice, and by Letters ſtirred them up to the greateſt ſeverity againſt the ſmalleſt Offenders; but never relieved any, though overpowered by never ſo unjuſt a Sentence: Whereas (ſaith our Author) the very end of Government, as wiſe men have accounted it, is the Profit and Safety of obedient Subjects.

His Virtues.

122. Theſe were his Vices according to the Character Ammianus giveth of him, who alſo alloweth him large Commendations for ſuch Virtues, as (if all had been anſwerable) would have rendered him not inferiour to Trajan nor Marcus Aurelius himſelf. Theſe were great Indulgence, to the Provinces, both in eaſing them as much as in him lay of the Burthen of Tributes, and providing for their Safety by the building of Towns, and raiſing of Forts and Caſtles in places, where was danger of Invaſions. A great Exactor he was of Military Diſcipline, and as to that herein onely he erred, that he was exceſſively ſevere to common Souldiers, but indulgent to great Officers, againſt whom he would not hear any Complaints; and hence proceeded the Commotions both of Britain, Africk, and Illyricum. As to his Body he was exemplarily chaſte, and by his own Example propagated that Virtue both in his Court, and where ever elſe he came, there being no Complaints of Rapes, or any other Miſdemeanors in that kind. To his Kindred he was not indulgent beyond the publick Intereſt, either not at all preferring them, or if he did, to inconſiderable Places, Valens his Brother excepted, whom in a dangerous poſture of Affairs he raiſed to the higheſt Dignity. He was even ſcrupulous in beſtowing the greateſt Offices; neither in his time did any man belonging to Money govern a Province, nor were any of theſe Imployments ſold except it was at the beginning of his Reign, when many extravagant things were wont to be done, out of hope that a new promoted Prince was either too buſie to take notice, or elſe that he was generous, as ſuch perſons called him, that is, careleſs and negligent of his Buſineſs. As to Military matters he was very ſagacious; for having been accuſtomed to hardſhip, he knew when and where to direct his Souldiers, in ordering of whom he was very exact. He wrote very handſomly, and could both paint and emboſs very well; ſo that we need not wonder he was ſo indulgent to Artiſts of this Profeſſion, as by an Edict he made not long before his Death we underſtand he was. He was very ingenious in finding out new ſorts of Arms, had an excellent Memory, and Readineſs of Speech nigh to Eloquence; a great Lover of Neatneſs, and in his Feaſts and Entertainments loved to be ſplendid, but not profuſe. And Ammianus placeth this as the laſt, though not the leaſt of his Commendations, that in the diverſity of Religions and Perſuaſions he ſtood as betwixt both Extremes, neither moleſting thoſe of the one ſide nor the other, nor by any terrible Edicts forcing thoſe of other Perſuaſions to what he eſteemed beſt, but left all Parties free as he found them. Which is to be dered in another place.

123. With Ammianus other Hiſtorians agree in the main of his Commendations. Victor writes, that he was of a comely Countenance, ſubtile Wit, grave Deportment, and moſt elegant Speech, though of few words; ſevere by nature, and vehement in his Severity; yet an Enemy to Vice, and eſpecially Covetouſneſs, upon which he animadverted with all rigidity, reſembling Adrian in all theſe things. He adds, that he was mindful of Ancient Nobility, ingenious in the Invention of new Arms, and in making of Statues; knew how to ſerve himſelf of Time, Place, and Speech: And in a word, had he eſcaped the hands of a Company of unfaithful perſons, to whom he delivered up his Underſtanding, to be governed as to faithful Councellors and wiſe, and had he been ſerved by Perſons of Fidelity and Learning, he had been without doubt a complete and excellent Prince. In concluſion, all agree that he was of a preſent Countenance and proportionable Symmetry of his Limbs compoſed unto Majeſty. He died in the Fifty fifth year of his Age, having reigned twelve years wanting an hundred days, on the fifteenth before the Calends of December, in the third year of the two hundred eighty and eighth Olympiad, of the City the MCXXVIII, the third Indiction, in the CCCLXXV year of our Lord, Paulinus being Conſul, as ſome have written; though S. Hierom tells us, that for this year no Conſuls were created, becauſe of the Irruption of the Sarmatæ into Pannonia in the preceding. And therefore (as we formerly ſaid) in the Faſti it is reſcribed, After the third Conſulſhip of Gratian and of Equitius.

SECT. III.

From the Death of Valentinian the Firſt, to the Murder of his Eldeſt Son Gratian.

The ſpace of Seven Years and Eight Moneths.

Valentinian's Iſſue.

1. VALENTINIAN left two Sons, Gratian and Valentinian; with three Daughters, Juſta, Grata, and Galla. Gratian he had by his firſt Wife Severa, and the reſt of his Children by Juſtina, a Lady he married (as Socrates writes) while his former was living, upon this occaſion: Juſtus her Father, who in the Reign of Conſtantius for a good while governed Picenum, dream'd that his Right Side was delivered of the Imperial Robe, and this Dream he told to ſo many, that at length it came to that Jealous Emperours Ears; who conjecturing that one born of him might arrive, or aim at the Sovereignty, procured him to be made away. Juſtina thus bereaved of her Father continued a Virgin, and in time came to be acquainted with the Empreſs Severa, and with her often converſed, and grew ſo familiar, that ſhe permitted her to uſe the ſame Bath with her ſelf, by occaſion whereof Severa ſaw and admired her Beauty to ſuch a degree, that ſhe could not forbear telling her Husband of it; affirming, that in that ſort of Perfection ſhe excelled all other Women. That ſunk deep into the Heart of the Emperour, which ſeemed onely to pierce his Ear; and he deviſed how he might compaſs this beautiful Juſtina for his Wife, without divorcing Severa the Mother of Gratian, whom he had aſſumed to a Participation of the Imperial Dignity but a little before. To this purpoſe he made a Law, That all that were ſo pleaſed might have two Wives apiece, and this he cauſed to be proclaimed throughout every City; which done, he took Juſtina for a ſecond Wife, and by her had Valentinian and his three Daughters, whereof two died Virgins, and Galla was after married to Theodoſius the Great. But this is juſtly ſuſpected for a mere Tale, nay there's little doubt of its Falſhood, that Law appearing no where, and the Teſtimony of Hiſtory being ſo clear againſt it, that it affirms him exceeding chaſte; neither would other Writers have omitted ſo ſtrange and extraordinary a Paſſage. But this may ſuffice, that this Juſtina was no Virgin when he married her, but the Widow of Magnentius the Tyrant; if Zoſimus may be believed.

A ſtrange Tale of his making a Law for, and having two Wives together.

2. The Emperours Body being duly prepared to be ſent to Conſtantinople, and buried amongſt the Auguſti, Trouble ſeized on all mens Spirits, in expectation what ſo great an Accident might produce; and the rather becauſe the Gallican Souldiers were ſuſpected, as thoſe that never had kept their Fidelity to the deceaſed Prince, but were ever ready to raiſe Commotions upon ſuch occaſions. The Officers therefore in ſuch ſtraits proceeding in a wary courſe, ſent for Merobaudes their Commander in the Emperours Name, and as yet alive, to come to them; who either ſuſpecting the matter of himſelf, or ſifting it out of the Meſſenger, pretended to his Souldiers, that he had Orders to lead them to the Rhine, there to oppoſe the Incurſions ſions of the Barbarians, and, according to his Inſtructions, he ſent out of the way Sebaſtian, a man by his own nature quiet and milde enough, but in great favour with the Military men, and thereupon much to be feared. When he came to Court it was reſolved in Council, that Valentinian the Son of the Deceaſed, a Child of four years old, (if not rather nine) and at the diſtance of an hundred miles, living with his Mother Juſtina in a Village called Murocincta, ſhould be made Emperour. Accordingly Cerealis, the Boy's Uncle by the Mothers ſide, was ſent to fetch him, who bringing him in a Litter into the Camp, he was there legally declared for Emperour (ſo ſaith Ammianus) on the ſixth day after his Fathers Death, and named Auguſtus, in the ſolemn manner. All men concluded that Gratian would take it heinouſly (as well he might) that any one ſhould be advanced to the Imperial Dignity without his Conſent or Knowledge; but they lived very peaceably and lovingly together, and in this matter he carried himſelf both like a prudent and good-natur'd perſon, nay rather educated this his young Brother with too much fondneſs and reſpect.

Valentinian his Son declared Emperour by the Officers of the Army.

Ammian lib. 31. & ult.

Lib. 4.

3. In the mean time a great Tempeſt began to gather to an head in the Eaſt, which occaſioning the Death of Valens was foretold by many Prodigies, as our Author believeth. Amongſt them (if any) is remarkable the Oracle found written in a four-ſquare Stone in the Walls of Chalcedon, which were pulled down (as he ſaith) for the building of a Bath at Conſtantinople; as others write, becauſe the Chalcedonians had reviled Valens during the Commotions raiſed by Procopius; wherein was in Greek Verſe ſignified, that when thoſe Stones ſhould be ſo imployed, a ſtout People through the River Danubius, the Scythian Countreys and Myſia, ſhould invade Thrace. Now Socrates hints, that theſe Walls were broken down ſeveral years before, by Command of Valens, who ſware, That if he overcame Procopius the Tyrant, he would do it, becauſe the Inhabitants of that City took his part, ſhut their Gates againſt himſelf, and reviled him as he paſſed by the ſaid Walls, the Stones whereof were indeed carried to the Common Baths of Conſtantinople, called Conſtantianæ. Then were found certain Verſes (he adds) ſignifying, That the Walls ſhould be taken to the uſe of the Baths, at what time great Plenty of Waters was to be ſeen in the City; and that then infinite Numbers of the Barbarous Nations, invading the Roman Dominions, ſhould wonderfully diſtreſs the Empire; but in the Concluſion be deſtroyed themſelves. Accordingly not long after, the Conduit made by Valens yielded great Plenty of Water to the City, and at the ſame time ſeveral of thoſe Nations took up Arms againſt the State. Yet ſuch as will trouble their Heads with things of this nature affirm, that the Oracle might be otherwiſe interpreted, from Clearchus the Præfect his making a great Pipe from this Conduit into the Forum of Theodoſius, called The Plentiful Pipe, the flocking together of the People, and the Feaſt held thereupon; but theſe Circumſtances and the Knowledge of this ſuppoſed Oracle fell out afterwards. We are further told, that when the Walls of Chalcedon were going to be demoliſhed, the Citizens of Conſtantinople made humble ſuit to the Emperour, that he would not ſo deface that City; and the like did ſuch Bithynians, Nicomedians, and Nicæans, as by chance were at Conſtantinople at the ſame time: but he remitting nothing of his Choler, took their Suit in very evil part, and that he might (as he alleaged) keep his Oath, commanded both the Wall to be pulled down, and the Foundation filled up with Pebble Stones; whence came it to paſs, that a ſlender and contemptible Structure was afterward raiſed upon ſo ancient and ſubſtantial a Foundation.

The Hunns invade the Empire.

Their manner of living.

4. But the Tempeſt which fell upon the Eaſt was raiſed by the Hunns, who out of greedineſs after Booty invaded the Empire, and raging with great Cruelty and Rapine, pierced at length as far as Achaia. This was a fierce and ſavage People, inhabiting that part of Scythia which lay upon the Ocean, beyond the Fenns of Mæotis. As ſoon as born they had their Cheeks cut and mangled, to prevent the growing of Hair, and therefore were as Beardleſs as Eunuchs, and ugly to behold. But their Conſtitution was firm and robuſt, as were their Limbs, and their Shoulders ſo large and fleſhed, that they looked rather like two-footed Beaſts, or rude and unpoliſhed Images of Men. So hardy were they that they never uſed Fire, nor dreſſed any Meat, but lived on the Roots of Herbs, and ſuch Fleſh as was chafed betwixt their Thighs and the Sides of their Horſes. For Houſes they never had any, but were as averſe to them as to Sepulchres ſeparated from common uſe; they wandered from place to place through Mountains and Valleys, as from their Infancy accuſtomed to bear the Incommodities of Cold and Hunger; which had ſuch Influences upon their Fancies, that when they came into other Countries, they would not willingly enter within the Walls of any Houſe, as thinking themſelves not ſafe when ſhut up and covered. Their Clothes were either Linnen, or the Skins of a ſort of Mice ſtitched together, knowing no diſtinction of Time or Place, or any Change, ſo long as they could hang on. They wore a crooked ſort of Cap; with Goats Skins they covered their Legs; and their Shoos were without any ſhape or faſhion, which hindered their pace, and rendered them unſerviceable on Foot; but on Horſe-back they fought nimbly, though in an unſeemly poſture. Day and night was indifferent to them as to Buying, Selling, Eating, and Drinking; and their Sleep they took upon the Necks of their Horſes. As to their Publick Affairs, thereof they conſulted in common, having no King, but living in a tumultuary confuſed manner. They fought in Parties formed like to Wedges. They begun the Battel with an hideous Noiſe; and as in Onſets they were quick and ſurpriſing, ſo when put to flight their Retreat was diſorderly, and void of all prudence; their Purſuit being alſo violent, furious, and diſcompoſed, wherein was obſerved that they never attacqued the Camp of their Enemy. Their Miſſile Weapons were made of Bones joyned together and ſharpned very artificially; hand to hand they made uſe of the Sword, and made it a great part of their buſineſs to entangle the Legs of their Adverſaries both on Foot and Horſe-back. They were never to be truſted in time of Truce, breaking all Laws of Nations, of Peace and War, as the fit and fury would come upon them, for they had no greater ſenſe of Right and Wrong than wilde Beaſts; and were of ſo inconſtant a humour, that without any Provocation they would fall out with their Friends, and again be reconciled without any Application made to them. To no ties of Religion or Superſtition were they bound. They were greedy of Gold, though they never pierced into the Earth ſo far as a Plough: For they wandered about as if they fled from an Enemy, without any Habitation, conſtant Law, Rule, or Order, in their Waggons, where they dwelt with their Wives and Children, whom they therein brought up till time of Puberty; ſo that none could anſwer if demanded of him, which was the place of his Conception, Birth, or Education.

Sect. 3.

A.D. 375.

The Alani their Neighbours.

5. Neighbours to the Hunns were the Alani, who alſo inhabited Scythia beyond Tanais, which River ſeparated Europe from Aſia. If we credit Ammianus, this People poſſeſſed a vaſt Deſert, and from the Mountains had their Name; which by their continual Conqueſts they communicated to the bordering Nations, as the Perſians formerly had done; ſo that thoſe who went under this common Appellation, extended toward the Eaſt their Habitations as far as the Amazons, and into Aſia to the River Ganges, which taking its courſe through India, pours forth its Streams into the Southern Sea. Like the Scythian Nomades they alſo wandered up and down without Houſes or Agriculture, living on raw Fleſh and Milk, and carrying their Families in Waggons covered over with the Bark of Trees, and ranged together in a Figure reſembling that of a City. They were chiefly addicted to the breeding of Horſes, and drove before them great Herds of Cattel. And the Soil they inhabited was very convenient for this ſort of Life, abounding with good Paſture, and here and there beſet with fruitful Trees. On foot to be ſeen they accounted ignoble, as being from their Youth accuſtomed to ride, and being trained up in War were in the management of it more prudent; and thence came it to paſs, that the Perſians being originally Scythians, were more skilful in fighting. In other reſpects they were much like the Hunns; for generally they were tall and goodly Perſons, of a terrible Aſpect, their Hair inclining to a Yellow, their Eyes quick; they were ſwift in Battel becauſe of the Lightneſs of their Armour; yet were they of a more cultivated and civil Converſation than they. Impatient above all things they were of Reſt, taking no pleaſure but in Wars and Dangers, inſomuch that they eſteemed thoſe happy who died in the Field, but ſuch as were extinguiſhed by Old Age or other accidents, they reproached as degenerate and ſluggiſh Perſons. Nothing accounted they ſo glorious as to have killed an Enemy; and they were wont to trap their Horſes with the Skins taken off from the Heads of the ſlain. As for Religion, not a Temple nor Chapel was ſeen amongſt them, as indeed no Roofed Houſe; but a naked Sword after an odd kind of faſhion ſtuck in the Ground they worſhipped as Mars, and the Protector of the Regions they inhabited. They had a ſtrange way of foretelling things to come by Rods, on which their Women practiſed certain ſecret Inchantments. They knew not what Servitude meant, (yet we read that the ancient Scythians had Slaves) all of them being reputed as nobly deſcended, and in matter of Judicature they made choice of ſuch Judges and Officers as were moſt Eminent for Ability in War.

6. Into

Sect.3.

A.D. 375.

The Hunns fall into the Territories of the Alans, and then upon the Goths.

6. Into the Territories of theſe Alani, who were called Tanaites, and were Neighbours to the Greuthungi, did the Hunns break; they ſpoiled the Countrey, made great havock of all things; and entering into Alliance with ſuch as remained alive, joyned them to their Body, and with great Confidence and Celerity fell into the Dominions of Ermenrich a moſt Martial King, who for his great Performances was become terrible to the Nations adjoyning, but, ſtruck with Conſternation at ſo ſtrange and unexpected an Attempt, prevented his further trouble by a voluntary death. Vithimires being advanced into his place, by the Aſſiſtance of ſome other Hunns he had hired, made reſiſtance for ſome time, but after many Loſſes received was ſlain in fight. Then Alatheus and Safrax, two valiant and experienc'd Captains, undertook the Guardianſhip of his Son Viderich, who yet being ſtraitned in time, caſt off all hopes of Reſiſtance, and warily came down to Danaſtus, a River running through large Champain Countries betwixt Iſter and Boryſthenes. This being underſtood by Athanarich, Judge or Magiſtrate of the Thervingi, him againſt whom Valens moved war for having aſſiſted Procopius, he reſolved to ſtand upon his Guard, and vigorouſly to defend himſelf in caſe he were invaded, ſending out his Scouts to diſcover the Motions of thoſe Rovers. The Hunns ſuſpected there was a great Number of Men, and paſſing by the Scouts, fell upon him all on a ſudden, who having loſt ſome of his Souldiers, fled to the Mountains, and afterward paſſing from the River Geraſus, the Country of the Taifali, unto Danubius, there he raiſed a Fortification for his own Defence, when he had eſcaped the Hunns, who were overcharged with Booty, and thereby rendered incapable of an haſty Purſuit. However, the Report of this ſtrange and ſudden Invaſion running throughout the other Regions of the Gothick Nations, they reſolved by ſeeking out new Seats, to evade the Rage and Fury of ſo Barbarous an Enemy; and reſolving upon Thrace, both for that it was a fruitful Countrey, and from the Tracts which theſe Rovers moleſted, ſeparated by the large Streams of the River Iſter, under Conduct of Alavivus they ſeized on the Banks of the Danube, and by their Orators humbly beſought Valens they might be received, promiſing to live quietly, and to ſend him Aid upon any occaſion.

The Goths frighted from their own Countrey reſolve for Thrace.

7. The firſt Rumour of theſe ſtrange Commotions in the Northern Parts ſtruck all men with Admiration as well as Terror, to hear that ſo vaſt Multitudes of Barbarous People ſhould hover about the Banks of Iſter, driven out of their Seats by greater Barbarians than themſelves: And indeed this ſeemed, as by ſome later Chriſtians it is held, to be one of the Soundings of the Trumpet to the Diſſolution of the Weſtern Empire. Yet ſome flattering Courtiers took even hence occaſion to extoll the good Fortune of the Emperour, who would now be ſo furniſhed with Souldiers out of Thrace, that he might by that Eaſment treaſure up abundance of Gold, ſpent before this in the making of new Levies; and their Perſuaſions were ſo effectual, that Order was given for Tranſporting theſe Goths into that Country, who night and day without any intermiſſion came over in ſuch Multitudes, that ſuch as were appointed to ſurvey them could never attain to any certainty of their Number. Ammianus compares them to the Troops of Xerxes, and the Companies that muſtered at Doriſcus, and affirms them far more noxious than they, in that they brought Ruine to the Empire along with them, and far exceeded the Malignity of the Perſian Armies, which Greece in a manner overcame before ſhe ſaw. Theſe Swarms of the Northern Barbarous People he further likens to the thick Clouds of burning Coals, which were wont formerly to iſſue out of the Mountain Ætna, and at this very ſame time intercepted the Light of the Sun; and beſides what it belched forth out of its own Bowels, kindled other new and unnatural Fires, by burning all things combuſtible within the Limits of the adjoyning and obnoxious Countrey. And it ſo further happened at this very time of danger and moſt preſſing difficulties, when there was greateſt need of skilful and prudent Governours, that the Provinces were ſerved by moſt unworthy men, amongſt whom of moſt Eminence were Lupicinus and Maximus, he a Comes through Thrace, and this exercizing the Office of a Dux; both equally guilty of Raſhneſs and the Ruine of their Countrey through their Covetouſneſs, whereby they ſeveral ways irritated this People, till then ſufficiently quiet and peaceable. Amongſt other diſhonourable Practices, when theſe Multitudes were ſorely pinched with want of Proviſions, and diſtreſſed by Hunger, they got all the Dogs they could together, and exchanged them for ſo many Men, whom they took for Slaves, and amongſt them ſome of the Sons of the chiefeſt Perſons. However, ſuch was the occaſion of the Admiſſion of theſe Barbarous Nations into the Bowels of the Empire, a thing of ſo per-

Order is given by Valens for their Tranſportation.

They are provoked by Lupicinus and Maximus.

Sect. 3.

A.D. 375.

nicious a Conſequence, as nothing more; and the Circumſtances of their Admiſſion were ſuch, as Ammianus Marcellinus delivers them. A moſt groſs act of Imprudence, whether of Valens or others, to receive ſuch Multitudes without diſarming them. Some Writers ſay, it was the Emperours Command that they ſhould deliver up their Arms before they came over; but the Officers who had the charge of their Paſſage never had any regard unto it, being intent upon their own Gain and private Advantages, which they made of the moſt beautiful Women, the goodlieſt Boys, and ſtrongeſt Slaves and Labourers they could chuſe. And ſome were bribed by Linen Clothes and other Preſents, to connive at their having their Weapons. Nay, ſome tell us, that Valens his Deſign was prudent, if it could have been proſecuted, which was, to beſtow the Children of both Sexes through divers Provinces of the Empire, to have them as ſo many Hoſtages for the Truth and Fidelity of their Parents. This memorable Paſſage of the Goths happened, when Valens the fifth time and Valentinian the Younger were Conſuls, in the CCCLXXVI Year of our Lord, and not in the following Year, as it is erroneouſly placed in the Chronicle of S.Hierom. Their Captains were Alavivus and Fritigern.

Their Admiſſion miſchievous to the Empire.

Vide Valeſium in Amm. lib. 31. p. 442.

Which happened when Valens the fifth time and Valentinian the younger were Conſuls.

A.D. 376.

The Greuthungi, though forbidden,

8. Theſe Captains with their Followers being thus received within the Roman Pale, not long after Vithrich King of the Greuthungi, by the Advice of Alatheus and Saphrax who governed him, accompanied by them and Farnobius, came down to the Bank of Iſter, and by Meſſengers diſpatcht away in all haſte beſought the Emperour that they might alſo be received, with the ſame Courteſy. This for weighty reaſon was denied them; and when they conſulted what to do upon this Repulſe, Athanarich well remembring how he had affronted Valens, by pretending he had ſworn never to ſet Foot on Roman Ground, and for that Reaſon had forced him to come by Boat into the middle of the River to make the Peace, concluding that the Emperour reteined ſtill the grudge in his Mind, drew off his Men to a place that was almoſt inacceſſible by reaſon of Mountains and Woods, and thence expelled the Sarmatæ who had there ſeated themthemſelves. In the mean time ſuch of the Thervingi as were permitted to paſs the River, wandred upon the Coaſts, almoſt ſtarved, by reaſon of the Cheating tricks practiſed againſt them by the Roman Officers for Gain, and Lupicinus perceiving their juſt ſence and indignation, for fear they ſhould Mutiny, ſent a Party of Soldiers to drive them on faſter. The Greuthungi perceiving this to be a convenient time, when the Soldiers were thus imployed, and that the Veſſels wont to ply to and again to hinder their Paſſage, were removed, took the opportunity, and got over by Boats patched together as well as they could out of hand, and ſate down at a good diſtance from Fritigern, who being a Cunning Man, that he might not give any Cauſe of ſuſpition to the Romans, and yet not want the Aſſiſtance of the other Kings upon occaſion, marched ſlowly towards Marcianople. There fell out a miſchance which added Oyle to the former Flame. Lupicinus having invited Alavivus and Fritigern to Dinner; leſt the ordinary ſort of Barbarians ſhould preſs upon him for Victuals, he ordered a Guard of Soldiers to keep them off from the Gates of the Town, whither they deſired they might be admitted as Friends, to provide them Neceſſaries. Being thus Repulſed, they came to outragious words with the Inhabitants, and from words to Blowes, ſo that the Goths fell upon the Party that was appointed to watch the Gates, killed them, and ſtripped them when ſlain. Lupicinus herewith acquainted, in the midſt of their merriment, cauſed all the Attendants which waited on the two Gueſts to be ſtraightway knocked on the Head; the Report whereof flying to thoſe without the Walls, drove them into a Rage, as concluding that their Kings ſhould be detained Priſoners. This Fritigern earneſtly preſſing, and fearing indeed that he ſhould be detained as an Hoſtage, alleaged it was neceſſary he ſhould go, to quiet their mindes and allay their Fury. Both he and his Companion got away, the Roman General being now beſotted with Wine, and were received with great Joy, as utterly unexpected; and to improve the Advantage thence obtained, they fell into Conſultation how they might beſt raiſe a War and Revenge themſelves.

Take their opportunity and paſs over.

And all agree together to waſte the Country and defeat Lupicinus.

9. The whole Nation of the Thervingi upon information of what had happened, were vehemently bent the ſame way, and with Banners diſplayed, fell preſently upon the Countries, which they Pillaged and waſted with Fire and Sword. Lupicinus in a Tumultuary manner marched out, to withſtand ſo dangerous a beginning, but with ſo ill Succeſs, that Incamping himſelf at twelve Miles diſtance from the City, he was by a ſudden Attacque of the Enemy defeated, and forced to flye for his Life, moſt of his Men being Cut off together with their Tribunes, which Accident, carried this greater miſchief along with it, that the Barbarians were hereby furniſhed with Roman Armes, and made now havock of all things without Controll. When Valens had notice of theſe dangerous Motions of the Goths, he was much diſtracted in his Thoughts what Courſe to take. He ſent away with ſpeed Victor the Magiſter Equitum, to Compoſe Matters as he could with the Perſians, about Armenia. Reſolving then to quit Antioch, where he had made his Abode about a year, and go to Conſtantinople to be nearer at Hand; he ſent before, two of his Captains, Profuturus and Trajan, Men more Ambitious than able for Buſineſs, who coming to the place, whereas the Caſe required, that they ſhould by way of Stratagem and Surprize, Cut off and diminiſh ſo great Multitudes as now filled both the Mountains and Champion; they oppoſed againſt them the Legions drawn out of Armenia, which indeed were Valiant enough, but utterly unable to grapple with ſuch vaſt numbers of Men. They forced the Enemy beyond the Mountain Hæmus, and there ſeizing on the Straits and cragged Rocks, reſolved to ſhut them up, and deſtroy them by Famine; or at leaſt ſo long to keep them pen't up, till Frigeride could Arrive with the Pannonian and Tranſalpine Auxiliaries, which, at the requeſt of Valens, Gratian ordered to their Aſſiſtance. And Richomeres, who at that time was his Comes Domeſticorum, he commanded to haſten out of Gall into Thrace, upon the ſame Errand. But by the Endeavours, as was reported, of Merobaudes, Richomeres his Troops forſook him for the moſt part, that the Borders of Gall might not be deſtitute and expoſed; ſo that he joyned indeed, with Profuturus and Trajan, but to little Effect, for Frigeride was ſeized with the Gout; or elſe, as his Ill-willers talked, Counterfeited himſelf ſick, and ſtaid behind.

Sect. 3. A.D. 376.

10. Such were the Diſappointments, as to Relief out of the Weſt; and for the Eaſtern Parts, we muſt not forget, that at the very firſt when the Rumour of the motions of the Thervingi, came to the Eares of Valens, he ordered a Party of Goths which under Conduct of Sueridus and Colias had been long before received and appointed to Quarter about Adrianople, ſpeedily to remove toward the Helleſpont. But they conſidering what would make moſt for their Intereſt, required Proviſions for their Journey, and two days Reſpite, whereat the Magiſtrate or Duumvir of that City was very much moved, as incenſed againſt them for having waſted the Country adjoyning, and he ſtirred up the Common ſort ſo much, together with the Fabricenſes or thoſe belonging to the Forges, of which, there was there a great Multitude, that they all gathered together, threatning to deſtroy them upon Refuſal to depart. The Goths at firſt were amazed, and ſtirred not, till provoked both by opprobrious Language and the Miſſile Weapons; they then fell upon them, killed many, put the reſt to Flight, and in the Roman Habit (having ſtripped the ſlain) went and joyned themſelves with Fritigern, and with him laid Siege to the City. But Fritigern, knowing his People unexperienced as to Sieges, perſwaded them to remove (alleaging that he had no Quarel with Walls) and to Plunder the wealthy and fruitful Province; for there they ſhould find no Oppoſition. Leaving a ſufficient power to block up the Town, they ranged all over Thrace, where they could get moſt Booty, their numbers being daily increaſed by thoſe of their Nation, who having been formerly ſold by Merchants, or others, for morſels of Bread, now flocked in to them. Many alſo who had Skill in Mines, of which there were plenty in Thrace, accompanied them for getting of Gold, not able, or not willing, to bear the uſual Impoſitions, and the Goths gladly entertained them for the Diſcovery of the ſecret places in the Country whither Men of Wealth had retired. Now, without any difference of Sex or Age, did theſe Barbarians rage againſt the Perſons, as well as Goods of the miſerable Inhabitants; the ſucking Children were ſnatched from the Breaſts of their Mothers, the Infants killed, and the Mothers abuſed, after they had ſeen their Husbands Butchered before their faces; thoſe of puberty were haled over the dead Bodies of their Parents into Slavery, and the old Men, in vain complaining, that they had already lived too long, were compelled to quit their flaming Houſes, and follow with their Hands bound behind them.

Græcè στρατηγὸς dictus.

They block up Adrianople.

And cruelly rage throughout Thrace.

11. But Profuturus and Trajan to whom Richomeres had joyned himſelf, that it might not be ſaid they would do nothing, moved toward a place called Salices near to which, lay a vaſt Body of the Goths, the poſture of whom they obſerved, as they were incloſed with their Waggons, and expected when they would ſtir, that they might fall upon their Rear, promiſing themſelves much Succeſs in ſuch an Attempt. But the Deſigne was diſcovered either by Fugitives or ſome other way, ſo that the Barbarians kept their Poſt, and by Signes gave notice to all their Straglers to return to the Camp; where being Arrived, like ſo many Wilde Beaſts upon the Prey, they raged to be led out againſt the Romans, who well enough perceived the diſadvantage they were in, both in reſpect of their Numbers and the Folly of their Commanders; however, animated by the goodneſs of their Cauſe, That Night they paſſed without Sleep on both Sides, and the Day following came to a Bloudy Battel. The Barbarians, having firſt taken the Oath after their manner, indeavoured to become Maſters of the upper Ground; but in this matter the Romans were as cunning as they, and ſo Reſolute and Couragious, that Night alone could put an end to the Controverſy, in which many of them fell, as overpowered by Numbers. The better ſort, as they could, they gathered up and Buried; and all the reſt were left to be devoured by Fowles, which then had but too plentiful Fare, as appeared by the Bones they left, with which theſe Fields were covered a long time after. The Romans drew off towards Marcianople. The Goths for ſeven days following, kept themſelves amongſt their Cariages, not daring to look out, which opportunity the other taking, Blocked up another Party of them in the Straits of Hæmus, where they hoped they might periſh with hunger; for on the other ſide they were cloſed by the Iſter and Deſerts, within a Country deſtitute of Neceſſaries; all Proviſions being removed into ſtrong Townes and fenced places, which how to Attacque or become Maſters of, they knew them to have neither Skill nor Power. Theſe things thus performed, Richomeres went back into Gall, to fetch, as was hoped, greater Supplies of Men, for ſo mighty a work as evidently now was Cut out for them. But this was when Gratian the fourth time was Conſul, together with Merobaudes, and Autumn now approached, as Ammianus tells us in ſo many words.

A Bloody Battel.

Honoratos Ammianus eos vocat.

When Gratian the fourth time and Merobaudes were Conſuls.

Hæc Gratiano quater & Merobaude Conſulibus agebantur, Anno in Autumnum vergente.

12. Valens his Eares being perpetually filled with the Noiſe of Slaughters, Pillagings and Burnings, ſent away Saturninus with the Horſe, to the Relief of Profuturus and Trajan. But at the ſame time it hapned that all things neceſſary for Suſtenance being conſumed, through the Tracts of Scythia and Mæſia, the Barbarians of thoſe parts allſo were in great Diſorder. Often they endeavoured to break their Bounds, but ſtill by the Reſolution of the Roman Forces were Repulſed, till driven by extream Neceſſity, they allured by promiſes of vaſt Booty, a number of Hunns and Alans to joyn with them. Saturninus was now at Hand, imploying himſelf in diſpoſing matters relating to the Garriſons and Stations of theſe Borders; but perceiving the vaſt Swarmes of theſe People could not be diverted by him and the few he had with him; but that they muſt be overwhelmed, as by a more violent Inundation of Waters, the more they endeavoured to ſtop the Current, he made a fair Retreat. And now upon Removal of the Soldiers, a Vent being given, ſtraitway like a mighty Flood, they bore down all before them, and ſpreading themſelves throughout the Coaſts of Thrace, as far as from Iſter to Rhodope and the Streights; with Rapines, Slaughters, Blood, and Fire, the inſlaving of all they thought fit not to diſmiſs out of their miſerable thraldome, and ſpoyling of all things, they gratified their Ravenous Appetites. In this manner they proceeded as far as a place called Dibaltum, where they found Barzimeres Tribune of the Scutarij encamped with his Legion, together with the Cornuti and ſeveral other Parties of Foot; a Perſon very well skilled in matters of War. He well enough knowing the Danger he was in, reſolved with his Men wedged as cloſe together as could be, to brake through them; and in the Attempt ſo well behaved himſelf, that he had eſcaped, but that, when he was now wearied and diſabled any more to maintain the Fight, he was ſurrounded with Horſe, and Cut in pieces, yet not without a great Slaughter firſt made of the Enemy, which by the vaſtneſs of their Numbers was Concealed. Incouraged by this Succeſs, more than they had reaſon, they went on hunting after Frigeride, who by Order of Gratian was come into Thrace, and had taken up a Poſt near to Beræa. But he who was ſufficiently knowing how to avoid dangers and preſerve an Army, withdrew himſelf out of the way into Illyricum through Mountainous and Woody places, and in his Retreat was much Elevated by a notable Adventure. He light upon Farnobius, one of the Captains of the Goths, who then Headed the People called Taifali which had joyned themſelves alſo to his Nation, having paſſed the River, when the Roman Guards out of Fear were diſperſed, as deſirous to Share in the Adventure made now by all theſe Northern People. Perceiving he could make his Party good if he grapled with theſe Rovers; he ſet upon them, killed Farno-

The Barbarians of Scythia and Mæſia break alſo into Thrace.

They cut off Barzimeres.

Sect.4.

Frigeride kills Farnobius and takes his Taifali.

A.D. 376.

bius, and with him had ſo treated all the reſt, but that he was induced to Mercy, by the miſerable Cries they made for Quarter. He took them all alive, none eſcaping, and beſtowed them in Italy, about Mutina, Regium and Parma, to Till the Grounds. This Nation, as the Hiſtorian tells us, was Infamous for Sodomy; it being their Cuſtome to abuſe Boys that were Arrived at Puberty, who had no way to Redeem themſelves from that filthy ſort of Slavery, but by killing a Wilde Boar, or elſe a Bear, with their own Hands; a Service performed to the Publick.

In the mean time the Lentienſes a People of the Allemans invade alſo the Empire.

13. In this manner was miſerable Thrace afflicted, when it grew towards Winter; and about the ſame time, other Northern Parts of the Empire had their ſhare in the publick Calamity, occaſioned by the Lentienſes, a Nation of the Allemans neighbouring to Rhætia, which broke the League, and invaded the Roman Territories upon this Occaſion. There was one of their Countrymen, who being of the Emperours Guard, and having occaſion to return home, when ſeveral aſked him what Newes at Court? Told them, that Gratian was ſent for by his Uncle Valens, to help him to repell thoſe Northern People, which had conſpired againſt the Peace of the Empire; and that ſpeedily he would ſet forward to the Eaſt. They were Joyful Men at the Report, being as greedy of Booty and Spoil, as any of the reſt; and in the Month of February, when the Rhine was Frozen, took the Opportunity, and fell of ſpoiling the Country, till ſtopped by the Petulantes and Celtæ, who making Head againſt them, drove them back; not without conſiderable loſs on the Roman ſide. They were forced to Return; but not at all diſmayed by this Repulſe, they encouraged their Friends and Relations to venture forth another time; and now generally the German Nation knowing that the Imperial Forces were drawn into Illyricum and that Gratian was to follow, roſe up from all their Villages, and to the Number of forty thouſand, or as ſome who endeavoured to inhance the Reputation of the Emperour alleaged, to that of ſeventy, confidently poured themſelves into the Neighbouring Province. Gratian herewith very much ſtartled, recalled the Troops he had ſent toward Pannonia, and muſtering ſuch as were in a Readineſs in Gall, committed them to the Conduct of Nannienus a Sober and Expert Captain, and with him joyned Mellobaudes his Comes Domeſticorum, yet a King of the Franks, and a Valiant and Martial Perſon. Theſe two, though of different Tempers, the one being very Wary and Circumſpect, the other greedy of Fighting and impatient of Delay; at a place called Argentaria, gave theſe Rovers a notable Defeat; though at firſt their Men were affrighted at the Number of their Enemies and began to ſhift for themſelves. Of the Barbarians (ſo many in number as we have ſaid) no more than five thouſand eſcaped, through their knowledge of the Woody Country; and ſuch as died in the Field, were accompanied to another World by Priarius their King, who had been the principal Incendiary and procurer of the War.

After this the Germans generally do the ſame.

Argentaria opidmm Germaniæ in Triboccis.

Maximinus and Mellobaudes give them a great defeat.

14. With ſo great ſucceſs was Gratian ſufficiently elevated, and bent now toward the Eaſt. Yet encouraged by the Victory, he could not but in his way turn to the Left Hand; and with all Secrecy imaginable paſſing the Rhine, hoped by Surprize wholly to Conquer or deſtroy this inconſtant and unfaithful People. The Lentienſes having received frequent Alarms of his Approach, as utterly deſpairing of any other Courſe, and too too ſenſible of the miſerable reiterated Slaughter of their Nation, fled with all they could carry away to the Neighbouring Mountains, where they little doubted but to defend themſelves by the ſteepneſs of the Rocks. But Gratian choſe out of the Army ſeveral Parties, whereof each conſiſted of five hundred Men, and ſent them as it were on Hunting after the Enemy, and though in Skill and Valour theſe might have the Advantage, yet the other were ſo Aſſiſted by the inacceſſible Precipices, that they maintained the Fight on even Terms, till Night put an end to the Contention. The Emperour ſo unexpectedly miſſing of his Aim, called his Officers together, and it was reſolved in Council, no more to follow the former Courſe, but Block them up and ſubdue them by Famine. But this could not ſo far Affright or Diſcourage the Germans, but that ſufficiently knowing the Country, they removed their Station from this place to other Mountains, leſs Acceſſible than the former. For all this, he ſtill purſued them, and laboured to diſcover the Paſſages whereby they had Arrived at the Top of the Hills; which Pertinacious purpoſe of his, had ſo great Operation now at laſt upon them, that perceiving nothing would ſatisfie him, but their Deſtruction, and that by no Difficulties, could he be deterred

Sect.3.

A.D. 376.

Gratian forces the Lentienſes to beg Peace.

Which gains him much Reputation.

Ammianus.

from his Reſolution, they begged Peace and obtained it on Condition, to ſend their Youth to ſerve in the Roman Armies. This ſo ſeaſonable and otherwiſe conſiderable a Victory, incredible it is, how much it advanced the Intereſt of Gratian, who hereby kept in Awe the Weſtern Nations, and facilitated his Deſignes, as to his Eaſtern Expedition. And indeed he gained much upon the People by his towardly Diſpoſition, being a Youth well Inclined, Eloquent in Speech, Soldier enough for his time, yet moderate and merciful; though to blame in a fond humour he had of imitating the Emperour Commodus, yet ſo as not to be Bloody. For as that Prince Prided himſelf in the Dexterity of Caſting Darts, ſo as in the View of the People, he would kill whole Droves of Wilde Beaſts upon the Theatre, nay, an hundred Lyons let go all together, he ſingled out ſeverally, and killed each with one Shaft alone; ſo Gratian ſpent too much time in his Parks, in Exerciſe of the like Nature, and neglected his great and Important Affairs, at ſuch a time, when, if Marcus Antoninus himſelf had Sate at the Helm, he could ſcarcely have recovered the State out of the miſerable Condition wherein it now lay; without great Warineſs and ſome Colleagues choſen of equal temper with himſelf.

15. But having ſettled the Affairs of Gall, as the time would give leave, and the Caſes of the ſeveral Nations required, and withal, having puniſhed that Soldier who had betrayed his Deſignes to the Enemy, he took his way by the Fort at the Happy Tree, as it was called, and by Lauriacum haſted to the Aſſiſtance of them, in whoſe Quarrel he was ingaged. In the mean time, when Frigeride ordered all his matters with great Prudence and Caution, and now was about to fortify the Streights of Succi, ſo wiſe a Man though he was, and ſuch an one, as if he had not been imployed, ſhould have been by all means drawn out of Retirement and preferred, was diſcharged his place, and Maurus a Comes appointed his Succeſſor, one of a quite contrary Diſpoſition, raſh and uncertain; he who took a wreath from about his own Neck, and put it as a Diadem upon the Head of Julian, at his Promotion. In thoſe days Valens departed at length from Antioch, and came to Conſtantinople, where having ſtaid a little time, he found the People tumultuous, and having given the Command of the Foot belonging to Trajan, to Sebaſtian, a very expert Commander, whom he had lately ſent for out of Italy, he departed to Melanthias, a Village belonging to the Emperour, where, by Money, good Victuals, and fair words he careſſed the Soldiers. Thence he gave Orders for the Army to March to Nice, a Station ſo called, where he underſtood from his Scouts that the Barbarians having waſted the Coaſts of Rhodope were returned with great Booty as far as Adrianople, and for fear of him, having heard he was at hand, with a powerful Army, haſted to joyn their Countrymen that lay about Beræa and Nicopolis. Againſt them was Sebaſtian ſpeedily ſent away with three hundred choſen Men out of Each Band or Numerus, and uſing great Expedition, ſoon arrived at Adrianople, to the walls of which when he approached, he was unexpectedly forbidden by the Inhabitants to proceed any farther; for they were fearful that he was ſuborned, and ſent by the Enemy to entrap them; but at length, perſwaded to be of another Opinion, they opened the Gates. Having refreſhed his Men with what Conveniences the Town would afford, the day following he iſſued out, with Intention to cut off certain Parties of the Barbarians, which were roving about the River Hebrus, and covering himſelf with the thickneſs of the Woods and obſcurity of the night, he fell upon them undiſcovered, killed all that could not make a ſpeedy Eſcape, and recovered ſo much of their Plunder, that if you will believe our Writer, neither the City nor the adjacent Plain it ſelf could contain it. At this ſo conſiderable a Defeat was Fritigern much diſturbed; and fearing that the reſt of his Country men, that were diſperſed, and riſling the Country, ſhould be intrapped by ſo expert a Commander, he gathered them together from all Quarters, and departed into the Coaſts of Cabyle.

Frigeride moſt ſtrangely turned out of Power.

Sebaſtian, ſent by Valens, cuts off very many of the Barbarians.

16. While matters thus ſucceeded in Thrace, Gratian having by Letter informed his Uncle how his Arms had proſpered againſt the Allemans, ſent his Baggage away by Land, with his Army paſſed the Danube, and by the way of Bononja (a Town in Pannonia) came to Sirmium, where having ſtaid four days he removed, and by the ſaid River proceeded as far as the Fort called Caſtra Martis, though all the while afflicted by an Ague, having by the way loſt ſome few of his Followers, intercepted by the ſudden Incurſions of the Alans. Valens was not ſo dull, but that he conceived Febribus intervallatis afflictas.

Valens envying his Nephew goes in perſon againſt the Goths.

ceived matter of Æmulation upon a double account, both that the Lentienſes were quite ſubdued, and that Sebaſtian had got ſo much Reputation by the late Action about Hebrus. Inwardly nettled at the Fame of his young Nephew, he removed from Melanthias, out of a Reſolution to do ſomething by the repute of which he might equal his Renown; and for this purpoſe having already in the Field a very good Army, he rendered it yet more formidable, by getting into the Service many Veterane Souldiers, and amongſt others of more notable Rank he again imployed Trajan, who had not long before been Magiſter Armorum. Now was made a Diſcovery, that the Barbarians intended by ſeizing on the Straits to intercept the Proviſions he had made for his Men; but this he prevented in good time, by diſpatching away with all ſpeed a ſtrong Party of Archers, and a convenient Body of Horſe. They, thus diſappointed, proceeded ſlowly and cautiouſly, for fear of being ſurprized; and Valens by his Scouts being miſinformed concerning their Number, longed to be at them. Drawing his Army into the form of a Square he marched toward Adrianople, and near the Town intrenched himſelf, where with impatience expecting his Nephew, he was preſently informed by Richomeres his Comes Domeſticorum, whom he had ſent before with Letters, that he was at hand. Gratian by theſe Letters earneſtly beſought him that he would ſtay for him, and not by hazarding a Battel thruſt himſelf into ſo great danger; and upon reading of them he called together his Council of War. Sebaſtian and others importuned him not to delay fighting. Victor a Magiſter Equitum, a prudent and wary Captain, adviſed him by all means to ſtay for his Colleague, and not hazard that Victory by too much haſte, which by the aſſiſtance of the Gallican Troops, there was little doubt but he might obtain.

Gratian by Letters deſires him not to fight till he ſhould come to his Aſſiſtance.

But he is perſwaded to the contrary.

17. He, as it happens in ſuch caſes, when Princes are adviſed to various courſes, took that which moſt ſuited his own Inclination, being by ſome Flatterers perſuaded to prevent the Honour which might accrue to his Nephew by the Engagement, and to wear the Laurel alone. While matters were preparing to put in execution what he had reſolved; a Chriſtian Prieſt (Presbyter, Ammianus tells us they called ſuch) and ſome others arrived with a Meſſage from Fritigern, by which in an humble manner he deſired, that he and his Countrymen, who had been driven from their own Seats by fierce and Barbarous Nations, might be permitted to inhabit Thrace, and enjoy the Cattel and Fruits there found, which if granted he promiſed Peace and all good Offices on their part. This the Chriſtian (ſo he terms him) openly delivered with the reſt; but he had other ſecret Inſtructions and private Letters from his King, who therein in ambiguous terms ſeemed to deſire of Valens, that he would bring his Army into the Field, and awe the Goths by the terror of his Imperial Name, without which they were not to be kept in any decorum. The Meſſengers were diſmiſſed as perſons not to be underſtood; but not long after on the fifth of the Ides of Auguſt, in all haſte Orders were given for the Army to march, all the Baggage being ſent into Adrianople, there to be kept with the Governour and Conſiſtorian Counſellors. By noon they diſcovered the Barbarians making an hideous Noiſe, as their Cuſtom was, to Battel, and the Roman Captains put their Army into a poſture of fighting. The right Wing of the Horſe they placed in the Van, for the left was not yet come up, and as it marched with all vigour and ſpeed ſome of the Barbarians were affrighted with the Noiſe, and ſome of them that lay further off with Alatheus and Safraces ſent to the Emperour, and in a ſhow deſired Peace. He deſpiſed them as an abject and baſe People, and required thoſe of the chiefeſt of them to be delivered up for Hoſtages; but they by feigned Excuſes drew out the time in length, and delayed till their own Horſe could arrive, which hourly they expected, with a further deſign, that the Roman Souldiers might be ſpent with the Heat of the Seaſon, now increaſed by the multitude of Fires which they had induſtriouſly kindled throughout the Countrey, as well as ſtarved for want of Victuals.

18. But Fritigern further to amuſe the Emperour, ſent and promiſed to bring all his Forces over to him, together with all things neceſſary for the Army, onely he required that ſome Noblemen might ſpeedily be ſent as Hoſtages to him. The Meſſage being acceptable, Equitius a Tribune, a Kinſman of Valens, and who had the Charge of his Palace, was deſigned for one, but he refuſed the Imployment, as having had too much Experience of the Extravagancy of the Barbarians when Priſoner with them, for he had made his Eſcape from Dibaltum. Upon his refuſal Richomeres freely offered himſelf to it, as becoming a man of Courage and Reſolution, who as he was going to the Enemies Camp, certain Archers and others, commanded by Bacurius an Iberian and one Caſſio, out of a too earneſt deſire of fighting fell in upon the Goths,and through their raſhneſs gave an ominous beginning to the War. For hereby was fruſtrated the worthy Deſign of Richomeres, who was not now permitted to paſs, and the Gothick Horſe being come up under Command of Alatheus and Sarfraces, together with a Party of Alans, with great violence fell from the Mountains, and bore all down that ſtood in its way. The Romans at the firſt Onſet were overpowered, and great ſlaughter followed of them, though they made as manful Reſiſtance as could be expected; which procured a Battel of that violence and reſolution, that the Hiſtorian compares it to a raging and increaſing Flame of Fire, as alſo to a Fight of Beaked Gallies, agitated both by the voluntary Truſion of each other, and the motion of the Sea. The left Wing broke through as far as the Enemies Carriages, and had done more if any Aſſiſtance had come; but forſaken by the reſt of the Horſe, was oppreſſed utterly by the Numbers of the Barbarians, which ſo crouded upon them, that ſcarcely could one of them draw his Sword, or pull in his hand again when once ſtretched out. The Duſt was ſo great, that it intercepted all proſpect, ſo that none could be aware of or prevent his being killed or maimed by the Enemies Darts, and by ſo vaſt multitudes were the Romans hemmed in on all ſides, that there was no opportunity of flight, which made them out of deſperation to contemn Death, and to ſell their Lives at a very dear rate, though the Goths ſeemed fully as reſolute as they. For If one of them had his Hand cut off, ſo that he could not uſe a Weapon, or had his Legs ſo mangled that he could not ſtand upright, yet when conflicting even with Death, would he with rolling Eyes and a grim angry Countenance, ſhew with how great fury and deſire of Revenge he was poſſeſſed. Through this mutual Contention, and pertinacious Humour, the Ground was all covered with heaps of dead Bodies, and the ſhouts of thoſe that fought were not heard, by reaſon of the loud cries and lamentations of the dying. The Roman Foot, utterly ſpent by the toil and heat of the day, having now neither ſtrength, hope, nor diſcretion left them, and having broken their Pikes betook themſelves to their Swords, and like mad men ruſhed amongſt the Multitudes of the Barbarians, till ſuch time as they could not hold their Feet, (ſo ſlippery was the Earth rendered by the Streams of Bloud that now ran every way) but fell upon dead Carcaſes, which by this time they trampled on without horrour; ſo familiar had Cuſtom made the ſight, how diſmal ſoever. The Sun was upon his entrance of Virgo, and therefore his Heat, added to the weight of their Weapons, rendered their Thirſt, as well as their Arms,inſupportable.

Sect. 3.

A.D. 376.

Certain Archers raſhly begin the Battel.

The moſt dreadful, and bloudy of all others.

19. In concluſion, the Romans were overpowered, and forced to fly as they could; which Valens perceiving, while every one ſhifted away as privily as he could, he betook himſelf in great fear and anxiety to the Lancearii and thoſe called Mattiarii, who had endured the ſhock without giving the leaſt ground; at which Trajan cried out, that the Emperour deſerted by his Guards would be utterly loſt if not ſpeedily reſcued. Hereupon Victor with all ſpeed haſted away to fetch ſome Batavians, who had been placed as a Reſerve to the relief of the Prince; but by this time there were no ſuch men to be found: So that diſappointed he went his way, as in like manner Richomeres ſaved himſelf by flight, together with Saturninus, whom Valens had preferred to the Dignity of Magiſter Armorum. The Purſuit was vigorouſly proſecuted by the Barbarians, who ſpared none that yielded, but quitted thoſe that made reſiſtance; and the flight of the purſued was hindered by the multitude of dead Bodies filling the ways, yet indifferently ſecured by the darkneſs of the following Night, at the beginning whereof in the twilight its thought the Emperour himſelf fell amongſt the common Souldiers, by the ſhot of an Arrow: But in what way he miſcarried there's no certainty, for his Body was never found, neither was there one alive that could ſay he ſaw him, the Enemy hovering long upon the place, as intent upon the Spoil, ſo that none durſt approach it to make any diſcovery. In like manner Decius, one of his Predeceſſors, in a Battel fought with Barbarians, was caſt from his Horſe into a Bog, and never could be recovered nor found. Yet was it reported, that Valens died not upon the very ſpot, but was conveyed to a Countrymans Houſe near at hand, which being very defenſible by reaſon of its large Roof, when the Barbarians for ſome time repulſed knew not the Quality of the Perſon, and were diverted by thoughts of greater Booty, they ſet * fire to it, and burnt him and it both together. That one of his Attendants leaping out of a Window, and being taken, told the unwelcom News to the Goths, (who were much troubled they had not got into their hands the Roman Emperour alive alive) and afterward eſcaped with it to his Fellow Subjects. After the ſame manner came one of the Scipio's to his end in Spain, being burnt in a Turret to which he had fled, by the Enemy: And it's certain, that neither he nor Valens obtained Sepulture, the laſt mark of Honour and Reſpect. Amongſt many other Eminent Perſons that periſhed in this Action, Trajan and Sebaſtian were very Famous, and with them fell five and thirty of thoſe they called Tribuni Vacantes, beſides other Officers; and Valerian and Equitius, whereof the one being his Kinſman overſaw the Stable, and the other the Palace of the Emperour. Potentius the Tribune of the Promoti was greatly lamented, being a perſon very acceptable, a young man in the flower of his Age, of ſingular hope, and recommended not onely by his own, but alſo by the Merits of Urſicinus his Father, who with approbation of all good men had executed the Place of Magiſter Armorum.

Wherein Valens miſcarries, it's uncertain how.

* Purpureos cultus, abſumptiq; igne Valentis Exuvias, &c. Claudian. de Bello Getico, v. 610.

Others of note ſlain.

20. It's certain that the third part of the Army hardly eſcaped, neither did any other Defeat (except that of Cannæ) equal this Overthrow, in the Opinion of Ammianus, with whoſe Relation concerning this War, the Original and Iſſue of it, moſt Writers do agree. But as to what he writes concerning Valens his envying the Vertues of his Nephew Gratian, other Reaſons of his ſudden fighting may be added. He was diſpleaſed that Valentinian being made Emperour without the Knowledge of either of them, Gratian had confirmed his Election without his Advice, and had ſhared the Empire with him, as Eunapius related in his Hiſtory; who alſo alleaged this as the principal Motive to his receiving the Goths into the Roman Pale; and poſſibly a diſagreement about matters of Religion, (Valens being a great Favourer of the Arians, and Gratian eſteemed a moſt Chriſtian Prince by the Orthodox Party) might increaſe his diſpleaſure. The Defeat is by Oroſius attributed to the flight of the Roman Horſe, which by deſerting the Legions expoſed them to the fury of thoſe Multitudes that overpowered them by their Numbers. What Ammianus writes concerning Valens his periſhing by the ſhot of an Arrow, is affirmed alſo by Libanius, who makes him to have fallen in the throng of his Souldiers, though he wanted not Horſes ſwift enough to convey him ſpeedily out of the danger, and his Captains preſſed him earneſtly by a ſeaſonable flight to eſcape and preſerve himſelf for better times, and the good of the Commonwealth. But he thought it a thing not by him to be practiſed, to endeavour to overlive ſo great an Overthrow, and for a Tomb obtained an heap of ſuch Souldiers as fell with him. Yet moſt other Hiſtorians conſent to that other Relation, of his betaking himſelf to the Cottage, and there being burnt together with his Followers. However it was, at this time and place, viz. about eight or twelve miles from Hadrianople, he died, now drawing near the fiftieth year of his Age, when he had reigned fourteen Years, four Moneths, and ſome Days, on the third or fifth of the Ides of Auguſt.

With two thirds of the Army.

Vide Annot. Valeſii in Amm. lib. 31

21. This muſt be ſaid in his Commendation, that he was a faſt and faithful Friend, a ſevere Puniſher of Ambitious Practices, a rigorous Exactor of both Civil and Military Diſcipline, moſt careful always and vigilant, leſt any through pretence of Relation or Kindred to him, ſhould procure Preferment; both as to beſtowing and removing from Imployments he was rather too ſlow, a moſt juſt and watchful Guardian of the Provinces, for each of which he took as much care as if it had been his own Family; for he induſtriouſly ſet himſelf to eaſe them of the Burthen of their Tributes already impoſed, and as for new ones he ſuffered none to be laid. Moreover, if for Tributes in ſpecie Money was to be paid, he was no whit rigorous as to the Summe. To Thieves and Corrupt Judges he was a ſharp and vehement Adverſary, and in this reſpect the Eaſt was more happy in him, than it had been in any other Prince before him. He was Liberal with a ſort of Moderation, as in many other matters appeared, ſo alſo in this, that when his Courtiers begged any thing, he would give him that had a title to the Eſtate time enough to defend himſelf, and in caſe it proved his own and he might beſtow it, with him that begged it he would joyn ſome others that were abſent, by ſuch diſappointment to repreſs the confidence of thoſe that gaped after the Wealth of other men. Many Cities and Towns he beautified both by raiſing new Buildings, and repairing ſuch as were fallen to decay. Such were his Vertues, which received on the other ſide great Allays. He coveted Wealth very intemperately, was impatient of Labour, was harſh as far as Cruelty it ſelf, of a clowniſh Humour, as neither cultivated by any Liberal Studies nor skill of Arms. He cared not who ſmarted, were but his Deſigns accompliſhed; and if he could but faſten Treaſon, or the Contempt of His Majeſty upon any, he far exceeded all Moderation both as to Bloud and Confiſcations. In this reſpect his Government ſeemed moſt intolerable, as alſo in another Effect of the ſame Cauſe; for though he pretended to refer all Cauſes and Queſtions to the deciſion of the Laws themſelves, and would delegate particular Judges to certain Affairs, yet never ſuffered he any thing to be done contrary to his own luſt and will. He was cholerick and abuſive, received all Accuſations readily, whether right or wrong. He was ſlow and unactive, of a ſwarthy Complexion, and the Pupil of one of his Eyes covered, yet ſo as it was not much to be perceived. His Limbs were compact and firm, indifferent was his Stature, his Legs bowed, and his Belly ſomething prominent.

Valens his Character.

22. This Character of Valens his Mind, the Reader may remember to have been ſufficiently confirmed by the precedent Account of his Laws, which ſhew his Humour and Diſpoſition much as it is deſcribed to us by Ammianus. By conduct of this Author we have traced his Actions ſo far as related to War, from the death of his Brother to his own deceaſe; but as to the Civil State we muſt take a further View of what was done by him and his two Nephews and Colleagues. They after their Fathers Death ſo divided the Empire of the Weſt betwixt them, that to Gratian fell Gall, Spain, and Britain; and to Valentinian, Italy, Illyricum, and Africk. Yet was not this Diviſion made at firſt, and it muſt be known, that whereas there are extant in the Codes ſeven and thirty Conſtitutions, bearing Date from the CCCLXXV Year of our Lord, or that wherein their Father died, to the Year CCCLXXIX, or that wherein Theodoſius was received as Emperour, there are none which bear the Name of Valentinian the Younger, but onely of Valens and Gratian. The mighty Care which Valens had for the Provinces, to protect them from Spoil and Rapine, as well of his own Officers as of the publick Enemy, may further appear from the Laws which we have not yet mentioned, and confer much to the fuller underſtanding of the ſtate of thoſe Times. The very Year his Brother died he directed from Antioch a notable Edict to Modeſtus “ the Præfect, concerning the furniſhing of Tirones or new Souldiers. Herein he “ declares, that the Burthen ought to lie upon Poſſeſſions or Lands, and not perſonal “ Eſtates, although certain ſorts and ranks of Men were liable thereunto, as Senators, “ Honorati, Principales, Decuriones, the Officers of Magiſtrates, or the like. “ And whereas there was an Imployment called Prototypia, which who ſo executed, it was their work to hire or buy theſe Souldiers, and ſet them at ſuch a rate, or make the Provincials pay ſuch a Summe of Money for each, he aboliſhes this “ Office as grievous and vexatious to the People, when it happened that thoſe whom “ it concerned had no Sons of their own to put into the Service. In the next “ place he nulls all Privileges granted to any perſons to excuſe them from this “ Charge, that ſo it might lie wholly upon Poſſeſſions; as to which, ſuch as had “ loſt them ſhould not bear the Burthen when the Emolument was gone; and if “ they had but ſmall Eſtates, or not amounting to the value of the Expence, as “ here it is the Cuſtom with us in the Militia, two or more ſhould joyn together “ in the furniſhing of one Souldier out, one being at the Charge this Year and the “ other the next; or if Money was to be paid, inſtead of the Souldier, each of “ them was to contribute his ſhare. Then doth he ſettle and eſtabliſh the Price or “ Rate of a Souldier to be ſix and thirty Solidi, and ſix over and above towards “ his Clothes and Expences; which Rate at ſeveral times varied according “ to the pleaſure of Princes, or the ſcarcity or cheapneſs of things. And for the “ Encouragement of theſe Tirones and thoſe that ſent them, he declares, That when “ they were liſted in the Army, if they well demeaned themſelves they ſhould receive “ the firſt Year Immunity from the ordinary Cenſus, and having ſerved ſeven, “ obtain the ſame Indulgence for their Fathers, their Mothers and Wives; “ if ſo be they ſerved amongſt thoſe called Comitatenſes; but if they lay upon the “ Borders, or were liſted among the Ripenſes, then they ſhould have onely this Privilege “ for their Wives. For the Comitatenſes, as we have ſaid heretofore, were reckoned in place before the Ripenſes, and greater Strength and Stature was required in one than in the other. And as ſoon as Tirones or new Men were levied, they were not preſently put into the Army, or mixed with the reſt; but to ſupply the Numbers of ſuch as were miſſing, he ordains the Army be reinforced with the Adcreſcentes or Incenſiti.

Vide Chron. Theodoſian. ad An. 375.

Laws made by him after his Brothers Death.

L. 7. de Tironibus, Cod. Th. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

A 2 Edict concerning raiſing new Men or Tirones.

23. He had Miniſters (as we have ſeen) rapacious and cruel, yet however he himſelf might be extravagant this way towards particular perſons, yet would he reſtrain his Officers in any courſes tending to the detriment of the Provinces. Therefore did he repreſs Fortunatianus his Comes Rei Privatæ, whom Ammianus brands with the Name of a Troubleſom Exactor, even in a matter which tended brands to

Sect. 3.

He repreſſeth the Avarice of his Officers in a thing wherein his own Gain was concerned.

A.D. 376.

Moleſto illi flagitatori.

L. 3. de Fiſci Debitoribus, Cod. Th. l. 10. tit. 16. & Cod. Juſt. l. 5. eod. tit.

A.D. 377.

A juſt Edict concerning the furniſhing of Souldiers Clothes.

L. 3. de Militari veſte, Cod. Th. & l. 2. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Vide Gothofr. in loc.

An indulgent one concerning Children of Senators.

L. 1. de Senatoribus & de Glebali, &c. Cod. Th. l. 6. tit. 2.

Againſt Abuſes committed by Under-Treaſurers.

L. 14. de diverſis Officiis, &c. Cod. Th. l. 8. tit. 7. & l. 2. Cod. Juſt. de Palatinis S. L.

For the Ornament of Cities.

L. 8. de Ædificiis privatis, Cod. Juſt. l. 8. tit. 10. Modeſt.

to the filling of his own Coffers. It happened ſometime, that amongſt the Papers of perſons condemned, or whoſe Eſtates were confiſcate, ſome Writings were found which mentioned Debts due to them from other men, though no Bills nor Bonds were to be ſeen, nor any Witneſs there was of any ſuch Obligation. By an Edict directed to him he declares all ſuch Notes to be Null in Law, it being eaſie (as he ſaith) by ſuch means to make any man ones Debtor. Which Edict is tranſcribed by Tribonian into Juſtinians Code, and being by him ſomething interpolated and altered, is accommodated alſo to the Cauſes of private perſons, no ſuch ſingle Note deſerving any Credit to be given to it, no not where the Emperour or his Treaſury were concerned. This Conſtitution bears Date from Hierapolis in the Province of Euphrates, on the fifth of the Ides of Auguſt, of which ſame Date from the ſame place he directed another to Modeſtus the Præfect of the Eaſt, concerning the annual furniſhing of the Souldiers Clothes through his five Dioceſes; theſe were Thrace, Ægypt, the Eaſt ſtrictly taken, Aſiana, and Pontica; in all which he ordains, that every thirty Juga or Capitations of Land ſhall find one Suit of Apparel, except in four Provinces of Thrace, viz. Europe, Thrace, Hæmimons, and Rhodope, in which every twenty ſhould find the like. Herein he ſhewed himſelf very juſt and equal, which the Hiſtories of the Times ſufficiently make out unto us. For, the other two Provinces of Thrace, in particular wherein he declares the number of Thirty is to be obſerved, were now overrun by the Goths and Hunns, as we have ſeen. He obſerves a difference betwixt the Cuſtoms of the Provinces of the Eaſt; properly ſo called; for two of them (Oſroene and Iſauria) found Souldiers Clothes in kind, but the reſt paid Money in the room of them; as Paleſtine amongſt the reſt, which ſhortly after was divided into three Provinces. Now we may take notice that theſe five Dioceſſes took up the whole Diſtrict or Share of the Empire belonging to Valens, Valentinian having in the Diviſion reteined all the reſidue to himſelf, and therein all Illyricum. And hence poſſibly aroſe the Diſagreement betwixt Valens and his two Nephews mentioned by Eunapius, which provoked him to receive the Goths or Scythians, as they are alſo termed, into the Roman Pale. At this ſame City he was further ſo indulgent, as to enact by another Conſtitution this ſame Year, That the Children of Senators (Male or Female) ſhould not, if born before they arrived at that Dignity, be liable to the Glebalis Collatio, although in matters of Privilege they were eſteemed Children of Senators, both as to Honour and other Emoluments. Further to diſcourage Abuſes in matters of Money, wherein the Provincials were ſo very much concerned, he ordained alſo this Year at Antioch, That ſuch Theſaurenſes, or thoſe that ſerved under the Treaſurers of Provinces, as ſhould be found faulty in their Accounts, ſhould never be ſuffered to ſerve in that nature again, nor yet admitted to any other Service; neither thoſe that were ſtill in the Service be permitted to paſs over to any higher Imployment, leſt having ſuch refuge they might be encouraged to betray their Truſt. For there were three ſorts of Treaſurers having the title of Comites: The firſt was Illuſtrious, viz. the Comes Sacrarum Largitionum of the Weſt or the Eaſt, as Titian, to whom this Law is directed; the ſecond was Comes Theſaurorum; Comes Largitionum, or Largitionalium Titulorum, who was Treaſurer over the whole Dioceſe, as that of Thrace, Italy, or the like; and then the Præfectus or Præpoſitus Theſaurorum in each ſingle Province, whoſe care it was to receive, keep ſafe, and tranſmit the Revenue. Of his great care for the Ornaments and Luſtre of Cities, there is further another Law made by him this Year, and extant, though not in that of Theodoſius, yet in the Code of Juſtinian. It commands, That all Curiales of Cities be conſtrained either to repair their old Houſes, or to build new ones, and therein dwell and attend the Services of their Corporations, as well as contribute toward the Populouſneſs and Opulency of the Towns. And if the Inhabitants were not of the Curiales or Corporation, he obliges them yet to repair ſuch Houſes as as they dwell in, if decayed, and rebuild them if fallen down.

24. To bid Farewell to Valens, after his Reign of fourteen Years, four Moneths, and odd Days; and come to the Adminiſtration of Gratian. He (as we ſaid before) during his Uncles Life, although his Brother Valentinian was declared Emperour, yet governed the Weſtern Parts thereof alone; as appears from the Laws dated for the ſpace of three Years from Triers and Magontiacum or Mentz; whereas there are not any that own the other for their Author. After his Fathers Death he continued long at Triers, and for about a Years ſpace had Maximinus or Maximus for his Præfectus Prætorio; but to expiate all his Villanies he was then

Laws made by Gratian after his Fathers Death.

One concerning the Tryal of Senators in Criminal matters.

L. 13. de Accuſationibus & Inſcript. Cod. Th. lib. 9. tit. 1. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

Quinquevirale Judicium.

then put to death, when by no other Courſe, not by Edicts themſelves, his Cruelty could be reſtrained. For, Gratian made divers Laws, as is rationally Concluded, for this purpoſe, that he might Comfort and encourage the Senate, which had, as we have abundantly ſeen, been grievouſly haraſſed by his unheard of practices. To this end he directed ſeveral of his Conſtitutions or Laws (called, when to the Senate, Orations) which with great Joy and Applauſe were read in the Houſe. By the firſt of theſe we meet with, he gives powerto the ordinary Judge of the Province, to hear the Criminal Cauſes of Senators; though he were but of the Degree of Spectabilis, whether Præſes, Corrector, Conſularis, Vicar, or Proconſuls, (all which ſorts of Provincial Magiſtrates he reckons up) but Condemn them he could not, but was to report the Matter to the Higher Powers, as either to the Prince himſelf, or his greateſt Officers, viz. The Præfect of the City, if the Party inhabited in the Suburbicarian Provinces; and the Præfectus Prætorio, if in the reſt. Herein he Acted otherwiſe, than had done either Conſtantine the Great, or his own Father, For Conſtantine had made a Senator puniſhable in the Province where he committed the Crime, without any Reference to be made to any other: and Valentinian ran ſo contrary a Courſe, that he would not have any ordinary Judge to have Cognizance of the Crimes of Senators, and curbed even the Præfect of the City as to this point. Indeed antiently none could judg Senators, but thoſe of that Rank, and the Præfecti Prætorio, as ſuch, had no Juriſdiction over them. When the Senate came to have the Power of judging its Members, it was committed to the Præfect of the City, and he continued their Judge till thoſe days wherein the Power of the Præfecti Prætorio became ſo extravagant, and that of the Præfect of the City ſo much decayed; For now within the Suburbicarian Provinces, or the Country an hundred Miles round, was included his Authority. The Cauſes of ſuch as dwelt within this Diſtrict, Gratian will have referred unto him; but withall joynes with him the Quinquevirale Judicium, or five other Senators, bearing Office at preſent, or ſuch as had borne Office, who were to be choſen by Lot, and not called at his Pleaſure, or Diſcretion.

And in Civil Cauſes.

*L.*2. Cod. Juſt. ubi Senatores. lib. 3. tit. 24.

Another concerning Quarries and Buildings in Rome.

L. 8. de Metallis Cod. Th. lib. 10. tit. 19. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt. ubi hiſtoria & temporaria.

*L.*19. de operibus publicis Cod. Th. lib. 15. *tit.*1. Abeſt à Cod. Juſtin.

Two more againſt Freed men accuſing their Patrons, and Slaves their Lords.

L.L. 1, 2. *Ne Præter Crimen Majeſtatis Cod. Th. lib.*9.*tit.*6. Dat. Id. Mart. Valente 5. & Valentiniano A. A. Coſs A. D. 376.

25. In ſuch Manner were Senators to be judged in Criminal matters, but as to Civil Cauſes, by another Branch of this Oration, he put a difference betwixt the one ſort and the other; determining, that in the City and Suburbicarian Provinces they ſhould ſtand to the award of the Præfectus Pætorio, the Præfect of the City, and of the Magiſter Officiorum when the Emperour commanded it, and in the Provinces to the determination of the ordinary Judg. Having indulged ſo the Senators in a matter ſo near relating to their own Perſons, he farther obliged them and the whole City by his care of the Buildings, for in another Law, thought to be part alſo of the ſame Oration, having told them that he had formerly given them leave upon a certain condition, to cut ſtone out of private Quarries throughout Macedonia and Illyricum, he now adds, that if they pleaſed to do it, they ſhould neither be burdened with the Expence of Tribute nor Toll, remitting thereby what was due to himſelf,though not what belongled to the Party that owed the Land. Hereby we learn that at the making of this Law, on the Ides of Auguſt A. D. CCCLXXVI. Gratian had ſtill Command over Macedonia and Illyricum, whatſoever Zoſimus ſaith to the contrary; though he had taken his Brother Valentinian for his Colleague; but indeed, when Theodoſius, three years after, was alſo choſen Emperour, then was Illyricum, formerly undivided, parted into Eaſtern and Weſtern. Having hereby ſufficiently encouraged them to fetch Materials elſewhere, by another Law,thought alſo to have been part of the ſame Oration, he forbade all manner of perſons, as well the Præfect of the City as other Judges, to raiſe any new works in Rome, except at his own Charge, and without injury to other Buildings, digging up any old Foundations, or making uſe of the Stones or pieces of Marble belonging to decayed Works. This ſame year, finding it was a Cuſtome, and practiſed, we may little doubt, by Maximinus, to have Patrons accuſed of Capital Crimes by their Freed Men, and Lords alſo by their Slaves, by two ſeveral Conſtitutions as now we find them directed to this very Maximinus, or Maximus, he forbids the Practice for the time to come, except only in Caſes of Treaſon, wherein the Emperours themſelves are Concerned, and that under pain of Death, to be inflicted on ſuch Accuſers by the Sword or by Fire. As to the Emperours themſelves an exception might juſtly be made; for if Slaves might be heard and Examined, againſt others, in behalf of their own Lords, much much more ought they to be againſt any whatſoever in behalf of the Common Lords or Fathers of their Country. By theſe Conſtitutions we find in ſuch Caſes, the puniſhment of Freedmen and Slaves, the ſame; for though the former were now Free, yet their Ingratitude was the greater. So much was this falſeneſs abhorred by the Romans, That Slaves could not be ſo much as heard againſt their Lords, but preſently were hurried away to Puniſhment, which formerly was the Opinion and Practice of Conſtantine, as afterward of Arcadius and Honorius, though Theodoſius was of another mind; for he admitted them to Proof, and yet, after their Evidence ſubjected them to the moſt ſevere Sentence, admitting the Treachery, but hating and puniſhing the Traitor. The moſt antient Emperours abhorred both of them in ſuch a meaſure, that though they produced Writings, and had prepared Evidence for Tryal, yet they denied Slaves all Credit, Audience and Acceſs. But Maximinus, as Ammianus tells us, in his enormous Cruelties, was wont to torture Slaves, to make them teſtify againſt their Maſters, ſo that theſe Laws ſeem directly intended to give a ſtop to his proceedings; which, when neither they, nor any other Courſes could effect, the Sword upon his Throat at laſt put a ſtop to his Career, after he had been Præfectus Prætorio full four years.

Sect. 3.

A.D. 376.

A.D. 376.

Olim florente Rep. de ſervis nulla quæſtio erat in Dominum niſi de Inceſtu. Poſtea Julius & Octavianus cum leges de adulteriis coercendis ferrent, ut in adulterii quæſtione ſervi in caput Dominorum torquerentur ſanxere ſed in quæſtione ſtupri ſervi adverſus dominos tormentis interrogari non poterant ut diſtinctè ait Papinianus in L. 17. D. de quæſtionib. vide Valeſ. in Amm. p. 365.

l. ult Ad legem Corneliam de falſo. P. P. Romæ 16. Kal. Maij. Cod. Th. lib. 9. tit. 19. L. penult. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. hinc deformata eſt. Vide Notas & Comm. Gothofr. in L.

An Edict about falſe Accuſations.

26. By another Edict directed to Maximinus, this Tartareous Inquiſitor (ſo they ſtyle him) Gratian took Care to prevent the frequent and raſh Accuſations of Forgery; by a Courſe much more full of mildneſs and Humanity, than had been practiſed, at leaſt as he thought, in former times. By the more antient Law for prevention of ſuch malicious or raſh Accuſations; it was provi-“ded, that after a convenient ſpace granted to the Accuſer to deliberate what“ he was about, if he would enter a Criminal Action, he ſhould by Writing ob-“lige himſelf to make good his Accuſation, or undergo the Lex Talionis, and“ ſuffer the Puniſhment himſelf, due to the Crime he had objected. So the Law ſtood before the time of the Emperour Antoninus, who took another Courſe by remitting the matter to the Office and Diſcretion of the Judge, to conſider whether the Accuſer laid his Accuſation with an undaunted and reſolute mind, in which Caſe he might remit the Neceſſity of the Obligation; or with a raſh and diſturbed Spirit, which if he perceived, he might give him ſpace to conſider, and then require the Obligation. But in after-times, the Judges unmindful of their Duties in this point, out of a negligent and ſevere humour, neglected both the one Direction and the other preſcribed by Law, and neither requiring the Obligation, nor granting ſpace to deliberate, as ſoon as an Accuſation was laid on any, they hurried on the Accuſer, and gave no time for Paſſion to vent it ſelf; but made advantage of it to the deſtruction of the Party. Conſtantine, by a moſt Elegant Law, took away this Abuſe, by retroducing a neceſſity of the Obligation though formerly he had been of another mind, and ſo the Matter ſtood till it came down to Gratian, who by a new way yet more accommodated to the antient Laws, endeavoured to put a ſtop to this miſchief. “When firſt mention is made of Forgery, he ordains, that“ the Judge give the Accuſer his Choice, whether he will proceed againſt his Adverſary by the way of a Civil, or of a Criminal Action, and to grant him a competent time to conſider (which Tribonian in tranſcribing this Law hath omitted in Juſtinian's Code) and this not only to him whoſe only deſigne it was to“ accuſe of Forgery, but to him alſo that in another Cauſe did this by the by,“ as when they were upon Tryal of another matter, which being offered to be“ proved by Writing, the Party ſhould ſay, that the Writing was forged, and“ ſuch he would prove it to be. If the Accuſer thought good to proceed in a“ Criminal Action, he takes away the neceſſity of the Obligation to the Lex Ta-“lionis, as too ſevere, and fit only to be required in certain Caſes, in this as“ all other Diſputes, both Words and Deeds being to be valued and eſteemed ac-“cording to the quality of the perſons concerned. He gives this Reaſon, that it is more agreeable to the Authority of the Judge to puniſh a Party offending according to the antient Laws, than to take his Meaſures from any Obligation, or Convention of the Parties; and he Confirms it by two Examples. The firſt is taken from the Cornelian and Julian Laws, concerning publick Judgments which require Criminals to be accuſed, and Forgeries puniſhed without any mention made of ſuch an Obligation; and the ſecond is the Reſcript or Law made by Antoninus and lately mentioned; both which Examples had never been known, had he not made mention of them in this Edict. In the laſt place he ordains, that if ſo be the Accuſer would reſolve to proſecute the Accuſed in a Civil Action, the Duty of the Judg ſhould be, not to Condemn the Party caſt, in more than the Victor was endamaged, but yet when the Tryal was paſt, then to exert his Authority in puniſhing either Forgery or falſe Accuſation, as the Nature of the Cauſe ſhould require.

He takes care that Gall be furniſhed with fit Profeſſors.

27. Gratian lying at this time at the City of Triers, took Care that the Cities of Gall ſhould be furniſhed with fit Profeſſors, by a notable Edict directed to Antoninus the Præfectus Prætorio of that Dioceſs. "He commands that Rhetoricians and Grammarians, both of the Attick and Roman way and Learning, be inſtituted in every Metropolis; by Attick, as afterward he explains himſelf, meaning Greek; for Athens as in former Ages, ſo alſo in this whereof we write flouriſhed with the Profeſſion of good letters, as appears by many Teſtimonies. Here Studied Julian the Apoſtate, Proæreſius, Muſonius, Hemerius Libanius, and others of Pagan Perſwaſion; and of Chriſtians, Gregory Nazianzen, Baſil of Cæſarea in Cappadocia, and John Chryſoſtome; and indeed, the Youth was ſent from all quarters to this ſtill flouriſhing Univerſity, as I may term it. But, Perſons that are of Franco-Gallick Original here move a queſtion, what need there was, that Gratian ſhould take this Care? ſeeing Learning already flouriſhed in Gall, which Antiently was furniſhed with many Academies and Profeſſors. They Cite what Cato ſaid of old, concerning the Acute manner of Speech of this Country, with whom St. Hierome Accorded, when he wrote, that it always abounded with moſt Eloquent Men. They urge the old Conteſt concerning Greek and Latine Eloquence before the Altar at Lyons, and hint to us the Account of Learned Men, and eſpecially of Rhetoricians given by Pithæus in his Preface to Quintilian. They tell us, the Deſigne of Conſtantius Chlorus is ſufficiently known concerning the School of Auguſtodunum, over which he ſet Eumenius, whoſe Oration concerning the Erecting of Schooles, is ſtill extant, when before this, there was an Antient Academy at Maſſilia, and another at Adua under Tiberius. Moreover, Symmachus acknowledgeth, that he received the Rudiments of Rhetorick from an old Man that Inhabited, or was borne near the Garumna or Garonne, and how much he was beholden to that Countrey, upon this Account. Nay, from the ſame Symmachus, who lived at this time, it is evident, that under Gratian himſelf, the Studies of Gall exceedingly flouriſhed, and that thence, Rhetoricians were ſent for to Rome, as Palladius amongſt others. The Profeſſors of Bourdeaux are moreover known, as commemorated by Auſonius, who ſpeaks alſo of Tolouſe and the Schoole of Narbone, as alſo of Veſontio and Lyons, all which, ſay they, were famous before this Conſtitution of Gratian. They themſelves anſwer for him, that though there were many Schooles in Gall, yet being much taken with the Gallick Eloquence, which alſo he had himſelf imbibed, and dayly, where he lived, Converſing with Learned Men of this Country, he reſolved yet farther to Promote it, as much as poſſible, firſt by Ordaining Profeſſors in all notable or moſt Populous Cities; for by Metropoles in this Law they will have them meant, and not the word ſtrictly taken for the Principal in all Provinces; the number of which, yet at this time they ſay increaſed. But the principal Reaſon they aſſigne is, becauſe Gratian now reſolved to appoint fixed and conſtant Salaries to the Profeſſors out of the Fiſcus or Treaſury, as Conſtantius Chlorus appointed an Allowance to Eumenius out of the Revenue of Auguſtodunum.

L. 11. de Medicis & Profeſſoribus dat. 10. Cal. Jun. Cod. Th. lib. 13. tit. 3. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

Vide Gothofr. in d. L.

28. And indeed, the Cities in the Provinces were wont to pay Profeſſors their Wages themſelves, and Gothofred tells us, that by Fiſcus may well enough be meant the Revenues of them, ſo as this Law may be thus interpreted, that Gratian would have them to maintain their Profeſſors; but by a certain Allowance now preſcribed by him, not left at random to their own Diſcretions, who, he might preſume, would make the beſt market they could one way, as Auſonius complained, and Libanius particularly, concerning the Rhetoricians of Antioch. He thinks the Deſigne of the Emperour was to leave the Election free to the Citizens: but to aſſure the Profeſſors a conſtant and certain Maintenance by his own appointment, as Conſtantius before him ordaind the Corporation ſhould give Salary to none, but whom he appointed. Now the Allowance ſetled by this Law, is, to the Orators twenty-four Annonæ, or dayly Proviſions for ſo many Men, and to the Grammarians twelve, being a ſmaller Number; but to a Rhetorician of the City of Triers (at this time of Gratian, the Metropolis of Gall, and the Seat of the Emperours and of the Præfecti Prætorio in that Country) he aſſigned thirty, to a Latine Grammarian twenty and to one of Greece, twelve; and that out of reſpect to the eminency of the place. But here we muſt needs take notice that but two ſorts of Profeſſors are mentioned in this Law, viz. Rhetoricians or Orators, and Grammarians; for as yet in Gall there were none that profeſſed Philoſophy, or the laws, to learn which the Youth travelled to Rome. But we are not by Grammarians to underſtand ſuch as taught the firſt Rudiments of language only; their Province extending much farther, as including almoſt whatſoever there was of more Polite literature; and to be ſure Philology; although in this Edict they be ſet after and allowed leſs ſalary than Orators. So much for the Edict it ſelf which we find directed to Antonius Præfectus Prætorio of Gall, as ſeveral others are, who two years after was preferred to the ſame dignity in Italy, and was in Gall ſucceeded by Auſonius, whom Joſeph Scaliger by a miſtake would ſubſtitute for him, and, erroneouſly, have the Name of Antonius to be blotted out. “The Emperor tells him he will have the former Rules obſerved throughout all the Dioceſs committed to his Magnificence; whence is obſerved that to the Præfect of Gall at this time did only one Dioceſs belong, though the Præfecti Prætorio otherwiſe had ſeveral under their juriſdiction, as we have ſeen heretofore, and three ſometimes under the diſpoſition of him of Gall, viz. Gall it ſelf, Spain, and this Iſland of Britain. But Spain at this time was governed by a Proconſul of its own, and was ſubject to no Vicar, and not under any Præfect (as the very name of Vicar doth import) though ſhortly after it returned to that form of Government, as appears both from Eunapius and Sulpicius Severus his Hiſtory. And Britain probably was from the time of the General Theodoſius under the ſame ſort of Officers, which may be gueſſed partly from the Example of Spain, and partly from this Law, which gives to the Præfect of Gall but one Dioceſs. So that they are much deceived who think the Adminiſtration of one Dioceſs below the Dignity of Illuſtrious Perſons. For the Præfect of the City of Rome had but one Dioceſs, viz. the Suburbicarian Regions lying within an hundred Miles; and after theſe times no doubt there is but that Præfecti Prætorio were content with one Dioceſs, as under Juſtinian he of Africk.

L. 3. de Offic. Præfect. Urbi Cod. Juſt. l. 1. tit. 28. Dat. 6. Cal. Jul.

He gives the Prefect of Rome place above others in the City.

29. At this time was Rufinus Prefect of Rome, to whom Gratian directed another Edict of this year, whereby he gave him precedence over all other Dignitaries in the City. He ſtaid not much longer in his Office, being in the latter end of the year ſucceeded by Gracchus, who continued Præfect alſo the year following. To this Gracchus is directed a Law, ſaid to be had in Seldens Copy, dated in the firſt of December, which forbids “That any man be judge in his own Cauſe, for the ſame reaſon that no man can bear witneſs in his own behalf. The Emperor decrees it generally ſo, as no ſort of Perſon excepted, not Maximinus himſelf who is thought to have been principally aimed at in this Conſtitution alſo, upon report or conſultation of Gracchus, now Præfect of that City, wherein ſeveral ill things were at this time reformed, and particularly relating to Religion. Now indeed there ſeems to have been much inſolence and ſeverity uſed by Judges; and poſſibly by the Example or Procurement of Maximinus. For, Gratian not long before this in the ſame year found reaſon to proceed further for the liberty and honour of Curiales, or the Officers of Corporations, invaded doubtleſs by ſome who executed authority over them; which were no other than the Governours of Provinces. He ſent an Edict to the ſame Antonius Præfectus Prætorio of Gall, whereby he commands “That all Decuriones be free and exempt from the Fidiculæ and Tormenta, although any of “ them had ſpent the publick money, or had demeaned himſelf fraudulently and “ extravagantly in a publick Office; for although great care ought to be had of “ Tribute or publick Money, as alſo of the publick Diſcipline, yet might they be “ eſtabliſhed by others, beſides bloody means. But from this Immunity he excepts Perſons guilty of two ſorts of Crimes, whereof the one he expreſly declares to be Treaſon, and the other not to be ſpoken of, but thought to be in degree and importance next unto it, as namely the crime of Magick. He alſo diſtinguiſhes betwixt Fidiculæ and Tormenta, and theſe they called Plumbatæ, from the ſtroaks of which he will not have guilty or criminal Decuriones to be exempt, which Priviledge yet was afterward indulged them in the Eaſt, but again not long after revoked, and the old Law introduced afreſh. Yet by this Conſtitution he grants this Immunity to ten of the chief of them, and he wills alſo that it be moderately uſed towards the reſt that were ſubject to this pain, as not to be inflicted but upon highly criminal perſons and Publick Debtors. Thoſe Plumbatæ however were leaden Bullets tied to Whips or Thonges, wherewith ſome were corrected for amendment, and others puniſhed, ſo far, as often death inſued thereupon.

L. Unic. Ne in ſua cauſa quis judicet. Cod. Th. l. 2. tit. 2. Divulſa hæc L. in Cod. Juſt. in L. un. eod. tit. & L. 10. de teſtibus.

Is kind to the Decuriones.

L. 2. de quæſtionibus Dat. 15. Cal. Octob. Trev. Cod. Th. lib. 9. tit. 35.

Sect. 3.

A.D. 377.

30. The year following, which was the CCCLXXVII of our Lord, wherein Gratian the fouth time, and Merobaudes were Conſuls, that Emperor abode for the moſt part at Triers, though one time by a Subſcription of a Law we find him at Mentz. Heſperius the Son of Auſonius was, for this and the three following, Præfectus Prætorio, and beſides him Modeſtus was Prefect of the Eaſt, and Antonius ſtill of Gall. Gracchus, as we ſaid, ſtill continued Præfect of the City; for, the firſt Edict of this year, made by Gratian, we find directed unto him. Whereby He forbids "the examining Senators by Tortures, a thing practiſed as we have ſeen by that cruel Maximinus, to the aboliſhing of which Cuſtom introduced by him, this Conſtitution ſeems intended, as ſeveral other Laws againſt his practices, and that at the Petition of the Senate, though the Monſter himſelf, whoſe nature could not be ſweetned, probably had had his Throat cut the preceeding year. On the twenty ſeventh day of July, we find Gratian at Mogontiacum or Mentz, perhaps in order to his expedition againſt the Alamans; for it was now that he got ſo notable a victory over them at Argentuaria, a Town of Gall, wherein was killed Priarius their King. From Mentz a Conſtitution bears that date, directed to Antonius, and forbids "That in the afternoon any Perſon of the ſame Province be admitted to the preſence of the ordinary Judge, whether known or unknown to him, nay of what " degree or quality ſoever. For in the morning it was ſuppoſed that they heard Cauſes in the Secretarium, and attended buſineſs in publick, and, but in publick he would not have them to receive any Impreſſion at all, not by the Information or motion of any perſon in private, leſt they ſhould be corrupted, or for fear or favour be biaſſed contrary to their own Judgement, or the juſtice of Cauſes depending before them. That ſometimes this hapned, eſpecially in Gall, we may well believe if we judge of the Diſeaſe from the Nature and Efficacy of the Remedy, and give credit to Libanius the Sophiſt, who wrote two Orations concerning this Subject, wherein with all earneſtneſs and Rhetorick he could uſe, he deſired the Emperor to make ſuch a Law as this before us, which Orations James Gothofred partly firſt publiſhed, and partly illuſtrated with Commentaries. By the middle of September we find the Emperor returned to Triers; for, thence he ſent another Edict to Probianus now Præfect of Rome, wherein he takes care "That the Wine which was furniſhed by the Provinces, or the Urbicarian Regions, for the Uſe of that City, ſhould be received as ſoon as it was brought or preſented; and ſuch as would not endure Age, preſently diſpoſed of to the Uſe of the Citizens. Such ordinarily were the Italian Wines, herein of a different Nature from thoſe of Syria.

He forbids examining Senators by torture.

L. 3. de quæſtionibus Cod. Eod. Dat. Prid. Non. Januar. Trev. L 10. Cod. Juſt. de Dignitat.

Vide Chron. Theodoſian. L. 6. de Officio Rectoris Provinciæ Cod. Th. lib. 1. tit. 7. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

Vide eum in L.

L. 3. Tributa in ipſis ſpeciebus, &c. Cod. Th. lib. 11. tit. 3. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

31. Part of the next year, which was the laſt of his Unkle Valens, Gratian paſſed alſo at Triers well nigh to the month of May, as appears from eight Laws made by him at this place; and then marched to the Aſſiſtance of his Uncle. The two former of theſe Laws bearing the ſame date, and directed to the ſame Perſon, viz. Antonius, now Præfect of Italy, ſeem to have made one and the ſame Conſtitution though of ſomething different Subjects. In the former he declares to be Law what had been formerly held as a Rule by moſt underſtanding men in that faculty, "That when both a civil and criminal Action lay, the Party concerned in any thing reſpecting his Profit might try the Cauſe both ways, neither could the criminal " Action be extinguiſht by the Civil. He explains it by ſeveral inſtances, as if a man were violently diſſeiſed of any thing, he might not only have the Inderdict or Writ called unde vi, but by the Julian Law concerning this Subject, might put in an Accuſation againſt the Deſſeiſor. In like manner, if a Teſtament was concealed, not only the ordinary Writ for exhibiting it, did lie, but alſo an Information by virtue of the Cornelian Law concerning Teſtaments. The like was to be obſerved, If a Freed-man pretended himſelf to be free born, in matters of Theft, and other Offences. One only exception he allows to his Law, viz. the Civil Action concerning Manners, as in caſe a man brought it againſt his Wife, for her naughty behaviour, he could not for the ſame fault bring a Criminal Action of Adultery, becauſe by the very Civil Action concerning manners he proſecuted her to puniſhment, and not to any pecuniary mulct, and this being for abuſing his Bed, one and the ſame Crime ought not to receive two puniſhments; the reaſon why this Action deſcended neither to nor againſt an Heir. But amongſt other Offences he declares Forgery alſo to be ſubject to Actions of both ſorts, and by the ſecond part of this Conſtitution, or the ſecond Law, explains what Forgery he means, which was ſuch as was too frequently uſed; in the time of Valentinian and Valens eſpecially. We have ſeen out of Amminnus Marcellinus how the Arts of Magick and Inchantments were laid to the charge of many eminent perſons, and thoſe of the Senate

He declares that both a civil and criminal Action may lye.

L. un. victum civiliter agere & criminaliter poſſe. Cod. Th. lib. 9. tit. 2. Dat. prid. id. Jan. L. un. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Lege Julia de vi. De tabulis Exhibendis. lege Cornelia teſtamentaria.

L. 7. de fide teſtium & inſtrument. Cod. Th. lib. 11. tit. 39.

L. penult. Cod. Juſt. de probat.

Sect.3.

A.D. 377.

Puniſhes ſuch as raſhly accuſe any of Magick or Inchantments.

eſcaped not in this point, the malicious Deſigns of ſuch as deſired to have them removed out of the way. This was another of Maximinus his Tricks, which Gratian, having done ſo much already, to reform the cruel Cuſtoms introduced by him, reſolved to make null by this Conſtitution. Thereby he expreſly commands, “That ſuch as ſhould pretend to know of any ſuch wicked Magical or Inchanting Writings, whereby it might be ſaid that the Life of the Prince or others was in “ danger, and promiſed to make good their Charge, if they failed therein, ſhould be “ puniſhed no otherwiſe than as perſons guilty of Forgery, without any formal accuſation, “ by the meer Office of the Judge. And ſuch are the Laws certain as to time and place, which Gratian after his Fathers death, and his Governing the reſt by himſelf, made, yet during the life of his Unkle, and which we thought proper to be mentioned in this Work; for others that relate ſolely to the Jus privatum, we think fit to be omitted. Some there are which go under the Names of his Father, his Unkle and himſelf, but without day or Conſul now extant in the Code of Juſtinian. One of them ſettles the matter of precedence betwixt the Vicars of Præfects and the Comites or Magiſtri Militum, ſo that in military Affairs theſe “ ſhould be preferred before the former; but if they hapned to ſit together in Judgement, “ the Vicar ſhould have precedence out of reſpect to the Prefect whom he re- “ preſented. By another Law they declare, that they will receive and hear the Re- “ ports and conſultations of theſe Vicars, as well as of other Judges.

L. 1. de Officio Vicarii Cod. Juſt. lib. 1. tit. 38.

L. 2. eod. tit.

The Goths beſiege Adrianople.

Ammian. lib. 31. ad calcem.

32. But to return from our Law-Hiſtory, to that of the War. When the Night following the great Overthrow and death of Valens was paſt, and it was now light, the victorious Goths, like ſo many Wild-beaſts inraged to farther attempts by the taſt of blood, having underſtood by ſome Fugitives, that many Perſons of eminent quality with Valens his Treaſure had ſtaid behind in Adrianople, haſted thither and beſieged the City. They moſt vigorouſly aſſaulted it, but it was as reſolutely defended, and it hapned that many who had fled from the Battel, for want of time, having not been received into the Town, three hundred of them went over to the Barbarians, who cut them all in pieces, and by ſo ſevere an Act prevented the like Treachery for the time to come. In the heat of the Fight a violent ſhoure of Rain chanced to fall, which drove them to their Carriages and Rampart; whence by threatning Letters they moved the Defendants to yield to quarter. The Meſſenger was not admitted, but the Letters were carried by a Chriſtian, as our Hiſtorian calls him, and being read, were ſlighted, as reaſon required; and thereupon the remainder of the Day and the Night following were ſpent in preparing for a freſh Attack. They within blocked up the Gates with maſſy Stones, and placed their Engines where need required, with plenty of Water, for want of which many had well nigh periſhed by thirſt the day before. Without, the Goths began to be ſenſible how difficult the enterprize was on which they had entred, and that their power was much diminiſhed by the loſs and unſerviceableneſs of their ſtouteſt men. They betook themſelves therefore to a crafty Device, which by juſtice it ſelf Ammianus tells you was diſcovered. They perſwaded certain Fugitives to counterfeit flight back into the Town, with deſign to ſet it in ſome convenient place on fire, that the Defendants thereby diverted, the Walls might be ſcaled with greater eaſe. Theſe men whom he calls Candidates, came to the Trench, and ſtretching out their hands, deſired that as Romans they might be admitted; and as ſuch they were, no ſuſpicion being had of them. But when they came to be examined about the Enemies Deſign, they could not agree in their Anſwers, which hinted ſo much to thoſe concerned, that being put to torture, they confeſſed on what Errand they were ſent, and loſt their Heads. The Goths fruſtrated of their aim, with all preparations they could make, and minds hardned againſt Death and Danger, gave another Onſet, about the third watch; and by their Numbers thought to do the work; but ſuch was the Valour and Conſtancy of the Beſieged ſtill, that they failed of ſucceſs, and this diſadvantage they had by their multitudes, that whatever the Romans let flie at them, did ſome execution. But eſpecially a Scorpion, or ſort of Engine, called the Wild Aſs, by caſting at them a very great Stone, though it broke in the fall, did ſo affright them, that they fairly betook themſelves to their Heels.

Their device diſcovered.

33. Yet by the earneſt endeavours of their Officers the Fight was renewed, wherein ſtill the Romans had the ſame advantage which the Multitudes of their Enemies formerly afforded; yet did the Goths couragiouſly maintain the fight till it grew dark, and then they retired, fretting in vain, and upbraiding one another that they had not taken the Advice of Fritigern, who by all means deſired they would decline Sieges. Applying themſelves all Night to the dreſſing of their Often repulſed, they raiſe the Siege.

They approach Perinthus.

They face Conſtantinople.

wounds; when Day came they were much diſtracted in their Counſels what to do, but at laſt reſolved to ſeize upon Perinthus, and breaking up their Camp laid all waſte in their Paſſage; which as ſoon as they within Hadrianople perceived, by thoſe they could truſt, with all diligence they haſted away with their Wealth as they could, not by the Common Roads, but by-ways to ſeveral Quarters. Some towards Philippopolis and ſo to Serdica, and others towards Macedonia, thinking about thoſe parts to find out Valens, of whoſe Death they had not received the leaſt intimation. In the mean time the Goths with the Hunns and Alans their Confederates, two ſtout and Warlike Nations, which Fritigern by great promiſes of Booty had cunningly drawn into their Party, encamped themſelves before Perinthus, yet ſmarting with what they had felt before Adrianople, they dreaded ſo much as to approach the City; but waſted that fertile Country far and wide, the Inhabitants whereof they either took or killed. This done, they paſſed on towards Conſtantinople in four ſquare Bodies, for fear of being ſurprized, hoping to be Maſters of the great wealth they knew to be in that City. But ſo Providence ordered it, that when now they began to preſs toward the Gates, a Party of Saracens lately ſent for thither (as that People was more dextrous in ſudden Attacques, than in ſet and pitcht Battels) fell out on a ſudden upon them, and after an Earneſt Diſpute came off on equal Termes, though by a ſtrange Fact committed by one of their Number, they ſeemed to have the better of it. A man with long hair hanging about him and all naked, but his Privy parts, with an hideous noiſe, and a Dagger in his Hand, ran into the midſt of the Goths, killed one of them, and ſetting his Mouth to the Wound, ſucked his Blood; with which ſo Prodigious a Spectacle the Barbarians were quite daunted and in a far different humour than formerly, began to conſider the State they were in, and marched very warily. For, perceiving the great Compaſs of the Walls, (by reaſon of ſo many Iſlands taken in) the ſtrength of that beautiful Place, and the vaſt Number of its Inhabitants, they razed the Fortifications they had made upon the Streight, and having loſt more Men than they had killed, they departed through the Northern Parts as far as the Foot of the Alpes then called Juliæ, but to Antiquity known by the Name of Venetæ.

Julius in the Eaſtern Parts out of fear of their joyning with them puts their Country men to the Sword.

Ammianus Marcellinus concludes his Hiſtory.

34. Yet by this their bold Attempt, they brought more miſchief upon others their Country men, than upon themſelves. For when it was noiſed up and down how miſerably Thrace had ſuffered by them; the Eaſtern Provinces began to quake and tremble, as expecting the Storm would preſently be at their own Doors, which cauſed Julius, a Magiſter Militum, beyond the Mountain Taurus, to venture upon a ſafe and wholeſom, though ſharp and ſevere Courſe, to prevent ſo great a miſchief as might happen. There were multitudes of Goths diſperſed alſo through divers Cities and Caſtles of theſe Quarters, though headed by Roman Officers; a rare thing, Ammianus writes, in thoſe times. For fear they ſhoule riſe and ſide with their Countrymen if they came that way, he thought it ſafeſt by ſecret Letters to their Officers, to Order that they ſhould all be put to the Sword on one and the ſame day, when under colour of receiving their Pay, they were drawn out into the adjacent Fields; by which Prudent Council, Executed without either Noiſe or Delay, the Eaſtern Provinces were delivered from very great Dangers. So Ammianus Marcellinus ends his Hiſtory, which being a Soldier by Profeſſion, and a Greek by Deſcent, from the Principality of Nerva, he had, according to his Ability, he ſaith continued till the Death of Valens, a worke which ſhould pretend to tell Truth, as never to his knowledge, ſuppreſſing any thing by Silence, or inlarging Narration by any “ Lies. He ends it with Advice, to ſuch as flouriſhed with Learning, and whoſe “ Age rendred them more proper for it, to write what remained; and if they “ thought fit to undertake the Task, he deſires them to whet their Tongues, (ſo “ his Expreſſion is) to a greater Style.

His Birth and Breeding.

35. This is all at parting, he ſaith of himſelf; but ſenſible of the Aſſiſtance he affords us to the Hiſtory of the Age, whereof we write, we cannot, out of gratitude to his Memory, ſo take our Leave of him. He was born at Antioch, and, we have ground to believe, of Noble Parentage, ſerving the Emperour in his Youth, as Domeſtick Protector, to which Imployment few or none but the Sons of Duces and Comites were admitted; and we are told, that Conſtantius Chlorus and Jovian, who were afterward Emperours, as alſo Gaudentius the Father of Ætius took thence the Riſe of their Military Imployments

His Imployment.

ments and Preferment. It was the Ambition, as we have ſeen by the Laws, of all other Soldiers, even of the Veterane or Emerite to be advanced to the place of Protector, which Ammianus arrived at, even in his Youth. Now, whereas it was the Cuſtome for ſome of theſe Domeſtick Protectors, to Attend for the Security of the Princes Perſon, and others were ſent with the Magiſtri Militum into the Provinces; Marcellinus was by Conſtantius, as he writes himſelf, ordered to Attend Urſicinus, the Magiſter Equitum in the Eaſt, with whom he returned to Milan and followed him into Gall, to ſuppreſs the Tyranny of Silvanus which happened in the year CCCLV. And when Urſicinus was ſent back again into the Eaſt, our Hiſtorian did not forſake him; where, in what Battels he was preſent, at what Seiges, what Dangers he incurred, and how otherwiſe imployed; He himſelf Relates, and we from him have already ſhown. After the Death of Conſtantius, he went in the Expedition of Julian, againſt the Perſians, and therefore being an Eye-witneſs of what paſſed, we have much more reaſon to follow him in our Narration of that War, than Zoſimus, or any other. During the Reigns of Valentinian and Valens, what Courſe of Life he followed, cannot well be told; but when the Empire was devolved upon Gratian, Valentinian the ſecond, and Theodoſius, he left the Eaſt, and went to Rome; whether or no called by the Emperour, is uncertain. However, he made no Advantage of the Place, for indulging a Luxurious or Idle Life, as moſt Perſons did, that there choſe to Sojourn; but applied himſelf to Study, and the Converſation of moſt knowing Perſons; as ſufficiently is known from the one and thirty Books of Hiſtory which he wrote.

Vide Valeſium in Præſ. ad lectorem Ammiani Hiſtor. Præmiſſa.

He writes his Hiſtory at Rome.

36. That he wrote this Hiſtory at Rome appears from ſeveral Evidences; as from his ſevere Invectives he makes againſt the Behaviour of the Citizens; of which he takes notice, and not that of other places, however vitious enough. He refuſeth to ſet forth the Calamities of that City, leſt what happened to Phrynichus ſhould fall to his Lot, who taking for the Plot of a Tragedy, the Siege and loſs of Miletus, which was a Colony of the Athenians, was by Decree of the People of Athens heavily Cenſur'd. But to evince his living at Rome, Valeſius who has made very learned Annotations upon him, produces a Letter out of the French Kings Library; written to him thither by Libanius (that eminent Sophiſt of this Age) which becauſe it contains matter tending to the Renoun of our Author, he thought fit to exemplify, and we cannot but take notice of what's therein contained. “He begins with congratulating with him that he was at Rome, and with Rome, that ſhe was poſſeſſed of him; him, for that he dwelt in that City, the like to which the world could not ſhew, and her, becauſe ſhe had him, ſuch an Inhabitant as was nothing inferiour to her own Citizens, however deſcended from no leſs than Heroes. He tells him it would be very much, if he, there hearing others recite their works, as the Cuſtome was, ſhould in ſo great a City himſelf keep Silence; for as much as, Rome, even at that time, had alſo her Orators, who not at all degenerated from their Fore-fathers. But, he ſaith he had heard from ſuch as came from Rome, that He alſo had publiſhed, or recited ſome of his Hiſtory, which was divided into ſeveral Parts; and he perceived that the Applauſe he had got by that, invited him to the publication of the reſt. Moreover, that Rome it ſelf Crowned his Labours, and the Judgment of the whole City was, that as He excelled ſome, ſo he was not out-done by others. He adds, that things of this Nature, did not only grace a Writer of Hiſtories, but gave Repute alſo to the Country that brought him forth. And he bids him proceed, to recite what was behinde, and receive that Admiration and Applauſe which he deſerved, and not be wanting to what redounded to the Commendation both of himſelf, and of Libanius, and others of the ſame Original with him. At laſt, with Wiſhes for the continuance of his good Fortune, he bewailes his own miſhap in looſing his only ſon, no ill Childe of a good Mother; although ſhe was not of free Condition.

Libanius his Letter to him.

37. This notable Letter of Libanius, not only proves Ammianus to have lived at Rome, but alſo, that by Birth he was an Antiochian, to which City, how kind he was, ſufficiently appears, in his defending the Inhabitants from the Invectives even of his Beloved Julian, and the Crimes faſtened upon them, in his Miſopogon. His Hiſtory we ſee by Libanus, was publiſhed in Parts; and, indeed, the twenty ſeventh Book not till after the Death of Gratian, and the Deſtruction of Maximus the Tyrant; and he mentions Neotherius the Conſul, who bore not not this Office till the Year CCCXC. But in his two and twentieth, he ſpeaks of Serapis his Image as yet ſtanding, which was, by an Edict of Theodoſius, demoliſhed in the year following Neotherius his Conſulſhip. Of the worth and Uſe of his Hiſtory, too much cannot be ſpoken. For the Matter thereof, both as to the Argument, Choice and Diſpoſition, and his Judgment and Fidelity therein, it yields to none whatſoever. His words (however) are moſt of them Latin, but the Phraſe is Greek; and it muſt not be denied, but it is harſh, and his Style affected, not ſuitable to that of an Hiſtory, which ſhould ever be gentle, plain, and ſimple. But moſt to blame, is his Affectation of a fame of Learning, a Vice as Valeſius well obſerves, incident to thoſe who betake themſelves late to Study; which makes him break out of the Path of his Narrations, into idle vain and needleſs Excurſions, about the Cauſes of Earthquakes, Comets and the like, ſo as to nauſeate the Palate of any one, but meanly skilled in the Delivery of Truth. However, the Faults of his work, are far overmatched by the great Virtues thereof; which commend him, not only to thoſe who deſire to know the Civil, but even the Eccleſiaſtical Affairs of the time wherein he lived and wrote. For though by Religion, he was a Pagan, with ſuch Candor, Modeſty and Fidelity, he ſpeaks of matters relating to Chriſtianity, that were it not moſt evident from many paſſages, that ſuch he was, one might take him for a Man of our own Belief. The Antiquities of the Franks, Burgundians, Alamans and other Nations, he alone in a manner hath delivered; and if his thirteen former Books had been preſerved, though they handled matters much more Conciſely, (as therein delivering the Hiſtory of near thirty Emperours) yet they had afforded us much more light to the knowledge of thoſe dark times. And as thoſe thirteen are loſt, the eighteen remaining, though they eſcaped the Shipwrack, yet underwent ſo great damage, became ſo ſhatter'd and imperfect, that they deterred many from peruſing of them, not only through the Imperfection of the Copies, but the fault of the Publiſher, till they fell into the hands of Lindenbrogius, and afterward of Valeſius; by whoſe learned Amendments and Annotations, they have been well reſtored to their native Luſtre.

His Hiſtory was publiſhed in parts.

The Excellency of it.

38. With Ammianus, agreeth Socrates the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtorian, that the Emperour Valens being diſpatched out of the way in ſuch ſort, as no man was certain of, the Barbarians marched toward the Walls of Conſtantinople, and began to deſtroy the Suburbs thereof. That the People, moved thereat, went out on their own Accord to withſtand the Enemy, and every one took what Weapon came firſt to hand. Dominica the Empreſs, now Widdow of Valens, gave Rewards to every one that went forth to Battel, out of the publick Treaſury, according to the cuſtome of paying the Soldiers; Mavia alſo, the Queen of the Saracens, being in League with the Empire, ſent a Party of her Subjects to Aid them, whereupon, the People gave them Battel, and drove back the Barbarians from the City. But Gratian receiving word of his Uncles death, and of ſuch things as followed thereupon, as well as the occaſion thereof, (and the power and practices of the Goths, who dayly committed ſome outragious Act againſt the Roman Intereſt, and by their Example, drew on the Hunns, Alans, and other Barbarous Nations into the Quarrel) marched into Pannonia, with as ſtrong an Army as he could raiſe, to give ſome check to their preſumptuous boldneſs. But for that He alone could not be ſufficient to grapple with ſo great difficulties and Neceſſities as at preſent the Empire ſtruggled with, he began to conſider of whom he ſhould make Choice to be Sharer with him in the Care and Burthen, as well as in the Power and Dignity of the Throne.

Lib. 5.

The Narration of Socrates the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtorian Concerning the Siege of Conſtantinople.

39. Gratian indeed, having received the Newes of his Uncles Defeat and Death, from Victor the Magiſter Equitum, who with a few more had eſcaped out of the Battel, went preſently to Sirmium, there to Conſult what Courſe to take to preſerve the Weſtern Provinces. Before well he could have the Report, five or ſix days after his Uncles Death, he ſent an Edict to Vindicianus a Comes Archiatrorum, and a Vicar in ſome Dioceſs of Gall (for it was the Fortune ſometimes of theſe Principal Phyſitians to be intruſted with Governments and riſe to high Dignities) whereby he ſignifies, that He had repealed by “ his Letters directed to the Præfects of theſe Diſtricts of Gall and Italy, a former “ Conſtitution which gave leave to Aurileguli or thoſe that ſought for Gold-Oare, “ to paſs as many as pleaſed into Sardinia. It ſeems there was ſome particular “ Reaſon relating to that Iſland, which occaſioned this Iudulgence, poſſibly ſome

Zoſimus lib. 4. p. 751.

l. 9. de Metallis Cod. Th. Dnt. 18. Cal. Sept. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt. quia localis & temporaria ſome new Mine diſcovered, and thereupon greater encouragement given than uſual. But probable it is allſo, that this Permiſſion was found inconvenient, and that by Reaſon thereof, the other Mines within the Prefectſhip of Gall were neglected; for ſuch there were there, and alſo moſt famous Gold-Mines in Spain, as all affirm that write of that Country; beſides what they ſay particularly of the River Tagus. In Gall this Metal was digged, as in the Mountain Cemmenus under the Pyrenæans, in the Country of the Tarbelli, and alſo in the Alpes, as Pliny and Strabo have delivered; however now, and in theſe latter Ages, Europe hath neglected what ſhe hath of her own, and cared only for what hath been far ſought, if not dear bought, out of the Indies. At the latter end of this ſame year Gratian alſo thought fit to decide a Controverſie betwixt the Præfect of Rome, and the Conſularis or ordinary Governor of Campania. That part of the Country called Latium, and lying near to Rome, properly belonged to the Government of the Præfect; but either for that he could not be at leiſure when need required, or for other Reaſons, it had been united to Campania, yet ſo, as to own, and acknowledge ſtill the Authority of the Præfect, who, as he received Appeals out of Campania, ſo in things of greater Conſequence, was to hear and to determine matters belonging to Latium in the firſt Inſtance. But the Conſularis exceeded his Bounds, and ſo far uſurped upon the Right of the Præfect of the City, within whoſe Dioceſs Latium lay, that by an Edict directed to Antonius, Præfectus Prætorio now of Italy, the Emperour thought fit to declare, that the Conſulares of Campania, ought not to exceed that Power "which was given them in a Place "under certain Rules and Reſtrictions; neither Baniſh any Perſons out of their "own Province. By virtue hereof, theſe Conſulares could neither Baniſh into, nor out of Latium, the general Rule being, that no Governour of a Province could relegate or Baniſh any one into any place that was not fully in his own Juriſdiction, nor any perſon any whither, but who was fully ſubject to his own Authority.

Vide Gothofr. in l.

Gratian decides a Controverſy betwixt the Præfect of Rome and the Conſularis of Campania.

L. 12. de Pœnis Cod. Th. lib. 9. tit. 40. Dat. pridie Cal. Decemb. Trev. Abeſt à Cod Juſt. ut hiſtorica & temporaria.

40. Gratian being come to Sirmium, gathered together all the Force he could make, and therewith having paſſed through Pannonia, viſited Myſia and Thrace, as far as Conſtantinople, where he took Care for the quiet of the Eaſt, and the Limit of the Danube. But now ſtanding in need of a good Commander, there had been ſo many loſt in the late War againſt the Goths, he pitcht upon Theodoſius, the Son of that Theodoſius, by Thermantia, who Commanded as General, with ſo great Succeſs both in Africk and here in Britain, a Perſon who for his skill in War, might well be taken for the Son of ſuch a Father, and whoſe Dexterity in matters Civil, and relating to Peace, was no whit Inferiour to the other; for he had already given ſufficient Teſtimonies of his Ability, though for the preſent, by reaſon of a Faction in Spain his own Country, he ſeemed to be laid aſide, or rather underwent a voluntary Retirement. Having ſent for Theodoſius from Spain, when the time now for deſigning Conſuls for the following year was come, out of generous Gratitude to his Tutor, or Shoolmaſter Auſonius of Burdegala, or Bourdeaux, an Eminent Poet of this Age, he declared him Conſul with Olybrius, and gave him notice of it by this Letter,

He pitches upon Theodoſius for his General.

Out of Gratitude to his Tutor Auſonius, he declares him Conſul with Olybrius.

When I conſidered with my ſelf alone, whom I ſhould name Conſuls for the enſuing year; as you know my manner is, as is my Duty, and I am certain your deſire, I asked Counſel, (or referred it unto) God, in Obedience to whoſe Authority I have deſigned and declared you Conſul in the firſt place, and have ſent you the Robe (Trabea Palmata) which Divus Conſtantius our Father himſelf wore. I have paid what I ought, and I yet ſtill owe what I have paid.

Vide Auſonii Orationem Panegyricam.

When Theodoſius was arrived, he ordered him to command in the Eaſtern parts, and, ſome there have been who wrote, that after he had received his Command, he Ingaged againſt the Barbarians, and got a notable Victory over them, which if true, it had not been forgotten by thoſe more antient Writers who have endeavoured to ſet off with Luſtre the Life and Performances of this Perſon. But for certain it is, that Gratian finding the Emperour oppreſſed with manifold Dangers and Inconveniences even near to miſcarriage, by reaſon eſpecially of the Barbarous, Nations their pouring themſelves into the Provinces; conſidering that he himſelf had enough to do in Gall with the Germans, being but twenty years old; and his Brother Valentinian not above thirteen, and there-therefore unable to manage any publick Buſineſs; he cloſed with the Advice of thoſe who perſwaded him to take Theodoſius in as a Partner in the ſupream Power. For this purpoſe being now at Sirmium, he called the Nobility together, and directing his Speech to him in particular, told him he was reſolved to commit the Eaſt to his Charge. He gave him thanks for the great Honour he intended him, but by words, endeavoured what he might to decline the burthen, which he declared too great for him to undergo. However, Gratian would not contend with him in Modeſty, but whatever the other might do, ſpake what he thought, and required him to take Patience and accept of it. So was Theodoſius advanced to Share in the higheſt Dignity and Power upon Earth, on the ſixteenth day of January, being thirty three years old, A. D. CCCLXXIX, in the Conſulſhip of the lately mentioned Auſonius and Olybrius.

A.D. 378.

Makes Theodoſius Emperor.

41. Gratian having taken this good Order for the Settlement and Security of the Eaſt, and had Intelligence that the Allemans had again paſſed their Bounds, and fallen into Gall, left Theodoſius at Sirmium, and returned with ſpeed into that Country. For ſtill did he keep to himſelf, in the threefold Diviſion that was now made of the Empire, Gall, Spain, and Britain. To his Brother Valentinian fell Italy, Illyricum and Affrick, and to the Share of the New Emperour, The Eaſt with Thrace; but not Illyricum as Sozomen miſtaketh. Before he quitted Sirmium he took notice of the Differences which were wont to ariſe betwixt the Palatines, or Officers belonging to the Comites of the Conſiſtory, who were often ſent into the Provinces upon Errands relating to the publick Revenue and other matters of great Concernement, and the Governors of Provinces themſelves. “He declares that doing their Duties in ſuch manner “ they were not to be diſcouraged by the Ordinary Judges or Governours, who “ were often very ſevere to them, as thoſe they found to be Spies upon their “ Actions, and on the other ſide, not ſtanding now in any fear of them, he “ yet requires, that if they have any occaſion to deal with them, they ſhall “ pay them all the uſual Reſpect and Reverence. Hypatius was at this time Præfect of the City of Rome, of whom Ammianus Marcellinus gives this Character, That he was a meek and milde Perſon and given to Quiet, and he ſeems to have been ſo milde, that Gratian by an Edict directed to him, rebukes him for it, with a Penalty to be inflicted for the future. Againſt any Sentence whereby the opening of a Teſtament was enjoyned, or for putting the Heir into Poſſeſſion of the Eſtate of the Decaſed, there ought by Law to lye no Appeal, becauſe thoſe things admitted of no Delay. To this purpoſe Adrian the Emperour made a Law, that whoſoever was found an Heir by Teſtament, ſhould within a year after the opening of it, be put into poſſeſſion, and that upon occaſion of the twentieth part of Inheritances; leſt there ſhould be any Delay in the Payment of that Impoſition. Now it appears, there was ſome Default in Judges, in admitting Appeals in thoſe Caſes, which meek and good natured Perſons were more apt to do than others; to prevent this miſcarriage “ for the time to come, he impoſeth a Muct of twenty pounds of Gold both “ upon the Party that ſhould make ſuch Appeal, and upon the Judge who “ ſhould admit it. By virtue of Adrian's Edict the Heir needed not to ſue for his Eſtate according to the Teſtament, which if he did, he loſt the Benefit of the Edict; but Juſtinian afterward repealed the Edict, and gave Liberty to the Heir to obtain poſſeſſion, though the year were out; againſt whom he would not have Preſcription, though of a long time, to take place.

Vide Chron. Theod. ad Ann. 379.

L. I. de Palatinis S. L. & R. P. Cod. Th. lib. 6. tit. 30. Dat. 6. Cal. Mart. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

Composeth the difference betwixt Palatines and Governors of Provinces.

Forbids Appeals againſt the opening of Teſtaments.

L. 26. Quorum Appellat. non recipiuntur. Cod. Th. & L. 6. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

42. By the Date of this Law it appears, the Emperour was back at Triers before the middle of Auguſt; where being arrived, Auſonius in many words returned him thanks for making him Ordinary Conſul, by an Oration, which, in many reſpects, Sigonius thinks fit to be peruſed. But in his way back to Gall, he paſſed through Venetia and Liguria; for, in the Month of July, and beginning of Auguſt we finde him at Aquileia, a City of the one, and at Mediolanum, or Milan, the now beginning to be the moſt frequented of all Places belonging to the other. Being come to Aquileia, he found that the Tirones, or New-rais'd Soldiers, abſented themſelves, and ſought to Deſert the Service, and that thoſe they called Actores, or Managers of Lands in the Country, were wont to harbour and Conceal them ſo offending. This by a Law made at this place “ and directed to Heſperius the Præfect of Italy, he prohibits upon pain to the Concealer “ of being burnt alive, which Puniſhment was ſometimes inflicted upon the “ Deſertors themſelves (ſo the Law terms them) as appears from Ammianus. And for Publiſhes a ſevere Edict againſt the Harbrouers of new Soldiers that fled from their Colours.

L. 2. de Deſertoribus & occultatoribus eorum Cod. Th. lib. 7. tit. 18. Dat. 6. Non. Jul. Aquileia.

for the time to come, he threatens the Lords of the Grounds ſhall undergo the ſame, if theſe their Officers continue ſtill to offend in the ſame ſort. But as theſe Souldiers endeavoured to withdraw themſelves from ſerving the publick with their bodies; ſo at the ſame time there were others who would gladly have been excuſed from contributing with their Purſes to the finding of Horſes. Theſe were the Navicularii, of whom we have often ſpoken, and particularly of the great height to which they were riſen through the Indulgence of ſome late Princes, ſo as they were not only made partakers of the Equeſtrian dignity by Conſtantius and Julian, but ſome Senators would joyn themſelves to their Body, and now there were ſome found amongſt them who obtained from the Emperors honorary Codicils or Letters, whereby the greater Codicillary Dignities were conferred on them. Now ſuch as obtained theſe Titular Honours were wont to be ſubject to extraordinary charges, as of Souldiers, and Horſes for the Wars; though ſome of them, as thoſe that had diſcharged Imployments in the Prince his Palace, were priviledged from them; and to theſe charges ſtill Grati- “ an reſolves that the Navicularii ſhall be ſubject, for all their obtaining the “ Codicillary or Titular Dignities.

L. 15. de Nomiculariis Cod. Th. Accept. 12. Cal. Aug. Conſtantinæ Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

Abates the rigour of the Paternal Power.

43. About the ſame time Gratian thought fit to abate the rigour of the Paternal Power, which had been already attempted, ſince the Sovereign Authority was become Chriſtian. This Power at firſt was ſo extravagant as to extend to life over Children, which though the Law at length thought fit to leſſen, even as to the Perſons of thoſe not Emancipated, yet as to their eſtates, except what they got by ſerving their Country, all was wholly in the power and propriety of their Fathers. Conſtantine, the great, thinking it very unjuſt that obedient Children ſhould be ſo ſeverely dealt with, took order that their Mothers Eſtates ſhould be ſo aſcertained to them, that it ſhould not be in the power of their Fathers to alienate them, who ſhould have only the Uſusfructus during the time of their continuing under their Paternal Authority. But, as Laws are wont to gather force by degrees, ſo the Law in this point got ground, together with the Chriſtian Diſcipline, which mollified the Rigour of the former Cuſtoms. Conſtantius confirmed what his Father had done, as to the Mothers Goods, and afterwards added certain Caſes, wherein the Eſtates of Grandfathers by the Mothers ſide, being left to the Children, ſhould not be acquired either by the Father, or his Heirs. But now Gratian by an Edict directed to Heſperius, made what was but to be obſerved in certain Caſes to hold good purely and ſimply, enacting “That not only the Goods of Mothers, but of Mothers Fathers, and Mothers Mothers ſhould be out of the Power of Fathers “ as to alienation, and that they ſhould only have the Uſusfructus of them; But “ as for Eſtates coming from Strangers, and from Relations in a tranſverſe Line, he “ left them, as formerly, to be acquired by Fathers. After this, Valentinian carried the matter on farther, forbidding Eſtates got by marriage to be acquired by the Father, and that by an Argument drawn from the Grandfather and Grandmother lately mentioned; as the caſes of theſe are by this Law derived from the Example of the Mothers Goods. At length Juſtinian, by Example drawn from all theſe Rules, extended the Law to all ſorts of Caſual or Adventitious Eſtates, and there it ſtood at the higheſt pitch of Indulgence. But Gratian, as we ſaid, having paſſed through Venetia and Liguria; made a Progreſs alſo through the ancient Gall, through Rhætia; and viſited thoſe that inhabited near the Rhine, the Sequani, and Germania Prima; by his Appearance in thoſe Parts he reſtrained the motions of the Suevi and Alamans; and leaving theſe Countrys in a ſettled Eſtate returned to Triers, where for ſome time we muſt leave him, and attend the Motions and Actions of our New Emperor.

L. 6. de maternis bonis. Dat. prid. Cal. Aug. Acc. 4. Kal. Sept. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

Theodoſius at Theſſalonica.

44. Theodoſius, after the departure of Gratian for Gall, removed to Theſſalonica in Macedonia. Here we find him on the ſixteenth of June, by the date of a certain Conſtitution directed to Pancratius his Comes Rei Privatæ, of which we muſt ſpeak upon another occaſion. Zoſimus tells us, that he ſhowed himſelf eaſie of Acceſs at this place, and that ſuch as came to him upon buſineſs from all quarters returned with ſuch Anſwers to their demands, whether reſpecting the publick or their own private concernments, as were fit and convenient. But at this time vaſt numbers of the Tranſiſtrian Nations, viz. Scythians, Goths, Taifali and others having paſſed the River, and being become troubleſome to the Provinces, he made all preparations to drive them out. All Thrace they had over-run, and ſuch Garriſons as were there beſtowed in Caſtles up and down dared not ſo much as peep forth; much leſs to come to any Ingagement in the open field. There was now one Modares, a man of Royal Blood amongſt the Scythians, who not long ſince had come over to the Roman Party, and having performed ſome faithful ſervices was preferred to a Command in the Army. He having led his men up to an Hill, whence he had a fair Proſpect of the adjoyning Country, by his Scouts diſcovered that the Barbarians abuſed the advantage which the fruitful Plain afforded, and were moſt of them overcome already with Wine; whereupon he gave order to his Troops, to leave behind their heavy Armour, and only with their Swords and Targets to ſurpriſe theſe diſſolute men; which they did, and eaſily put them all to the Sword, many of them never being ſenſible who it was that hurt them. Having plundred their Camp, they found and took four thouſand Waggons full of Women and Children, beſides Slaves anſwerable to ſuch a Company, and ſuch as followed on foot, being to ride when their turns came; for, they had not Carriages enough to take them all in at one time.

L. 12. de Jure Fiſci. Cod. Th.

Quo priùs, p. 751.

Modares cuts off a Party of Barbarians.

A ſtory of Zoſimus concerning Julius his putting the Sons of the Barbarians to the Sword.

45. In this manner Zoſimus writes that Thrace was preſerved from imminent ruine; when at the ſame time he adds, that the Eaſt was manifeſtly near to deſtruction upon this occaſion. When Valens received the Goths into Thrace, he did it with this caution, that for their Fidelity he would have ſuch of their Children as were under Puberty to be delivered up as Hoſtages, and thoſe he ſent to be educated in the Eaſt, under the Care and Inſpection of one Julius, whom he knew to be ſufficiently able, both for their ſafe Cuſtody and Education. Julius ſo diſperſed them through the Towns of theſe Tracts, that they might have as little advantage as might be to meet and conſpire againſt the Empire; but the news of the Defeat of their Countrymen in Thrace could not be concealed; and ſo diſturbed them, that as many as were in one Town, laid their Heads together, and privily ſent to thoſe that dwelt in other places, to let them know that they deſigned to fall upon the Roman Cities, and revenge the death of their Parents and Friends, being now arrived at ripeneſs of years. Julius, how private ſoever they were, diſcovered the Plot; and not knowing well how to prevent the ſuddaineſs of the blow, yet ſent not to Theodoſius to acquaint him with it, partly becauſe he was at a diſtance in Macedonia, and partly for that the charge had been committed to him by Valens, and not by the new Emperor, unto whom alſo he was ſcarcely known. He wrote ſecret Letters to the Senate at Conſtantinople, and from it received Power to act what he ſhould think fit and convenient for the State; which obtained, he ſent for all the Officers of the Army, and having taken an Oath of ſecrecy, imparted to them his reſolution. Hereupon, they being ſufficiently inſtructed, cauſed it to be given out throughout all places where the Barbarians lived, that the Emperor was reſolved to be very liberal to them, not only by giving them money, but Lands alſo, therewith to deſerve their friendſhip and adherance to the Intereſt of the Roman Empire. For this purpoſe they were admoniſhed to aſſemble together at a day appointed, within the Metropolis where they lived, and not fearing any thing gladly expected the Day, remitting now much of their Anger and Zeal for avenging the death of their Parents; and when the time came, they all appeared. Then did the Souldiers who were brought together for this purpoſe, ſeize on the Houſes round about the Forum, where they ſtood, and what with Stones, Darts and other Weapons deſtroyed them all, and thereby delivered the Eaſtern Cities from imminent danger.

46. This is the account Zoſimus gives us of the Succeſs againſt the Barbarians, both in Thrace and the Eaſtern Provinces. Herein he takes no notice of the Perſon of Theodoſius, but makes all to have been performed by the Officers; one of which, Julius by Name, he ſays, refuſed to ſend to him, but deſired a Commiſſion from the Senate of Conſtantinople; a probable matter, that an Emperor already ſo declared, and in poſſeſſion, ſhould be ſo ſlighted; but indeed this Writer deals as fairly with him, as with other Chriſtian Emperors. According to his cuſtom he tells all his ſtories in a way, and with circumſtances far different from the general concurrence of other Hiſtorians, and particularly of Ammianus Marcellinus, who lived in theſe times, and had great reaſon to know the true ſtate of Affairs; and this amongſt the reſt, which he relates at the end of his work, as done before the preferment of Theodoſius. Indeed theſe actions performed againſt the Barbarous Nations, after the time at which Ammianus left writing, are obſcure; both as to the time and manner thereof. For ſome will have Theodoſius to have performed great things againſt them, while yet but General, and before he had the Purple given him; him; and other Authors ſay, that the Alans, Hunns, Goths and Scythians were this year overthrown and defeated in many Ingagements; but how the War was carried on they do not add. Some ſay the Goths upon giving up of Hoſtages were received into friendſhip, and others, that after being ſufficiently beaten, they begged peace in an humble manner, and that thereupon he received them to mercy, and not only ſo, but made them his Aſſociates in War, free of the Empire, beſtowed Honours upon them, and gave them Lands to inhabit. But if we may believe Claudian the Poet, He was the man that prevented the deſtruction of the Provinces by Fire and Sword, reſtored the Grounds to the former Proprietors, ſnatched the Cities out of the Jaws of Death: that if he had not been, no ſhadow of the Roman Name had been left in theſe quarters: aud that this was done when Rhodope groand with the weight of Barbarians that ruſhed in upon it; when the North now was become deſert, having poured out all its People upon the Roman Empire; when the Banks of the Danube vomited forth Battels; and when Myſia and other Parts were covered with the ſwarms of the Gothick Troops and Waggons.

Various Reports concerning the Actions performed againſt the Barbarians.

Vide Sigonium ubi ſupra. p. 184.

Nam cum Barbaries penitus commota gementem Irrueret Rhodopen, &c.
De 4. Conſolatu Honorii in princ.

47. That theſe are Poetical expreſſions, and directed to hisS on we muſt not deny, and yet we are afraid that Zoſimus has more offended on the other Hand. To his former Relation he adds, that Theodoſius, lying ſtill at Theſſalonica, did indeed ſeem eaſie of acceſs to ſuch as made their addreſſes to him: but beginning his Reign with Luxury and negligence of publick Affairs, made a diſturbance in Offices, and ordained more Commanders in the Armies than formerly there had been. For whereas there were anciently but one Magiſter Equitum, and alſo one Magiſter Peditum, he made more than five; and thereby burthened the Revenue, each of the five having now as much allowance as formerly was given to one of the two. Hereby he alſo expoſed the Souldiers to the Avarice of many Officers, every one of whom made it his buſineſs, as much as either of the two formerly, to inrich himſelf out of the Souldiers Pay. But not herewith content he made alſo ſo many inferior Officers, as Tribunes and the like, that he left double the Number of thoſe he found, and by this means the Souldiers got nothing of what was allowed them out of the Treaſury. And ſo matters went, ſaith he, by reaſon of the enormous Negligence and Avarice of the Emperor. But farther, he firſt cauſed ſo great expence to be made for his Table, that for preparation of ſuch variety of coſtly Diſhes, multitudes of Cooks, Cup-bearers, and other Officers were ordained, and not to be mentioned but in a long Diſcourſe. Neither is there any need of telling what abundance of Eunuchs he had to ſerve him, moſt of whom, eſpecially ſuch as were handſomeſt, made ſuch Magiſtrates as they pleaſed, having all the Power of the Empire in their Hands, and being able to perſwade the Emperor to whatſoever they thought fit; ſeeing the cauſes of the Ruine which followed thereupon muſt be declared. For, being profuſe to undeſerving Perſons, and therefore as neceſſarily he muſt, wanting much money, he ſold the government of Provinces to thoſe that came next, without any diſtinction of worth or honeſty, but judging him the fitteſt man who brought along with him moſt money; inſomuch as one might ſee Bankers, and thoſe that dealt in Coin, and others of baſe profeſſions wearing the Enſigns of Magiſtracy, and delivering the Provinces in Sale to thoſe that were able to give moſt.

Zoſimus his complaints againſt *Theodoſius.

τοῖς μὲν ἐντυγχάνουσιν ἐδόκει πῶς εὐπρόσιτος εἶναι, τρυφὴν δὲ καὶ ἐκμέλειαν, &c. p. 754, 755.

48. This alteration being ſuch at the beginning, grew ſtill worſe and worſe, and thereby came it to paſs that the Forces of the Empire were diminiſhed in a little time, and money failed the Cities thereof, which were exhauſted, partly by exceſſive Taxes, and partly by Avarice of the Magiſtrates; for, ſuch as would not comply with their inſatiable deſires they ruined by Calumnies, as good as ſaying that they muſt get up the money that they had payed for their Places. Hence came it to paſs that Inhabitants through their oppreſſion, and otherwiſe, undone, led miſerable lives, and prayed to God to be freed from ſo great Calamities; for as yet they were ſuffered to frequent their Pagan Temples, and appeaſe the Deities, after the Rites and Cuſtoms of their Fathers. But Theodoſius, having by theſe courſes diminiſhed his Forces, gave leave to the Barbarians that lived beyond Iſter to come over to him, promiſing with theſe Fugitives to fill up his Troops, which Offer they accepted, and were accordingly received into the Army, with hope that if their Number increaſed they ſhould be able to attack the Roman State, and reduce all under their own obedience. The Emperor perceiving now how things ſtood, and that the number of theſe Fugitives exceeded that of his own men, and conſidering what was the beſt way to prevent them in caſe they ſhould attempt any thing contrary to what they had ingaged, he thought it beſt to mix part of them with the Army that was in Egypt, and ſend for ſome Forces out of the Legions of that Dioceſs. According to the Emperors Orders they marched; and in their way, the Romans behaved themſelves very civily, paying honeſtly for what they called; but the Barbarians quite contrary, offering violence to thoſe that ſold Proviſions. At Philadelphia, a place of Lydia, they met, where the Egyptians, inferior in number to the Barbarians, obeyed the orders of their Officers, but the others preſuming in their own ſtrength took much upon them. One of them being demanded money in the Market for what he pretended to buy, drew his Sword and cut the Seller and his Neighbour that came in to aſſiſt him; upon which accident the Egyptians gently admoniſhed the Barbarians to abſtain from ſuch unjuſt oppreſſions, which did not at all become Perſons that pretented to live after the Roman Laws. But they being too good to be adviſed aſſerted, what their fellow had done, by drawing their Swords at the Reprovers, who not able to contain their indignation, fell in with them, and killed of them above two hundred men. Having thus chaſtiſed them that remained, and perſwaded them to carry themſelves more civily toward ſuch as would take no Affront at their Hands, they proceeded in their March, and the Barbarians kept on their way to Egypt, under conduct of Hormiſda the Perſian, ſon of that Hormiſda who ſerved under Julian in his War againſt that Nation.

49. The Egyptians being come into Macedonia and taken in amongſt the Legions there, no order at all appeared in the Camp; no diſtinction betwixt Roman and Barbarian; but all went promiſcuouſly together, without any certainty in the Muſter-Rolls. And as for the Fugitives it was permitted them, though liſted in the Army, to return home, and to ſend others to ſerve in their rooms, and yet when the fit took them, to return again to their Colours. But this liberty they injoyed not without ſuch effects as any one in prudence might juſtly foretell. For they held intelligence with their Countrymen, and letting them underſtand how negligently all things were managed on the Roman part, they reſolved to make Uſe of that opportunity which the great confuſion in the Army did afford them. Having without difficulty paſſed the River, (for none there was to oppoſe them, and thoſe that pretended to have forſaken them, rather farthered their deſign) they entred Macedonia, whither the Emperor came with all his forces. At Midnight they perceived a great Fire to be kindled, which they concluded to be for the Uſe of Theodoſius and his Followers; and therein being confirmed by the relation they received from Fugitives, they haſted ſtrait to his Pavilion, taking their direction from the Fire. Now did moſt of the Fugitives joyn themſelves to their Countrymen, and far more in number thus united they were, than the Romans and ſuch as ſtill remained with them. Yet did they find ſtout reſiſtance, which ſerved to this purpoſe, that the Emperor had time to ſhift for himſelf and get away; and though his men that he left behind, were all cut off, yet they fell not without an infinite number of Barbarians accompanying them to another world. Had the Northern men uſed the advantage given them, and purſued Theodoſius, as they might have done, they had eaſily taken him and all the reſt; but being rendred Maſters of Macedonia and Theſſaly by this Victory, they contented themſelves with it; neither Impoſed they any Tribute upon the Towns; but left them as free as they found them. The Emperor, after their departure into their own Country, fortified with Garriſons all the Caſtles and ſuch Towns as were walled; and then went to Conſtantinople, where he wrote to Gratian concerning what had hapned, and how ſome ſpeedy courſe was to be taken to prevent that ruine which impended. Having ſent away the Meſſengers, he then fell upon the Macedonian and Theſſalian Cities, which, as if they had received no damage from the late Incurſion, he burthened with the uſual Tributes, and ſo ſeverely exacted the payment, that in a manner he took away what the humanity of the Barbarians had left. For not only were they conſtrained to pay money; but even the Ornaments of their Women, and all their Clothes, ſo as our Writer had almoſt ſaid they had nothing left to cover their nakedneſs, and all this under the notion of Tribute; inſomuch that every Town and Village rung again with Cries and Lamentations of thoſe, who univerſally extolled the Barbarians, and called upon them for their help. Such was the eſtate of Theſſaly and Macedonia in theſe dayes.

50. However, our Emperor ſplendidly and as in triumph entred Conſtantinople, without any reſpect had to the publick Calamity; and being thither come, made

Sect. 3.

A.D. 379.

immoderate Uſe of the Delights and Pleaſures of that great City. On the other ſide Gratian was much diſturbed at the news he had received from him, and, with as much expedition as might be, ſent away conſiderable Forces under the Command of Baudo and Arbogaſtes, both Franks by Nation, great Friends to the Ramon Intereſt, free from Covetouſneſs and Bribery; and both very ſtout and expert Captains. They being come into Macedonia and Thrace, the Scythians who ſufficiently underſtood their Worth, and ſtill remained in theſe quarters, haſted away into Thrace, which formerly they had waſted, and doubting what further courſe they ſhould take, betook themſelves to a Trick (not much unlike to the former) whereby they cheated Theodoſius. They ſent to him certain Fugitives, of moſt baſe condition, to promiſe him Friendſhip and obedience in whatſoever he would require. And he very eaſily admitted, and gave them Credit, not at all inſtructed by his former Experience of their fidelity; and hereupon more followed, and he received them all. By the Sottiſhneſs of this Prince were matters again reduced under the Power of theſe Fugitives, which Sottiſhneſs he Increaſed by his voluptuous courſe of life. For whatever tended to the corruption of manners and humane converſation, received ſuch incouragement and increaſe during the Government of this Emperor, that all thoſe that imitated him in his way of living, ſeemed therein to place all that could make them happy in this World. Ridiculous Mimicks and peſtilent Dancers were now in requeſt, and if any thing could contribute toward obſcenity, and this wicked and diſſolute Muſick, it was practiſed both in and after his time; for to ſo great depravity of Manners was the Generality now inclined, that ſuch as came after, imitated thoſe that went before them in this ſort of madneſs. And beſides all this, the ſervice of the Gods was everted thoughout all Cities and Countries, inſomuch that all who believed there were Gods, were in danger, together with thoſe that looked intentively to Heaven, and worſhipped ſuch things as they there ſaw.

The Objections examined by conſidering what the Laws and other Authors ſpeak of his Actions.

51. The laſt thing related by Zoſimus we may eaſily grant to be true, and whether prejudice raiſed from this proceeding of Theodoſius did not exaſperate our Hiſtorian and thoſe of his Perſwaſion, we ſhall not now enquire; but to make a true judgement of this diſmal character he beſtows upon him, take in what the Laws and other Writers generally afford us of his Actions, which are the trueſt teſtimony that can be given to humane Life. By his Conſtitutions we find, that from Theſſalonica, whither we ſaid he removed after the departure of Gratian, he went to a place called Scopi, whence he directed another Edict to Pancratius, concerning the chuſing of the Principal of the Office of Comes Domorum per Cappadociam, commanding, "That it ſhould be every year out of the Palatine Officers, as of old it was wont, and not from amongſt the Agentes in Rebus. This Comes of the Emperors Houſes in Capadocia was once under the Command of the Comes Rei Privatæ, although, as we have already ſeen, in the time of Theodoſius the Younger, when his Breviary or Notitia of the Empire was made, he was ſubject to the Præpoſitus ſacri Cubiculi: But why Cappadocia ſhould have its peculiar Comes for Houſes and Lands there, appertaining to the Emperor, might well be conſidered. Juſtinian ſayes that the ground was ſo excellent, that it pleaſed exceedingly the foregoing Princes, who therefore beſtowed on it a Magiſtrate of its own, who was nothing inferiour to the Civil Magiſtrate, or Proconſul. But yet, how theſe Poſſeſſions came to the Emperors, and particularly why they ſo pleaſed them, he doth not expreſs. It's therefore thought, that when Conſtantine confiſcated the Revenues belonging to the Prieſts, and Pagan Temples (which made ſeveral Writers, as Libanius, Eunapius and others diſcontented and raile as well as Zoſimus) he appropriated to his own Uſe alſo thoſe that he found in that Province. And how large theſe Reveneus were in this very Country appears, from Strabo his deſcription but of one City and Temple, viz. the City of Comana, and the Temple of Bellona. Comana was a memorable City, in a Valley of that Mountain called Antitaurus, wherein was a great multitude of thoſe they accounted poſſeſſed Perſons, and ſuch as laboured in the buſineſs of Sacrifices. The Inhabitants, being of that ſort of Cappadocians called Cataonians, were otherwiſe ſubject to the King; but chiefly obedient to the Chief Prieſt, who was eſteemed as Lord both of the Temple and of thoſe which miniſtred therein, who when Strabo was at the place, exceeded in number ſix thouſand Perſons, reckoning both Women and Children. Beſides, there was much Land belonging to the Temple, of which the Prieſt received the Revenue; for amongſt that People, in Dignity he was next to the King, and moſt commonly of the ſame Family. We ſee then the Emperor, having ſecured ſecured theſe Revenues belonging to thoſe ſuperſtitious Uſes, might well have large poſſeſſions in Cappadocia, which alſo was a Country ſo good and fertile, that the Prince had a great Breed of excellent Horſes there.

L. 2. de Palatinis, S. L. & R. P. Cod. Th. vide Com.

Lib. 12. p. 535. Edit. Cauſab.

He makes an Edict about the Gold called Aurum Coronarium.

L. 4. de Auro Coronario. Cod. Th.

52. The next place we find Theodoſius at, is Vicus Auguſti, a Place of Dacia Ripenſis; for, thence he gave forth another Edict to the ſame Pancratius, which in the opinion of Lawyers ſhewed his Clemency and Moderation. It was concerning that Gold called Aurum Coronarium wont, as he expreſſes in this Conſtitution, to be given to Princes by the Curiales upon three ſeveral occaſionss. The firſt was out of their love and reſpect to the Perſons of the Emperors, as upon their firſt promotion, (ſo they preſented Julian) or when they were Adopted, (ſo Antoninus Pius) or when they hapned to come to their City, or when Meſſengers were ſent to them upon ſome Requeſts, or the like. But the ſecond occaſion mentioned in this Law is, that of Indulgence or Remiſſion of Tributes or Debts due to the Treaſury; ſuch as Gratian granted at this time, to which we might imagine his Law to have reference, had it not Teodoſius for its Author. The third and laſt was upon occaſion of Victory or good Succeſs, which was the moſt ancient and eſpecial occaſion; for it was given them in Crowns already made, or for the making of ſuch Triumphal Ornaments; and thence came it to paſs, that covetous Generals would catch at all opportunities to Triumph, in expectation of this Gold, which extorted a Law of old, that it ſhould not be given them except a Triumph had been deſired. “ Upon whatſoever of theſe occaſions it was given, he would have it received in whatſoever form it was brought, whether in “ Crowns or Images, (as ſometimes Images of Victory were preſented) and “ though it had not received the greateſt purification by fire; becauſe it ought to “ come, not from conſtraint, but a willing mind. Theſe were remarkable Laws made by Theodoſius in his firſt year relating to civil matters. Gratian, as we ſaid, being returned to Triers, amongſt other Edicts of ſmaller concernment, publiſhed another directed to Vindicianus, his Comes Archiatrorum, in behalf of the Phyſitians of his Houſhold, whereby he confirmed to them two Privileges or Immunities. “ The firſt was that of the Senatores Adlecti who enjoyed the Dignity and Prerogative of Senators; but were not ſubject to the Burthens “ belonging to that Order, as thoſe of Glebalis Collatio, and the Prætorſhip; and “ this Immunity he extends alſo to their Heirs; as on the contrary, if ſuch Senators “ as were obliged to be Prætors died before the exhibition of the publick “ Games, their Heirs were bound to be at the Expence. The ſecond Privilege was “ That if theſe Palatine Archiatri arrived at the Dignity of Comites, which uſually they did, that then they ſhould be excuſed from thoſe they called ſordid “ Offices, or Imployments, as were ſome others of the ſame Degree. This Vindicianus to whom the Edict is directed, is the ſame we ſpoke of before, who arrived at the Dignity of Vicar, having written a Book of Medicinal Obſervations for the Uſe of Valentinian and his Sons.

Gratian is Indulgent to Phyſitians.

L. 12. de Medicis & Profeſ. Cod. Th. Dat. 18. Kal. Octob.

Severe againſt Debtors to the Publick.

53. But though he was Indulgent to Phyſitians, he was ſevere enough to ſuch as were Debtors to the Publick, for the preſervation of his Revenue. Moſt miſerable in old time had been the condition of all that were in Debt, whom, as we learn from Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus and others, the Creditors had ſo much in their power, as to ſubject them to Drudgery, Impriſonment and Torture; which Cuſtom, though introduced by reaſon of the careleſneſs and knavery of ſome, who made no Conſcience of retaining or ſpending what belonged to other men, yet produced ſuch Acts of cruelty and oppreſſion that by the Julian Law a Ceſſion of Goods or Eſtates was introduced; ſo that thoſe who quitted all they had, were not to be Impriſoned nor Tortured for what it was not in their power to diſcharge. But this, on the other Hand, was in ſome ſpace of time found to give occaſion alſo to great Inconveniences; for thereof crafty and cheating Knaves made advantage to defraud honeſt men, by concealing part of what they had; and luxurious Spendthrifts, knowing they could come but to this at laſt, incouraged themſelves in their laviſhment and debaucheries. Now as to torturing of Debtors, Conſtantine the Great, and his Son Conſtantius did not approve of it. But Valentinian, as Ammianus tells us, adjudged ſuch to death as were not able to pay what they ought to the Treaſury. “ His Son Gratian now took a middle courſe, admitting the practice of Ceſſion ſtill; but only allowing it to ſuch Debtors “ as by Providence were reduced to Poverty; as by Robbery, Shipwrack, “ Fire, or ſome other Calamity, which they were to prove; otherwiſe all Diſſolute “ or Malicious Spendthirſts he will have ſtill by ſeverity of Puniſhment for- “

L. 1. Qui Bonis ex lege Julia cedere poſſunt. Cod. Th. lib. 4. tit. 20.

ced

Sect. 3.

A.D. 379.

ced to the payment of their Debts; which yet Juſtinian afterward did not “ approve, but being of the opinion herein of Conſtantine and Conſtantius, left this Conſtitution out of his Code; requiring in caſe of Ceſſion a full proof, or any Oath, that the man was unable to pay; which was agreeable to the ancient Law. And the laſt remedy remedy left to Creditors is, that if they can find out any Goods or Eſtate belonging to their Debtors, they may ſue for it, and recover ſuch moneys as are due to them from other men.

The fifth Conſulſhip of Gratian, and firſt of Theodoſius.

A.D. 380. Gratiano A. 5. & Theodoſio A Coſ.

54. The year which followed, being of our Lord the CCCLXXX, had for Conſuls Gratian Auguſtus the fifth, and Theodoſius the firſt time. In this Conſulſhip mention is made of ſeven ſeveral Præfecti Prætorio, viz. four under Theodoſius, (to whom Laws are directed from Theſſalonica, Adrianople and Conſtantinople, and publiſhed at Antioch) as, Eutropius, Neotherius, Florus and Tatianus, and three others, viz. Probus, Heſperius and Syagrius, the Diſtricts of whom lay in the Weſt; the Conſtitutions directed to them being dated from Aquileia or ſaid to be publiſhed at Rome or Hadrumetum. To Eutropius we find a Law directed this year, whereby liberty is given to the Illuſtrious, the Præfecti Prætorio, to impoſe fines as far as fifty pounds of Gold, in caſe of heinous Offences. Theſe Fines ordinarily were returned into the Treaſury; yet was it in the Power of the Judges to appoint them to ſome ſpecial Uſe, as to the Curſus Publicus, publick Buildings, the relief of the Poor, or other neceſſary charges, as ſtill the Parliaments of France do practiſe. Hereby Theodoſius inlarged the power of the Præfects, and about the ſame time extended it even to the depriving of the Governours of Provinces, or inferior Judges; and degrading them ſo far, as to the vileſt condition of men, if found corrupt and abuſing their Power. By removing from the Senate to the ſtate of the vulgar had been uſually puniſhed Senators guilty of Falſhood, eſpecially during the Government of that moſt excellent Prince Alexander Severus; neither was Theodoſius the firſt man that brought up this of degrading Judges to the ſame condition. Before the Julian Law, the puniſhment of corruption in them was that of Exile, and the Value of the Loſs ſuſtained by the injured party; but that Law contracted it within theſe limits of removal from the Senate, and the Value of the damage: yet afterward according to the merit of the cauſe was the penalty increaſed. This new Conſtitution being made at Conſtantinople, ſeems to have taken its original from ſome complaint made to Theodoſius there, who after his Promotion (by confeſſion of Zoſimus himſelf) while he lay in that City, had application made to him by many from all places, according to their particular wants, who received ſuch diſpatch as was agreeable to their ſeveral caſes.

Theodoſius inlarges the power of the Præfecti Prætorio.

L.4. Cod. Juſt. de modo multarum. lib. 1. tit. 54.

A Law of his againſt corrupt Judges.

L.1. Ad Legem Juliam repetundarum Cod. Th. lib. 9. tit. 27. Dat 18. Kal. Feb.

L. 12. Cod. Juſt. de Dignitatibus.

55. But, how great a calumny this ſame Hiſtorian raiſed againſt this Emperor, or elſe how ſlender his judgement was, in that he charges him with weakning the Army and rendring inconſiderable the force of the Empire, Gothofred tells you ſufficiently appears by other Laws he made about this time, from which it is evident how careful and ſolicitous he was to reſtore it to its wonted ſtrength and luſtre. About a fortnight after the Date of the late mentioned Edict, he publiſhed another, to the Provincials of his Territories, whereby he ſignified out of what ſorts of men he would not have Choice made of Souldiers; and this, as is concluded, in order to the carrying on of the Gothick War. It being one of the main points to receive ſuch as are fit, and reject others; he declares “He will have in the firſt place no Slaves, whom the continual practice of the Romans forbade to take Arms; nor any out of the meaneſt Victualling Houſes, or “ infamous Drinking Houſes, which ſort of Perſons were looked upon as ſo vile, “ that it was not accounted Adultery which was committed with the Miſtreſs of “ ſuch Houſes: Nor out of the Companies of Cooks or Bakers; nor ſuch as belonged “ to the Gynæcia, or had pitiful effeminate Imployments, or were taken out “ of the Ergaſtula or working Houſes, where thoſe were kept in labour, who either “ were condemned thither as a puniſhment for crimes, or elſe for their Subſiſtance, as not able otherwiſe to live, had condemned themſelves to that drudgery. For, there were Ergaſtula not only of Slaves but of thoſe alſo which were born, or made free, in thoſe Days, notwithſtanding the Conſtitution made by the Emperor Adrian for taking them away. Now all theſe ſorts were forbidden to afford Tirones or New-ſouldiers, and that under penalty of finding three duly “ qualified for one ſo unfit, and that by Award of the Magiſtri Militum, and according “ to their Diſcretion, if intimated to them. Of theſe Magiſtri, if Theodoſius now made five, or more, in room of two; for the better management of this great Concern, and other reaſons; he might do it, without ſuch diſmal effects as

In Com. ad l. 8. de Tironibus Cod. Th. Dat. 4. Kal. Feb. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

He declares out of what ſort of men he will not have Souldiers choſen.

are

Sect.3.

A.D. 380.

are ſuggeſted by Zoſimus, whoſe ſtory concerning his ſupine Neglect of Affairs,his exceſſive Rapacity, Selling of Offices, and Luxurious life, its poſſible, will be very much ſuſpected before we have done with the Hiſtory of his Laws. To be ſure he proteſted his extream hatred againſt Informers at this time; and by his Acts declared it, thoſe ſometimes neceſſary but generally Evils of a State, who found holes in mens Coats, and by Accuſations, right or wrong, promoted the Intereſt of the Treaſury, or rather of begging Courtiers. He found them growing miſchiefs when he came to the Government; and therefore by a Conſtitution (divided now, its thought, into two Laws and directed to Pancratius his Comes Rei Privatæ, and to the Provincials) he ordained “That before ſuch Beggar could enjoy any fruit of the Prince his liberality, he ſhould cauſe the Informer to be “ produced in open Court, not only when an whole Eſtate or inheritance was “ begged, but any particular thing or piece of Land. And that he ſhould not “ only thus be produced when the Emperors Reſcript or Grant was ſhewed in “ the Court of the Comes lately mentioned; but alſo ſent down to the Province “ where the Eſtate or thing begged lay; there to make good his Charge where “ the matter might beſt be determined one way or other; and if it proved a “ calumny, the Provincials might have the ſatiſfaction to ſee the puniſhment (by “ death) of the Falſe Accuſer. In the laſt Place he inflicts the pains of Death “ upon any who ſhall have informed thrice, nay, although he had made the “ charges good; and this as he ſaith out of hatred, whereby he exſecrates all Informations “ of this Nature.

Publiſheth a ſevere Act againſt Informers.

L. L. 12. 13. de Petitionib. &c. Cod. Th. Abſunt à Cod. Juſt.

Illud etiam ad profeſſionem odii quo univerſas Delationes exſecramur adjungimus, &c.

He further ſhews his averſion to the begging of Eſtates.

56. Further, this ſame year, he ſhowed his hatred, not only againſt Informers, but the begging of mens eſtates, by other Laws; which here we ſhall mention, becauſe relating to the ſame Subject. He commands the ſame Pancratius, that a Grant obtained ſhall be of no Force till it appeare from the matter heard “ and examined in his Court, what particularly the Eſtate was, which was ſo begged, and Certificate be made thereupon. This would, by a full Information, let the Emperor know what he had given, and prevent his being ſurprized and cheated by the uſual diminiſhing and undervaluing of ſuch things by thoſe that begged them. But by another Edict directed to Eutropius the Præfectus Prætorio, he puts a greater Stop to their Greedineſs, by an incapacity laid upon ſome things confiſcate to be ſo imployed; plainly declaring “That the Eſtates of ſuch as were proſcribed for Treaſon, ſhall not be begged; and if granted, the “ Grant ſhall be of no force. And whereas he ſaith, the ſhameleſneſs of ſome “ ſuch Petitioners many times by their importunity wreſted from Princes what “ was not to be granted, he declares his own Reſcript in ſuch caſes, as made “ contrary to Law, to be of no Force at all. But if he ſhould think fit, of “ his ſpecial grace, certain knowledge, and meer motion, that is, without the Deſire, “ Requeſt or Begging of the Party, to give or grant any ſuch Eſtates, ſuch “ Grants ſo made ſhould be of full effect. Now why he ſhould make this exception in the caſes of Treaſon, it being lawful to beg any other Eſtates, was either, for that Accuſations of this Nature were often made, and of the moſt rich and conſiderable Perſons, by ſuch as gaped after their Patrimonies; or, as Gothofred believes, out of a certain peculiar and too great mildneſs and benignity towards Offendors in that kind, which made him often eaſily pardon both Words and Deeds againſt his own Perſon, which both Libanius and Themiſtius in their Orations do teſtifie and otherwiſe will appear. Therefore would he keep open ſome Door to Clemency, which was innate to him, by ſhutting it againſt the importunate voracity of his Courtiers, who preſently after condemnation of the Party flew upon him; for which Reaſon alſo, as it ſeems, his Son Arcadius afterward ordained, that the Eſtates of proſcribed or condemned Perſons ſhould not be begged within two years. But whereas Theodoſius forbade this as to the Eſtates of Traitors only; we muſt not omit that this Law by Juſtinian is extended to all other Crimes, who would not have any thing begged at all, whether it fell to the Treaſury by Proſcription, or any other ways for want of Heirs. “As to our preſent Account of Theodoſius, he ſubjects to extraordinary or Arbitrary puniſhment, ſuch as ſhould Beg contrary to the Import and “ meaning of this Law; and by another, made two years after, extends this “ Prohibition to ſuch Houſes or Dwellings as were fitter to be made Palaces, “ and for the Emperors own Uſe, than dwellings for Subjects. If any ſhould be “ ſo bold as to beg any ſuch Places, when Confiſcate, he pronounces him puniſhable “ as for Sacriledge, nay, although he did it out of ignorance, or being “ deceived “

L. 14. eod. tit. Abeſt. à Juſt.

L. 15. Eod. tit. & l. Cod. Juſt. de petitionib. bon. Subl.

L. 16. eod. tit. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

deceived; and for this Reaſon, that He who is curious and buſie upon the matter of begging, ought to be careful what he askes. And he commands Nebridius, in that year the Comes Rei Privatæ to whom this Conſtitution is directed, to puniſh his own Office, if they make any falſe certificate, or conſent by colluſion to one that ſo begged, from whom he requires, that any thing ſo obtained ſhall be taken away.

57. But being now imployed in the War againſt the Goths, he ſtill took all care poſſible for the reinforcement of his Troops, by ſeveral Edicts iſſued out to Neoterius. “He propoſed rewards to ſuch as ſhould diſcover any that had forſaken his Colours; required thoſe whoſe imployment it was to take up new Souldiers, to do it out of the Regions that lay moſt convenient, and with careful choice; and threatens with puniſhment both them if they neglected, and the Judges themſelves if they connive at their neglect; and the Provincials too if they conſpire with them therein. He commands that the Sons of the Primipilares follow the condition of their Fathers; and be obliged to that ſervice they were bound to. But in caſe they were not called on in their legitimate or twenty fifth year, but become obnoxious to ſervices of Corporations, he ordains that they continue in the number of Curiales; and in caſe the Primipilares had ſeveral Sons, and left a fair Eſtate, one of them he will have obliged to the ſervices of theſe Courts, and the reſt to their Fathers Imployment. For he had a great regard to Corporations, that their Courts and Offices might be ſupplied, from which ſeveral now withdrew themſelves, and, upon occaſion of the Wars with the Goths, and the care he took to ſupply his Army, deſerted their Charges and went into the Field. “This in another Edict directed to the ſame Neoterius, he tells him he had diſcovered; in particular that Scribes and Logographi of Cities had thither withdrawn themſelves, probably to be Actuaries in the Army; but he prohibits ſuch practice for the time to come, telling him, that he purpoſed to ſupply his Troops out of ſuch as ſtraggled abroad, out of the Sons of Veterani and ſuch as had been diſmiſſed, and now minded their own private Affairs, whom he commands to the Military ſervice, and forbids all occaſion of Excuſe. So even an Hand he reſolved to keep betwixt his own Concernment of the Army, and the intereſt of Corporations. But further ſo careful he ſhewed himſelf that the Courts ſhould not be deſerted, that by other Laws made this year, and directed alſo to Neotherius, he commanded, “That if any by birth obliged to be Curiales had betaken themſelves to the uſeful Body of the Fabricenſes, nay had got to be admitted into the Order of Senators, or to any Palatine or Court-Imployment, they ſhould thence be forced back to the Duties, to which they were obliged by their original. And ſtill, as I ſaid, to ſhow his care both of his Army and the Corporations, if any Sons of the Veterane Souldiers had put themſelves into the ſervice of the Governours of Provinces, however ſuch might pretend old Age, if he was able enough for military ſervice he ſhould be compelled into the Field; but if he was found unable to diſcharge that Duty, then to the ſervice of the Curiæ; however, in one of them to be (if poſſible) ſerviceable to the Common-wealth.

Takes farther care for the reinforcement of his Troops.

L. 3. de Deſertorio. Cod. Th.

L. 9. de Tironib. Eod. Cod.

L. 11. de Filiis Militar. Apparit. & veteran. Cod. Th.

And for the ſervices of the Curiæ.

L. 3. de Tabulariis, &c. Cod. Th.

Lib. 8. tit. 2. & l. 9, 10. de Filiis milit. apparit.

L. l. 81, 82, 83. de Decurionibus.

58. Nothing appears from the Laws to confirm what Zoſimus writes concerning this Emperors making ſo many Magiſtri Militum, yet that he had a ſpecial regard to thoſe Military men, thence ſufficiently is evident. For in this very year, did he publiſh a new Conſtitution or Notitia of Dignities, of place and precedence, whereby he makes equal ſuch as had born theſe Offices, with thoſe that had been Præfecti Prætorio. And the ſame place he aſſigns to them, not only in the Secretaria or Courts of the Provinces, and in Extraordinary meetings, as Valentinian had done before, but every where, indiſtinctly, even in the Senate of Conſtantinople, to the Præfect of which City, Reſtitutus, he directs his Edict. No other precedence he gives to either ſort, but ſuch as time it ſelf afforded; ſo that he who was firſt advanced ſhould take place, ſpeak and deliver firſt his Opinion; and this he found himſelf obliged to do from reaſon of State, thereby to oblige Military men, of whom at this time he ſtood in great need, having ſo much work cut out for them by the Goths, Hunns and Alans; and the more becauſe many of his great Officers were by original themſelves Barbarians. But by ſo doing, he might ſeem to leſſen the dignity of the Præfecti Prætorio, the Power of whom was in this Age ſo exceeding great; and therefore to make them ſome amends, he ſeems to have inlarged it by granting Incourages Military men.

L. 2. de Præfectis Prætorio ſive urbis Cod. Th. & L. 2. Cod. Juſt. eodem tit.

ting them leave to Fine Criminals as far as fifty pounds of Gold, by the Edict lately “ mentioned, which is rationaly thought to have been part of this very Conſtitution, “ however the Date of it hath happened to be altered. However, there is extant another “ Law which is concluded to have been a Parcel of it, whereby thoſe that had “ borne any of four other great Offices, viz. that of Quæſtor, the Magiſter Officiorum, “ and the two Comites Sacrarum Largitionum and Rei privatæ, are in ſome ſort “ made equal to thoſe that had been Præfecti Prætorio. They had formerly been “ by Valentinian preferred before Proconſuls, and ſo by Dignity were only Spectabiles; but now by this Law they were taken into the Rank and Number of Illuſtres. But he doth not hereby make them fully equal with the Præfectorians, as he had done them that had been Magiſtri Militum, ſo as if they ſhould make any advantage of Time, or be preferred before them, if they had been firſt advanced; but certain particulars he mentions wherein they ſhould equal them, as in Acclamations, and being received with the ſame Honour and Reſpect in all Companies and Aſſemblies. The Reaſon he gives for this Advancement is, that though they had not yet born the Office of Præfect, yet they were near it, and it was due to them, ſuch being uſually preferred to that Dignity; as might be made evident by infinite Examples.

L. 2. de Quæſtorib. Magiſtris Officiorum, &c. & L. 1. Cod. Juſt. Eod. tit.

His Reſpect for the Notaries:

L. 1. de Primicerio & Notariis Cod. Th. lib. 6. tit. 10. Dat. Theſſ. 18. Cal. Jul. & L. 1. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

59. But amongſt other more inferiour Imployments, Theodoſius at this time profeſſes the great Reſpect he bore to the Notaries, of whom has been already ſpoken, as alſo of their various Imployments, out of Ammianus. For theſe were the Clerks that took Notes of what paſſed in the Emperours Conſiſtory; his Decrees were often by their Primicerius recited in the Senate; and they were ſent often into the Provinces upon extraordinary and urgent occaſions, being uſually bred Scholars; and thereupon it is thought they were recommended to the Emperour by Eutropius the Præfectus Prætorio, to whom this Edict is directed; he being a Perſon of great Learning and Eloquence. When they had left their Imployments either for Age, to take their Eaſe, or other Reſpects, the Numerarij belonging to the Magiſtrates, would put them upon Duties relating to the Revenue, as thoſe of Collectors and the like, to their great Inconvenience and Moleſtation. Now as the Rule in Law generally held “ that the ſame Privileges belonged to thoſe that were in actual Imployment, “ and thoſe that were out, but had ſerved in that Relation. Theodoſius in this “ Edict extends this Privilege which already belonged to other Honorati, “ to thoſe that ſerved in the Palace: and in Caſe any Numerarius were ſo “ troubleſome to them, he threatens him with an heavy Fine, and the loſs of his “ Office. But amongſt his Concernes, for thoſe that ſerved him in the Palace, he forgot not them who by their Labour contributed to the Subſiſtance of himſelf and them, viz. the Farmers of the publick Lands. He revived now a “ Law made by Valentinian, for ſaving harmleſs ſuch Perſons; and he declares, “ no Farmer in Poſſeſſion, ſhall be turned out through the Importunity of another, “ having given that Security which of Courſe ſuch Tenants were to give, “ by joynt Obligation of other Perſons. And at this time his Hand being in, and, as any one looks upon the Laws would judge, being ſet to do good to his People; by his ſeveral Conſtitutions ſent to the Præfecti Prætorio throughout his whole Diſtrict, eſpecially to Eutropius, he endeavoured to ſuppreſs the great Thefts that were common in the Provinces; and not only them, but ſuch as were as certain, though in a more plauſible way, as the unjuſt Exactions and Violences uſed by the Governors or Judges of Provinces, and the greater Officers, nay, of the Treaſury it ſelf. To this purpoſe, he made a famous Conſtitution ſtill extant, and divided into ſeveral Laws.

His Care for the Farmers of his Lands.

L. 3. de Locatione Fund. Jur. Emphyt. Cod. Th. lib. 10. tit. 3. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

60. By one of theſe he ſhewed great Clemency to ſuch as underwent the Puniſhment of being Baniſhed into Iſlands, called Deportation, by the Romans. For whereas by the Law, the whole Eſtates of ſuch Condemned Perſons, were “ Confiſcated, ſome Portion thereof, he permitted to be allowed for the ſubſiſtance “ of the Offender and of his Children, and Parents (were there no “ Children) viz. one ſixth part, except in Caſe of Treaſon, of which, whoſoever “ was Convict, and thus baniſhed, he would alſo have him puniſhed with Want, “ as was wont to be Practiſed in all places; that Crime being ever excluded from “ all Privilege and Benefit of Law. Both hence and from other Laws it's evident, that Death was not always inflicted for Treaſon it ſelf, but ſometimes Deportation ſatisfied. As to the Children of ſuch Perſons, by this ſame Conſtitution he allows them a ſixth part of the Eſtate, of what Sex, Degree or Condition

L. 8. de bonis Proſcriptorum. Cod. To.

His Clemency to ſuch as underwent Deportation, and to their Children.

on ſoever they are, although Emancipated, and Grandchildren by a Daughter; the Crime of Treaſon again excepted; and yet ſo, as even in that Caſe as much ſhould be allowed them, as to their Father, had he offended in another ſort, and for that been ſo Baniſhed, viz. a ſixth part; a ſigne of the wonderful Clemency of this Emperour; wherein his Sons refuſed to imitate him; the horridneſs of that Crime, as one of them ſaith, regularly leaving nothing to Poſterity; and not only his Succeſſours, but generally his Predeceſſors were of the contrary Opinion. But indeed this was the natural temper of this Prince, whoſe Mercy uſually ſhewed in the point of Treaſon, Themiſtius, about this time, extolled in an Oration he made in the Senate; and of his wonderful Clemency towards the Antiochians, we may hear hereafter. But in that manner he provided for them whoſe Goods or Eſtates were Confiſcated. By another, he ſetled the ſucceſſion of ſuch, whoſe Eſtates were not ſeized by the Exchequer, although they were put to Death for ſome offence, and that as he profeſſes according to the Direction of the Civil (twelve Tables, and the Lex Papia) and of the Prætorian Law; for the Romans had a double way of conveighing the Inheritances of ſuch as died Inteſtate, the one by the Civil Law it ſelf, and the other by the Edict of the Prætor, when Reaſon required that Equity ſhould interpoſe and regulate the Rigour of the Law. By this his Conſtitution he ordained the Eſtates of ſuch as were put to Death, to deſcend to the Children of the firſt and ſecond Degrees entirely, but only half to thoſe of the third, or Great Grand-Children. If there were no Children, a third part of ſuch Condemned perſons Eſtates, ſhould go to their Parents, and the other two be Confiſcate. And to the Grandfather and Grandmother by the Fathers ſide; if the Party had no Father nor Mother, one fourth part; and all theſe failing, as much to the Brothers and Siſters of the Party, who if of whole Blood, and not Emancipated were to exclude the Grandfather and Grandmother as by the Antient Law they ought to do.

L. 2. eod. tit. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

His further Severity againſt Judges that had been deprived for Corruption.

61. By another part of this Conſtitution, he farther provided againſt the Corruption of Judges; for, having as we have ſeen already, this ſame year, deprived ſuch of all Honour, and degraded them as low as the meaneſt Condition of the Vulgar, he now took away the Stairs by which they might hope to mount again to their former Dignity, by declaring, that they ſhould for ever be debarred from all, both Real and Titular Honours. And he Commands Eutropius, that if any Perſon formerly Convicted ſhould obtain any ſuch Power or Imployment, as might happen through the Emperours not being acquainted with what had formerly paſſed, and his being impoſed on; that in ſuch Caſe, he ſhould not ſuffer him to Act or intermeddle; but ſend and acquaint himſelf with the matter. This he did, conſidering that Men of ſuch baſe and corrupt Principles, ſeldom grow better if they have any oportunity; however are to be preſumed ſtill the ſame, except there be any Evidence to the contrary, of which it was fit the Prince ſhould be Judge, without having his Hands tied up, if he were pleaſed to reſtore any, as ſatisfied of their Amendment. But we ſee the power of the Præfects was very great, as even in this Caſe it appears, of Prohibiting a Perſon to meddle with the Government, though producing the Emperours Commiſſion, as they had Authority given them of puniſhing ſuch Judges as they found to be Thieves without any neceſſity of making Report to the Emperour. By this ſame Conſtitution he reformed ſeveral Abuſes perceived to be growing about Contracts of Mariage, Prohibiting that Liberty which ſome took of ingaging the Affections of Perſons, of putting them to trouble and Charge, and then deſerting them; ſuch Women as were Guilty of this Inconſtancy by the Roman Laws being to reſtore fourfold of the Tokens that they had been preſented with. The Law in this point he now regulated, according to the Age and other Circumſtances of the Woman; but vigorouſly reinforced that part of it which related to the Governours of Provinces, or ſuch as had Command, or Authority therein; who thereby were Expreſly forbidden to marry, during their Government, any that lived in the parts ſubject, to their Juriſdiction; becauſe of that Fear, Awe, or Terror which it was ſuppoſed they might ſtrike into them. He declares that if any woman under ſuch Circumſtances had received any Tokens or Preſents; whereas by the Antient Law ſhe might renounce any Contract thereby made, but was of neceſſity to return the Preſents back; that now it ſhould be in her free Choice, whether ſhe would or not return them. And this he extends, not only to the Governour himſelf, but

L. 2. Ad legem Juliam. Repetundar. Cod. Th. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſtin.

He Reforms Abuſes in order to Marriage.

L 6. de Sponſalibus &c. Cod. Th. lib. 3. tit. 5. & L. 1. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Arrhæ.

Eſpecially of Governours of Provinces.

L. un. ſi Provinciæ Rector. Cod. Th. lib. eod. tit. 6. & L. un. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

his Sons, Grandſons, Kinſmen, Aſſeſſors and Domeſticks, if he interpoſed in their“ behalfs. But in Caſe, after his Government ended, the Party would agree to it,“ the Mariage might be conſummated, but as now by a new Conſent, which during“ his Power was reputed and taken to be null and ineffectual.

L. un. de uſuris Rei judicatæ. Cod. Th. lib. 14. tit 19.

L. un. Si quacunq; preditus poteſtate nuptias petat in vitæ. Cod. Th. lib. 3. tit. 11. & L. un. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

62. By this ſame Conſtitution, he endeavoured to prevent the Fraud of Debtors, and the Rapacity of Creditors, appointing what Intereſt ſhould be paid, and when, for ſuch ſums as any by courſe of Law had been Caſt in; but ſtill had his Eye upon Governours of Provinces, by whom he thought the People more oppreſſed than by one another; and that eſpecially at this time, and he thought he had not yet done enough in the point of Mariage. He further ſeverely Prohibits“ all having Authority in any Province or place, not only by Threats or Awe, to“ Compel any Woman to Marry themſelves or Domeſticks, but any other Perſon“ whatſoever, and that under a double Penalty, of fining in ten pounds of Gold,“ and loſing the Dignity belonging to ſuch as had borne their Offices, when out of“ their Imployment; which if they ſhould preſume to take upon them, or Challenge,“ he forbids them coming into, or abiding in the Province they Governed for the ſpace of two years. Such puniſhment was the Offender to undergo if Marriage followed upon his Attempt; and for prevention yet further, the Emperour preſcribes a remedy againſt ſuch violence, giving the Party ſo Awed or threatned, Liberty“ to renounce the Juriſdiction of the Tyrant, if he were the ordinary Judge or“ Governour of the Province, and betake himſelf to thoſe of the Degree of Spectabilis,“ as the Vicar of the Dioceſs, the Proconſul, Comes or Præfectus Auguſtalis, according“ to the place where it ſhould happen; and there demand Relief. And if“ the Vicar or other ſuch officer made the Attempt, the Ordinary Judge ſhould have“ the Hearing of the matter; but if both were faulty, then ſhould the Illuſtrious“ Perſons or Præfecti Prætorio, undertake the Protection of the attempted party. In concluſion, the Defenſores of Cities, formerly ſpoken of, are required to take care that“ the matter be proſecuted in this ſort, as alſo the Apparitors of the Ordinary Judge.“

Prohibits Donations to be made to them.

L. quicunque de iis quæ Adminiſtrantibus Cod. Th. lib. 8. tit. 15. Abeſt à Cod Juſt.

63. Yet ſtill farther did his Care extend, to protect the Inferiour ſort of People from the Awe and Terror they might ſtand in, in order to their Provincial Magiſtrates, and the ill Effects following thereupon. By another Law, part alſo of this“ Conſtitution, he permits all Donations to ſuch Perſons to be revoked, within the“ ſpace of five years, whether theſe Magiſtrates were Governors of Provinces, of Dioceſſes,“ or Præfecti Prætorio themſelves as formerly had been ordained in caſe of“ purchaſes; nay though they were made but to their Wives, their Children indiſtinctly“ of what Degree, Sex or Condition whatſoever, their Parents, Brothers,“ Siſters, Fathers in Law, Mothers in Law, or Domeſtick Aſſeſſors; for he will“ not have them themſelves only incorrupt, but their Houſes and Families alſo“ untainted. The five years, within the ſpace of which he gives leave to revoke“ the Donation, he will have reckoned from the going of ſuch a Magiſtrate out of“ his Office, and he permits it to be done without any Denuntiation (as the term“ of Law is) or warning, which was neceſſary before other Suites or Actions were“ commenced; it ſufficing to prove before the Judge the time when the Donation“ was made. And yet further to this Suite or Proſecution he adds ſuch Efficacy,“ that the Poſſeſſion of the things given, ſhould reverte to the Donor in ſuch ſort“ as if it had never gone out of his Hands; in like manner as thoſe that had poſſeſſed“ any thing by fraud were compelled to reſtore it together with all Fruits or“ Emoluments thence ariſing. In Caſe the Donor die before the Term be out, he“ declares that his Heirs ſhall have Cauſe of Action againſt the Donee, except the“ Donor, while living, had by his ſilence confirmed the Donation, by ſuffering the“ matter to reſt ſo long till the Heir became emancipated, or out of his Paternal“ Authority. But we are to underſtand, that what Theodoſius here Enacts, and other“ Laws determin. againſt Donations made to Magiſtrates, muſt be underſtood concerning“ ſuch as were made and had effect betwixt the living; for by Teſtament or laſt Will any thing might be given or bequeathed to thoſe in Dignity, or Power, as well as to the Emperours themſelves, which by another Branch of this large Conſtitution he doth declare, which inſtanceth in an Inheritance in a Legacy, and a thing left in truſt with another Perſon for their Benefit and Advantage. By another part of this ſame Law he declares, that if ſo be, one that was left Heir, or as we ſay Executor, or ſucceded to an Inteſtate, did once approve of the Will“ of the deceaſed, all things therein bequeathed ſhould hold good, although the“ Teſtament were not ſolemn, or ſo Conſtituted as the Law required.

L. 16. Cod. Juſt. de Teſtam. lib. 6. tit. 23.

64. What Zoſimus writes concerning ſo many flocking to him with their Complaints, plaints, when he lay at Theſſalonica, we may well believe to be true, from what we find in another Edict made by him this year, although not at that City, but at Conſtantinople; if Hadrianople be not rather to be read. When places in the Countries had any Requeſts to make, they were wont in thoſe times confuſedly to ſend their Meſſengers to the Emperour, and more in number than was convenient; to the great Charge of the People and the burthening of the Curſus Publicus, which provoked other Princes as well before, as after, to put a Reſtraint upon this Diſorder: Cities of one and the ſame Province would ſend up their Requeſts particularly and “ by themſelves; and this Theodoſius doth not diſapprove, at leaſt not forbid; but “ how many in Number ſoever thoſe Cities of the Provinces were, at the general “ meeting three Meſſengers only, ſhould be choſen to repreſent their (particular) “ Complaints; which was thought ſufficient; nay, Valentinian the younger afterward “ would have but two Meſſengers Choſen for an entire Dioceſs or a Province, although in former times three might have been ſent from one City alone, but no more; by an Edict of Veſpaſian, whatſoever place it was. Now all the Meſſengers go under the Name of Legati, and ſo are termed in a peculiar Title of Theodoſius his Code, as well as they who were ſent on Errands to Foreign Princes or Nations, which we now more peculiarly call Ambaſſadors; for ſuch more properly are they who are ſent from one Sovereign Authority to another, although now Commiſſioners ſent to a Treaty go under this Name alſo; and this more lately; though (mediately) they alſo tranſact with Sovereign Powers. As for Ambaſſadors ſent from the Romans to Foreign Nations, their Number often was wont to be three. But to return to Theodoſius; as by this Law he ſeems chiefly to have aimed at the Eaſe of the Citizens ſo by others of this ſame year, to have conſulted the Beauty and Luſtre of the Cities. And ſome need there was, of his ſo doing; for it's obſerved, that from this year of which now we write, for ſeventeen together, till the Reign of Arcadius his Son, the Governours of Provinces through the Eaſt, caſt off all Care of repairing publick works or Buildings. This made him both now and afterwards quicken them to it by ſeveral Edicts; and this year, when one Julian was going to be Præfect of Ægypt, he made this Charge part of his Inſtructions, declaring that every Judg “ that was to be ſent into his Province, ſhould repair and reſtore to their antient “ Luſtre two Parts of three of ſuch Structures as were decayed, either through neglect “ or Age; and if they would to theſe add the third part alſo, they ſhould thereby “ procure Fame and Reputation, though at the publick Charge. They were greedy enough of Fame and Repute, but they loved to procure it by ſome new Work, ſome new Device, which ſhould call them Author, at leaſt Founder; and were wont to neglect what was begun but left unperfect by their Predeceſſors; To obviate which miſchief, this ſame year by another Edict directed to Entropius, he “ commands that they begin no new Work till the old ones be repaired, and ſuch “ as were left unfiniſhed by thoſe that ſerved in the Province before them.

Reſtrains the Number of Meſſengers ſent up to him upon Buſineſs.

L. 7. de Legatis & Decretis &c. Cod. Th. lib. 12. Tit. 12. Abeſt à Cod Juſt.

Takes care of repairing antient Buildings.

L. L. 20, 21. de operibus publ. Cod. Th. Abſunt à Cod. Juſt.

65. This Charge concerning the Repairs of Antient Structures, was indeed one of thoſe which of Courſe were given to Governors that were going to undertake their Provincial Imployments; and ſo was that concerning the Immunity of Curiales or Senators of Cities from Tortures, or beating with Plummets, as ſhould ſeem from another Law directed to the ſame Julian Prefect of Ægypt, and to be joyned with the former. By this he excepts from the aforeſaid Tortures, being due to “ Criminal Perſons, the whole Rank or Order of the Curia, and will have every “ Judg or Governor know, that if either He himſelf, or his Officers Act contrary “ to this Injunction, they ſhall be moſt ſeverely puniſhed. Therefore he requires Him “ in particular, that the greatneſs of the Command conſidered, he will abſtain from “ corporal Injuries, as he terms them, of the Curiales; and to be ſure to puniſh with “ the heavieſt Cenſure, any of his Officers that ſhall tranſgreſs in this ſort. Yet for all this, from an Oration of Libanius it appears, that ſome Governours themſelves tranſgreſſed in this kinde, and were puniſhed for it; as for inſtance, Flavianus the Proconſul of Aſia (of whom we may hear afterward) who was turned out of his Place, and another Prefect of Ægypt, who was caſt into Bonds for the violation of this Law, a Law ſo acceptable and welcome, that Libanius prays him to eſtabliſh Juſtice by the puniſhment of ſuch as ſhould infringe it, by which Courſe many would be incouraged to give themſelves to the Service of the Cities, whereas, if he neglected to do it, he would in a manner command them to run away from their Imployments. But ſo kind, we ſee, was Theodoſius to Corporations; the Senators whereof could not but be pleaſed to have their Perſons thus ſecured from the Inſolence of Governors, and eſpecially of their Officers; and, if publick Forbids the torturing of the Curiales.

L. 80. de Decurionibus Cod. Th. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

Vide Gothofr. in Com.

ſpiri-

Sect. 3.

A.D. 380.

ſpirited, to ſee their Towns beautified by repairing of ſuch Structures as were gone to decay. And the Emperours indeed were wont ſo far herein to concern themſelves, that in their uſual Inſtructions or Mandates given to theſe Magiſtrates, they uſually ordered the Accounts concernnig theſe publick Works to be allowed. For each City had its peculiar Revenues, part whereof was wont to be aſſigned to the maintenance of publick works, the Accounts of which they would have allowed, but Prohibit any Salary to be aſſigned by the Decuriones, or greater Magiſtrates, to any Perſon, without their Command therein eſpecially ſignified; whereas, in ſome Caſes the Decuriones were wont to allow Salaries, as to a Municipal Profeſſor or Phyſitian; to Meſſengers ſent to Court, and to the maintenance of ſuch of their own Members as were fallen to Decay. But Conſtantius forbade any Salary to be given, peremptorily, without the Prince his Command, as his Grandfather Conſtantius Chlorus, himſelf, aſſigned to Eumenius the Rhetorician his Penſion from the City of Augustodunum; and Gratian when he gave the Gallican Cities leave to chuſe their Profeſſors, yet would not yield them the liberty of aſſigning them Allowances at their own Diſcretion. Yet Libanius in an Oration to the Senators of Antioch importunes them of that City to increaſe the Salaries of their four Rhetoricians or Sophiſts, by aſſigning them certain Lands; ſo that probably the Prohibition of Conſtantius extends to unuſual and Extraordinary ſtipends; not to the wonted and neceſſary ones.

L. de operibus publicis Cod. Th.

L. unic. de præbend. ſalari Cod. Th. lib. 12. tit. 2. & Cod. Juſt. l. unic. eod. tit.

66. Theodoſius, at the latter end of the year, ſetting himſelf to the Correction of manners, took notice of the Immodeſty of Widdows (amongſt other Faults) which were wont to Marry again before the time of Mourning due to their former Husbands was expired. He confirms what the Law formerly had declared againſt ſuch, that they ſhould be eſteemed infamous Perſons; and to this adds, that “ they ſhould not bring as Dower to their ſecond Husbands above a third part of their “ Eſtates nor leave them more than juſt ſo much by their Teſtaments. That they “ ſhall be Incapable of any Inheritances, Legacies or Benefits from Truſts left by “ Will, which muſt fall to the Heirs, and no Benefit thereby Accrue to his Treaſury, “ to which he will have no reſpect in the buſineſs of Reformation of Manners. Further, “ ſuch a Woman ſhall looſe whatſoever was left to her by the Will of the firſt “ Husband, which muſt fall to them to whom the Prætorian Law aſſigned it; and “ the Treaſury ſucceed in the laſt place. And as for ſuch Inheritances as fall to her by “ Succeſſion, She ſhall not ſucceed to any ſuch, or thoſe called Honorary, beyond the “ third Degree. By another part of this ſame Conſtitution, directed to Eutropius the “ Præfectus Prætorio, though now ſeparated and put into another Title in the Code, “ he pronounces ſuch a woman notoriouſly infamous by the Law, except the Prince “ be pleaſed by his Indulgence to wipe off the Blott, whether ſhe had Children or not “ by her Husband. In Caſe She had Children, and obtained from the Emperour “ an Abolition of Infamy, he is willing She ſhall injoy it, together with an Exemption “ from all other puniſhments, provided She part with half that Eſtate ſhe had “ at the time of Marriage, to thoſe Children ſhe had by her former Husband, by a pure and ſolemn Donation, ſo as no Profits thereof ſhall be Exempted; and if “ one or more of them ſhould dye, thoſe remaining ſhall ſucceed the deceaſed; but “ in Caſe all of them die Inteſtate, then, for Conſolation of her miſery Contracted “ by the loſs, She her ſelf ſhall be the Heir.

Puniſhes the haſty Marriages of Widdows.

L. 1. de ſecundis Nuptiis Cod. Juſt. lib. 5. tit. 9.

L. 15. ex quibus cauſis Infamia irrogatur. Cod. Juſt. lib. 2. tit. 12.

L. 4. Ad ſenatus conſultum. Tertullianum Cod. Juſt. lib. 6. tit. 56.

67. This Conſtitution bearing Date on the fifteenth before New-years Day, we ſuppoſe was not made at Conſtantinople; whither Theodoſius by this time, was ſcarcely returned from Theſſalonica. The ſecond day after there, we think we find him by another Law which here we ſhall not further mention. But to beſure at Conſtantinople he was on the twenty-ninth of December, on which we have another Edict directed to Eutropius, and full of Clemency, concerning the Apprehenſion and Cuſtody of Priſoners. “ Hereby he Commands, that none be caſt into “ Priſon without ſufficient Ground: That none be ſent for from far, without the Accu- “ ſer have firſt ingaged himſelf ſolemnly to undergo the puniſhment due to the Of- “ fence if he do not prove it. That thirty Days time ſhall be allowed ſuch an one “ to diſpoſe of his Buſineſs, and to comfort and ſettle his Family before he under- “ took his Journey, by the ordinary Judg of the Province, or the Municipal Ma- “ giſtrates, to be reckoned from the entring of the Decree; that ſo there may be no “ opportunity left to the Meſſenger to make his Markets out of him, for any Re- “ ſpite. And when he is produced before the Judg, before whom he muſt receive “ his Tryal, he ſhall have the Aſſiſtance of an Advocate, be examined, and under- “ ſtand what is laid to his Charge; which done, in a condition equal with that of “ his “

Vide Chonic. Cod. Theod.

He makes a favourable Law in behalf of Priſoners.

L. 3. de exhibendis & transmittendis Reis & L. 2. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

Nulla remanente aput eum qui ad exhibendum miſſus eſt copia nundinandi.

Sect.3.

A.D. 380.

his Accuſer, he ſhall abide his Tryal. Being now in Priſon, he commands that he be not there long kept, nor his Tryal protracted, but thereby all occaſion be cut off from Jailors, and Keepers, of making their Markets by procuring to Priſoners a ſpeedy Hearing. To this purpoſe he requires, that the Commentarienſis, every thirtieth day, preſent to the Judg an Account of the Number, Variety of Crimes, Order, and Age of the Priſoners; as Conſtantius formerly had ordained that they be fully heard within one Month. This he will have done, or the Office Fined in twenty pounds of Gold: And a lazy, proud and careleſs Judg Baniſhed the Province, and Fined alſo In the ſum of ten pounds. Theſe are the ſeveral Laws made this year by Theodoſius, whom leaving at Conſtantinople, we muſt ſee what was done, in the mean time, by Gratian and Valentinian in the Weſt.

L.6. de Cuſtodia Reorum Cod. Th. & L. 5. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

68. The firſt thing we meet with, is an heavy Complaint made to Gratian by the Navicularij of Africk, concerning the Breach of their Privileges granted by former Princes. To put them into heart again, and that Rome might not ſuffer by want of Proviſions, in Anſwer to their Petition, he Confirms what Immunities they had received from his Predeceſſors. In the firſt place, he eſtabliſhes upon them the Equeſtrian Dignity, which had been conferred on them, both by Conſtantine the Great, and Julian, by Laws made for that purpoſe; which are not now extant. And as this, amongſt many other Privileges belonged to that Dignity, that ſuch as enjoyed it were exempt from Corporal Injuries, as they were termed, that is, from Examinations by Stripes and Tortures, Gratian confirms it alſo to them, threatning all Judges with grievous puniſhment, in caſe they treated any Navicularius in ſo ſevere a ſort; and alſo their Apparitors, whoſe duty it was to put them in mind of their Office, when they ſaw them tranſported with any paſſion, In the third place, he delivers them of the Fear they were in, of being forced to the Services of Corporations; agreeing with them in what they urged in their Petition, that in preſſing neceſſities, ſuch as already had been bound to the Services of the Curiæ, were wont to be diſcharged, and added to the Body of the Navicularij. Beſides this, he eſtabliſhes their Antient Immunity from the Burthen of the Luſtralis Collatio, and Cuſtom for their Goods; which favour was granted but to few Perſons; but whereas ſome of them might abuſe this their Liberty, and defraud the Publick, by concealing the Goods of other Men, and giving opportunity to Merchants to ſteal the Cuſtomes of their Wares, he charges the Judges concerned in ſuch matters, to take eſpecial Care, that no ſuch ill Uſe be made of his Indulgence.

Gratian in the mean time favours the Navicularii.

L. 16. de Navicularиis Cod. Th. Dat. Treviris 8. Id. Febr.

69. In the ſame Conſtitution, he abates the Rigour of a Law made by his Father, which required, that half the Number of the Mariners of a Ship, ſhould be ſubjected to Examination, in Caſe of Shipwrack, and the Death of Paſſengers cauſed thereby. Moved by their Report, he permits that but two or three be examined. But in Caſe the Maſter of the Veſſel were living, the truth ſhould firſt be inquired of from him, as ſuppoſed the beſt to underſtand all matters of ſuch Concernment. If ſo be he had miſcarried, Choice was to be made of other Mariners; and if all were loſt, Inquiry was to be made among the Relations of the Navicularii, and he appoints a very large time, in which this Tryal ſhall be terminated, viz. five years; one, or two having been the uſual Term for ſuch Buſineſs. Beſides theſe Acts of Grace, he takes Order alſo, that what had by the Laws been allowed them for loſs of the Grain by Leakage, or other Accidents, ſhould not be diminiſhed by thoſe Officers, whoſe work it was to overſee the Tranſportation of Corn. He declares at what time of the year they ſhall begin to tranſport the publick (or Fiſcale) Grain, and when they ſhall leave off their Navigation. For of old, before the Invention of the Compaſs, there was wont to be ſome definite time, for opening the Sea, and, as it were, for the ſhutting of it; for ſo both were termed by the Antients, who were wont to Celebrate both theſe times by ſolemn Sports and Merriments. In Spring, you muſt know, they were ſo bold, as to adventure forth; and yet they accounted it but doubtful and dangerous to ſtir out before Mid-May. Now Gratian will have the Navicularii take a middle Courſe; viz. to begin the firſt of April, being it was not ſo late as May, and nearer to Summer than was March. And whereas the Seas were not ſaid ordinarily to be ſhut up till the eleventh of November, he will have Navigation (with the Fiſcale ſpecies) to ceaſe all this Month, and part of October alſo; for he appoints the time of freighting the Ships to extend to the firſt of October, and thenceforth Navigation to continue till the Ides or fifteenth of the ſame Month incluſive, thereby allowing fifteen teen days for Sailing from Africk, and unlading in the Port of Rome; five thou- “ ſand Furlongs being reckoned for the Breadth of the Streight betwixt this Port and “ that of Carthage. But afterward, this time of Navigation was enlarged, as we may ſee in convenient time. In the laſt place, Gratian will have the Number of the Navicularii increaſed, by calling all men to the Function (if need be) that “ are not imployed in publick Buſineſs.

L. 3. de Naufragiis Cod. Th. lib. 13. tit. 9.

Sect.3.

A.D. 388.

He makes ſome Laws in order to War.

Memiuit in L. 12. de Extraordinariis &c. Cod. Th. ad Theodorum Com. R. P. Dat. 15. Kal. Apr. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt. Emphyteuticarii.

70. We do not Read of any Expedition made by Gratian this Year; but that he apprehended the Occaſion of one, and probably feared the motions of the Barbarians towards the North, we cannot but believe from the Preparations he made this very Spring. For being now at Triers in Gall, he iſſued out Orders to the Præfect of Italy (to whom he gives the Attributes both of Vir Clariſſimus, and Illuſtris) for an Impoſition of extraordinary Services and Payments, and amongſt the reſt, “ for levying of men, and proviſion of Corn and Horſes in Italy, and the Suburbicarian “ parts. But from theſe extraordinary Services he will have ſecured the Tenants “ of his Patrimonial Lands, their Actors or Stewards, and ſuch as poſſeſſed them “ in perpetual Right. And from the finding of Tirones or New Soldiers, he alſo pri- “ vilegeth the Suburbicarian Parts, as he terms them, which were often befriended, and “ as we may believe, for the ſake of Rome, the Dioceſs of which they were accounted. The Corn and Horſes he commands to be haſtened in ſuch manner, as having “ Authority over theſe parts of Italy, and the Suburbicarian Provinces; for although Italy and Rome it ſelf had fallen to the ſhare of Valentinian his Brother (who himſelf made Laws alſo this Year, though hitherto not of that Conſequence ſo as we think fit to trouble the Reader with them) yet he being ſtill very young, he governed both thoſe quarters, and in Gall alſo. As this Law provides for the raiſing of Soldiers; there's another as neceſſary, which bears Date ſome four Months after, “ made againſt their running from their Colours; inflicting puniſhment on ſuch as “ ſhould conceal ſuch Fugitives, and propoſal of Rewards to thoſe that would diſco- “ ver them ſo offending. The Stewards or Managers of Lands offending in this “ point, it Condemns to no milder a Death than that of Fire; and the Lords of ſuch “ Eſtates it deprives of ſuch Grounds, as by their Deſign afforded them Lurking- “ holes, according to the ordinary Cuſtom of forfeiting Lands by procuring, or ad- “ mitting unlawful things to be done upon them. As for the Diſcoverers, if Slaves, “ it rewards them with freedome; if free, and of ordinary Condition, with Immu- “ nity from Civil Imployments; nay the very Offender, if he make himſelf known, “ it requites with Impunity; but inflicts Death upon him that lies concealed; and “ ſevere Puniſhment upon Governours of Provinces and their Officers, if Conniving. “ Now this Edict is as much to be aſcribed to one that has already raiſed an Army, as the other immediately preceding to him that is about making of Leavies; ſo that we can ſee no Reaſon why Learnd Gothofred ſhould imagine Gratian to have been Author of that, but Valentinian of this. The Propoſing of it at Rome, can no way evince it; for the Reaſon he himſelf alleages, why the Eldeſt Brother exerciſed his Authority in Italy and in that City.

Actores poſſeſſionum. L. 4. de Deſertor. Cod. Th. lib. 7. tit. 18. P. P. Id. Jul. Romæ. Et L. 1. Cod. Juſtin. eod. tit.

A.D. 381. Fl. Siagrio Fl. Annio Eucherio Coſs.

71. The following year, being the CCCLXXXI of our Lord, and the ſixth of Valentinian the ſecond, had for Conſuls Fl. Siagrius and Fl. Annius Eucherius. The Præfecti Prætorio mentioned under Theodoſius were Eutropius, Neotherius and Florus; and Syagrius under Valentinian. Gratian and Valentinian made their Abode at Milan, or Aquileia, and Theodoſius at Conſtantinople, till near the middle of July; toward the end of the year he removed from Heraclea to Adrianople, but returned back to Conſtantinople in the ſame Month of September, and there continuad all the reſt. “About this time it is that Zoſimus tells us how “ Gratian ſent one Vitalianus to Command the Legions of Illyricum, a man no whit “ able to ſuſtain any difficult or dangerous Enterprize. While he there lay, two “ Parties conſiſting of ſo many German Nations, beyond the Rhine, of which one “ was headed by Fritigern, and the other ſerved under Allothus and Safraces, ſo “ preſſed upon the Galls, that they conſtrained Gratian to give leave, that on con- “ dition they would quit the Gallick Regions, they might paſs the Iſter, and beſtow “ themſelves in Pannonia, and the upper Myſia; and this he granted out of his earneſt “ deſire to be rid of them, by reaſon of their continual Irruptions. They, to im- “ prove the opportunity croſſed the River, and through Pannonia, reſolved for Epi- “ rus; and paſſing over Achelous, to fall upon the Greek Cities; but, in order to “ this, Athanarich the chief of all the Royal Bloud of Scythia, they concluded was “ to be removed out of the way, that they might not leave an Enemy at their Back. “ Upon him they fell, and eaſily drove him out of thoſe places which he held, who “ Athanarich driven by the Germans out of his Country.

neſs. “

Dies and is Buried at Conſtantinople.

ſpeedily betook himſelf to Theodoſius, but lately recovered of a dangerous Sickneſs. The Emperour kindly received him, with all the Barbarians that accompanied him, going out of the City to meet him; at a good diſtance: And the Man dying not long after, he Buried him with Royal Pomp, and ſo great Magnificence, that all the Barbarians being aſtoniſhed at the Statelineſs of the Funeral, the Scythians returned home, reſolving no more to moleſt the Romans, ſo greatly did they admire the goodneſs of the Prince; and ſuch as came over with Athanarich ſet themſelves diligently to keep the Bank of the River, and a long time hindred all Incurſions from being made into the Roman Territories. Thus much writes Zoſimus concerning that Athanarich; who though he pretended his Father had made him ſwear, that he would never ſet Foot on Roman Ground; yet afterward laid his Bones on Roman Earth, coming to Conſtantinople on the thirteenth of January, and there dying on the twenty-fifth of the ſame Month. We ſee by this Story of Zoſimus, how the Germans preſſed upon the Gallick Nations, and about the ſame time that the two Laws lately mentioned concerning the Raiſing of Men and Proviſions, and againſt the concealing of Fugitives, were made; ſo that we need not ſeek for any other occaſion than this, nor any other Author than Gratian himſelf.

Theodoſius ſucceſsful by Confeſſion of Zoſimus and the Atteſtation of other Hiſtorians.

72. But, Zoſimus, proceeding in a reaſonable good humour, tells us, that at the ſame time ſome other things happened luckily to Theodoſius. For he overthrew in Battel the Scyri and Carpadocæ, which were mixed with the Hunns, and compelled them to repaſs the Iſter into their own Countries. Now again the Soldiers began to reaſſume their former Courage, and ſeemed to receive hope, notwithſtanding the miſchiefs that had formerly happened; the Husbandmen were incouraged to renew their Labours; there being free indiſturbed Paſture afforded to Flocks and Herds. And now the Hiſtorian condeſcends ſo far as to tell us that in this manner Theodoſius ſeemed to heal the former maladies of the State. And he adds, that Promotus at this time commanding the Army which conſiſted of Foot in the Province of Thrace, fell upon Oedotheus who had gathered together a vaſt Army, not only out of ſuch Nations as Bordered upon Iſter, but others moſt remote and unknown; and by this time was paſſing the River. But Promotus met him in his Paſſage both with his Foot on Land, and Boats upon the Water, and made ſo great Slaughter of his Men, that he filled the River with dead Bodies; and the ſlain that lay on dry Ground could not be numbred. What Zoſimus tell us of the ſucceſs of Theodoſius, is by others in general terms atteſted, and eſpecially what he writes of the Clemency and goodneſs of his Nature, concerning which we hear enough on all Hands. By the force and efficacy of this Weapon it was, not by Garriſons, Archers, or Armed Men, as Themiſtius tells him, not by Armenians or Spaniards, or by multitudes of Armed Horſes that he extinguiſhed the Scythian Flame; for it went out of it ſelf, by reaſon of his Prudence and good Advice. This is a Teſtimony given by one Pagan to another, to which if we may add what is further ſaid by an Hiſtorian of theſe ſame times, of our own Profeſſion; He writes further, that all the Nations of the Goths, by Zoſimus termed Scythians, after their Kings Death, beholding the Vertue and Mildneſs of Theodoſius, gave up themſelves to the Roman Empire. That in thoſe days alſo, the Perſians, who had ſufficiently inſulted for their Victory over Julian and other Emperours, and their late putting of Valens to flight, ſent Ambaſſadours on their own Accord to Conſtantinople, and in a ſuppliant manner deſired Peace. whereupon that League was made of which all the Eaſt, ſaith he, to this day, with ſo much Tranquillity, reaps the advantage. So he protected the Empire from its foreign Enemies. Now let us ſee how by Enacting wholſome Laws, this year, he contributed to this Protection, and further corrected the inward Diſtempers thereof.

Orat. 6.

Oraſius lib. 7. c. 34.

73. To the protection of the Province he contributed by publiſhing an Edict of the ſame import with that of Gratian, lately mentioned, againſt ſuch as harboured the Soldiers that ran from their Colours, impoſing the ſame puniſhment upon the Stewards and Agents, as alſo the ſame penalty upon the Owners of the Lands; and this we may gueſs was done in Order to the Scythian or Gothick War, which, for theſe three years, continued, notwithſtanding the induſtry uſed by the followers of Athanarich upon the Banks of Iſter, which Zoſimus mentions. The Imperial Authority could not ſupport the State except it was likewiſe ſupported by the Revenue; but this was leſſened by ſome Covetous perſons, who, poſſibly incouraged themſelves in their fraudulent practices, by hope of Impunity conceived from the Emperours Clemency. For we find that at this time it was become too frequent to cheat the publick, even by cutting down Trees and Vines, thereby to pretend Poverty and evade the Tax, in the Books whereof was uſually regiſtred what Trees were in a Field and what or how many Vines in a Vineyard. “ This Fraud he thought fit now to puniſh by no leſs a Cenſure than of death and confiſcation of Eſtate; with “ a caution not to trouble any Perſon that uſed that courſe meerly for the improvement “ of his Grounds; which ſeverity, however proper for the cheats of “ this preſent time, yet was thought too great to be continued, and therefore though the Law be taken into Juſtinians Code, yet the penalty is changed from Death and Confiſcation, to ſuch puniſhment as the Judge, having cogniſance of the cauſe, ſhould think fit. There was another Abuſe committed betwixt ſuch as managed the Publick money; and other perſons who were wont to borrow it of ſuch Officers; which proving very inconvenient in draining the Treaſury, ſo as it could not ſuffice for the publick charge, he forbids his Money either to be lent or borrowed. “ Such as ſhould borrow it either upon Bond or word of mouth, he puniſheth with confiſcation of Eſtate and perpetual Deportation; and thoſe “ who under Notion of publick Creditors ſhould either lend or give it, with no “ leſs than Death. This bears date on the one and twentieth of July, from Heraclea, whither he removed from Conſtantinople upon occaſion, as it's thought, of the War with the Scyri and Carpodacæ mentioned by Zoſimus. He took further notice this year, that the miſerable Provincials were haraſſed and compelled ſpeedily to pay their Taxes; and yet notwithſtanding, nothing or but little, often time came to the Treaſury, by reaſon that the Officers belonging to the Revenue trafiked and made their own Markets of it. “He inflicts death upon ſuch as ſhould ſo intervert the money, and upon Judges or Governors of Provinces; except “ after the receit of it, by their Officials they ſignified that it was committed to “ the publick Cuſtody at ſuch a diſtance as was uſual. And if the money were “ kept ten days longer by the Officers of the Comes Largitionum, or thoſe “ whoſe work it was to convey it, they ſhould fine in two hundred Parts of the “ value of the Summe.

L. 5. de deſertoribus Cod. Th. Dat. 16. Kal. Febr.

He makes ſevere Laws for vindicating his Revenue from groſs Abuſes.

L. 1. de Cenſitoribus Cod. Th. lib. 13. tit. 11. & L. 1. de Cenſibus & Cenſitoribus Cod. Juſt. plurimum interpolata.

L. 2. de His qui cum Diſpenſatore, &c. Cod. Th. lib. 10. tit. 24. Dat 12. Kal. Aug. ad Palladium Com. S. L. & L. 2. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

L 3. Cod. Th. eod. tit. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt. Nundinatione conſumitur.

74. Being removed from Heraclea to Adrianople, he could not, but, in his preparations againſt the Scythian Nations, take notice, that it was a thing ſo common in Illyricum and theſe Tracts for the Thumbs of men to be cut off (whence as we ſaid before, they had the name of Murci) that, almoſt incredible though it be, the Provincials could ſcarcely find any to ſerve in the Wars, but thoſe Fellows that were ſo mutilated. This he obſerves in an Edict directed to Eutropius the Prefect, to whom he gives order “ That ſuch Murci ſhould not thereby eſcape what they thought to avoid; but that it ſhould be free for the “ Provincials at the time of finding new Souldiers to preſent him with two of “ them in the room of one unmaimed, for he will force them to ſuſtain the burthens and labours of warfare; but be kept from the Dignities and Emoluments “ thereof. While Theodoſius, in this manner, imployed his time in the Eaſt, Valentinian in the Weſt, concerned himſelf for the Corporations in Africk, by a Law directed to Camenius or Carterius, the Vicar of that Dioceſs. There were ſome Diſputes raiſed about the manner of chuſing the Duumviri, and other Officers; as to which he declares “ That the uſual Cuſtom in the firſt place be obſerved, of having two parts of three of the Curiales preſent at ſuch Elections. “ But it was objected that four ſorts of men poſſibly might not be preſent at ſuch “ times; as ſome by reaſon of ſickneſs, others of old age; ſome were Clerks or in Orders, and others were abſent, and perhaps had deſerted their Stations: in Anſwer to all which he reſolves “ That in the reckoning of two parts of three “ thoſe that were abſent ſhould not be compriſed; but it ſhould be underſtood “ of two thirds of thoſe who were not letted by any of the four reaſons. Not long after the date of this Law we find Gratian ſetling the matter of Precedence betwixt thoſe that had obtained Honorary or Titular Dignities by Codicils, or Letters Patents, and ſuch as had really executed the Offices to which ſuch Honour of due belonged. He diſtinguiſheth betwixt thoſe that ſerved in his Court or Palace, and them that having had no employment there, had by begging, by making Intereſt, or otherwiſe obtained ſuch Letters, whereby the place of a Proconſul, a Vicar or Conſularis was conferred upon them. Now in reference to thoſe that were out of the Palace, he confirms that otherwiſe known “ and notorious Rule, that meerly Titular, or Honorary Dignities ſhould, though “ ſeniors in time, give place to thoſe, that had really been poſſeſſed of ſuch Offices.

Againſt the Murci.

Valentinian or Gratian makes a Law about Elections in Corporations.

About Precedence.

L. 10. de Tironibus Cod. Th. Dat. Non. Sept.

L. 84. de Decurionibus Cod. Th. P. P. Karthagine 15. Kal. Mart. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

L. 5. de Honorariis Codicilliis Cod. Th. lib. 6. tit. 22. Dat. 3. Kal. April. L. 2. de Proximus, &c. Cod. Th. l. 2. de Primicerio & Notariis Cod. Th. Honorarios ἐμπρακτοις, licet tempore poſterioribus cedere debere.

Sect.3.

A.D. 381.

75. But as for his own Palatine Officers, if they, as for Example a Primicerius of the Notaries, ſhould part from the Conſiſtory, or he who immediately followed him, as the Tribune or Notary, or other Notaries and Tribunes, or Domeſticks and Notaries, and obtain by Codicils the Dignities aforeſaid, they ſhould be preferred before ſuch as had exerciſed ſuch places, if ſo be they were of more ancient ſtanding. In like manner he reſolves that the Proximi of the Scrinia, and the Magiſtri Diſpoſitionum ſhall be ſo equalled with thoſe of the order of Vicars, that if they firſt were diſmiſſed out of the Palace, with this honorary Dignity, they ſhall precede others who had really diſcharged this place and Truſt. But, as to the Notaries, we are to know further, that the Primicerius and Secundocerius, at their diſmiſſion, were preferred before Vicars, and made equal to Proconſuls; the other Tribunes and Notaries were made of the ſame Rank with Vicars; and the Domeſticks and Notaries (for there were theſe three Ranks amongſt them) with Conſulares. This ſame year Theodoſius, as by conſent, made two Edicts concerning the ſame Subjecte, one whereof being next in order in the Code to that made by Gratian concerning the Notaries, differs little from it, but only in this "That he will have the Dignity of the Primicerii to have its original from the very time of their entring the Office of Primicerius and Tribune. As alſo that he will not have the Prætorian Tribunes and Notaries to be taken for Perſons of the ſame Rank and Quality, as to be ranked with Proconſuls, but in the next Degree with the Comites of the Eaſt, or Egypt; for theſe two were next in Degree to the Proconſuls, as alſo the Comes of Pontica, but ſuperior to all other Comites, Duces, Vicars and Conſulares. Now the Tribune of the Prætorian Notaries was the ſame thing amongſt the Notaries of the Præfecti Prætorio, as the Primicerius now ſpoken of amongſt the Notaries of the Prince. In like manner next in the Code to the Edict of Gratian concerning the place of ſuch as had without the Palace by Letters obtained Dignities, we find one of Theodoſius immediately following, and concerning the ſame matter to the ſame purpoſe. "For he will by no means ſuffer ſuch as lie in the ſhade, and rather by favour than any good deſert, have obtained Honorary and Titular Dignities (ſo did not they that ſerved in the Palace) to be ranked in the ſame degree and quality with Perſons who by their Actions or worthy diſcharging of their Imployments had commended their memories to Immortality. The laſt Edict which the Code preſents us with this year is another of Valentinian, to conſtrain ſuch as were bound to make an Annual payment of or for Proviſions to the City of Rome, to diſcharge their Duty; ordaining "That if they paid it not within the year, they ſhould forfeit as much more, and if afterward they delayed, fourfold as much. For it is to be known that certain Provinces paid a yearly Tribute to the Treaſury or Chamber of Rome, with which Corn was bought in Spain and Ægypt. The Tribute was wont to be behind, and therefore, the Poſſeſſors of the grounds were intended to be quickned up by this Conſtitution.

L. 3. de Primicerio & Notariis Cod. Th. Dat. Conſtantinop.

L. 6. de Honorariis Codicillis Cod. Th.

Valentinian concerns himſelf for furniſhing Rome with Neceſſaries.

L. 18. de Annona & Tributis Cod. Th. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

Chron. Cod. Th. ad h. An.

A.D. 382.

Fl. Antonio & Fl. Siagrio Coſs.

76. The CCCLXXXII year of our Lord had for Conſuls Fl. Antonius, and Fl. Siagrius the ſecond time; it being the ſeventh of Valentinian the ſecond, and the tenth Indiction. The Præfectus Prætorio under Theodoſius was Florus; and under Gratian and Valentinian, were Severus, Siagrius and Hypatius: Proculus was both this, and the former year, Comes of the Eaſt, and Palladius was Præfectus Auguſtalis of Ægypt. Theodoſius the Emperor continued this year at Conſtantinople, and there, on the one and twentieth day of February intombed the Body of Valentinian his Predeceſſor. In the beginning of the year he conſidered of an uſeful and material point for the keeping of good Order and Decorum amongſt the People, viz. what ſorts of Clothes were fit to be worn in this City; particularly by Senators, Officiales and Slaves, who were wont, by promiſcuous and common Uſe of Garments, to make themſelves little differ in appearance both from other Perſons, and amongſt themſelves. This laudable Reformation had been formerly and ſeriouſly thought of by Alexander Severus, who purpoſed to aſſign to all Ranks and Degrees their ſeveral Habits, that they might thereby be known and diſtinguiſhed; eſpecially to put a mark of diſtinction upon Slaves, to prevent all Sedition by reaſon of them; and that they might be diſcerned from Perſons of Quality and of ingenuous condition. But the Project did not pleaſe Ulpian and Paulus, the great Lawyers of that Age, who alleaged that it would give occaſion to quarrels, if men were, by ſuch marks, made liable to Affronts; whereupon, that Emperor contented himſelf with cauſing thoſe of Equeſtrian Rank to be diſtinguiſhed by the kinds of their Clavus or Studds; and permitting old men to make Uſe of Penulæ or Cloaks, Mantles, or a kind of Garment only proper for a Journey and bad Weather, but forbade Women to wear them in the City, though in Travelling they might do it with Allowance. But, whatever Ulpian and Paulus might think, moſt indecorous both it was and is, that all Perſons ſhould confuſedly wear the ſame Apparel, that a Slave or Footman ſhould not be known from his Lord or Maſter, nor a Kitchin-wench from her Lady. In the beſt times Governours have been careful to reſtrain extravagancy in this kind; neither hath ſuch great Inconvenience followed by Affronts offered from one ſort of Perſons to another; for Slaves and inferiour Perſons may be known by other tokens; as by following their Maſters, and by ſervile works about the Streets, if any have ſuch deſire to quarrel with them.

Theodoſius reſtrains liberty in Apparel in three ſorts of men.

Senators.

L. de Habitu quo uti oportet. intra Urbem Cod. Th. lib. 14. tit. 10. Abeſt. hic tit. à Cod. Juſt.

A κολοβὸς Curtax mutilus, truncus.

77. Therefore both in Old Rome and in the New, or Conſtantinople, certain Perſons were diſtinguiſhed by their Apparel; ſo as they might be known when one met them; which was by commanding or permitting certain ſorts of Cloaths to be worn by certain Perſons, and prohibiting the Uſe of them unto others. Both of theſe are injoyned by Theodoſius in his new Law to the three ſorts of men before mentioned. As for Senators, the wearing of ſome Apparel is forbid them; the Uſe of another ſort is permitted them; and in a certain Caſe neceſſity of one kind of Habit is injoyned them. It was grown a faſhion now for Senators and Gentlemen to wear the Chlamys , or Souldiers Coat in the City, either for that they thought it more gentile or leſs cumberſom than the Gown; “but for as much as it is was the Military Habit, he commands it to be left off, and that in the City, which was the Metropolis or Head of the Eaſtern Empire, in a time of peace, the Robe of Peace and Civil Habit, viz. the Gown or other civil Garment ſhould be worn, as well in the Morning as other times of the day, though the Senators thought they might, when they went to give the Emperor good Morrow, appear in that ſort of Garb. “But hereby he doth not infringe their liberty of wearing the Chalmys out of the Town, and neither forbid it the Palatine Dignities or Officers which had been long wont to wear it in the City. Together with the Gown he will have Senators known by the Colobium and Penula. Colobium was a ſhort Coat without Sleeves, or elſe ſuch as reached not to their Elbows, which as well as Shoes, it was not lawful for Slaves to wear; and beſides it was ſtudded or wrought with Purple. Penula was a ſort of Cloak, Mantle or great Coat, with an Hood or Capouche made of coarſer Cloath, and fit only for cold and rainy Weather, as the Colobium for fair and ſerene, and therefore within the City the Emperor permits them the Uſe of it, which came firſt out of Greece, where it was uſed in theſe Caſes as well as in Travel. In Rome it was firſt worn in wet weather by the Tribuni Plebis, and from them came ſhortly to be taken up by other Perſons, at the ſight of Plays and at Funerals, and as warm and convenient by old men; to whom Alexander Severus, as we ſaid, permitted the Uſe of it; but forbade it women except in a Journey. Then at length came it to be the common Wear of all that ſo pleaſed; eſpecially of Senators, who, as their Colobia, had alſo their Penulæ diſtinguiſhed by Purple. Theſe two kinds of Cloaths they might wear in the City without the Gown; but he expreſly commands “that in the Senate and in places of Judicature the Gown ſhall be uſed, and the other thrown off, when Senators were thither ſummoned or have any Cauſe to be tryed. In former Ages all Romans were known by the Gown, it was a Gens togata. But they became weary of it by degrees, and Senators would often appear in the Senate-Houſe in their Purple Penulæ. Adrian indeavoured to bring both Senators and Equites to appear always in publick in their Gowns, except they came from Supper; but foreign Faſhions and new Dreſſes got ſuch ground, that Theodoſius was well content, if in the Senate-Houſe and Courts, he could but reſtore this grave and ancient Habit.

Officials of Judges.

78. The next ſort of men he endeavours to reform are the Apparitors, or the Officials of Judges, or publick Miniſters; to whom he aſſigns three ſorts of Garments. The firſt is an Inward Caſſock or Coat, which he will ever have girt with a Girdle, as was wont of old to be the faſhion for ſuch men, and indeed all others; eſpecially when they went about any ſerious buſineſs. Provided they were but thus habited underneath, he allows them the Uſe of the Penula above; but then they muſt alſo wear upon their Breaſt a Pallium or Breaſt-cloth of divers colours, thereby to make known their Condition. For in Garments of divers colours, publick Servants and Officers were wont of old time to go, and not much above an hundred years ſince, by an Arreſt of the Parliament of Paris, it was decreed that

Sect. 4.

Slaves.

Bailiffs ſhould ſerve no Proceſſes, or Writs, except ſo cloathed; a ſhow of which we retain ſtill in England, in the Coats of the Officers, or Servants belonging to our Serjeants at Law, who attend them firſt to Weſtminſter-Hall in their ſolemn paſſage through the ſtreets; and afterwards alſo for ſome time, in party coloured Coats. In the laſt place he regulates the Habit of Slaves, which was uſually wont to be diſtinguiſhed from that of other Perſons. “He forbids them the Uſe of other Clothes wont to be worn by perſons of free Condition, only permits “ them the Uſe of thoſe called Byrrhi and Cuculli; which though not properly be“longing to them, yet were, it ſeems, accounted the meaneſt, and vileſt ſort of Wears. The Byrrhus was a ſort of Cloſe Coat, for its ſtraitneſs and uneaſineſs much deſpiſed; and the Cucullus was not that Covering of the Head, Cowl or Capouche, which hath more lately gone under that Name, but a mean and coarſe covering, though with ſuch a Capouch ſet to the Neck of it. Now for the penalty (without which a Law is without a ſting) he will have ſuch Senators “ as neglect to obſerve it, deprived of their Senatorian Dignity, and of power to “ ſit in the Senate; and foraſmuch as he thinks the Condition of Officials, and “ Slaves not capable of ſhame, he ſubjects them to the pain of baniſhment. And “ whereas the Cenſuales of the City, or the Officers under the Magiſter Cenſus, as “ we have ſeen already in the Caſe of Students, were the Keepers of publick “ Decorum and Demeanour; he impoſeth a Fine of Twenty pounds of Gold upon “ their Company; if knowing any to tranſgreſs this ſtatute, they reveal it not, “ whither out of connivance, or by money bribed to hold their peace.

L. 6. de Diverſis Reſceptis Cod. Th. lib. 1. tit. 2. Dat. Conſt. 7. Kal. Mart. ad Florum, P. P.

He becomes more ſevere,

L. 90. de Decurionibus Cod Th. Dat. Conſt. 8. Id. Martis Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

Againſt Senators that had been Curiales.

Againſt Agentes in Rebus.

L. 4. de Agentibus in Rebus Cod. Th. Dat. Conſt. 12. Kal. April. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

And Numerarii.

L. 13. de Numerriis Actuariis &c. Cod. Th. Dat. ad Florum, P. P. Conſt. 18. Kal. Octobr. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

L. 12. Eod. tit. Cod. Th. Dat. Conſt. 3. Kal. April. Omnibus Rectoribus Provinciarum & L. 2. Cod. Juſt. Eod. tit.

79. But for all this, ſo mildly did Theodoſius behave himſelf, that thence ill diſpoſed people ſtill took occaſion to defraud the Publick, and abuſe his Clemency. When they owed Money or Tribute to the Treaſury, they procured from him Receipts to the Officers, whereby reſpite was granted for payment of the Debt; of which inconvenience, he became now ſo far convinced, that by an Edict he declared all ſuch Receipts to be Void and Null. And now, whether he reſolved to be more ſevere, or was put upon it by Proculus, the Comes of the Eaſt, againſt whoſe Cruel and Tyranical Diſpoſition Libanius inveighs; or elſe induced thereto by the great Regard he had to the good and emolument of the Curiæ; he declared by another Edict, directed to the ſaid Proculus, that all ſuch as had within Twenty years, from the tenth Conſulſhip of Conſtantius, and the third of Julian, been advanced from Curiales to the Senatorian Degree; ſhould either be compelled to perform the Services due to the Curiæ, or if they had already diſcharged them, to ſubſtitute ſome in their Rooms, to repreſent them to the ſaid Courts; which Law was purpoſely deſigned for the Corporation of Antioch. About this time, he ſeems to have received ſome complaints againſt the Agentes in Rebus, the Rapines and adulteries of which ſort of men, as we have formerly ſeen, were frequent; which cauſed him to give directions to Palladius, the Magiſter Officiorum, for the careful choice of them, and great caution in their promotion. For their firſt Reception he will have none admitted, though he come with the Prince his Recommendation, without due Inquiſition firſt made into his Manners, and Original; and that in the preſence of the major part of the Schole, or Com“pany. Then for their Promotion, that ſuch as are received be not promoted to “ the firſt ſtep of Preferment, or that of Horſemen, till after five years ſervice, “ wherein they have been imployed in frequent Miſſions. And the Promotion to “ each Degree as they fall in Order, muſt not be per ſaltum, as neither without “ the approbation, and conſent of good and honeſt men. His hand being in, this year for Reformation, he extended it from that of the Agentes in Rebus, againſt the Inſolence, Covetouſneſs, and Rapacity of the Numerarii, whom he permits “ not to adore the People, or to come out of their Offices, till they have ſpent “ full three years therein; whereas before, two years ſufficed to that ſervice. But “ when they were out, they aſpired to Higher Dignities, and thereby eſcaped that ſtrict Examination, and Inquiry, which even by tortures there was need to be made into their Manners and Deportments, which were often ſo bad, that inſtead of theſe three, five years were afterward required of them, within which they could not forſake that ſtation, nor make a ſtep into that of Domeſticks, which they ſo much deſired. This he did for the Quiet of the people; having for their caſe, before this, Ordained that of theſe Numerarii (or Tabularii, as they are al“ſo called) ſhould be Ordained two in every Province; whereof one ſhould “ take the Accounts of ſuch matters as fell, or belonged to the Cheſt of the “ Comes Rei privatæ, and the other, thoſe appertaining to the other Treaſurer, or “

Comes Largitionum, that all Confuſion might be removed, and this under a great penalty he enjoyned all Governours of Provinces to ſee obſerved, the Edict being to them directed. In Concluſion, to prevent any miſchief, while they were in the Provinces, he forbade their buying any thing, or making any other contract.

L. 7. de iis quæ Adminiſtrantibus. Cod. Th. Conjungend. cum 18. de Numerariis, Abeſt à Cod Juſt.

Forbids Paragandæ of Gold

L. L. 1. 2. de veſtibus Oloveris & Auratis Cod. Th. lib. 10. tit. 21. & L. L. 1. 2. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

80. Another extravagant faſhion in Apparel he reformed about this time, wherewith whole Patrimonies were exhauſted, both by Men and Women. There was a ſort of Lace, or Border called Paraganda, ſometime made of Linnen, ſometime of Silk, or of Golden Twiſt; which by former Emperors had been permitted to be worn by Tribunes, and Officers of the Army; and afterwards was uſed by Chariot-drivers at the Circenſian Games in the time of Conſtantius: Women delighting alſo much to be ſeen in this kind of Dreſs. But Valens taking notice of the Abuſe, had forbidden the Uſe both of thoſe of Gold and Silk, as well to Women as to Men, and would have them made only in his own Gynæcia or Work-houſes: And now Theodoſius renewed the Prohibition, as to theſe golden Paragaudæ, both in Coats, (tunicis) and in Linnen Garments; ſo expenſive and Gaudy they were. For we may with as much reaſon, derive our word Gaudy from the Parthian Paragauda, as the Spaniards do their Brocado, and the French their Broche d'or; and with much more. Thus our Emperor laboured to Correct the Diſorders of the times; but ſtill had his Eye upon the Governors of Provinces, upon whoſe Demeanour the good of the People ſubject to their Juriſdiction did chiefly depend, as to the Adminiſtration of Juſtice and other matters. To make their Sentences in Judicature more ſolemn and conſiderate; he renewed the order made by Valentinian, or brought it into the Eaſt, that they ſhould ever be written, and out of writing read, or pronounced, though given by the greateſt Perſons, the Illuſtrious Præfects themſelves, to one of whom, Clearchus, he directs his Mandate; telling him, it is fitting that his Highneſs obey his Imperial Laws. But at this time was diſcovered to him how one Natalis, formerly Dux of Sardinia, had (probably during the Reign of Valens) wronged and ſpoiled the People of that Province, and it ſeems, was got away before the complaints of the oppreſſed could reach the Ears of thoſe to whom it belonged to redreſs ſuch grievances. Theodoſius conſidering of the matter, reſolved it was the beſt courſe to ſend him back into the Iſland; the complaints of the miſerable Provincials, either never, or ſeldom, coming to the knowledge of the Prince, at leaſt very late; and ſuch as were appointed to hear them, often miſcarrying in their Intelligence, as well as he, by reaſon that witneſſes, or poſſibly the parties themſelves, were unable to travel. For this cauſe it was afterward ordained that the Chancellors, and Domeſticks of the Judges, ſhould for ſome time, ſtay in the Provinces, after their time was expired; nay, afterwards the Governors themſelves, ſometimes three moneths, ſometimes thirty days; and that in the Metropoles, or Towns of greateſt concourſe, that there they might receive either the applauſe of their good Government, or be liable to the objections of Rapine, or other faults of their male Adminiſtration; and if they were got away, and endeavoured to conceal the guilt of which they were conſcious, they ſhould be apprehended, and ſent back into the Province, there to continue for four months together.

Ordains that the Sentences of Judges be Written.

L. 2. de Sententiis ex periculo recitandis. Cod. Th. Dat. Conſt. 16. Kal. Jun. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt. Parere Sublimitatem tuam noſtris legibus convenit.

Sends back Natalis who had been Dux of Sardinia into his Province.

L. 3. ad Legem Juliam Repetundarum Cod. Th. Dat. Prid. Id. Jun. Conſt. & L. 1. Cod. Juſt. Eod. tit.

81. The firſt indeed that began this wholeſome courſe, was the Emperor Valens; but with the Numerarii or Tabularii only, not medling with Governors of Provinces, or their Domeſticks. Them he ordered to ſtay a year or two in the Province, to give account of their ſloth and neglect, and this at length was drawn into example, and applied to the Judges themſelves. Theodoſius now, as to the Caſe in hand, as well provided for the Relief of the Provincials, by cauſing the Offender to be conveyed back, and that under Cuſtody of the Protectors, (to whom often was committed the Proſecution and charge of Criminal Perſons) and there to be puniſhed two ſeveral ways. For he will not only have him anſwer what Injury he had done himſelf, but the inſolences committed by his Officers and meaner followers, a thing not heard of before, that a Judge ſhould anſwer the Thefts and Rapines of his Miniſters, (who themſelves might be called to account) though what his Wife did amiſs, was wont to be required at his Hands. But whereas by means of their Attendants, they were wont to Haraſs the People, or at leaſt to Connive at their Inſolence and Oppreſſions; he makes this Man lyable to the miſcarriages, not only of his Domeſticks, who were choſen by the publick, but of his very meaneſt menial ſervants. The Fine it ſelf he appoints to be the fourfold value of the loſs ſuſtained by the Party, who it ſeems alſo was to have the benefit of it; that being the ordinary Fine for Theft and Rapine, as alſo of Bribery and Cheating. This Edict is directed to one of the Succeſſors of this Natalis, by the Name of Matronianus, Dux and Præſes of Sardinia; for ſome (of the ſmaller) Provinces had the ſame Perſons, ſometimes both Duces and Præſides; that is, both Civil and Military Officers. And whereas Sardinia was the Province; we may take notice, that at this time this Iſland belonged to Theodoſius, his Diſtrict, or to the Eaſtern Empire; though afterward it appertained to the Weſtern: Firſt, to the Dioceſs of Italy, and at length of Africk. One might imagine that this Law, which though made upon the occaſion of Natalis his Miſdemeanors, yet was to ſtand good againſt others, for the time to come, (and accordingly it was put into the Code of Juſtinian) might have ſeemed ſufficient to the Law-maker to reſtrain this Rapacity. Yet three months had not paſſed, e're he, not ſatisfied with what he had done, declared by another, directed to Florus his Præfectus Prætorio, that the Heirs of ſuch Offenders dying, ſhould incur the ſame penalty, though they themſelves had neither been condemned nor called to Account. This indeed had been formerly Law as to this Crime; but the Suit was to be commenced againſt the Heir, within the term of one year, whereas he will have the Action lye indefinitely.

L. 4. Cod. Th. Eod. tit. & L. 2. Cod. Juſt. Dat. 10. Kal. Sept.

He ſhows great care for Corporations.

L.L. 91. 92. 93. de Decurionibus Cod. Th. latæ hoc Anno.

82. Great care he ſhewed at this time of the Corporations, from the ſervice of which he would have none excuſed, but they muſt diſcharge what already was “ Incumbent on them, and ſubſtitute fit Perſons in their places. Nay, all Senators “ that from Curiales had obtained that Dignity; he will have Clearchus Præfect of “ Conſtantinople to remand to their ſeveral Courts, and not them only, but all their “ Sons, although begotten during their Senatorian qualities. And, as if they retained ſtill as much Dignity by being Members of the Senates of theſe Ordinary Cities, as if they had been Senators ſtill of the two Imperial Seats, he commands that none of them diſgrace their liberty and quality by being Bailiffs, or by managing “ the Lands of other men, a matter in thoſe days appertaining to thoſe of “ Servile condition; and this under no leſs penalty than that of Deportation to “ him that undertakes the Service, and to the owner of the Eſtate, the loſs of his “ whole Patrimony. So ſevere was he to thoſe who made themſelves a kind of ſlaves, and got new Lords for Profit or Advantage: And as ſharp he ſhewed himſelf againſt ſuch as were ſlaves indeed, but would be rid of their Service, and their Lords together. In the Province of Lydia, ſome accuſed their Maſters and that out of Hope of Impunity upon proof of what they objected. But upon Conſultation of Panellinus the Conſularis, he appoints that ſuch Traitors be put to death, notwithſtanding they made good their Charge, which muſt be underſtood, except the crime was of the Nature of High Treaſon; for then the leſſer was obſcured by the greater. But as Theodoſius ſhewed himſelf ſharp againſt ſlaves that betrayed private men, Valentinian exerciſed wholeſome ſeverity againſt ſuch Perſons as offered thoſe that were Knaves, or Cowards, to publick Military ſervice; which was become ſo common, that, of them he required the value of ſuch a Tiro or “ new Soldier, as ſhould run away within one year after their liſting; ſuch as “ ſhould conceal them, in conformity to former Laws, he will have, if Stewards, “ to be burnt alive; and if Maſters, to forfeit the Lands in which they were “ concealed. And whereas the Sons of Primipilares were obnoxious to the Service of Officials, as well as their Fathers, as the Emperors in other Caſes of deſerted “ Military imployments require money to be given, ſo alſo in this civil one, to “ make amends for that injury otherwiſe offered to the Common-wealth. At this “ time alſo, ſo notable for Deſertions; complaint was made that many of the Curiales had forſaken their Stations at Carthage. Such as had already done it he excuſeth, if ſo be they had ſerved in the Militia Armata four years, and thirty in that “ called Militia Palatina, as Protectors, or Domeſticks; but for the time to come “ he forbids either ſort of imployment to afford them matter of excuſe, and that “ by an Edict ſent to Syagrius his Præfectus Prætorio, who was a Perſon taken “ notice of for his favour to all Palatines, or Courtiers: To him this year by another “ Law he gave Order that the Sons of Curiales ſhould follow the Condition “ of their Father; though their Grand-fathers, and Anceſtors were free from any “ ſuch Obligation. And that the Sons of veteran Soldiers, if unfit for War, “ given to idleneſs, or rendered unexcuſable by debility of body, ſhould not eſcape “ the ſervices of the Courts.

Great ſeverity againſt Slaves that betrayed their Maſters.

L. 17. de Petitionibus &c. Cod. Th. & L. 6. Cod. Juſt. de Delatoribus Dat. 17. Kal. Nov. Conſt.

Valentinian alſo ſevere againſt ſuch as ſent in unfit men for War.

L. 6. de Deſertoribus, Cod. Th. P. P. Romæ 4 Non. April.

L. 13. de Cohortalibus, &c. Dat. ad Severũ P. v. 3. Non. April. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

And againſt ſuch Curiales as deſerted their Stations.

L. 88. de Decurion. Cod. Th. P. P. 5. Id. April. Carthag. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

L. 89. Eod. tit.

83. The Provincials of Africk he further pleaſed this year, as by other Edicts, ſo eſpecially by one directed to Proconſuls, Vicars, and other Governours, whereby he Orders of the Præfecti Prætorio, for Taxes to be confirmed by the Emperors.

L. un. deſuper indicto Cod. Th. lib. 11. tit. 6. Dat. 7. Kal. Jun. Med. & L. unic. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

A Law againſt ſturdy Beggars in Rome.

L. un. de Mendicantibus non Invalidis. Cod. Th. lib. 14. tit. 18. Dat. 12. Kal. Jul. Patavi. & L. unic. Cod. Juſt. Eod. tit.

he forbad them to obey the Letters of the Præfecti Prætorio, when they laid “ new or extraordinary Impoſitions upon the Provinces; except they were confirmed “ by Warrant of the Prince himſelf. And as acceptable a Law he ſent to “ Rome not long after, directed to Severus the Præfectus Prætorio, (or of that “ City) for baniſhing thence all Luſty and Sturdy Beggars. The greatneſs of the Place afforded now ſuch reception, and concealment to multitudes of People, that ſlaves, and labourers, who were weary of ſervice, reſorted thither out of the Provinces, hoping to find ſhelter for their ſloth; which thing, very inconvenient at all times, was now the more intolerable; for that in thoſe days, this City was often pinched with Want, and this conſtrained the Magiſtrates to expel the Town all vagrants and uſeleſs Perſons. He commands that thoſe Beggars be diſcovered, “ apprehended and ſearched, whether they were healthful and able to work; “ if ſuch they were found, and diſcovered to be of ſervile condition, they ſhould “ be forced back to ſlavery; if found to be free, but in ſervice they ſhould be “ remanded to that (perpetual) ſervice or labour at Husbandry, called Colonatus; “ and ſo both ſorts remain either ſlaves, or ſervants to the diſcoverers; which was an effectual courſe to have the City ſwept of ſuch Vermine. We may add that the Chriſtian Religion by its Principles, and Precepts inclining the Profeſſors thereof to more than common Charity; ſuch Rogues abuſed the opportunity which the truly poor and indigent thence had for Relief, and beſieged thoſe places about the Vatican, and the Church of the Apoſtles eſpecially; where they wrought by their hypocritical complaints upon thoſe that were compaſſionately inclin'd, whether Eccleſiaſticks or others. And St. Ambroſe, Biſhop of Milan, writing hereof at this very time, adviſes Clergy-men not to imploy their Charity upon ſuch undeſerving perſons, but to be careful and circumſpect upon whom it was they beſtowed their Alms.

Extraordinary Taxes, and ſordid Imployments impoſed in Italy.

L. 13. de extraordinariis ſive ſordidis Cod. Th. Id. Apr. P. P. Carthagine, & L. Perpetuæ, 10 Cod. Juſt. de excuſ. muner.

L. 14. Cod. Th. eod. tit. Lecta 3. Kal. Sept. Capuæ, & L. eos qui. 11. Cod Juſt. de excuſation. muner.

84. What we have lately obſerved out of Zoſimus concerning the Motions in Illyricum, and Vitalianus being ſent to command there, ſome think to have fallen out about this time. For throughout the Provinces of Italy, as well as in other places, were new extraordinary Taxes, and ſordid Imployments impoſed upon the people; which, as Valentinian took care that they might not be without his knowledge and conſent, and thence occaſion given to the Rapacity of his Officers; So he took ſome pains to diſtinguiſh betwixt Things and Things, Perſons and Perſons; that all alike, and confuſedly might not be obliged to the ſame ſervices. Therefore in the firſt place, he gives order to Hypatius the Præfectus Prætorio, “ that his Lands in Africk, particularly thoſe called Emphyteuticæ, or held by Tenants “ in perpetual Right, ſhould not be ſubject to extraordinary ſervices; becauſe “ in way of exchange, and to be excuſed from theſe impoſitions, beſides “ the ordinary finding of Corn and other things, they paid a conſtant and certain “ Rent in Gold. And whereas the ſetting out of Men and Horſes was now uſed and preſſed upon the Provincials, for the expedition of Illyricum, or for that Relief which Theodoſius had required of him and Gratian; theſe belonging to the Court were, it ſeems, alſo named to contribute towards the Supply, which cauſed them to betake themſelves to him by Petition, that they might enjoy their wonted Priviledges. This he grants them Commanding by an Edict directed to Syagrius “ the Præfectus Prætorio, that the Comites, or Magiſtri Memoriæ, Epiſtolarum “ and Libellorum; as alſo thoſe who wrote in their ſeveral Offices, and diſpatched the “ Anſwers of the Prince, ſhould be free from all vile and ſordid Services, and alſo “ from finding of Men, and money in lieu of them as in former times. This Priviledge “ he alſo extends to them when gone from their Imployments, or raiſed to “ higher Dignities; who by other Conſtitutions were excuſed from the ſetting “ out of Horſes alſo for publick Service. “

None to be excuſed from extraordinary Payments.

But from ſordid Services, eight ſorts of Perſons.

Culmina dignitatum.

L. 15. de extraordinariis ſive ſordidis Cod. Th. Dat. ad Hypatium 5. Id. Decemb. & L. maximam 12. Cod. Juſt. de excuſation. munerum.

85. But ſo preſſing ſtill continued the Affairs of Illyricum, that by another Law publiſhed toward the end of the year; he expreſly forbad Hypatius to excuſe any Perſons, of any condition whatſoever, from extraordinary Payments or Preſtations, ſo as no Petition or Pretence ſhould by any be made Uſe of. But as for baſe “ or ſordid Services, or Imployments; he thinks fit to excuſe no leſs than eight “ ſorts of men. Such he terms the Heights of Dignities, viz. the Illuſtrious Perſons, “ whether Civil or Military, ſo often enumerated by us, the Prefects of both ſorts, “ Magiſtri Militum, the two Comites Largitionum, & Rerum Privatarum, the Quæſtor, “ & Magiſter Officiorum. In the next place the Conſiſtorian Comites; next, the Notaries; “ thoſe belonging to his Chamber, as Cubicularii and Excubicularii alſo; “ and all the Palatines, and Military Men in the Palace; provided they could ſhow “ that

Sect.3.

A. D. 1 8 3.

that ſuch Immunity did formerly belong to their Body, Company, or Dignity. “ This Immunity he alſo extends to Churches, or rather leaves part of what he “ found unto them; for they were wont to be excuſed both from baſe, and extraordinary “ Services, by the Conſtitutions of preceding Princes; but as from the “ one he now quits them, ſo he leaves them ſubject unto the other by this Law. “ And in the laſt place he mentions Rhetoricians and Grammarians, both in the “ Greek and Latine Tongues. Having told what Perſons he will have excuſed, “ he then declares the Particulars from what he excuſes them, and enumerates “ ſome fourteen which he calls by the name of ſordid Services. Theſe were Imployments “ about Meal, Baking of Bread, and others relating to the publick “ Bake-houſe: The finding of Carriage Beaſts, and of labouring at the conveyance of “ Materials, or other publick works; burning of Lime; furniſhing of Timber for “ Ships, Wood for Spears and Arrows, and Boards or Planks, all for the Service “ of the Army; finding of Coals for the Mints or publick Forges, or other extraordinary “ works; labouring at the raiſing or repairing of publick Buildings; “ the charge of Hoſpitals; the care of High-wayes and Bridges; ſetting out Tirones “ or Men to the War, or elſe paying the uſual ſum of money in room thereof; “ and laſtly, contributing to the expence of Meſſengers ſent to the Court, and “ thoſe that Collected and Conveyed the Tributes to the Treaſury. From all “ theſe he excuſeth the Perſons before named, with theſe Reſtrictions, that when “ there is need of ſupplying the Army, lying upon the Limit of Rhætia, Excuſe ſhall not be admitted from lading of Horſes and Carriages; for it was expoſed to the Incurſions of the Allemans; and for that reaſon had its peculiar Dux to look to the ſecurity of it, who at this very time had Imployment enough, though aſſiſted by whole Legions, the work of which it was to be Convoys to ſuch Proviſions as were ſent to theſe diſtant and dangerous places. Then he declares that “ the Immunity hereby granted ſhall be underſtood to be Perſonal, ſo as only to “ continue for life, and not extend to their Wives or Heirs. And he excepts from “ this Immunity ſuch as were obnoxious to finding Coals, provided it were for “ the Mints and making of Arms.

Sordid Services what.

86. We ſhall further obſerve in reference to theſe three Laws, that they are directed to two ſeveral Præfecti Prætorio, viz. Hypatius and Syagrius. Syagrius ſeems to have been Præfect of Italy; for, the Edict which to him is directed, is ſaid to have been read at Capua. Now, what was ſaid concerning the Plurality of Emperors before Conſtantine, may here be applied to this time; That it cauſed more Præfecti Prætorio in number to be made; to which this may be added that Gratian alſo having governed in the Diſtrict of Valentinian his Brother, by reaſon of his Non-age, ſeems even ſtill to have had a ſhare in the publick Adminiſtration of Italy; the Præfectſhip whereof at this time is obſerved to have been cut and divided into ſeveral parts, though formerly one and the ſame intirely. Therefore Syagrius is thought to have commanded only in that part of Italy lying to the Right Hand of Rome, as Campania, (of which Capua was the Metropolis) Apulia, Calabria, Lucania and Brutii. As for Hypatius, to whom the firſt and the laſt Conſtitutions about theſe Services are directed; the former being ſaid to have been publiſhed at Carthage, he ſeems to have had Africk for his ſhare. And this muſt be that Hypatius of whom Ammianus Marcellinus makes mention, Commending him for the ſweetneſs of his Diſpoſition, and affirming him to have brought both Glory to his Anceſtors, and Dignity to his Poſterity, by the Acts of his Twofold Præfectſhip. Whereas he ſpeaks of two Præfectſhips, the one of the City he executed two years ago, viz. in the year CCCLXXIX. and the laſt of the Prætorium in that whereof we now write; of which Ammianus ſpeaking as but lately paſt, and calling him Noſter Hypatius, as a familiar and intimate Friend; it is rationally concluded that he wrote his Hiſtory about this very time. To this ſame Hypatius, this Emperour Valentinian directed another Edict five days after the Date of the laſt; in behalf of thoſe that belonged to the four Scrinia, or Offices in the Palace ſo often ſpoken of. “ Thereby he ſignifies that he had cauſed a Levy “ of Horſes to be made for the War, at the Expence of the Honorati; but from “ that Burthen he diſcharges them, both for the preſent, and the time to come. “ The occaſion of this Levy of Horſes was for the Illyrican Expedition, or elſe for the defenſe of Valentinian his own Territories, from the Inrode of the Marcomanni, Quadi, and Juthungi; which in thoſe days moleſted the Borders of Rhætia, and of Illyricum. The Law it ſelf is ſo full of barbarous words and expreſſions, that it ſeems compoſed by ſome Gall, or one of Barbarous Original.

Several Præfecti Prætorio of Italy at the ſame time, and why.

L. 3. de Proximis Comitibus &c. Cod. Th. Dat. 16. Kal. Jan. Patavi. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

Sect. 3.

A. D. 382.

Gratian makes a Law concerning precedence of great Officers.

L. unic de Conſulibus, Præfectis &c. Cod. Th. lib.6.tit.6. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

87. It's ſomething ſtrange, that having ſo many Laws made by Theodoſius and Valentinian this year, we ſhould hear ſo little of the Emperour Gratian in this kind; for not one can we find which probably may call him Author, except it be a famous Conſtitutio nconcerning Precedence, which by Valentinian the third, ſome years after is ſaid to have been of his making. Herein in the firſt place he ſuppoſeth and taketh for granted, that all others Dignities muſt give place to that of the Conſulſhip, ſo as thoſe poſſeſſed of it, ſhould ſit firſt in the Senate-Houſe, and firſt give their Votes or ſpeak their Opinions, even before the Præfect of the City, who by Gratian ſome years ago was declared to have place before other Dignities of Rome, nay, before ſuch as had obtained the Dignity of Patritians, much more the Præfecti Prætorio and Magiſtri Militum; for theſe four, viz. the Conſulſhip, Patritiate, Præfectſhip (whether of the Prætorium or City) and the Office of Magiſter Militum, Conſtitute the firſt Degree of Illuſtrious Dignities. Yet was the Patritiate, which was Inſtituted by Conſtantine the Great, rather an Addition of Honour to another Perſon, than any peculiar Dignity, it being added uſually to other Titles, as, Præfectus Prætorio and Patritian, Patritian and Magiſter Officiorum; Patritian and Magiſter Militum, like as Conſul was the (only) Addition to the Imperial Dignity. To this the Law made afterward by Zeno, might much give occaſion, by which he Decreed that the Honour of the Patritian (whereby Perſons had the privilege to be ſtyled Parents of the Prince) ſhould be given to none, but ſuch as had been Conſuls, Præfects, Magiſtri Militum or Officiorum. But Gratian as to the point of Precedence further determines, That if any Perſon ſhould have been both Conſul and Præfect, or Magiſter Militum, in ſuch Caſe this twofold “ Dignity ſhould give him place above the reſt, that have only injoyed a ſingle “ one, though it were of the Conſulſhip it ſelf; for, the greater Cumulation of ſeveral Dignities carries the preheminence, although a Repetition of the ſame Honour (as being twice Conſul) cannot; which yet Valentinian the third thought as reaſonable as the other. But if one that had been Conſul had left his place to another who obtained two other Dignities, in Caſe he obtained a ſecond Dignity he ſhould recover his wonted Station, and that out of the great Reſpect given to the Conſulſhip, even in theſe Days.

A.D. 383. Fl. Merobaudez & Fl. Saturnino Coſſ.

88. In the CCCLXXXIII year of our Lord, and the eleventh Indiction, being the eighth of Valentinian the Second, Fl. Merobaudes the ſecond time, and Fl. Saturninus were advanced to the Dignity of Conſuls. For this year Florus and Poſthumianus were Præfecti Prætorio under Theodoſius; and under Valentinian, Flavianus and Hypatius. Proculus was Comes of the Eaſt, and another Hypatius was Præfectus Auguſtalis of Ægypt. Theodoſius made his Abode all this year at Conſtantinople, and Valentinian continued at Milan, till about May, and then removed to Padua, or Verona. As for Gratian we find little of him, till the declining of the year, at what time we ſhall hear of him upon too ſad an occaſion. In the mean while, to take things in the moſt orderly manner, and as they lye in time; before us, Theodoſius thought it beſt to begin the year with the ſettlement of his own Family, to which he could no better way Contribute than by giving the Title of Auguſtus to Arcadius his Eldeſt Son, a Boy, now in the ſixth year of his Age, which was performed on the ſixteenth day of January. Having made him Emperour, he took great Care that he might have Education, and be inſtructed as became ſo high a place; and for that purpoſe, he had written to Gratian his Collegue, that he would ſend him ſome Pious and Learned Man, that might be fit for ſuch an Undertaking. Gratian hereupon ſent to Damaſus the Biſhop of Rome, to recommend a Man, who pitcht upon Arſenius, a Deacon of the Roman Church, a Perſon Eminent for Piety and Learning. When he was come to Conſtantinople he Committed his Sons to his Charge, and put them fully into his Hands, both for Knowledg and Morals, with theſe words; Hence are you their Father more than my ſelf. On a time coming into the School, he found Arſenius the Maſter ſtanding, and Arcadius the Scholar ſitting as he was taught; at which ſight he was angry, and expoſtulated with Arſenius for not preſerving the Authority of his Office, to which, when he replyed, that it did not become him to ſit while he taught an Emperour, out of Indignation he took the Diadem from the Head of the Boy, made Arſenius ſit down in the Chair, and Arcadius to ſtand, as became a Scholar, adding, that His Children would no otherwiſe be worthy of the Empire, than if to Knowledg they added Goodneſs. Yet did Arcadius ſo far forget that Gratitude which all wiſe and good Men have ever acknowledged due from thoſe that receive their Education and a better Birth, to their ſecond ſort of Parents;

Theodoſius advances his Son Arcadius to the Imperial Dignity.

Socrates lib.5. c. 10. Sozom. lib. 7. c.12. vide Chron. Hiſtor. ad hunc Annum & Baronii Annal.

that being Corrected for his Faults, he would herein, alſo have made himſelf the Succeſſor of Nero, by plotting againſt his Maſters Life, from which Danger he eſcaped, departing ſecretly from the Court into Ægypt, where he afterwards lived and became famous for Sanctity. How baſe and ungrateful ſoever the Demeanour of Arcadius was while a Child, his Coſin-German and School-fellow Nebridius made better uſe of his time, being admired by St. Jerome, for that being brought up in the Palace, as the School-fellow of the Young Emperours, (whoſe Table the whole World furniſhed, and both Sea and Land did ſerve in the affluence of all things) and that in the firſt flour of his Age, he was of ſo modeſt Diſpoſition as even exceeded that of Virgins; and though the Companion and Kinſman of the Prince, and Educated in the ſame way (which things are wont to breed ſuitable Diſpoſitions) yet could he not be diſcovered to be puft up with the leaſt Pride, or Contempt of other Perſons.

L. 4. de locatione Fundi Jur. Emphyteutici. &c. Cod. Th. lib. 10. tit. 3. & L. 6. Cod. Juſt. de omni agro deſerto. Dat. ad Nebridium Com. R. P. 15. Kal. Feb. Conſt.

Makes an Order about the Farming of his Lands.

89. How Theodoſius by this Promotion of his Son might pleaſe his Subjects of the Eaſtern Province, we know not; but the ſecond day after, he Enacted a certain Law which doubtleſs would diſpleaſe one ſort of Men. The old Cuſtome was, that the Lands belonging to the Emperour or Common-wealth were in the Hands of the Decuriones or Municipes, viz. held and farmed by Bodies Politick, or Corporations, and ſo were thoſe belonging to the Temples, who paid their conſtant Rents, either to the Uſe of the Publick, or ſome of the Pagan Religion then obtaining. But after the diſſolution of that falſe Worſhip, and that the Lands came to be laid to the Patrimony of the Prince, Both kinds had been taken out of their Hands, and put into thoſe of private Men, probably to raiſe the greater Revenue; but it had not been done with ſuch Care, but that the beſt or fertile were taken to Farm by thoſe who underſtood their Trade, and the worſt or unfruitful ſtill remained on the Hands of the Emperour, and thus ſeparated brought ſmall or no Advantage to him. Now though we muſt needs ſay, that generally Emperours did not incline their Ears to New Chapmen, or ſuch as would offer more, and turn out old Tenants; yet either for that the publick Occaſions required it, or the leſs Fertile Lands lay generally neglected, whereas formerly they were wont to be let together with the better ſort, Theodoſius ordained, That in the like manner they ſhould be added by way of Epibole (as it was called) or Adjection to the better; and if ſuch“ as now held the moſt Fertile, would not take them with the Increaſe of a third part“ of the Rent, then New Tenants were to be admitted. If none of theſe could be“ found, he will have the Lands reverte to the Antient Poſſeſſors, viz. the Decuriones“ or Bodies Politick, and that without any Augmentation or Addition of a third Part“ required of the other, provided, they gave ſufficient Bond or Caution for payment“ of the Rent. But thus were the Emperours often conſtrained to make this Epibole when barren Grounds were left upon their Hands. As for ſuch as hold them by perpetual Right, he forbids that they be turned out of Poſſeſſion, having by their Induſtry in Tillage brought them into a better Condition, notwithſtanding any“ Decree obtained ſurreptitiouſly from himſelf to that purpoſe; and contrary to“ what the Antient Laws provided in that behalf; yet ſo as once it might be lawful“ to impoſe the Epibole or Adjection.

The Epibole.

L. 2. de Locatione Prædiorum. Civilium Cod. Juſt. lib. 11. tit. 70. Dat. ad eund. Nebridium.

90. But whatever private Perſons might think of this, or other Matters, now was the publick Joy by Meſſengers to be excited according to the Cuſtome, for the Creation of a New Emperour, and Images of him were to be diſperſed amongſt the Provincials, who upon ſuch occaſions, out of Novelty were greedy to Contemplate the Countenances of their Governours. To prevent the Rapine which at theſe times was wont to be exerciſed by thoſe that were imployed upon ſuch Errands; he publiſhed an Edict as his Predeceſſors had done. Prohibiting any thing“ or Reward to be Exacted of the People, for any Joyful News, either upon this“ occaſion of New Promotion, ending a War, or that of a Victory; when the“ Emperours themſelves received Conſular Ornaments, or of a Peace. The Edict bears Date of the ſecond day of February, a Fortnight after his Promotion, when all over the Provinces the People were running and gazing after thoſe Pictures which were carried aloft, to be ſeen by Men richly Clad, and Adorned with Gold, before whom went a Trumpetter and gave notice to the Multitude, which, if pleaſed at the Sight, might beſtow freely upon the Gerulus, or Bearer, what they thought fit, but nothing was to be Exacted or forced from them; if it were, by a“ Sacrilegious diſſimulation, as the Emperour terms it, both the Receiver and Compulſor ſhould incur Infamy and loſs of Eſtate, and the Office of Florus the Præfect,“ to whom the Law is directed, a Fine of thirty pounds of Gold. The Emperours

L. 4. Ne quid publicæ lætitiæ Nuntii &c. Cod. Th. lib. 8. tit. 11. Dat. 4. Non Febr. Conſtant. & L. unic. Cod. Juſt. hoc tit.

He prohibits any money to be exacted by the Meſſengers of good News.

then Receiving Conſular Ornaments is here expreſſed by Honour of the Royal Trabea given to the Faſti or Regiſter of the Conſuls. The Trabea was the Robe proper to Conſuls; and by giving the Honour of it to the Faſti is meant Inſerting the Emperours Name into the Regiſter, or publiſhing him to be Conſul for the following Year, to which he gave, together with his Collegue, the Characteriſtical Note. But in this Law Theodoſius makes no mention of the Conſulſhip of Subjects or private Men. For the Cuſtom of declaring them Conſuls, though formerly obſerved Solemnly, was now either grown out of Uſe, or at leaſt nothing was now exacted for the Meſſage, which though known ſufficiently, as to them, might yet be doubted as to what concerned the Emperours.

Vide Leges varias de Decurion. Cod. Th. hoc Anno datas ſcil. à L. 94.

Further gratifies Corporations.

91. Theodoſius further proceeded at this time to gratify the Corporations by recalling ſeveral back to their Services whom ſome Laws had excuſed, and obliging their Children, though ſet at liberty by former Princes. Yet would not he permit the Decuriones to hire or receive to Farm any Cuſtomes whatſoever, becauſe excuſed from ſuch Severities as were exerciſed againſt other ſorts of Perſons offending in ſuch Offices: but here he excepts the Dioceſs of Ægypt, partly becauſe of the great Trade driven there at Alexandria, for which other ſorts of people could not furniſh a ſufficient Number. In other places he will not have them receive in Farm the leaſt ſort of Cuſtom with which the Senators of Rome were alſo Prohibited in former times to meddle in any ſuch way. He would have them intent upon the buſineſs of their Corporations, from which he ordains that they receive no Immunity by Warfare; no not by Virtue of the Prince his Reſcript; for, the Emperours uſually forbade their own Decrees to take place when againſt the publick Good. As to Warfare, whereas both he and his Predeceſſors were wont to play an after-Game by an ingrateful forcing back ſuch as had already ſerved in the Wars, he reſolved to prevent the Liſting and Entertainment of ſuch Perſons into Service, and for that purpoſe ſtrictly required, that when any one offered himſelf to be Liſted, full Inquiry ſhould be made into his Birth and the whole State and Condition of his Life, ſo as he was to prove himſelf free, both from Servitude, the Relations to Corporations, and other Conditions, which might render him unfit for Military Imployment. The like Inquiries alſo were made into thoſe who were admitted into the Palatine Militia, or the Emperours Court-Imployments: as for ſuch of them as had already continued therein for the ſpace of ten years he yields, that they be diſcharged from any Obligations to the Courts of theſe Towns and Cities Corporate; in the ſtating of which time he differs from other Princes; for, ſome required more, and ſome leſs for the diſcharging of theſe Curcial Ties, which gave Princes ſo much trouble. But Theodoſius was ſo kind to his People, that as he would not preferr, the Sons of ſuch as had Relation to Corporations before the Intereſt of them; but though the Fathers were excuſed (as Profeſſors and others) yet they ſhould be bound to diſcharge the ſeveral Duties to them belonging; yet he would prefer the Intereſts of Sons before that of his own Exchequer. For, whereas Valentinian eighteen years ago, had made a Law, in favour of the Children of ſuch Criminals as were Condemned and put to Death, he was now pleaſed to extend the ſame Mercy to their Poſthumous Iſſue, or thoſe that were begot, but not already Born; the Crime of High-Treaſon ever excepted, which excludes all the Children of Traitors from the Benefit of their Eſtates, that they may not have wherewith to Arm themſelves againſt their Prince or Country. But that the Exchequer might not be defrauded, and to prevent ſuppoſititious Children, he Commands the Old Edict of the Prætor, in a manner, to be obſerved. He will have the Wife of the Condemned Perſon, after his Death, to ſend and certifie the Governour of the Province, of her being with Child; and her ſelf to go to the Municipal Magiſtrate, and Depoſite in his Hands the Certificates or Teſtimonies concerning her Condition; and laſt of all, that ſhe be ſo kept and lookt to, that all opportunity of Cheating may be prevented.

Exceptâ Dioceſi Ægyptiacâ.

L. Quid probare debeant. Cod. Th. lib. 7. tit. 2.

L. 12. de Privil. eorum qui in S. Pal. mil. Cod. Th.

L. 10. de Bonis Proſcript. Cod. Th.

Yet he inforces the old Edict of the Prætor.

He prevents Abuſes in the Exaction of Tributes.

I. L. L. 17, 18, 19. de Suſceptoribus Præpoſitis &c. Cod. Th.

92. To prevent another ſort of Cheating, but of the Subject, he publiſhed about the ſame time ſeveral other Laws. Whereas the poor Provincials were compelled to take great Journeys to pay their Tributes, and get rid of their Money; and that by reaſon that there was for a whole Dioceſs but one Receiver, who was wont to reſide in the Metropolis or Chief City; For the time to come he Commands this great Abuſe to be rectified, by making, as need ſhould be, more Receivers or Collectors in the ſame Dioceſs. And that the People may not be conſtrained to pay the ſame thing twice, he Orders, that theſe Receivers for

Sect.3.

A.D. 380.

for every ſum received give an Acquittance, wherein ſhall be expreſſed both“ what, in what kinds, upon what Account, and in what Indiction it was done. And yet farther, becauſe, in receiving Tributes in kind, they were wont to“ make their own Meaſures, and Conſtrain thoſe that paid to give more than their“ due Proportion; he ordains That in every Station, that is, every Place where“ they were wont to be paid, certain Weights and Meaſures ſhould be eſtabiſhed.“ So, long ago, to prevent the the Frauds of Tradeſmen, it was not only the Duty of Ædiles to ſee that due Meaſures were allowed, but publick Meaſures and Weights were kept in the Capitol, by which all thoſe of private Men were to be meaſured, according to a Standard, if any Controverſie aroſe thereupon; which the Emperours in ſucceeding times alſo took Care of, as occaſion was; and Prætextatus the Præfect of Rome, cauſed it to be practiſed in all the Regions of the City, as we have ſeen from Ammianus. But this Law is directed to Poſthumianus the Præfectus Prætorio, and that concerning Acquittances to Flavianus the Proconſul of Aſia. This is he who, contrary to Theodoſius his Law lately mentioned, cauſed ſome Decuriones to be beaten or examined with Torture, for which Offence, while the Emperour Conſulted how to puniſh him, he took Boat and conveyed himſelf away; and therefore, he turn'd him out of Office. But, for ſuch as were behind in their Payments of Tributes; that no Violence or Rigour might be uſed; if the Debtor was a great Man, he ordered that the Exactor,“ or he that was ſent to require the Arrears, ſhould be one of the Officials of the“ Judg of the Province; if a Decurio then a Decurio; but if a mean Perſon, then“ one of their Protectors called Defenſor Civitatis ſhould with all Juſtice or fidelity“ Compel him to the payment of his Dues.

L. 12. de Exactionibus Cod. Th. lib. 11.tit. 7. Dat. ad Conſtantianum Vicarium Ponticæ. Abeſt à à Cod. Juſt.

93. So much ſtill was the Emperour inclined to yield to any thing wherein the“ publick benefit was concerned, that in another Caſe he declared that no Preſcription“ of Time, no, nor his own Reſcripts ought to obſtruct it. But Complaint“ had been made by Proculus now Comes of the Eaſt, that in Antioch the Metropolis and Eye of theſe Parts, the Forum or publick places were obſtructed, to the great deformation of the City; with which this Proculus was the more concerned, for that at his own Charge, he beautified the place with ſpacious and convenient Streets, Porticus's, Baths and Forums. For this he is commended by Libanius the Sophiſt, who had reaſon to do it from his own Experience, having been once in danger of his Life as he paſſed from the Senate-Houſe, by reaſon of the former ſtraitneſs of the ways. “But to incourage Proculus in ſo laudable an Undertaking,“ Theodoſius declares in an Edict directed to him, what we ſaid concerning Preſcription“ of time, and his own Reſcripts, and Commands, that in all Cities ſuch Buildings“ be pull'd down as were erected on publick Ground. And herein he did better in“ gratifying him, than in other matters which he alſo deſired. For, if credit may be given to Libanius; though Proculus was to be commended for publick works he made at Antioch, yet was he Tyrannical in his Government, and left it in diſgrace, as the Sophiſt relates in his Oration to Icarius his Succeſſor. Therefore to his ſuggeſtions is aſcribed the Rigorous forcing back to the Court of Antioch, or other places, ſuch as had aſpired to Senatorian Dignity, which this Emperour by an Edict to him directed doth enjoyn. But this is nothing ſo ſharp as what he ordered concerning the Principals of the Officials belonging, to him or other Governours of Provinces. “For he not only Commands that they be returned back to their former“ Imployments; but alſo be Chaſtiſed with Plummets: a puniſhment Cruel and“ Servile, but ſuch as through the Cruelty of Judges was in this Age grown too Common, and gratified the Tyrannical and pitiful Humour of Proculus towards thoſe, who were the Officers belonging to his place, and, during his Government, ſubject to his Command.

Forbids the ſtraitning of Streets and Forums in Cities.

L. 22. de de operibus publicis Cod. Th. Dat. 3. Id. Jun. Have Procul. K. N. B. & L. 6. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

L. 90. de Decuronibus. Cod. Th. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

L. 14. de Cohortatibus Cod. Th. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

94. But let us leave Theodoſius, and ſee what we find of Valentinian in the Weſt, before we come to tell the ſad Story of his Brother. We find him in the firſt place concerned for his Revenue, that no Senator might eſcape the Payment called Glebalis Collatio due from his Lands, whether he was borne to that Dignity, or had been preferred to it only through the Bounty of the Prince. “To this end he requires“ that every one of that Order, give into the Senate a true and full Particular of his“ Lands, upon pain of forfeiting whatſoever he Concealed, which was the uſual courſe taken with Concealed Goods in point of Cuſtoms. And whoever attains to the“ Dignity of Conſularis, either as Governour of a Province, or by Codicills, before“ he enjoy or execute his Place, he will have him under his hand to own the Payment“ due from Senators; to declare where his Habitation is, that there the Payment may“ be

Valentinian* Concerns himſelf for his Revenue.

L. 2. de Senatoribus & de glebali Corlatione Cod. Th. lib. 6. tit. 2. Dat. ad Hypatium 4. Id. Jan. Abeſt. b. L. pariter ut reliquæ leges hujus Tituli à Cod. Juſt. propter glebalem Collationem ſublatam.

Sect. 3.

A. D. 383.

be Exacted; to give alſo a full Account of his Poſſeſſions, and thereof to ſend in“ a Schedule to the Office of the Comes Longitionum, that thereby may be known“ what Acceſſion is made to the Emperour's Revenue. Theſe Rules he will have“ obſerved by thoſe Senators that had Poſſeſſions. As for thoſe that had none, he“ will yet have them pay the two Folles formerly mentioned, which alſo, whoſoever“ is admited to the Dignity of Conſularis, or to any of the higher ſorts of“ Offices is bound to acknowledg, and promiſe to pay. But from this Obligation he“ excepts ſuch as had been made Senators for having faithfully diſcharged the Palatine“ Militia, or Offices in the Court. But though he allowed this Privilege“ to thoſe Perſons in a matter wherein his own Profit only is concerned,“ yet will he not approve of Immunities, obtained by particular Men from the“ uſual Impoſition or Tax upon Lands, becauſe what thereby would be granted“ to a few, would tend as he ſaith to the Detriment of many. Therefore will he“ have them all taken off; and to ſhew an Example himſelf, he renounces all ſuch“ as had been granted to his own Poſſeſſions; hoping thereby all others concern'd“ would be ſufficiently ſatisfied. And he commands Probus, to whom the Edict“ is directed, that he eſtabliſh this Order, through all Italy, as alſo through the Urbicarian and African Regions, and through all Illyricum. By ſeveral others mentioned“ as Præfects at this time, we may perceive the Præfectſhip of Italy, lately broken, and beſtowed into ſo many Hands, was not yet again united in the Perſon of this Probus, of whoſe long and reiterated Power in this Nature Claudian the Poet might well ſing, as he doth to his Relations; ſo often did he enjoy the Prefectſhip and ſo long a time, as we have ſeen in the Reign of Valentinian the Elder. But yet now he was Præfect over no leſs than four Diſtricts, and we ſee that Italy, the Urbicarian Provinces, Africk and Illyricum were all really diſtinct one from another, and not one in another comprehended. By Illyricum is all that Tract of Ground to be underſtood which was divided afterward into Eaſtern and Weſtern. “In the laſt place, the Emperour Commands Probus to eſtabliſh this“ Law, or confirm it, by which is only meant publiſhing it with an Edict or Order of“ his own. For in thoſe times the manner was for Magiſtrates to publiſh or expoſe to View, the Conſtitutions of Princes, in ſuch manner, as firſt the Conſtitution ſhould be recited, and then the Edict of the Magiſtrate follow, like as the Parliaments of France declare or publiſh the Edicts of that King, which they term Verifying; not that the Royal Decrees there receive Authority from their Arreſts, but that there muſt be ſome way of Solemnity to eſtabliſh the Truth and Certainty of the Thing.

He takes off Immunities as to Taxes granted to particular Men.

L. ut Si per Obreptionem fuerint Impetrata Cod. Th. Lib. 11. tit. 13. Dat. 4. Kal. Febr. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

Sinceritas tua id ipſum per omnem Italiam tum etiam per urbicarias Africanaſq; Regiones, ac per omne Illyricum, Prælatâ Oraculi hujus auctoritate, firmabit.

95. At this time there were ſuch frequent Robberies Committed, and ſuch ſwarming of Thieves in the Countries about Rome, that even Perſons of Quality durſt not Travel; particularly Symmachus, an Eminent Man in thoſe Days, choſe rather, as he ſaith, to Macerate himſelf in the City, of which he was ſufficiently weary, than expoſe himſelf to ſo great Hazard. “This drew from Valentinian“ an Edict againſt the Harbourers and Concealers of Robbers; and becauſe ſuch“ Soldiers as had fled from their Colours, uſually took up that Courſe of Life, in“ the former Part thereof he declares how ſuch as give them Shelter, ſhall be puniſhed.“ If the Offendor was of mean Condition, he Condemns him to be“ beaten with Rods, to the Mines, or Deportation; if within two Months (Theodoſius“ this year allowed ſix) he did not diſcover ſuch a Fugitive to the Ordinary“ Judg of the Province; if of higher Condition, he impoſes on him the Penalty“ of finding ten Souldiers for the War, or elſe paying fifty pounds of Silver, which“ was juſt the ſame Value. Such puniſhment were the Maſters themſelves to undergo;“ but if their Stewards or Agents herein offended, they were to Anſwer it“ with their Lives; but this was to be underſtood of ſuch Fugitive Soldiers for whom ſatisfaction had not been made. But in the Diſcovery this Courſe was to be obſerved, That firſt they were to be preſented to the Governours of Provinces where they were taken, who after Examination, was to ſend them away to the Præfect, by whom they were to be puniſhed, except the Præfect or Magiſter Militum, or others who had Authority over Soldiers in matters Capital, were at hand. But againſt the Harbourers of Thieves or Highway-men he ſhewed himſelf ſtill more ſevere. “For if any one knowingly entertained them, or refuſed to diſcover“ them, he ordains he receive the Corporal puniſhment, or forfeit his whole“ Eſtate at the Diſcretion of the Judg, if he be Maſter of the Houſe; if a Servant“ or Officer, that he be burnt alive.

Frequent Robberies about Rome.

Lib. 2. Ep.22.

L. 8. de Deſert. Cod. Th.

Valentinian endeavours to prevent them.

L. ult. de His qui latrones &c. Cod. Th. lib. 9. Tit. 29.

96. But yet ſtill did the poor Provincials miſerably complain of the Inequality of Taxes, that ſome eſcaped Scot-free, through pretended Privilege, while others bore the Burthen that were leſs able to pay; and the matter grew ſo high, that though little more than a Month had paſſed ſince Valentinian, as we have ſeen made a Law againſt all ſuch Privileges, yet was he now forced to add a ſecond, more large and efficacious than the former. For in this, directed to the People, having found that the Tabularii of Cities, whoſe Imployment it was to keep the Ceſs Books, and give out Copies to the Collectors, were very faulty in adding or diminiſhing as they pleaſed, he Commands they be burnt alive, if, moved or overcome by the “ Fraud, Entreaties or power of any whatſoever, they admitted of any pretended “ Immunity. But he directs that the Ceſs be equally laid, by Conſent of the Provinces “ confirmed by the Prince, having firſt been equally taxed and adjuſted by “ the Cenſitores, aſſiſted thereunto by the Authority of the Ordinary Judges, and “ the Præfecti Prætorio. And whereas Notice was taken that ſeveral Perſons “ newly come from Court, and eminent for their Power and Dignity, often injuriouſly “ treated the Provincials, ſometime ſpoiling them of their Goods, and otherwhiles of their Liberty, nay, perhaps of their very Lives; and this under pretence that they had Warrant from the Emperours for their Actions, Valentinian by a Law ſent to Euſignius the Proconſul of Africk, Ordains, that No Perſon ſhall be credited, be he Tribune, Notary, or of the Degree of Comes, when he “ alleages the Prince his Orders, except he produce the ſame in writing: And “ hereby he lets the People know that they ſhould not be frighted by their big “ words or Looks. He inſtances in thoſe who were (as we have ſeen out of “ Ammianus) Extraordinarily ſent upon various Errands from the Court. Theſe were wont to receive their Inſtructions in a certain form of words fitted to the occaſion, and poſſibly ſometimes ſecret Orders (ſecreta Mandata) and by word of Mouth; but it being eaſy to pretend ſuch, and great miſchief thereon enſuing, “ he Commands, that no Credit be given to them. And indeed where “ the Parties concerned were Couragious, they would not obey ſuch Orders, “ and therefore it behoved the Meſſengers themſelves to have a certain Rule of Direction, that it might not be ſaid to them, that they exceeded the Limits of their Commiſſions. Therefore when ſuch Tribunes and Notaries were ſent into the Provinces upon publick Buſineſs, ſometimes they would publickly expoſe their Commiſſions, that their Authority might not be queſtioned. And as no Meſſengers from the Prince were to be credited, except they produced their Warrants; in like manner to the Meſſages ſent from the Countries to the Emperour, no heed was to be given, except they produced their Inſtructions in Writing; ſo that, that called Libera Legatio, whereby Power is given to thoſe Imployed, to Act as they ſhall ſee Cauſe, and what they think fit, is hereby diſowned.

And the Frauds of Tabularij.

L. ult. de Cenſu Cod. Th. Dat. ad Populum Non Mart.

L. un. de Mandatis Principum Cod. Th. lib. 1 tit. 3. Dat. 15. Kal. Jul. Veronæ & L. 1. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

He forbids pretended Meſſengers from Court to be believed, except they produce their Inſtructions in Writing.

97. By a Letter written from Symmachus to this Euſignius, Proconſul of Africk this year, and afterward advanced to be Præfectus Prætorio, it appears, that the City of Rome was threatned with Famine, by reaſon that the African Provinces, whence it was wont to have its Supply, afforded not Corn ſufficient for the bare Suſtenance of their own Inhabitants, and for the year following were to be ſupplied with Seed from other Places. This Condition of Africk, Euſignius had before made known to Symmachus, who thereupon adviſes, that Recourſe be had to the Princes, and that in the mean time, he would Relieve, as well as he might, thoſe that were committed to his Charge. We find not any Edict made in any ſort with reference to this Occaſion; but as Theodoſius this year very much concerned himſelf with the Intereſt of Corporations in the Eaſt, ſo by a Conſtitution directed to Euſignius, as well as by others to other perſons, we perceive Valentinian at the ſame time, no leſs Zealous for thoſe within his Diſtrict. “He “ alſo Commands, that ſuch as were born to the Services of the Curiæ, ſhall not “ be excuſed under pretence of the Military Imployment, except they have continued “ in the Wars fifteen years, whereby he ſeems to Repeal what he had “ Ordained the year preceding, as to this ſame Dioceſs of Africk, That none ſhould be excuſed, without he could alleage he had ſerved five yeas; and, that for the time to come, the Curiales ſhould be excluded from Military Service. But from the wording of this Law, we learn, that to fifteen years, are counted three Luſtra ſo that it need not be doubted, how much time the later Luſtrum of the Romans did contain, viz. juſt five years. And whereas the Emperour here inſiſts upon fifteen years, Gothofred conjectures, it is for that in the Reign of his Father ſo many years ago and more, from the beginning thereof, theſe Provinces, as we have ſeen, were dreadfully haraſſed by the Barbarians, provoked there-

Symmachi Ep. ult. lib. 4.

Africk and Rome threatned with Famine.

L. 95. de Decurionib. Cod. Th. Dat. 4. Kal. Mart. Med. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

Valentinian Indulgent alſo to Corporations.

Poſt quindecim vero Stipendia, vinculo prioris Ordinis liberetur, qui ſe tribus luſtris aſſidue militaſſe, et neq; bellicis neceſſitatibus neque muneribus militaribus oſtenderit defuiſſe.

UMI

to by the miſerable negligence of the Officers of the Army, and the Villany of Romanus, which provoked, or incouraged many of the Curiales to go into the Field for defence of their Country; and as this might be a Reaſon why Valentinian would be a little Indulgent to ſuch Perſons, ſo might it be an Inducement to his Father, fifteen years before, to grant, that five years Warfare in Mauritania ſhould excuſe from the Service of Corporations. But as to this Indulgence, granted both to Souldiers and the Palatine Officers, Emperours have differed, and the ſame Prince ordained ſeveral things as to the Term which ſhould excuſe them, according as Circumſtances of Time and Place have differed. But to be ſure, there was much Stir made by ſome Perſons at this time, to eſcape the Burthens of theſe Bodies Politick; and ſome attempted it, by Pleading, that by the Mothers ſide, they belonged to other Corporations, which being leſs, and conſequently, the Charge of them below that of others, they would needs remove themſelves to them. Indeed in the Eaſt, in the Diſtrict of Theodoſius, ſuch Privilege had been granted to the Inhabitants of Ilium, Delphi and Pontus, that if a Man by both Parents was obnoxious to theſe Courts, he might uſe the Benefit of his Mothers Relation; and probably ſome other places in the Weſt, and under the Juriſdiction of Valentinian, had obtained the like Immunity; but he abrogates “ all ſuch by another Law, and whatever Cuſtome there might be for it in the Pro- “ vince, founded upon ſome ſuch antient Grant: He propounds the Example of the “ Senatorian Order at Rome, wherein the Son followed the Condition of the Father, “ were the Mother of any other Rank.

Vide legem 100 illius tit. Dat. 13. Kal. Maii ad Hypatium P. F. P.

L. 101. Dat. ad Baſilium Com. S. L. 16. Kal. Jul. Cod. Th. & L. 36. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

98. The Courſe of matters now brings us at length to Gratian, of whom it's a wonder we have nothing all this while; that the Countries ſubject to his Command, ſhould afford no work for his Quæſtor. But this we are willing to Attribute to his former Care and Vigilance, for the more Laws any Nation wants, the more are Griefs and Neceſſities; for it cannot be ſuppoſed, that if Healthful and free from Diſtempers, the Prince its Phyſitian, would be ever and anon tampering with it. But notwithſtanding, let none out of Ignorance, becauſe he Reads of ſo many Laws now made by the Roman Emperours, for this one Reaſon, conclude the Empire to have been of a very ſickly Temper; if ſo, the Diſeaſe lies in his own Head, which will be Cured by a Receit of Geography, when he views the vaſt Tracts and Circumference of the Roman Pale. I ſuppoſe the Reader an Inhabitant of what was once ſome ſmall pittance of the Empire, where he cannot but take notice, how many Edicts or Acts of State paſs for the Government of even that ſmall Plot of Ground. But when he ſurveys all the Provinces of this flouriſhing Dominion, from Mount Atlas, and the Streights of Gibraltar, paſſes as far as the utmoſt Extent of Meſopotamia and Oſdroena, and from the Banks of Danubius Croſſes to the Southern Borders of Ægypt and Mauritania, he will not at all wonder that we make mention yearly of ſo many Laws. But to come to Gratian, though he publiſhed no Edicts at this time for particular Direction in any point of Government, yet herein he ſeemed beſt to provide for his People, and take his Leave, by ordaining ſomething for the Government of thoſe who were ſubordinately to Govern them in their ſeveral Provinces; to prevent their Rapacious Preying upon them. Of their boldneſs in this point, ſome Complaint was made to him, not long before his Death, how beſides their ordinary Allowances they were wont to exact of the Provincials, Money or Proviſions for maintenance of their Houſes. Upon hearing and deliberating hereof, he declared in Conſiſtory, that every Judg or every Governour of a Province ſhould himſelf furniſh his Prætorium with Conveniences, and that neither to him nor any Comes “ ſhould be more allowed, than by Imperial Authority, was granted in thoſe Al- “ lowances they called Annonæ and Cellaria. By theſe two, generally are meant “ all Neceſſaries for Expence, and the Salaries of the Judges; which were alſo allowed to all, whom the Emperour ſent for to Court, or diſpatched elſewhere upon publick Buſineſs, both in the Manſions upon the way, and in the Places where they ſtaid. But, as we have formerly ſaid, by Cellaria are properly meant, Wine and Corn, or Neceſſaries for eating and drinking: by Annonæ all other ſorts of things, as Gold, Silver, Clothes, Proviſions for Horſes, Attendance, Firing and the like. The Houſes wherein they lived and adminiſtred Juſtice, were called Prætoria, uſually placed in Cities that ſtood upon the High-ways or Streets, and furniſhed at the publick Charge, by a Set Allowance; But they were wont to live high, and exceed their Bounds, both the ordinary Governours and the Military Officers, or Comites Rei Militaris here

Gratians laſt Edict againſt the Rapacity of Governours of Provinces.

Vide L. 8. de fundis Patrimonialibus &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 11. tit. 61. & Notas.

L. ult. de Officio Judicum omnium

Pars Actorum habitorum in Conſiſtorio Gratiani Aug. Gratianus Auguſtus dixit &c. Cod. Th. lib. 1. tit. 10. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

Sect.3. here mentioned. This Abuſe now Gratian endeavoured to prevent by this his Farewel to his People, it being the laſt Law we find that was made by him, as it is placed in the Code, although it bears no Date of Month or Day. A.D. 383.

99. For in the month of Auguſt of this year he periſhed by the treaſon, ſome ſay of Merobaudes (or Mellobaudes) a Magiſter Militum, to be ſure by the ambition of Maximus a Commander here in Britain. That Maximus was a Britan born, ſome will gather from the words of Socrates the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtorian; and ſo Chriſtopherſon our own Country man tranſlates them; but being narrowly lookt into they will ſcarcely be found to aſcertain any thing more, than that he roſe and fell upon the Roman Empire from the parts of Britain. It matters little what Country it was that brought him forth; but Zoſimus, who ſeldom agrees with other Writers, ſaith expreſly, that by birth he was a Spaniard, and tells another ſort of ſtory concerning the occaſion of this Rebellion, and the death of Gratian. Fetching his Narration from the Motions lately ſpoken of in Illyricum, he writes, that, during thoſe Stirs, this Emperor was imbroiled in no ſmall diſadvantages. For, yielding to thoſe who in Courts are wont to corrupt the manners of Princes, he kindly entertained ſome fugitive Alans which were liſted in the Army, conferred on them great gifts, and ſo highly eſteemed them, that in the mean time he ſeemed to make no reckoning of his own Soldiers. This brought him into no little odium amongſt his own men, which daily increaſing, at length drove into a ſeditious humour, amongſt others, ſuch as ſerved here in the Britiſh Iſles, who more indulged themſelves in contumacy and peeviſhneſs than the reſt. And they were further inraged, he ſaith, by Maximus, a Spaniard by Nation, who had been fellow-ſouldier with Theodoſius in Britain, and took it in diſdain that He ſhould be accounted worthy of the Diadem, and himſelf of no honourable Place or Office. They being eaſie enough to be wrought on, conferred on him the Title of Emperor, gave him both a Diadem and Purple, which he had ſo long deſired, and without delay ſhipped themſelves and paſſed even to the mouth of the Rhine. The Armies that lay in that quarter were not difficult to be won, and joyn with them; but then Gratian came and offered them Battel, while no ſmall number of the Souldiers ſtill continued in their Fidelity. And when the Armies approached nearer, for five days they skirmiſhed one with another, till the Moors all of themſelves revolted, and gave to Maximus the Title of Auguſtus, while the reſt alſo followed by little and little; which Gratian perceiving, and that his Affairs here were deſperate, with three hundred Horſe fled towards the Alpes, where when he found no ſecurity, he turned off toward Rhætia, Noricum, Pannonia and the upper Myſia. Maximus, though glad of the advantage, thought he was not to be ſuffered ſo to eſcape; but diſpatched after him one Andragathius, his Magiſter Equitum, born near the Euxine Sea, who ſeemed to be faſt and faithful to him, with ſuch Horſe as he thought would beſt hold out. He following on the Purſuit with all diligence, overtook him as he was going to paſs the Bridge at Singidunum, and there killed him; by which Act he more eſtabliſhed Maximus in his newly acquired Empire.

Maximus rebells againſt him.

Μάξιμος ἐκ τῶν περὶ τῆς Βρεττανίας μερῶν ἐπανέστη τῇ Ῥωμαίων ἀρχῇ. Maximus ex partibus Britanniæ oriundus.

Zoſimus his ſtory thereof.

Ἴβηρ τὸ γένος.

100. Here Zoſimus acquaints his Country-men, the Græcians, that it will not be amiſs, but worth the while to tell them a ſtory, which being commonly committed to memory is no whit impertinent to the preſent Purpoſe. In the Colleges of the Prieſts at Rome thoſe called Pontifices held the chiefeſt place, which word, if tranſlated into Greek, muſt be termed Gephyræi from Bridges, which name they got upon this occaſion. At ſuch time as Mortals were ignorant of that worſhip which afterward was rendred by Images; thoſe of the Gods were firſt made in Theſſaly; but whereas (you muſt know) there were neither yet any Places to put them in (for the Uſe of ſuch Houſes were alſo unknown) they placed thoſe Repreſentations upon the Bridge of the River Peneus, and from the Bridge thoſe who preſided at the worſhip thereof were termed Gephyræi. Thence took the Romans their Title of Pontifices, and beſtowed it upon their chief Prieſts, and withal ordained that their very Kings ſhould be reckoned in their number, for the excellency of their Dignity. The firſt that obtained this Honour was Numa; after him all that went under the Name of Kings, and long after them Octavianus himſelf, and ſuch as ſucceeded him in the Roman Empire. For as ſoon as any one came to be Emperor, he was preſented by the Pontifices with the Sacerdotal Robe, and upon receipt thereof ſaluted with the Title of Pontifex Maximus. And all other Princes with a moſt willing mind received the Honour, and uſed the Title, and even Conſtantine himſelf, though (ſaith the Pagan)

Pagan) he forſook the right Path in Religious matters, and imbraced the Faith of the Chriſtians; and after him the reſt in order, as far as Valentinian and Valens. But now when as, according to the Cuſtom, the Pontifices preſented Gratian with the Robe, he would by no means accept of what they offered, being of opinion that it was unlawful for a Chriſtian to uſe the Habit. The Robe then being returned to the Prieſts, it was reported that He who was the chief amongſt them ſaid, that if the Emperor would not be Pontifex Maximus, in a ſhort time a Pontifex ſhould be made of a Maximus. And ſuch end had the Empire of Gratian, ſaith this Hiſtorian, whoſe Tale concerning the Pontifices being ſo named from that Bridge of Peneus is very pretty; and more pretty indeed than the ſtory Plutarch relates concerning their being ſo named from the Bridge called Pons Sublicius, however ridiculous this Grave Writer eſteems it; for it is eaſier to imagine them to have received their Name from a Bridge of their own, where Sacrifices alſo were offered, than from one diſtant ſo many hundred miles, at ſuch a time when Travelling and Geography were not much in Uſe. As for his ſtory concerning Gratian his being the firſt that renounced the Title of Pontifex Maximus, and refuſed the Robe, it's ſaid by him, and deſerves no credit, as we ſhall ſee in its proper place. But for his being killed at Singidunum, and as he was to go over the Bridge there, it deſerves leaſt belief at all; the concurrent Teſtimony of all Writers beſides himſelf, being that he was ſlain at Lugdunum or Lyons. And Baronius would have the one miſtaken or falſe copied for the other; but this is becauſe he never conſidered what the man ſo idly talks of his flying to Rhætiæ, Noricum, Pannonia and Myſſia, for in this Tract it was, that Singidunum and not Lugdunum is to be found. Zoſimus this once was a better Geographer, we muſt acknowledge, than to look for Lugdunum here; but he was vilely miſtaken in his Countries, and his Arithmetick.

Quem vide in Numa.

His Tales thereupon.

101. For all other Writers, as we ſaid, agree that Lugdunum in Gall, was the place where he was killed, which was accompanied with theſe circumſtances. That the Traitor might render himſelf more acceptable to the Souldiers, he pretended he was joyned in Affinity with Theodoſius, and that as it were by his Conſent and Allowance he ſet up for himſelf; nay he gave out, that he was deſcended of the Blood of Conſtantine the Great, of which this is ſome evidence, that he took the Cognomen of Flavius, for he called himſelf Fl. Clemens Maximus. But if he was thus deſcended, probably it was by the Mothers ſide, for ſo, if a Britan born, he might proceed from the Parents of Helena, the Mother of Conſtantine, which ſome reckon of Britiſh Blood. When firſt he roſe up in Rebellion, Gratian deſpiſed him as a mean Man, and of no Intereſt; and therefore he only ſet the Alans againſt him, whom he had procured for money to ſerve in his wars. The old Roman Souldiers took this very ill, looking upon it as an Affront, that he ſhould prefer Barbarians before them, in the point of Fidelity and Courage, and in anger revolted to Maximus, who promiſed them all kind things Imaginable. Hereat the Emperor affrighted, left Triers, where he had continued the month of April (as ſome pretend to find) and retired to Paris. The Uſurper having notice hereof, and eaſily repulſed the Alans, followed him with all the haſte he could make, and for five Days, being incamped near to one another, they skirmiſhed in Parties, till firſt the Moors and then the reſt deſerted their Prince. Hereat more diſmaied, with three hundred Horſe he fled Southward, and, being denied admittance in other Cities, came to Lyons, and was, not long after, followed by Maximus and all his Forces, who firſt endeavoured by plain force to deſtroy him; but, when that would not do, betook himſelf to crafty Devices, wherewith he hoped, and that not in vain, to intrap him. He cauſed it to be given forth, that his Wife was coming to him, and intended to meet him on the hither ſide of the River Rhoſne which runs by the City. Then did he place in a Wagon made like a Litter, carried by Mules, not any Lady but a Ruffian, Andragathius, though he made the Report to go that it was the Empreſs her ſelf; and the Plot took effect. For the poor Prince overjoyed to hear that his Wife was at hand, went forth to meet the Litter, with a few Perſons, whom Andragathius perceiving near at Hand, leaped out with his Companions, and ſlew him in the Place: ſome ſay he was betrayed by Merobaudes the Conſul; but ſo he periſhed when he had been Auguſtus full ſixteen years, and lived about eight and twenty; on the twenty fifth of Auguſt.

Socrates l. 5. c. 11. Alii vide Sigonium, lib. 8. de Occidentali Imperio & Baronium ad An. 383. Chronic. Hiſtoric. in Cod. Theod.

The true Account.

102. A Prince, on whom Envy and Prejudice themſelves can faſten no ill Character. Malice himſelf, or Zoſimus, tells us, indeed, that he gave heed to ſuch as are wont to corrupt Princes, but nothing in particular as to his ill Moralls: no doubt but he ſtood in great need of materials whereof to raiſe a Calumny. But Ammianus to tell us of his being drawn aſide by Flatterers, yet not wherein; only he inſtances in his imitating Commodus in the killing of wild Beaſts. A very great matter! an heinous crime for a young man of his years to delight in Hunting, and in ſo dextrous a way of killing; this is ſo idle an Objection, that though we prize Marcellinus very much; yet when we conſider how vaſtly this Prince his humour differed from that of Commodus, nay how nothing he had ſuitable to that Monſters diſpoſition, except what was harmleſs, we muſt needs excuſe the wonder that Baronius juſtly conceives of this Authors meaning, that when he praiſes him, he ſhould alſo blame him for following Commodus his courſe of life. And we muſt with him needs eſteem him Partial and harſh againſt Chriſtian Princes, and be of the Opinion, that had he known any thing ill by him, he would not have concealed it; eſpecially Zoſimus, who believing him to have been the firſt that refuſed the Title and Robe of Pontifex Maximus, could he have done it, would have caſt all the Dirt upon him imaginable. In that he followed his Sports, and minded not the Affairs of the Empire ſo much as he ſhould have done, as theſe Writers alleage, he ſhewed himſelf young in years and guilty of that Neglect which many Princes of that Age are to Anſwer for; but which yet thoſe amongſt them that are well inclined uſually make Amends for, when they come to riper years. But why may we not conſider what great Commendations are given, and amongſt the reſt what Encomiums, by Auſonius his Schoolmaſter, who had better reaſon than any other to know his Humour and Natural Inclination. It's true, what he ſaith is in a Panegyrical Oration, wherein he gives him thanks for the Honour of the Conſulſhip he had put upon him; but yet the Oration being to be made publick he cannot lightly be preſumed to have affirmed what he knew would be contradicted and laught at by all that ſaw or heard it; the matters thereof being freſh in memory.

The Character given him by Pagan Writers.

Auſonii ad Gratianum Imp. diſcipulum gratiarum actio pro Conſulatu. Panegyric. 12.

103. And the firſt thing he commends him for, we may eaſily believe, viz. “ That the Palace or Emperors Houſe which was terrible before, (in his Fathers time) “ he by his Clemency and Mildneſs had rendred pleaſant and acceptable; the Courts “ of Juſtice formerly full of miſerable complaints he by his favourable Decrees had “ made full of Acclamations and good Wiſhes. And the Bed it ſelf, which was or- “ dained for Reſt and Quiet, was become more full of Repoſe through that tranquil- “ lity he had procured to troubled and deſpairing Perſons. All this is ſufficiently atteſted by what we have already written concerning his giving a ſtop to thoſe bloody proſecutions that were ſet on foot in his Fathers Reign. “ But he further ſaith, that he was a valiant and warlike Prince, and for this he produces the Te- “ ſtimony of the limits of the Danube and the Rhine, they being freed from all “ Hoſtility in one year; that he was moſt Munificent, he alleages the Experience “ of a Rich Army: for his great Wiſdom he inſtances in the ſettlement of the Eaſt “ in ſo good a poſture, meaning the promotion of Theodoſius; and for his Piety “ or Dutifulneſs, the conſecrating of his Father with Divine Honours (as he terms “ it, which was by reckoning him among the Divi) the preferring (or rather “ receiving) his Brother, as he did, to be his Colleague in the Sovereign Power; “ his vindicating his Uncles Fame when dead in War, by revenging his Death “ upon the Goths; his making Auſonius and his Son both Præfects, and at laſt ad- “ vancing him, his Schoolmaſter, to the higheſt Dignity of Conſul, having alſo for- “ merly procured him the place of Quæſtor. As the cuſtom of other Emperors “ was; he affirms that he might well aſſume the Sirname of Germanicus, from the “ ſubmiſſion of the Germans, Allemanicus, from the Number of Captives; and “ Sarmaticus alſo, for his Conquering and Pardoning of that People. Now that he defeated an Army of the Allemans, conſiſting of thirty thouſand men at Ar-gentarium, a place in Gall, Writers affirm, and probably enough, he perfected the Deſign of reducing the Sarmatians, of which his Father was fruſtrated by Death.
But theſe things were memorable in Gratian, as a publick Perſon. As for his private Inclinations, Demeanour, and Qualities both of Mind and Body, “ He affirms him, in the firſt place, to have paſſed no one day from his Youth without Prayer “ to God; without making ſome Vow, and diſcharging himſelf of it with an im- “ maculate Conſcience and a Pure Mind; nay, with thoughts true and upright; “ and to be ſure with clean Hands. In Eating, no Prieſt could ſhew himſelf more “ ceremoniouſly abſtinent; in Drinking, the Table of no old Man whatſoever “ could be found more frugal and ſparing, as to Wine: the Altar of a Veſtal “

Quod tu quum terribile acceperis, amabile præſtitiſti, &c.

By Auſonius his Schoolmaſter.

Heſperius. Tunc primum videntur duo ſimul fuiſſe Præf. Præt. per Gallias. Vide Valeſium in Ammian. p.382.

Vide Notas in Panegyric. Auſonii.

Sect. 3. A. D. 383.

Nun was not more pure than his cloſed Bedchamber; the Couch of no Pontifex more unſpotted; not the Pillow of any Flamen more chaſt.

104. As to his Converſe with his Friends; he did not come eaven, but prevent them in all Offices of kindneſs; and if it ſo chanced that any of them firſt ſhewed him Reſpect, he bluſhed as much as a Private Man had reaſon, when prevented in Civility by an Emperor. His Conſiſtory he compares to ſome Sacrarium or Chapel; wherein none had ſate before him, who either more warily conſidered what he was to ſpeak, more prudently dilated on what he had conſidered, or more maturely diſpatched that whereon he had dilated. In the next place he tells him, He could diſcourſe of his Abilities in Rhetorick, but that therein he ſhould ſeem to gratifie himſelf. For in his Publick Speeches, Sulpicius himſelf was not more ſharpe; Gracchus the elder more commendably modeſt; nor did his Father himſelf carry more Authority with his Gravity: So ſteddy was his voice when he ſpake more warmly; ſo exact in its Cadence when more remiſly; and ſo temperately did he manage it in both caſes. Proceeding to declare the virtues of his Oratory in this manner, at length he turns his Speech to Xenophon the Athenian, and tells him, “That, if Nature would permit it, he could wiſh he might return to life again; he who in declaring the virtues of Cyrus rather accommodated his Pen to his own Wiſhes, than the truth of an Hiſtory; ſetting forth not what indeed he was, but what in reality he ſhould have been. He tells him, that had he lived in theſe Days; in Gratian he might have perceived, what in Cyrus he did not find, but deſired; and he inſtanceth thus: It's the part of a man moſt perfect not to do things of which he may have cauſe to repent; as for Gratian he never did any ſuch things, and always pardoned them that did. It's an excellent thing to ſhew indulgence to thoſe that are in fear; but he by his Edicts, perpetually to be had in remembrance for their Clemency, had put all men beſides the very occaſion of fearing. It's Magnificent to beſtow Honours; but he had inriched the Honorati: It's Laudable for an Emperor to give eaſie Acceſs, and not to pretend buſineſs; but he incouraged ſuch as were ſlow to make known their Requeſts, and when they had opened their griefs, would ask them if they had nothing yet more to ſay. That Speech of the Emperor Titus is very famous, that he had loſt that Day wherein he had done no man good; but it became famous becauſe it was the Son of Veſpaſian that ſpake it, whoſe overmuch Parſimony, and ſuch Auſterity as was ſcarcely to be born, made the Lenity of his Son to be admired. Whereas Gratian the Son of Valentinian (whoſe Goodneſs was great, his Gentleneſs ever ready upon occaſion, and his ſeverity well tempered) in a well acquired and fitly ordered State knew well enough that he might uſe the greateſt mildneſs imaginable, without any detriment unto Diſcipline. Neither did he (he tells him) do one ſingle good thing in one Day, but multiplied every moment ſuch favours as would laſt for Ages; and this he makes out by his remitting the Tributes which were remaining due to the Treaſury. He demands what Emperor did ever more largely indulge his Provinces in this kind, more certainly provide for their ſecurity, or more prudently conſult for their Defence? Trajan indeed, in old time, did ſomething this way; but doing it by halves, that part which he remitted did not ſo much gratifie the concerned Perſons, as the remainder afflicted them which they were to pay. Antoninus, in like manner, was kind to the People; but he that ſucceeded him in his Authority, though not in his Goodneſs (Commodus) required after his Death what his Father had forgiven, according as he found each one was behind in the Rolls. But Gratian had cauſed all the Records of theſe publick Debts to be publickly burnt; thereby to cut off all occaſion of further vexing of his Subjects upon this Account. A joyful Sight it was in the Forum of every City, to ſee theſe Advantageous Fires which were made with the Piles of theſe Papers, wherein were reduced to Aſhes the Originals of antient Frauds, together with the materials of future Oppreſſions. Now he again triumphingly asks the queſtion, what could poſſibly be more Indulgent than his Scholar, or in Indulgence more adviſed? who took care that all the Benefits he beſtowed ſhould not be forfeited, and that the grievances he took away, might not come into a poſſibility of relapſe.

Explained.

105. What he ſpeaks here concerning the remitting of Tributes in part by Trajan; if we conſider the Panegyrical Oration ſpoken to that Prince by Pliny the Younger, upon the ſame occaſion that this of Auſonius was uttered, we muſt interpret concerning the Vigeſima or twentieth part of Eſtates, which was firſt exacted

Sect.3.

A.D. 383.

Vide Notas Catanai & Rayani in Paneg. Plinij.

exacted upon this occaſion. Auguſtus when he conſidered what vaſt expence the State muſt needs be at, by Reaſon of ſo many Legions, and Bodies of Horſe as neceſſarily were to be maintained; for defraying the Charge, required the twentieth part to be paid into the Treaſury, of all Eſtates and Legacies that were left to Perſons that were not very poor, or nearly related in Blood. But much oppreſſion being hereby occaſioned, Nero firſt, as Pliny tells Trajan, abated ſomething the Rigour of the Exaction; but ſo, as it was rather to point at the Sore, and direct him to the Cure of it, than to heal the Diſtemper; which he effected ſo far as he intended, adding much to the Liberality of him that Adopted him. After him, it ſeems Antoninus alſo attempted ſomething in this kind, which proved ineffectual; and the greateſt Act of Grace and total Aboliſhing of the thing was reſerved for Gratian his Bounty and Munificence. “And “ this his Maſter farther tells him, did not only extend to the Provincials, but “ the Senate and the Army alſo. Trajan, it's true, viſited his ſick Friends, and “ for that his gentleneſs was to be commended; but he both viſited and healed “ them, found them Attendants, Victuals and Phyſick at his own charge, comforting “ them when ſick, and rejoycing with them when recovered. If any Diſaſter “ had happened to the Army, he had ſeen him viſit the Tents of the wounded, “ asking them how they fared, handling their wounds, and ſeeing them Dreſſed, “ or fit Applications ſpeedily made to their ſeveral neceſſities. Some he had ob- “ ſerved, who refuſed Meat, to receive it at his Recommendation; others to Re- “ cover upon his Chearing and incouraging them. The Baggage of ſome he “ would cauſe to be carried by his own Mules; to others he would appoint par- “ ticular Carriage-Beaſts; ſome ſupply with Servants, relieve the wants and cover “ the Nakedneſs of others; and this he did indefatigably, bountifully, with the “ greateſt Piety imaginable, and without the leaſt Oſtentation. In Concluſion, he “ provided all things for the Sick, and upbraided none when reſtored to Health.

His gratitude to his Schoolmaſter.

106. Thus he Illuſtrates his Goodneſs, and the Effects thereof towards all his Subjects; but, as became him, with much more Care and Paſſion he deſcants upon his Kindneſs to himſelf, and the occaſion of his Diſcourſe. “ He joyned “ him in the Conſulſhip, with a famous Perſon (viz. Anicius Hermogenianus Olybrius) “ and ſo joyned him, as to give him the Precedence, by preferring him in “ the Nomination. And this he did of his own Accord, when he never ſought “ for it, never thought on it, nay, when there were many deſerving Men elſe “ to be had, and no Merit could be pleaded on his part, except what was in the “ Opinion of the Emperor. But ſo it was, becauſe what he might aſcribe to his “ own Natural Parts, he attributed to the Induſtry of him his Maſter; for to “ this purpoſe in this manner he wrote to him. I pay what I owe, and ſtill I owe “ what I have paid. If therefore, any demanded of him how he came to this “ Honour, his Anſwer was ready: None but God, or he that is next to him, can “ give Account of any Mans felicity. If ſtill ſuch an one inſiſted on Merit, “ he replied, he could pretend none at all; only he could ſay, that The Empe- “ rour himſelf ſaid he ought it to him; but this word was of a large acceptation, “ for he might mean thereby, either that this was the reward of the Inſtruction “ he received from him, or without that, he might find an Obligation meerly “ from his own Liberality towards an agreeable Object, or elſe he had tacitely “ obliged himſelf to it, or had received ſome Command from his Father to be “ kind to him that brought him up; or elſe by this Magnanimity he reſolved to “ imitate the goodneſs of God himſelf. On the other ſide, Auſonius thinks him- “ ſelf obliged, that he had taught him, becauſe He was the man pitched upon, “ when many other Perſons excellent for Learning were paſſed by; but ſo it “ happened, leſt He, who for this his Imployment of Inſtructing him, had paſſed “ through all other Degrees of Honours by a ſtrange Celerity of his reiterated good “ Offices ſhould dye, before ſuch time as the Scholar had Compleated his Gratitude to “ the higheſt Degree his Maſter was capable to receive. But for all this it might ſtill be “ objected, that in former times there had been others that had taught the Emperours; and why ſhould He carry away the Honour of having been in, a “ manner, ſole Tutor to the Prince. As to this he replies modeſtly that he “ will not accuſe thoſe that were Collegues in the time of Conſtantine (meaning “ his Sons) but he would a little reflect upon the manners of former times. “ Seneca indeed was rich; but not Conſul as He was, and ſome thought him ra- “ ther to have Armed his Pupil for Cruelty, than inſtructed him againſt it. “ Quintilian alſo obtained Conſular Ornaments, by means and procurement of Cle- “ mens, “

Sect. 3.

A.D. 383.

mens, who was in great grace for a time with the Emperour Domitian; but “ he rather thereby procured ſome addition of Honour to his Name, than any Enſignes “ of Authority, being it ſeems, not made Ordinary but Titular or Honorary “
Conſul; for his Name is not to be found in the Faſti or Catalogue of Conſuls.
As for this Clemens, by whoſe Interceſſion that learned Spaniard the Author of the Oratorian Inſtitutions, got his Honour, there were two of that Name, viz. M. Aricinius Clemens, and T. Flavius Clemens his Couſin German, who for ſome time could do much with Domitian, under whom Quinctilian flouriſhed; but having been alſo Conſuls, he who was conſtant to nothing that was good, cauſed them both to be put to death.

107. In the next place he inſtanceth in Titian, who being alſo Tutor to “ an Emperour, and an excellent Perſon, yet taught afterward a Municipal School “ at Veſontio (now Bezanſon) and died in Obſcurity; which muſt have been Julius “ Titianus a Citizen of Veſontio, and afterward Schoolmaſter at Lyons, who “ was Preceptor to Maximinus the younger; and by his Scholar, when Cæſar, and “ his Father the Emperour, was promoted to the Conſulſhip; but both they “ continuing not long in power, he deſtitute of Support, betook himſelf to the School “ of the Municipium of Lyons, wherein the Sons of all the Corporation were “ Taught. “ At length, he ſaith, he can only allow of Fronto, to be compared “ with him in his Imployment and Reward; which Perſon being a ſingular Orator “ was the Inſtructer of the two Emperours Antonini, viz. Marcus the Philoſopher, “ and Verus his Collegue. And yet had not he been honoured with “ the Præfectſhip, before he arrived at that of Conſul; and for his Conſulſhip it “ was but of thoſe called Suffecti, who were ſubſtituted in the Room of the Dead “ to make up the year, as Fronto was but for two Months remaining; ſo that “ he might very well have left Recorded, in the Conſulſhip of whom it was, “ that he was Conſul. If any now ſhould upbraid him with his mean Deſerts, “ and demand of him (if he durſt Compare himſelf with ſo great an Orator as “ Fronto was, he ſaith, he would only reply in brief, that he did not compare “ himſelf with him; but yet would prefer Gratian before Antoninus, even that “ Gratian who as to Power, was Emperour, as to Valour was a Conquerour; “ for Sanctity was Auguſtus; for his Religion a Pontifex; a Father as to Indulgence; “ in Age a Son; and in Piety or Duty Both of them together. For “ when he was imbroiled in a moſt difficult War, at ſuch time as he was “ menaced by many Thouſands of Barbarians, wherewith the Tract of the “ Danube was confronted, even then, Armed as he was, and in the Field, he “ held the Comitia, for Creating him Conſul; and wrote to him that moſt obliging “ Letter, which we have already related at that year, and upon every “ word whereof, the obliged Maſter now boaſtingly deſcants, reflecting the “ glory back upon the grateful Scholar. He exceedingly glories in that he was “ pleaſed to ſend him as a Mark of his Honour, that Trabea, (or Palmata) viz. “ the Conſular Robe which was worne by the Emperour Conſtantius himſelf, “ whom he calls his Parent, as being indeed the Father of his Wife. And he “ no leſs admires his Wiſdome, in the Anſwer he gave to ſuch as demanded “ of him to which of the Conſuls he deſigned the firſt place, or Nomination; “
He told them there was no reaſon they ſhould queſtion who it was he intended “ to prefer, neither could any good, generous Perſons about him doubt of the “ matter. They that asked, hereat conceived hope, believing that that eminent “ Perſon, his Collegue, who was alſo at hand, muſt be the man.

108. Yet deſiring to be put out of all pain and doubt, they made a ſecond Demand, “ who ſhould be the Man? At that he pauſed a little, and bluſhed with “ ſome diſdain, that they ſhould make a Doubt; and then replied, Why do you ask “ who of the two deſigned Conſuls ſhould be firſt named? Who ſhould have the firſt “ Nomination but he whom the Præfectſhip doth Capacitate for it? He admires his “ wiſdome, that by ſo ſudden and diſcreet an Anſwer he ſhould prevent that “ Envy which his Affection might have raiſed; and he applauds himſelf in that “ glory, whereby he was rendred no leſs than equal to Cicero. For Cicero gloried “ much herein, that the People of Rome had made him the Firſt of the Prætors and the former of the Conſuls; thereby hinting, that it was more glorious “ to be preferred before one, than many; for though it be no Diſgrace to be a “ Second, yet it is great Renown when but two in the World can be thought “ fit, to be reckoned in the firſt place. It's reported of Alexander the great, that “ Reading thoſe Verſes in Homer, wherein, upon a Challenge made by Hector, “ out

Sect.3. out of nine Captains, one Champion was to be choſen, and thereupon the Army prayed to Jupiter, that when it came to the Lot, one of theſe three, viz. Ajax the Son of Tydeus, or elſe Agamemnon, might be the Man, he profeſſed, that He for his part, would have killed any that ſhould have named him in the third place. If this Couragious Prince would not amongſt no fewer than nine Perſons have been named in the third place, wherein he ſhould have been preferred before the greater number, how would he have been troubled, if of two, he had been made the ſecond in order? For when only two are deſigned, the Choice muſt needs be very difficult. As when two Perſons are preferred, before all other Mortals to be made Conſuls, he who hath the preheminence over the other, is preferred not only before one, but all mankind beſides. So great was the Favour, and high was the Honour he acknowledges to have been conferred on him, which yet was more tranſcendent by the reſpect he ſhewed to him, in gracing him with his Preſence at his firſt Promotion. For when he named him Conſul, the Emperour was then at Sirmium in Pannonia, and Auſonius was in Gall, of which he had borne the Prefectſhip; and yet it ſeems he took ſo long a Journey to ſee him aſſume the Enſignes of his Authority, that therein he rather flew than rode, there being he ſaith no ſtory of ſuch ſpeed told, no not in the Audacious Fables of the Greeks. He dares the Fable of Pegaſus, deſpiſes the Stories of Cyllarus and Arion. For the Horſes of Caſtor and Pollux performed their Journey with the Change of their Riders, and ſome Reſt. But Gratian flew over ſo many Limits of the Roman Empire, ſo many Rivers, ſo many Lakes, and the Bounds of ſo many antient Kingdoms; from Thrace, through all the Tract of Illyricum (how large ſoever) through Venetia, Liguria, Old Gall (as he terms Gallia Ciſalpina) the inſuperable places of Rætia, the Borders of Rhine, the unpaſſable Coaſts of the Seine, and the ſpacious Parts of the lower Germany, with greater expedition than he could write it, without any Repoſe ſo much as taking any moderate Sleep, or kind of Suſtenance. And all this was to grace or put ſome Honour upon his Gall, that he might anticipate his new Conſul; and make Fame, which was wont to be ſwifter than the wind, to appear ſlow, by his preventing it; ſo much did he allow to the old Age, and the Reputation of his Maſter; whoſe Curule Chaire, whoſe Prætexta, tinſed by his Purple, whoſe Trabea, (rendred more Illuſtrious by the kindneſs of him that ſent it, than conſpicuous for the Gold it had in it) which he made his, by what he had done in Illyricum, he had rendred much more Celebrious by what he had performed in Gall. But ſo he delighted to honour him, who could ſay that he was his Quæſtor, next boaſt that he was his Præfectus Prætorio, after that, glory that he was his Conſul, but above all (and which the Emperour prized above every thing) that he was his Præceptor, and as ſuch piouſly had declared him, juſtly had preferred him before his Collegue, liberally had inriched him; and by his Imperial grace and favour, through all good Offices had ſo Conſecrated him.

A.D. 383.

109. Now in way of Gratitude and Return for all his Kindneſſes, he confeſſed, that though Cicero having arrived at the Conſulſhip, denied that there was any other thing which he thirſted after; yet he profeſſes, that though he was both Conſul, and an old Man, yet he was ſtill greedy after ſomething elſe. You may well imagine what this was, viz. often to ſee him his Pupil, Cloathed with the Enſignes of that Magiſtracy, that he alone might equal the ſixth Conſulſhip of Valerius Coronus, the ſeventh, of Caius Marius, nay, the thirteenth of his Nameſake Auguſtus, meaning Octavianus or him that firſt obtained that Sirname. He tells him, that for his wonderful Charity and Goodneſs (formerly related) he had rendred himſelf more deare to all men than their own ſafety; all his friends he had made obnoxious; and ſuch as for ever would remain ready, devout and faithful to do him Service; being ſuch friends, as his own Inducements had procured him, and not Fortune. And from this more juſt than well grounded Confidence, he turns his Speech to him that would be more Righteous than thoſe he had obliged; even the Eternal-Maker of the World himſelf, who Chuſeth to inhabit, as he ſaith, in the Minds of thoſe who have Cordially given up themſelves to his Service, and therein makes Temples and Altars for his own Worſhip; acknowledging him to have ſo firmly planted the Love of him in the Emperours Heart, that Abſence had not made him at all more Cool therein but he had remembred him though at a diſtance, had conferred Honour on him when Abſent, and had preferd him before

Sect. 3.

A.D. 383.

before thoſe that were preſent and in his Sight. Such was the ſence that“ Auſonius had of this favour, expreſſed in very Oratorical and Poetical words,“ which though not convenient to be here rendred as they are in his Oration;“ yet we thought fit to give the Reader an Account thereof. Both for that Learn-“ ed men think it fit, that Youth ſhould be acquainted with his Panegyrick,“ and for that it acquaints us very much with the humour and Diſpoſition of“ Gratian. For although the Phraſe be very Poetical, and the Expreſſions hyper“ bolical, yet it repreſents to us in a Table, finely painted out and imbelliſhed,“ what Ammianus himſelf in a rough and courſe draught had done toward the“ Characteriſing of this Prince, when he tells us, that By his towardly Inclination“ he gained much upon the People, being a Youth well diſpoſed, Eloquent in Speech,“ and Soldier enough for his time. As for thoſe rough Lines he draws to make“ him have a Caſt of Commodus his eye towards ſomething on one ſide; when“ upon better View, this Object appears but a Herd of Deer or Wild-Beaſts;“ it rather directs us to a Foreſt or Land-skip, than any ill Features, glance or“ ſquinting of this Perſon, eſpecially if in an harmleſs Exerciſe, he behaved him-“ ſelf ſo gallantly, and demeaned himſelf with that Manlineſs and Dexterity, as“ the Panegyriſt tells us. But firſt, if you will, let us take a View of him as he“ deſcribes him on Foot, and then ſee how he performed his Exerciſes on“ Horſeback.

110. Having after the performing of his Devotions brought him out of his“ Cloſet with a mind as well as Body altogether waſhed and pure, as he walks“ he thus points unto him. Whoſe Coming forth did ever portend better things?“ Whoſe Gate was more modeſt? Whoſe Behaviour more weighed? Whoſe familiar“ Converſation more Decent? Or whoſe Military Behaviour more to purpoſe, or,“ as our Neighbours would ſay, more a droit? In exerciſing his Body, who ever“ ran more ſwiftly? Who Wreſtled, or did any other ſort of Activity more cle-“ verly (as now we ſpeak?) who ever Leaped higher or more nimbly? No man“ ever could throw any thing to a greater diſtance, no man caſt his Darts more“ thick, or more certainly hit the Mark. We wonder, ſaith he, at the Poet“ (meaning Virgil) for terming the Numidians, Infrænos, or thoſe that need not“ to uſe any Bridle on their Horſes, which were wont to be governed with a Rod“ alone; and at another Writer who talks of a Stroak of a Switch being a ſuffi-“ cient hint either to go or ſtay. All this was a Riddle to them that read it, till“ they beheld him when Mounted, bending his Bow, laying the Reins on the“ Horſe his Neck, when he pleaſed, meerly with a Switch putting him on, and“ with one ſtreak of the ſame, giving a ſtop to his higheſt Cariere. They who“ pretended to teach him this, could not do it themſelves; nay, they were now“ content to learn of him. Thus we ſee the Horſemanſhip and other Parts of“ a Cavalier deſcribed by him that was his Maſter in a more Noble Academy“ of the two, and we could wiſh he had been as happy in his Predictions as“ in his Inſtructions and Obſervations; the only thing we lament in his Panegy-“rick, as not having ſuch ground for it's Truth, is, that by his wonderful good-“ neſs he had rendred himſelf more dear to all men, than their own ſafety; that“ all his Friends he had made obnoxious, and ſuch as for ever would remain rea-“ dy, devout, and faithful at his Service. The Event did not prove it, however“ ſuch was the Deſire and Prayer of Auſonius, who if he wiſhed to him accord-“ ing to what he believed him to deſerve, he was equitable, though not ſucceſ-“ full in his deſires of the proſperity of ſo excellent a Perſon, however it ſeemed“ not good to the All-wiſe Creator of the World (to whom he addreſſed him-“ ſelf) to give him his Portion and Reward in this Life. As herein he is to be“ commended, ſo excuſed, in his Poetical Flouriſhes, and poſſibly more Luxuri-“ ant Expreſſions than the nicety of ſimple and plain Truth would bear. For the Honour and profit he himſelf reaped from ſo grateful a Scholar could not give him near ſo much Satisfaction as the contentment and Joy he received in being delivered from a vexatious tormenting diſappointment. When after a Melancholick Reflexion upon his former hopes conceived of doing Service to the Publick, from the Quality and Parts of the Youth; after many years ſpent, and much Labour loſt, he ſhould have been forced to quit the unpleaſant Object with no more returnable a Sentiment than that of Operam & oleum perdidi.

Cujus autem unquam egreſſus auſpicatior fuit, aut inceſſus modeſtior &c.

SECT.

SECT. IV.

From the Murder of Gratian, to the Murder of Valentinian the Second, his Brother, and the laſt of the Family.

The Space of eight Years, and about ten Months.

After Gratian's death, Maximus rages againſt his followers.

1. GRatian being dead, the fury and Rage of Maximus the Tyrant died not with him; but extended to ſeveral of his Friends in Gall, amongſt whom none more eminent than Merobaudes and Ballio. Merobaudes bore the Title of Conſul this year; but after thoſe Illuſtrious Offices he diſcharged, and his Conſular Purple, was put to death; and the other, (by Pacatus in his Panegyrical Oration to Theodoſius called Vallio) was driven to that Deſperation, that for fear of Cruel Torments he killed himſelf, as St. Ambroſe writes, who tells Valentinian what paſſed betwixt himſelf and the Tyrant upon this occaſion. For, when he went on an Embaſſy to him, being upbraided it ſeems, with the Death of Gratian's followers; the Tyrant anſwered, Whom have I cauſed to be ſlain? The Biſhop anſwered, Ballio; and how excellent a Perſon? how great a Souldier? was that any Juſt Cauſe for his Baniſhment that he kept himſelf faithful to his Prince? To this he replied, I did not command him to be kill'd. But, ſaith the Biſhop, we heard there was Order given for his Death. And the Uſurper acknowledged, that if he had not offered violence to himſelf, he had ordered him to be conveyed to Cabillonum, and there burnt alive. Whereupon, the Biſhop ended that Diſcourſe, telling him, that therefore it was believed, he was made away by his Command, complaining, that no Man could expect to be ſafe, if ſo great a Commander, ſo valiant a Soldier, and ſo deſerving a Perſon could not be ſpared. And he writes that Bauto, who in the ſeventh year of Theodoſius his Reign, was Conſul, and before whom St. Auguſtine then read a Lecture for the place of Profeſſor of Rhetorick at Milan, was alſo in Danger to have been ſentenced to dye, as if he had been another Ballio. Pacatus ſaith he might have more ſpecious pretence for his Cruelty againſt them, becauſe both of them had ſerved in the Army under Gratian, and that this Prince lov'd them both. Therefore it's juſtly wondred, that Proſper in his Chronicon, ſhould ſay, that Gratian was overthrown and ſlain through the Treachery of Merobaudes the Magiſter Militum; though by ſome, this Merobaudes is thought to have been ſome other Perſon, and not Merobaudes the Conſul of the preſent year. Now if you will know how farther the Uſurper behaved himſelf after his Succeſs againſt his lawful Sovereign, and thoſe of his Friends that could do him moſt prejudice, and diſturb him in his unjuſt got Poſſeſſions, you may hear Pacatus how he bemoans to Theodoſius his Country of Gall after this manner.

Vide Baron. ad hunc Annum 12. & Balduini Notas in Panegyric. Pacati.

Pacatus his Deſcription of his Extravagancies in Gall.

2. And whence ſhall I begin to make a Relation of thoſe Miſchiefs, which this Tyrant Maximus brought upon the Weſtern Provinces, but at the Calamities ſuſtained by thee my dear Country, which of all the Countries infeſted “ by this Plague, may'ſt truly Challenge to thy ſelf, the Privilege of Miſeries, be- “ ing conſtrained, not only with thine Ears, (the Senſe of which is more obtuſe) “ but with thine Eyes alſo to behold his Victory, and the Deſtruction of Grati- “ an. It's true; our next Neighbour the Italian, and the Spaniard alſo, had great “ reaſon to feel the wound; yet both of them in their grief may receive ſome “ Comfort, in that one of them ſaw nothing of the Tyranny it ſelf, and the “ other beheld the down-fall of the Tyrant. We firſt of all ſuſteined the Fury “ of that Savage-Beaſt, we firſt glutted his ravenous Appetite with the Blood of “ Innocents, and his Covetous, by our publick Deſolation. His Cruelty, now ſe- “ cure and at Eaſe, had it's full ſcope amongſt us; and his Avarice as yet beggar- “ ly and more craving. In other places this publick Miſchief, either began or “ ended, in Gall it repoſed it ſelf and continued. Who can compare himſelf for Miſery with us; when we bore the burthen of the Tyranny both with others and alone by our ſelves? Why ſhould I make menntion of the Cities emptied of their beſt Inhabitants, the Deſerts even filled with Noble Perſons that fled their Countries; the Eſtates of thoſe Perſons ſet to Sale, who had once enjoyed the greateſt Honours; their Perſons proſcribed, and their very Lives valued at a ſum of money? In our days we have ſeen Dignities reduced, Men of Conſular Degree ſtripped of their Robes, we have beheld old Men who outlived their Fortunes, and Infants ſecurely and innocently playing under the Eye of thoſe Officers who were ſelling their Patrimonies. Yet thus miſerable though we were were we forbidden to demean our ſelves as miſerable Perſons; nay, on the contrary, forced to Act the part of happy Men, and only at home and in our own Houſes having but permitted our Wives and Children to be Witneſſes of our grief, we went abroad with a Vizarded Countenance not at all agreeing with our Fortune. For you might hear ſome Informer talk after this Rate: Why looks he ſo Melancholick? Becauſe, of a Rich Man he is become Poor? May he not be glad he lives? Why hath this other put on Black? I believe he mourns for his Brother, but he has yet a Son. Therefore we durſt not bewail thoſe we loſt, for fear of loſing thoſe that remained. But we put on Serene Countenances over heavy and Cloudy Mindes, in like manner as they that taſte of the Juice of ſome Herbes in Sardinia, are reported to dye Laughing. We mourned, and yet made our ſelves merry. It's ſome alleviation to Sorrow, when one may weep it out; and the Breaſt is eaſed with Sighing. And there can be no greater pain than to be miſerable, but one muſt not ſeem ſo. There was no hope of ſatiating this publick Robber; for, Satiety which is natural in other Caſes, was not produced in him by plenty and Abundance; his Hunger of Having daily increaſed, and what he had already, did but irritate his Appetite after more. As Drink kindles the Thirſt of ſick Perſons; as Fire is not extinguiſht by dry Fuel, but it's Rage increaſed, ſo was his greedy and hungry Mind ſtill whetted by the devouring of that Wealth which he heaped up by impoveriſhing all other Men.

Sect. 4. A.D. 383.

3. He himſelf, in Purple as he was, ſtood by the weigh-Scales, and with a pale and gaping Face, obſerved every motion and Inclination of the Balance, not abating one ſingle Grain. The ſpoils of Provinces, what was left by the Exiled, and the goods of ſuch as were Murdered, were brought in on heaps. Here lay Gold pull'd violently from off the Arms and Fingers of Matrons, there Necklaces torne from about the Necks of Orphans, and hard by might be ſeen Silver, ready for the Ballance all beſmeared with the Blood of the Owners. Every where was to be perceived telling of Mony, carrying and lugging of Baggs into the Treaſury, laying heaps upon heaps, and the breaking and cracking of Tables and Veſſels to be heard, ſo that any one who ſaw the Sight would have imagined the place to have been ſome Den and Receptacle of a Thief, and not the Habitation of an Emperour: But a Thief uſes (or rather abuſes) what he has got, and what he takes from others as it were reſtores to himſelf; neither doth he obſerve and lye in wait to hoard up and bury Wealth, and at the ſame time to be wicked and wretched; but that he may gratify his Palate and his Belly, and not want ſupply for his laviſh Expences: for he is careleſs, and profuſe with the ſame eaſineſs, both as to getting and ſpending. But that Pirate of ours, amaſſed up together in that Charybdis of his Den, whatever he had got from all Quarters, where it ſhould be utterly loſt, without doing us or himſelf any good. Charybdis do I call it? This Gulf is reported, though it ſwallow up whole and intire Veſſels, yet to ſlight and reject Shipwracks, and caſt them up upon the Oppoſite Shoars. But our Goods went in one certain and conſtant Road, to the Treaſury, which common Whirlpit, not at all glutted with what it devoured, Vomitted up nothing at all it had once ſwallowed down. It's the uſual and laſt Excuſe that Bad Princes make; that they take on purpoſe that they may give, and they deprecate the Injury of their Rapines and Oppreſſions by the greatneſs of their Bounty. But what think you of one who takes from all on purpoſe that none may have what he takes? The Covetouſneſs alſo of private Perſons, though ill in it ſelf, yet hath this to ſay, that there was fear of Poverty, that one muſt lay up for old Age, and provide for Poſterity; but what Cauſe doth He alleage for his Covetouſneſs, who hath at his Command what ever in any place is to be had? I for my part (if a Mor-

Sect. 4. A.D. 383.

Mortal Man may dare to make a Judgment of what is Cœleſtial (he ſpeaks to“ an Emperour) do believe that Princes have no greater felicity in this world than“ to make other perſons as happy as they can, to relieve thoſe that are oppreſ-“ ſed by Poverty and want; to overcome Fortune, and confer a New Fate upon“ a Miſerable Man. And therefore an Emperour who well conſiders the great-“ neſs of his Condition, ſhould not call his own ſo much what he has taken away, as“ that which he hath given. For all things being in his Power, and as the Ocean,“ comprizing every thing within its own Circuit, what Waters it gives to ſeveral“ Parts of the Earth, from the Earth it receives them; ſo whatſoever out of Boun-“ ty is contributed from the Prince to his Subjects, returns again into the Prince“ his Coffers. So that a munificent Prince conſults both his own Fame and his“ Advantage; for he both purchaſeth Fame by what he doth, and he but lays out“ Money, which will again reverte into his own Purſe.

4. But what's to be ſaid to one, to whom every thing praiſe-worthy ſeemeth“ fooliſh, who both, as every wicked Man doth, hateth all good Examples, and“ placing his chiefeſt felicity in a power of having and hurting, bent his endeavour“ not only how to get, but how to leave nothing remaining to thoſe from whom“ he took it? For he did not practiſe what Princes are wont to do, in digging“ and improving of Mines, thereby to draw into publick Profit, what Nature had“ concealed within her own Womb; and find out a Treaſure there, where none“ ſhould be the poorer for its Diſcovery. He did not reckon that Gold of any va-“ lue, which was digged out of the Veins of the Earth, or taken from the Gravel of“ Rivers; but eſteemed that moſt pure and refined which was extorted from thoſe who“ wept when they parted from it; which was waſhed with the Tears of Men, not“ with the water of Rivers; not digged out of the Cavities of the Earth, but“ torne from the Necks and Throats of ſuch as were Slain. Therefore upon fear-“ ful apprehenſion of the Pen (for proſcription) as well as the Sword of the Tyrant,“ Poverty became a thing vowed, and, ſo that the Hangman might be avoided,“ the Officer of Confiſcations was willingly ſubmitted to. Then having related“ what we have ſaid concerning the Death of Merobaudes, and Ballio, he adds, that“ beſides this, he can ſpeak of Blood drawn from the Female Sex, and of Cruelty againſt them whom Wars are wont to ſpare, however otherwiſe Cruelly Managed. And he inſtanceth, in a certain Matron which he put to Death for her Religion; and inveighs againſt the Cruelty and Bloodthirſtineſs of ſome Prieſts. Hereby probably he means ſome Woman he thus puniſhed for the Hereſy of Priſcillian, as he did ſeveral others, being the firſt that ever inflicted Death for Religion, which Courſe (ſince that time too common amongſt Chriſtians) St. Martin the Biſhop of Tours earneſtly oppoſed; but it was urged and proſecuted by Idacius and Ithacius two other Biſhops, for which they were removed from Communion by the reſt of their Brethren. But of this more largely in its proper place. We ſee how Pacatus deſcribes the Demeanour of Maximus toward his Country-men the Galls, but we muſt read him with ſome allowance to his Paſſion and Panegyrical ſtrain, others (but poſſibly ſuch as never ſmarted) allowing Maximus tollerable qualities, had he not obtained his Power by Rebellion and the Murther of his Sovereign. But to ſecure his Dominion however got, rather than believing himſelf ſufficiently and ſafely ſetled therein, as Zoſimus writes, he ſent as Ambaſſador to Theodoſius, the Præfect of his Bedchamber, no Eunuch (which ſort of Men he could not endure) but a grave Man, and one of his moſt Antient Acquaintance. He asked no Pardon for what had been done againſt Gratian; but offered Peace, and to enter into a League and Society againſt any Enemies of the Roman Empire, or, if he was otherwiſe inclined, he denounced War. Theodoſius ſeemed to be willing to admit him Emperour, and that his Statues ſhould be erected with his own, reſolving with himſelf to make War upon him, when it ſhould be convenient, and in the mean time to circumvent him with a Show of all manner of obſervance. Therefore when he ſent away Cynegius the Præfect into Ægypt, with Order to prohibit the Worſhip of the Gods, and ſhut up the Temples, he alſo Commanded him to expoſe at Alexandria to publick view the Image of Maximus; and in an Oration to the People, to declare him his Conſort in the Empire. This Cynegius performed, and withal, ſhut up all Acceſs to the Temples through the Eaſt, all Ægypt and Alexandria; and prohibited the Sacrifices which in all Ages had been uſed, with the Worſhip belonging to the place. But what things from that time to this have hapned to the Roman Empire, ſhall particularly hereafter be related. Thus writes Zoſimus the Pagan Writer, and great Back-Friend to Theodoſius upon this account, Allowance is to be made to his Panegyrical ſtrain.

Maximus ſends to offer a League to Theodoſius.

Who ſeems to be willing to admit him his Colleague.

Sect. 4.

A. D. 383.

whoſe Falſities have been already laid open, and hereafter his Malice and blind Zeal may be more diſcovered.

His end therein.

5. The End and Deſign of Theodoſius his pleaſing the Tyrant, for the time, ſeems to have been his care for the preſervation of Valentinian; and his fear, leſt proceeding in his fury, he ſhould, after having brought Brittain, Gall and Spain under his Yoak, paſs alſo the Alpes, and, with as much eaſe, deſtroy that young and helpleſs Prince. And in Italy they were all ſeized with a mighty conſternation, expecting nothing but that the Tempeſt would ſpeedily be at their Door; and not knowing what courſe to take, at length Ambroſe the Biſhop of Milau was ſent upon a diſperate Imployment, to ſee if by the repute of his Gravity and Sanctity he could work upon the ambitious humour of the man, and reaſon him out of his extravagant heat and thirſt of Domineering over ſo many Mortals. And he ſeems to have wrought ſo far with him, that he gave ſome ſtop to his Careir, and for this year we ſhall hear no further of him. As for Valentinian, he could not be but very ſolicitous, ſeeing his Neighbours Houſe not only on fire, but burnt to the ground; and for that he ſeems at this time to have born no good will to ſome that were near about him, we are afraid he doubted ſomething of their Integrity. Theſe were his two Comites, Rei Privatæ, and Largitionum, from whom he took the Power of hearing Fiſcal Cauſes in Appeals about this very time, when “ made from the under-Officers of the Revenue, called Rationales, and ordered them to lye in private Cauſes, to the Judges of the Provinces, who had this “ cogniſance, viz. to Proconſuls, the Comites of Dioceſes and the Vicars. If from theſe alſo Appeal ſhould be fit to be made, he wills that the Parties concerned have “ recourſe to the Prince himſelf, who is to be informed of the ſtate of matters “ and the true merits of the Cauſes, by the Comes Largitionum and Rei Privatæ, “ as they have relation to each of their Imployments. This Law is directed to Ammianus, his Comes Rei Privatæ; and about this time Symmachus, who ſhortly after was Præfect of the City, in an Epiſtle to Theodoſius the Emperor, makes mention of one Ammianus and one Macedonius, both who had deſerved ill of the Commonwealth, and the hearing of whom had been referred to himſelf. Ammianus, died as he was brought by the Protectors towards Rome; and as for Macedonius he could not tell what was become of him, and he deſires the Emperor that the delay may not be laid to his Charge, and that he would ſend him more particular Inſtructions for his tryal. Now there is one Macedonius in the Code of Theodoſius, to whom a Law is inſcribed concerning Appeals, but two years before, by the Title of Comes S. Largitionum.

Valentinian leſſens the Power of two of his great Officers.

L. 41. de Appellation. & Cod. Th. vide Com.

Lib. 10. Ep. 49.

L. 39. ſup. tit.

Theodoſius incourages his Judges.

6. Theodoſius, after the death of Gratian continued all the remaining part of the year at Conſtantinople, where he made two or three Laws, of which it will not be amiſs to take notice. He took care for maintaining the juſt Revenue due to his Judges, by declaring, that for Mulcts impoſed meerly for Contumacy, ſhould “ lye no Appeal; for if a Magiſtrate cannot this way maintain his juriſdiction, his “ Power muſt needs be vain and precarious. But he found at this time in moſt ſorts of perſons a vaſt Ambition and deſire of precedence, which tranſported many ſo far, that by one means or other they procured Letters or Codicils of the greateſt Dignities, that they might leap over the Heads of deſerving Perſons, and ſuch as with commendation had diſcharged Offices of a middle Nature. This cauſed great Animoſities, and put all things out of due order and decorum; inſomuch that by a publick Conſtitution he thought himſelf obliged to take notice of it, and provide for a redreſs of a matter of ſo ill conſequence. “ He delivers therein his ſenſe of it as a thing, than which nothing could be more injurious, and a- “ gainſt preſerving Degrees of Dignities; for how could Merit be rewarded where, “ without any conſideration of ſervices performed, men intruded into places of Ho- “ nour, whereby beſt deſerving perſons were deprived of their due, and thoſe of “ inferiour Merit obtained what belonged not unto them. After this Preface he declares what courſe he will have obſerved, as to Honorary Codicils, that ſuch as have been preferred by them, or by the meer favour of the Prince, ſhall come “ below them that have been advanced for their ſervices, or have obtained Codicils “ alſo by the prerogative of their Merits. He preſcribes a Rule alſo to be obſerved “ in the beſtowing of Codicils; that ſuch as had diſcharged Offices, ſhould “ not only be preferred before ſuch as had meerly titular; but amongſt thoſe that “ obtained Meer titular Codicils alſo a reſpect ſhould be had to them that were “ of moſt deſert. So far he preferrs merit before theſe Letters, that to thoſe that “ obtain them he aſſigns Place and degree inferiour to what otherwiſe the Title of “ the “

L. 2. Quorum Appell. non Recip. Cod. Th. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

Reſtrains the Ambition of thoſe that aſpired after Honours.

L. 1. Ut Dignitatum Ordo ſervetur. Cod. Th. lib. 6. tit. 5. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

L. 7. de Honorariis Codicillis Cod. Th.

Sect.4.

A.D. 384.

the Dignity was wont to obtain. So that in caſe a Vicar of a Præfect, after the Office of Vicar diſcharged, obtained honorary Letters of a Præfectſhip, he ſhould not only not have place amongſt the Præfects themſelves, but take his place amongſt Proconſulares, or thoſe of the next Degree or Rank, as it ſhould fall to him; but ſo as to preceed ſuch as were of this Rank meerly by Codicils. In like manner if an ordinary Judge or Governour of a Province (viz. a Conſularis or Preſident) ſhould procure Letters for the place of a Præfect or Proconſularis, ſuch an one ſhould come behind a Vicar, one who had really diſcharged the Office; and if a Præſident procured theſe Codicils, if a Conſularis alſo procured the like, he ſhould be preferred. This was new Law and unknown to former Princes, except what Valentinian the Elder did ordain in a ſpecial Caſe. But ſo extraordinary was the Ambition of this Age, that it required a remedy ſuitable to the Diſtemper.

7. Nay farther than this, he ordains that no Perſon ſhall obtain Honorary Codicils of any Dignity, but the very next preceeding the place he bears, and thereby abſolutely Prohibits all promotions per ſaltum, by virtue of any ſuch unſeaſonable Letters; as preferments in Military Imployments were prohibited to be made. The puniſhment he inflicts upon ſuch as violate this Law, is double; for he wills both that they be deprived of the Honours obtained contrary to the meaning of it, and moreover be fined in no leſs a ſum than twenty pounds of Gold. This is further from this Law to be obſerved, that the Rank of Dignities at this time was thus Conſtituted, viz. Præfects, Proconſuls, Vicars, Conſulares, and then Præſidents; for Proconſuls had the ſecond place. And we may alſo take notice that by Ordinary Powers it means Governors of Provinces; and theſe two, namely Correctors and Præſidents were diſtinguiſhed not only from the Illuſtrious, as the Præfecti Prætorio; but thoſe that had no more than the Title of Spectabilis, as the Proconſuls and Vicars, being alſo by other Laws diſtinguiſhed from them that were termed the Greater Powers; although when Ammianus the Hiſtorian writes of Ordinary Judges and Ordinary Powers, he means ſuch Magiſtrates as they were, contradiſtinct to the Military. But ſuch was the Ambition of this Age which cauſed Theodoſius to be ſo peremptory and effectual in the cure of the Diſtemper, a Diſeaſe which ſo far prevailed, that in the Senate Houſe alſo it infected thoſe that were richer than their Neighbours, inſomuch that they would ſpeak their Opinions firſt, contrary to the antient cuſtom which gave priority of Speech according to Offices and Imployments, and not according to the greatneſs of Eſtates. The old cuſtom Theodoſius ordered the Senate to recall, and Symmachus gave him thanks for ſo doing, as alſo for the power he gave them to leſſen the charge of Games, which the Prætors were wont to be at. And he deſires him by his Decree to confirm what the Fathers by his order had reſolved on as to theſe or other matters, and give them force by a penalty inflicted upon Tranſgreſſors. By theſe Reformations he ſaith, they believed vertue was again returned to its Dominion and Sway that it had in old time. And indeed the way to have Vertue return, was, to fright away Vice by the ſeverity of Laws; which this Emperor yet further attempted now at the cloſing of the year. This was by publiſhing an Edict againſt Calumniators or falſe Accuſers, requiring that ſuch ſhould be puniſhed as Law required after their conviction, or clearing of the Party accuſed, without being admitted to any new Accuſation upon pretence of having now other matter, or having found out new proofs, which theſe men often pretended, thereby to evade the Cenſure they were for their Malice and Falſeneſs to undergo. This Edict is directed to one Hellebicus as Comes and Magiſter of both ſorts of the Militia; or both of Horſe and Foot.

Lib. 10. Ep. 21.

Credimus igitur his remotis ad regnum ſuum rediiſſe virtutes.

He reſtrains falſe Accuſers.

L. 1. de Calumniatoribus. Cod. Th. lib. 9. tit. 39. Dat. 3. Kal. Jan. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

A.D. 384. Fl. Ricimere & Fl. Clearcho Coſs.

8. The year next enſuing or the CCCLXXXIV of our Lord, the twelfth Indiction, and the ninth of Valentinian the Second, had for Conſuls Fl. Ricimeres and Fl. Clearchus. Cynegius for this and five years following was Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt. Prætextatus was Præfect of Italy, and ſo was Probus, as appears from other teſtimonies beſides the Laws, who ſeems to have ſucceeded upon the death of the other. For much what about this time it was that Symmachus, who was Præfect of Rome, by an Epiſtle ſignified the death of Vettius Prætextatus to Valentinian the Emperor. “He tells him that though he ſuppoſed Fame, than which nothing is ſwifter, would prevent his Narration, yet he cannot be ſilent, but compelled thereto by the Neceſſity of his publick Office, muſt acquaint him with the departure of this Illuſtrious Perſon, to the great regret of his Country, of which he was a ſingular Ornament. Whoſe commendations however Prætextatus the Præfect of Italy dies.

Lib. 10. Ep. 24.

Ep. 25.

Symmachus the Præfect of the City, deſires of the Emperors that Statues may be erected to his Memory.

juſt he ſhould in this conſternation of mind paſs over, there being no need to inlarge in his praiſe, ſeeing the Emperor himſelf could well atteſt the glory of his life, and his death was rendred famous by the grief of all men. In another Epiſtle directed to the other Emperors, Theodoſius and Arcadius, he writes, that though Vettius Prætextatus was by the Law of Nature diſſolved, yet ſtill he lived in the memory and love of all men, and in this thing puniſhed Envy it ſelf, that even Death ſo much contributed to his glory, that herein alſo ſhe ought to grudge him his good fortune. For beſides the grief of the whole Roman people conceived for the loſs of him, the Senate alſo being impatient upon the ſame account, deſires, ſaith he, ſome comfort from that Honour which is due to virtue; and beſeeches you that a man to be wondred at in our Age, may by the Diuturnity of Statues be delivered over to the Eyes of poſterity; not that he covets any earthly Rewards, who when he was living trampled upon corporal pleaſures as contemptible things; but becauſe Imitation is incited by honour given to good men; and emulous virtue receives ſtrength from the pattern of Reſpect that's given to another Perſon. Hence came it to paſs that even in leſs poliſht, or in ruſtick ages (as he terms them) the beſt Commonwealths-men were by Hand and Art committed to memory. And I wiſh that in after-times the facility of ſome Flatterers had not derogated from this decent cuſtom; although neither are ſuch things to be eſteemed equal, which by unſuitable ways are procured.

9. It's very fitting therefore that he who remains in the Breaſts of all men, ſhould alſo ſtand in the Eyes of moſt: He who was always greater than the Offices of Magiſtracy which he bore, was moderate towards other Perſons, but ſevere towards himſelf, eaſie without contempt, and of reverend Demeanour without terror. To whom if any profit came by ſucceſſion, it reverted to the kindred of the Teſtator. He whom Proſperity could not alter, never rejoyced in the Adverſity of other men, and knew not how to be indecently liberal: He whom Honour alway found unwilling though it courted him, to whoſe Juſtice and Equity every of his Neighbours would willingly truſt the meaſuring and limiting out their adjacent Grounds. He adds that he would ſay more, and ought more to ſay, but that all things are to be referred to them to whom he writes; whom he beſeeches, that as Patrons of Honeſty and Goodneſs, they would ſet forth what goodneſs was in their times to be ſeen to ſuch as ſhould come after. For this was that Prætextatus, whom juſtly they had made Conſul, that the Regiſter at leſt might tranſmit his famous Name. He prays them that they would by repairing fatal loſſes, do good to thoſe that were left behind. Though the man departed with a Reward, yet he intreats that their judgement of him might ſtill continue; that they would make it appear, that Accidents can do no prejudice to glory: for what he merited from his Country was altogether ſingular; but what he had now loſt was common to many, or indeed to all. In this manner doth the Præfect bewail the death of his Friend; which though it be a little tedious here to inſert, yet the Reader may hereby take notice of this Cuſtom of erecting Statues by order of the Emperors to Deſerving Perſons, as it was done to this Prætextatus; as alſo that the Senate ſometimes requeſted it, and that by the mouth or Pen of the Præfect. But whereas he tells the Emperors that they had made him Conſul, that the Faſti or Regiſters might tranſmit his Name to Poſterity; it ought to be known that he was only deſigned Conſul, and died before he came to receive the Enſigns of that Honour. But this is that Vettius Agorius Prætextatus, as an old Inſcription in a Stone calls him, of whom, being Præfect of the City, we have heard formerly from Ammianus Marcellinus, who gives him great commendations, and mentions his being made Proconſul of Achaia by Julian; in which Dignity he continued the firſt years of Valentinian, as Zoſimus writes, who alſo gives him a great Character.

Vide Proſopographiam. Cod. Theod. & Mureti Notas in Symm. Ep.

Ambaſſadors out of Perſia deſire Peace.

Chron. Hiſt. Cod. Th.

L. 5. de Auro coron. Cod. Th. & L. Un. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

10. Theodoſius this year made his abode at Conſtantinople till the Month of June, about which time Ambaſſadors came to him out of Perſia, and deſired Peace. Either upon this occaſion, and by way of congratulation, or ſome other, was the uſual Gold paid into the Treaſury, which they called Aurum Coronarium; which leſt it ſhould fall upon thoſe that were not concerned to pay it, by an Edict directed to Cynegius, and dated on the eighteenth of January, he commands “That none ſhall be compelled to pay it unleſs Cuſtom could be alleaged for it. But though he was careful and indulgent to thoſe Perſons that they might retain what Immunity they had injoyed; yet having ſet himſelf at this

Sect.4.

A.D. 384.

this time to the beautifying of Conſtantinople by ſeveral new Works, he ordains in the ſame Conſtitution “That no Perſon whatſoever by his Dignity be priviledged from contributing to the Haven, and Aquæduct which now were making or repairing. Therefore much leſs could the Judges priviledge any Perſon; but this holds only in ſuch Sodain, Extraordinary and Noble caſes as this; for otherwiſe Senators were free from ſuch Contributions, and ſo were alſo the Veterans or Emerite Souldiers. But at this time Theodoſius began to make a Port at Conſtantinople (which at this day when Turks and others ordinarily ſpeak of that place they call by this very Name) which was called Portus Theodoſianus; as alſo an Aqueduct which had the Name of Valentiacus; but to this afterward he added antoher, which bore, as did the Port or Haven, his own Name. Of this his inlarging Conſtantinople, Themiſtius the Philoſopher makes ample mention in an Oration he made this year in Commendation of this Emperor. “For, having extolled him as the moſt happy and wealthy Prince that had been, for maintaining ſo great an Army as never had been on foot, ſince“ the Romans had their power; eſpecially in the Country about Tigris (which“ gives us ſome hint of the Advantage he had at this time againſt the Perſians,“ and his compelling them to a Peace) he inſtanceth alſo in the ſupport of this“ vaſt City, and the great multitude contained in it: He adds, that he not only“ nouriſhed them, but repayed what was detained by the Fraud and Iniquity“ of former times; for he increaſed the Proviſions and the Gifts formerly beſtowed;“ whereas before they thought themſelves well dealt with if nothing was taken“ from them, of what they formerly had poſſeſſed: ſo that there was no need“ they ſhould cauſe all Stangers to depart the City (as ſometimes it hapned in“ Rome and other places) for want of Neceſſaries.

Theodoſius beautifies Conſtantinople.

L. 23. de Operibus publicis Cod. Th. & L. 7. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

Orat. 6. p. 161. &c.

The Teſtimony of Themiſtius the Philoſopher thereto.

11. On the contrary, ſtill greater numbers flocked thither, and lived in“ abundance of all good things. The Emperors Magnificence in the Buildings he“ would have his Auditors conſider, in that the City from a rude and unperfect“ thing was become ſo pleaſant and beautiful as could not be expreſſed; no Corn“ being now ſown within the Pomœrium, neither any void ſpaces left, but all being“ fitted with delightful Objects, it repreſented as it were a Garment interwoven“ to the very Borders with Gold and Purple; for ſuch a ſhow did the“ Palace called by the Emperors Name, the Baths, the Porticus's, and the Gymnaſia“ (or places for Exerciſe) make, and ſo largely extended it, that what“ ſeemed formerly the Edge and Hem, now appeared in the middle. Neither while“ the publick Works were carried on, were the private Buildings neglected; but“ the whole City grew and increaſed like to ſome Animal, through the contrivance“ of the Emperor and the aſſiſtance of the Magiſtrate, who ſo far excited the Inhabitants,“ that they built their own Houſes very ſtately and capacious, of which“ they lined the Walls, and paved the Floors with Laconick, Lybian and Egyptian“ Marble; and convinced Menelaus of much folly, who is ſaid to have covered“ his Walls with Braſs and Silver. But in the Suburbs alſo the Statelineſs and“ Magnificence of the City, ſaith he, is remarkably eminent; the Sea therein now“ brought within the Land, and an Haven lately made, afford a noble proſpect of“ Ships. The Town abounds with Artificers and curious Workmen of all ſorts,“ and looks like a very ſhop of Magnificence. And indeed if the Affection and“ Deſign of the Emperor proceed in this way, there will be the next year need of“ a Plot for another City. And it will henceforth remain doubtful whether of“ the two Cities be greater or more Illuſtrious; that which Theodoſius adds to“ Conſtantinople, or that which Conſtantine adjoyned to Byzantium. Thus much“ Themiſtius concerning the great zeal Theodoſius had for the inlarging and beautifying of this City; a City of which as Conſtantine was the Parent, Conſtantius, Julian and Valens were very tender in its Infancy; and now in its fuller Age was it as much indulged by Theodoſius, his Son Arcadius and Theodoſius his Grandſon; ſo that as we ſaid upon its Nativity, it was founded under a very lucky Planet.

12. But as Theodoſius had opportunity to ſhew his Magnificence; ſo alſo his Clemency and Fatherly affection to the Provinces at this time. For in the Eaſt, and particularly in Syria, was there great want of Corn for three years together, under ſo many Comites of the Eaſt, viz. Philagrius, Proculus and Icarius. The People alſo complained, that, what Tribute was due in Specie they were forced to change for Money, at a greater Rate than the things would bear, to their great loſs and Inconvenience. To redreſs this grievance and give all the eaſe he could to the Provincials, he publiſhed a Conſtitution, now divided into three ſeveral Laws, in one of which he commands “That the Tributes of Corn and Proviſions be Theodoſius eaſeth his People in reference to the ſale of Proviſions for publick Service.

L. 4. Tributa in ipſis ſpeciebus inferri. Cod. Th. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

be paid in Specie. And whereas, in caſe of neceſſity, when Corn and Proviſions were wanting, for the publick Service, or to ſupply the Poor in time of Famine, the Officers were wont to buy where they ſaw convenient, and often conſtrained the People, to part with what they could ill ſpare, or at unreaſonable Rates; by another Branch of this Conſtitution he commands “That no man be forced to ſell his Goods, but that the Sale be voluntary and free. That ready money be “ paid down for what was ſo bought, by the care and ordination of the Præ- “ fectus Prætorio, and that, at the ordinary Market-price; and in the laſt place, “ that the Plebeian or lower ſort of People ſhall not be conſtrained to ſell their “ Proviſions, which ſhould only be purchaſed from the wealthier Poſſeſſors of “ Lands. So would he provide againſt the common Calamity in behalf of the Poor, ſo as not to force one poor man to relieve another, but to lay this burthen on the richer ſort; though Anaſtaſius, one of his Succeſſors, thought this too gentle; and in ſuch caſes would have no man excuſed from this Coemption (as it's called) whoſe Law alſo Juſtinian preferred, and for this reaſon would not inſert this, nor another made by Conſtantine upon this ſubject, into his Code. But ſuch was the tender care of Theodoſius, to prevent oppreſſions, to which he might be excited the more, by ſome clamours made at this time. For, little better is a Relation made by Libanius, the Sophiſt, in an Epiſtle to Modeſtus the Comes of the Eaſt; to whom he complains, that one Dulcitius who was owner but of a ſmall parcel of ground about Beroea, betwixt Antioch and Hierapolis, was compelled to ſell a great quantity of Wheat by the Officers appointed to look to theſe matters, who oppreſſed, and favoured whom they pleaſed: and againſt them he craves his Juſtice and Aſſiſtance. Further, becauſe in the payment of Tributes a more peculiar reſpect was had to that of Gold, that the Suſceptors, or Receivers of it, might not imbezel it; nor the miſerable Provincials be oppreſſed by their frauds, he will have it be paid in the preſence of the Defenſores of the Cities, who, as “ we ſaid, were ordained for the eaſe of the People, to protect them from injuries, “ and were to be preſent for this end, at the publick tranſactions. And for the “ aſcertaining of the payments, he confirms what he had formerly ordained in ano- “ ther Law concerning the form of Acquittances given by theſe Suſceptors. This Conſtitution was publiſhed at Berytus, a City flouriſhing exceedingly in this Age in the profeſſion of the liberal Arts, and eſpecially the Civil Laws. Here alſo the Comes of the Eaſt and the Conſularis of Phœnicia (at leaſt ſometimes) had their reſidence. Moreover multitudes of Merchants flocked hither, for the Trade of Purple Cloaths here died, and for other ſorts of Traffick; beſides, it was frequented by Gladiators, and the Curſus Publicus was directed to it. Being in this Degree of Eminency, it eclypſed the ancient glory of Tyre, the Metropolis of Phœnice, and here uſually were the Edicts, relating to it, propoſed to view; yet with reſpect to that ancient City which had been advanced to the Honour of Metropolis by Adrian (who divided the Province of Phœnicia from Syria) it being a Colony that had Jus Italicum, at the interceſſion of one Paul, an Orator and Inhabitant of it. For it was the cuſtom, that if in any Province, there were a City of greater Reſort than the Metropolis it ſelf, the Laws were there publiſhed, yet ſo as to preſerve the eſteem of the Mother City, they were firſt directed thither. But at laſt there was no need of this labour, when Berytus it ſelf became a Metropolis by the Indulgence of Theodoſius the Younger.

L. 2. de publica comparatione. Cod. Th. lib. 11. tit. 15. vide Com.

L. 19. de Annona & Tributis. Cod. Th. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

The Eminency of Berytus in theſe days.

De Beryto vide Com. Gothof. ad h. L. & Ejuſd. Notas in 11. L. de Tironibus. Cod. Th. lib. 7. tit. 13.

13. We have formerly obſerved, though not with thoſe Reflections which the Malice of Zoſimus ſuggeſted, that Theodoſius was very Indulgent to the Magiſtri Militum. Thereupon, as it ſeems, rather than from any priviledge they had by Law, they preſumed to grant Licence for Uſe of the Curſus Publicus, or made Uſe of it themſelves without any lawful Authority. This Boldneſs of theirs by a Law he checks, and forbids the practice, declaring “That none ought to have the liberty of the Curſus, but thoſe to whom it was granted in former times; and there- “ fore they who formerly wanted it, will, for the time to come, more patiently “ endure the loſs of it; and he courts them to it, by telling them, that he takes “ them to be lovers of the Commonwealth, and in matters reſpecting the Common “ Utility, that he expects they will behave themſelves according to the Laws and “ Cuſtoms of the Empire. Thus juſt was Theodoſius to the Laws and Cuſtoms, and yet indulgent enough to his Magiſtri Militum, whom he courts as well as commands, and, whereas he expects they ſhould live according, as he expreſſeth it, to our Cuſtom, thereby he ſuppoſeth them Strangers, and ſuch indeed were the Magiſtri Militum at this time, their very names pronouncing them Barbarous; as Richomeres,

He reſtrains the Abuſe of the Curſus Publicus.

L. 43. de Curſu publico. Cod. Th. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

chomeres, Arbogaſtes, Stilicho, Banto, Hellebicus and others. But that we may joyn together what hapned this year about the ſame Subject; provoked, we muſt gueſs, by the great miſcarriages of this Curſus, which was intended for the publick ſervice; by another Edict he declares “ that no private perſons ſhall have the liberty of making Uſe of it, however the Licence be obtained, except they be ſuch as have exerciſed the Office of Præfectus Prætorio, or been Magiſtri Militum; not by Codicils having arrived to ſuch Degrees, but having really diſcharged the Imployments in their own Perſons. But neither ſhould theſe make bold with the privilege always as they deſired; but having once had the benefit of it, and thereby reached their Homes, or Places which they deſigned to come to, they ſhould thenceforth ſerve themſelves of it no more; except they obtained a Licence from the Emperor himſelf for ſo doing. Being ever and anon caſting his Eye upon the Carriage of the Magiſtrates; to prevent the oppreſſions of the People, he ordained, that a Judge might admit even of a ſuperfluous Appeal, and ſuch as had no warrant from Law, if he ſaw occaſion to tranſmit the matter to ſome other Court; and whereas of old time Caution was wont to be given to pay ſo much mony in way of Mulct, or depoſite it in Court, in caſe the Appeal were rejected; but Princes had taken this away and provided what Penalties in particular ſhould be impoſed upon idle and frivolous Appellants, he now forbids any other Mulcts to be impoſed in ſuch caſes, but what had been decreed by him or his Predeceſſors.

Grants great liberty of Appeal.

L. 42. de Appellat. Cod. Th. Dat. prid. Calend. Apr. ad Agreſtium Procon. Paleſtinæ. L. 43. Ejuſd. tit. Dat. 13. Cal. Nov. Merobaudi Duci Ægypti Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

13. The Law whereby this is injoyned is directed to Merobaudes, a Franck, and Dux of Egypt, who being as well a Stranger as a Souldier, might be leſs inſtructed, and more apt to be Excentrical in his Judicature than other Military Judges that were originally Subjects of the Empire. “But one diſorder he found in Souldiers at this time, which he would not have puniſhed by any of theſe their Great Officers, but reported and referred to his own Perſon, and that was their ſtragling from the Manſions where they were Quartered, and from their Colours, whether Tribunes or inferiour Souldiers. He expreſly commands that no leave be given them, for their wandring through the Countries, to prevent that Rapine and Violence they were wont to commit upon the Provincials; and if any ſhould tranſgreſs this ſo neceſſary Order, he requires that thereof Report be made to himſelf, both of the Souldier and his Tribune, by the Governour of the Province, or the Defenſores of the Cities, who being appointed for defence and eaſe of the People, he requires many things of them in order thereunto about this very time. And for the Cities and places Corporate, he ſhewed himſelf further careful, and particularly for thoſe of Ædeſſa in the Province of Oſdroena, where there was ſuch ſcarcity of Curiales, that by an Edict directed to Cynegius, Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt, he confirmed a Law formerly made by Valens, whereby, if a Principal or Primipilaris belonging to the Præſident of that Province, had a Son, he ſhould be addicted to the Court of that City; or if he had two, the one ſhould go to the Court, and the other remain in his Fathers Relation to the Præſidents Office. Nay ſuch he will have drawne back to the Service of the Corporation as were born before their Fathers came to be Primipilares; for they were indeed accounted ſuch though born before; in like manner as the Sons of Senators were received to the Honour of ſuch, though born before the Dignity of their Fathers. Further, being removed from Conſtantinople to Heraclea in Thrace, at the beginning of June, (Whence he again returned in September) by another Law inſcribed in July to the ſame Cynegius, he declared “ that even ſuch Perſons as had ſerved in the Government of Provinces, if belonging to theſe Courts, ſhould be forced back to ſich Services thereof as they had not diſcharged, agreeable with what he had before determined in two other Conſtitutions, it being his general reſolution, that Perſons, though Dignified, ſhould be recalled to theſe Imployments. Though this, to ſome of his Succeſſors ſometimes ſeemed fit, yet ſeveral of his Prædeceſſors were of other Opinions. But hence we ſee that they varied therein as occaſion ſerved, and the times would bear, and that the want of theſe Curiales grew greater every day, when ſuch as had been Governours of Provinces muſt again be forced back to ſuch charges; or in Concluſion, that the Governments of Provinces grew to be of leſs Eſteem, which formerly were wont to afford protection to thoſe that had diſcharged them.

Reſtrains the ſtragling of Souldiers.

Indulgeth Corporations.

L. 12. de Re Militari Cod. Th. & L. 11. Cod. Juſt. Eod. tit.

L. 105. de Decurion. Cod. Th. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt. Ut Hiſtorica & temporanea. Dat. prid. Non. Maij.

I. 106. Ejuſd. tit. Dat. 8. Id. Julii Heracleæ Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

14. However, Luxury and vaſt Expence for Oſtentation, was as great at this time as ever, which drove ſome Perſons in Place to that Exceſs, that they would give ſuch Gifts and beſtow ſuch Largeſſes upon their Friends, or the Players, as the Purſes of Princes were only full enough to bear. This compelled Theodoſius to publiſh a Conſtitution for regulating this Abuſe; both that ſome Difference might be put between the Largeſſes of Private Perſons and the Emperors themſelves upon ſuchoccaſions; and that amongſt private men there might be ſome Diſtinction of Dignity; and they might alſo be reſtrained from this immoderate effuſion of their wealth, which often extended as far as the waſting of their Patrimonies, and the ſpending of their Eſtates, that they might exceed one another in this ſort of Vain-glory. The Senate it ſelf being principally concerned had taken notice of this miſchief, as tending to the Deſtruction of its own Order; and thereupon had framed a Senatuſconſultum, as well againſt the immoderate expence in ſetting out the uſual Games and Paſtimes, as other matters, by the recommendation of Theodoſius himſelf, as Symmachus tells him, who thereupon prayed in the Name of the Fathers a confirmation of that which they had reſolved. In anſwer to his Epiſtle and to ſeveral particulars of it, this Emperor ſent his Oration or Edict directed to the Senate, wherein he premiſeth “That although a Senatuſconſultum doth obtain perpetual ſtrength and eſtabliſhment of it ſelf, yet they (the Emperors) thereto are wont to give a corroboration; that is, to ſuch Decrees of the Senate as reſpected it ſelf, its own Orders and Regulation; for as for other Senatuſconſultums made for declaring or enacting ſome points of Law (as Tertullianum, Velleianum and the like) there were no ſuch now made, nor had been for many Ages; the Prince having ſwallowed up all ſuch Legiſlative Authority. But therefore he ordains, that, “If any particular Perſons ſhould by way of petition endeavour to procure a Reſcript for excuſing himſelf from what was generally con- “ cluded and eſtabliſhed, he ſhould forfeit the third part of his Eſtate, and be “ rendred Infamous, as a perſon convict of Ambitious Purpoſes. Now for the Retrenchment of the Charges of ſuch as preſented the Games; amongſt other Expences upon Stageplayers and other Perſons they were wont to be profuſe towards them in Cloaths, which ſometimes were ſilken, either all; or in part, woven with other materials. “But whereas the Emperors themſelves were wont in their own Largeſſes to beſtow ſuch as were all of Silk, he forbids the Setters forth of the Plays to do it.

Checks Luxury and too great Expence.

L. Un. de Senatuſconſultis. Cod. Juſt. lib. 1. tit. 16.

L. 1. de Expenſis ludorum. Cod. Th. lib. 15. tit. 9. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

15. Of all the Emperors and Romans, Heliogabalus was the firſt that wore any Garment that was all of Silk; when as before that time Cloaths that were mingled of that and Linnen were only in uſe. But he both wore them, and gave to his drunken Companions thoſe of the later ſort; which courſe his worthy Succeſſor, Alexander Severus altogether rejecting with his other Extravagancies, neither wore any of Silk himſelf, nor gave any that had Silk in them to any Perſon: nay Aurelian never wore any of the former ſort, neither made any Preſent of the later; and when his Wife deſired ſhe might have but one Mantle of purple Silk, he told her it was a ſhame that Yarn and Gold ſhould be of the ſame value; for then a a pound of each was ſold at the ſame rate. Yet for all this, Private Perſons were ſometimes ſo arrogant as to wear whole ſilk; for elſe Tacitus the Emperor had not forbidden the practice, and notwithſtanding his Command to the contrary, they would ſtill be bold; yet ſo as they did not give ſuch Cloaths to Players; but thoſe only in which Silk was mingled, in the time of Conſtantius, which alſo was much complained of. However, after his time they took up the practice, and ſo much Silk came to be prized, that none could think themſelves Fine or Gay enough without it, though it was not the growth or product of the Roman Empire; but was brought out of Perſia or thoſe Eaſtern Countries; for (to give ſome ſtop alſo to this Extravagancy,) Gratian not long before the Law we are ſpeaking of, by his Edict directed to Toriobaudus, the Dux of Meſopotamia, forbade that any Perſon ſhould procure any Silk from the Barbarians, but only the Comes of Traffick or Commerce. “But now Theodoſius expreſly forbids the careſſing of Players with ſuch Cloaths, and by the ſame Conſtitution thinks fit to give a check to “ the Cuſtom for Magiſtrates their making exceſſive Preſents to their Friends at “ the entring of their Offices. For at ſuch times, their Acquaintance and Perſons of Quality, were wont to flock to them to grace them with their preſence, or to ſee the Shows, and then they muſt be preſented with ſomething whereby to remember them, nay ſuch as were in great Eſteem with them, though abſent, were wont to receive this mark of their kindneſs. Theſe were either Pieces of money (or Medals;) or elſe Diptycha or Tables to write on, conſiſting of two Leaves apiece. The Largeſs made by mony was called Sportula (from the Baſkets in which they were carried) both given upon theſe Promotions, at Weddings

Particularly in the wearing of Silks.

L. 2. Quæres venire non poſſunt, &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 4. tit. 40.

dings alſo, and upon other occaſions: and as well at Entrings into Offices, as at the Marriages of Noble Perſons, they were now wont to be made of Gold. “But Theodoſius prohibits any Setters forth of Games to make them in Gold, except “ the ordinary Conſuls, who did it in one piece called an Aureus, as Symmachus “ tells his Friend, to whom he ſent one in his Conſulſhip. All others were to make “ them in Silver, and not put ſo much as they pleaſed into every piece, but to “ form them ſo, as out of one pound of Silver might be made ſixty in number, and “ no heavier; but as many more as they pleaſed. And as for the Diptytha, he will “ have them, which the Conſuls preſented only, made of Ivory, whereas they were “ wont to be made of other Materials. Thus careful was he for reſtraining of Luxury; but his Law, however ſtrengthned both by a Penalty and Infamy, was broken not long after.

L. 9. Ep. ult.

Takes care for the Senate of Conſtantinople.

16. As careful he was for filling up and keeping in credit the Senate of Conſtantinople; to which end, whereas Immunity from the Glebalis Collatio, or ordinary Tax upon Senators, was wont to be granted to ſome certain Perſons, and had for this purpoſe been extended to ſuch Roman Senators as lived in Thrace; he now communicate it to ſuch as lived in the Dioceſs of Macedonia, and would be “ made Members of that Body. About this time, or the ninth Day of September, he had a Son born to him by Flaccilla his Wife, to whom he gave the Name of Honorius, And he ſtill continued his Indulgence to Corporations, by ordaining “That if the Eſtate of any Curialis came freely by way of Legacy, Truſt, or free Gift to any “ Perſon that was not of that Condition, ſuch Perſon ſhould be yearly bound to pay “ a certain ſum of Money (as the twelfth part of a Solidus) according to the pro- “ portion of the Patrimony which he received. And whereas the Governors of “ Provinces were now adays wont to puniſh their Officials for their miſdemeanors, “ by condemning them to the Services of the Curiæ, he forbids this as a thing in- “ decent, and below the Eminency of theſe Bodies. Indeed if any Decurio had forſaken his Station, and ſheltred himſelf amongſt the Officials, they might ſend him back to his former Charge; but he requires Cynegius the Præfectus Prætorio to admoniſh all Judges ſubject to his cenſure, that they ſhould not look upon the Services of Corporations as Puniſhments, by forcing any to them; and he gives this reaſon; For that Puniſhment, really ſuch, and not any Dignity ought to follow an Offendor. And indeed it's held for a Rule, that Puniſhment ought not to make the condition of the puniſhed party to be equal to what it was before, much leſs ought it to render it better than it was formerly. So careful was he to ſave that vaſt Expence, which, in theſe days, wherein Chriſtianity could not yet put an end to the former Pagan Extravagancies, was made by Prætors in their Games and ſhows, which they were bound to ſet forth to the People, that inſtead of four this year, he cauſed eight to be created, and appointed the Charge they were to be at, by another Edict directed to the Senate. One of the Prætors was once from Conſtantius Chlorus called Flavialis, and was the firſt in order; but afterward was put out of Place, and he that from his Son was named Conſtantinianus was the firſt in Rank, and Flavialis at length was quite aboliſhed. But to him, who from Conſtantine the Great had the Name of Conſtantinianus, another was added, who from his Son was ſtyled Conſtantianus. There was moreover one called Triumphalis, from the old Triumphs during the Commonwealth, and a fifth known by the name of Romanus, from the City of Rome, which Conſtantinople owned for her Mother. All theſe five were in the days of Conſtantius. In the Reign of Valens were but four; and ſo many continued till this very year, but not with the ſame Names. Conſtantinianus and Conſtantianus continued only in being, and in the room of the reſt the Senate had introduced lately two others, from the Names of the preſent Princes termed Theodoſianus and Arcadianus. But now of the old ones Theodoſius reſtored two, viz. Triumphalis and Romanus, and two he added a-new, viz. Auguſtalis and Laureatus, and ſo made them eight, or four pair in all, though under the Government of his Son Arcadius they ſeem reduced to that of ſeaven. Having thus made them Pairs, he will have each Pair to pay ſo much towards “ the expence of the Games, as one Perſon was formerly wont to do. Namely, “ That of Conſtantine and Conſtantius a thouſand pounds of Silver. That of Theodoſius and Arcadius, a thouſand (or rather leſs, for ſome fault ſeems to be in “ the Text, his words plainly ſhewing that he meant a Declenſion in the ſums:) “ then that of Triumphalis and Auguſtalis four hundred and fifty: and that of “ Romanus and Laureatus two hundred and fifty pounds.

Honorius born.

L. 3. de Senatoribus & de glebali &c. Cod. Th. l. 6. tit. 2.

And again for Corporations.

L. L. 107, 108. de Decurion. Cod. Th.

L. 25. de Prætoribus, &c. Cod. Th. Dat. 10. Kal. Nov.

He increaſeth the number of Prætors.

17. The

Sect.4.

The Conſulſhip of Arcadius and Bauto.

A.D. 385. Arcadio A. et. Bautone Coſs.

17. The CCCLXXXV year of our Lord had for Conſuls Fl. Arcadius Auguſtus and Fl. Bauto, being the tenth of Valentinian the ſecond, and the thirteenth Indiction. Theodoſius this Year made his Abode at Conſtantinople, and Valentinian continued at Milan till nigh the Month of September, when he removed to Aquileia, and there ſtaid till the beginning of the next, but that he was at Verona ſome little ſpace. For there he reſided upon the account of the Juthungi as it's thought, who at this time made Incurſions into Rhætia, and againſt whom the Hunns were called in for Aſſiſtance. Under him this year Neotherius and Principius were Præfecti Prætorio in the Weſt, and under Theodoſius, in the Eaſt, was Cynegius; for this and the following. Paulinus was Præfectus Auguſtalis, having ſucceeded to the place of Optatus, and Meſſianus was Proconſul of Affrick. The firſt Law we meet with in this, as agreeable to other years, is one of Theodoſius whereby he preſcribes the Duty and Work of a Defenſor of a City to one Theodorus, who bore that Office at this time, and therefore ſeems to have conſulted him about his Imployment. He tells him, the time he ſhall Exerciſe his Office ſhall be five“ years (afterward contracted to two) wherein he expects he ſhall carry himſelf“ as a Parent of the Common People. For he muſt not ſuffer either thoſe in Towns“ or Country to be oppreſſed by any Surveys; but protect them both from the Inſolence of Officials, and the daring boldneſs of Judges themſelves; yet ſo far as is Conſiſtent with modeſt Reſpect to their Perſons. He gives him leave to“ have recourſe to the Judg of the Province, when he pleaſeth. He chargeth“ him to prevent the Damage or Spoile of ſuch as he now holds as Children, un-“ der his Charge, from all ſuch Officers as ſhall demand more than publick“ Dues, and by no means permit more to be exacted than the wonted Tax;“ foraſmuch as there is no other way of Remedy for ſuch miſchiefs but what“ his Place and Function affords. So careful was Theodoſius to mind this officer“ of his Duty, who received little gain or no emolument from the diſcharging of it; but more ſevere he was againſt another ſort, to whom the Care of publick works was committed, or in whoſe hands mony for that purpoſe was depoſited. For there were thoſe they called Curators of publick works, or certain Maſters of Architecture (Mechanicks they termed them) who undertook the building or Reparation of publick Structures, received from the ſeveral Cities, Mony for carrying them on, and managed the Accounts of the Expences. Under them were thoſe that took the Work by great, called Ergolabi, who were anſwerable to the Curators, as they to the Publick. Now becauſe of the great Frauds and Neglects committed in this kind, Theodoſius ordained, that all ſuch Curators,“ or thoſe to whom the Charge of Building, or Mony was committed, ſhould“ for fifteen years from the finiſhing of the work if living, or their Heirs after them,“ be reſponſible for any fault committed in the Building. If any ſuch Defect appeared,“ they muſt anſwer it out of their own Patrimonies, except it happened by ſome Ac-“ cident, and was the effect of meer Chance, not any Neglect on their part.

L. 4. de Defenſorib. Civitatum. Cod. Juſt. lib. 1. tit. 55.

Theodoſius. Declares the Duty of a Defenſor of a City.

L. 24. de Operibus publicis Cod. Th. & L. 8. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. 3. Non. Febr.

Gives a check to the frauds of Curators of publick works.

18. We have ſufficiently ſeen how ſevere Theodoſius was to all the Curiales, that they ſhould diſcharge their Duties to the Corporations to whom they belonged; now at laſt we meet with the Reward he appoints them for their ſo long and troubleſome Services. By an Edict inſcribed to Cynegius, he obviates the Deſign of ſome who indeavoured to compel ſuch of them as had paſſed through all Imployments of the Curiæ and diſcharged all other Duties, to undergo the Charge of the Agonotheſia, as they called it; (which was a kind of Prieſthood amongſt the Pagans, or a Task of preſiding at, or governing their Exerciſes) and put them beſides the Honours they might juſtly challenge as Emeritæ or Veteranæ. In oppoſition hereto he poſitively declares, “That ſuch as had diſcharged“ in this manner all other Offices due to their Country, ſhall not be put upon the“ Agonotheſia againſt their minds: In the next place, that they ſhall receive the re-“ ſpect that was due to ſuch Perſons, and enjoy the Honour and Dignity of Comites,“ which in this Age was conferred on them, as, in others, other Honourable Qualifi-“ cations. And this Dignity he will have to ſtick by them, although they never ſtood“ for it, never deſired it, nay, though they refuſed it, and by all means ſought to de-“ cline it: for this Splendour he would have accompany the Quality of the Perſon, and that during Life; whereas ſometimes this Honour laſted only for ſome ſhorter Term. Thus where a Reſpect was had to the publick Concern, that other Men might by a Proſpect of Reward be incouraged to ſerve their Countries, were Perſons ever conſtrained to accept of Honour; as here, not only of the Degree of Comites, but alſo of receiving a Kiſs from the Governours of Provinces,“ and“

And the privileges of the Curiales.

L. 109. de Decurion. Cod. Th. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt. Dat. 6. Kal. Maij.

Sect. 4.

A.D. 385.

and ſitting with them upon the Bench; for this Theodoſius ordains in their Favour, as well as the other. But whereas the Governours of Provinces had great Inſpection over theſe Corporations, and right or wrong, were wont to beat the Curiales, or Senators thereof with Plummets; foraſmuch as Injury was thereby thought to be offered to the whole Body, the Court it ſelf upon the ſollicitation of the Party was wont to be concerned, and accuſe the Judg, as they thought with greater Load, becauſe with larger Intereſt and Reputation. But for that this Accuſation was made without any Solemnity, and the Parties thus accuſed, by Decrees of the Courts, often were thereby born down and injured, being taken for no better than Convicted Perſons; Theodoſius thought fit that this Accuſation ſhould be made in the Name of the Decurio himſelf who pretended to be injured; but notwithſtanding, the Præfectus Prætorio, to whom the Complaint was made, ſhould puniſh the Offender, as having been Injurious to the whole Court. This Law he directs to Cynegius his Præfect, to whom he gives the Titles of Illuſtrious and Magnificent Highneſs; and telling him that foraſmuch as no Accuſation ought to be made by a ſecond Perſon, he will have him, with that Juſtice and Equity by which he was known or taken notice of, to puniſh a Judg who ſhould beat in that manner any Innocent Decuriones; or his Officers if they were Silent upon ſuch an occaſion. The Præfecti Prætorio we have ſufficiently ſeen had Juriſdiction over the Judges or Governours of Provinces. And great is this Teſtimony the Emperour gives to this Præfect, while yet in Office, that he was Renowned for Juſtice and Equity. But he Charges him only to puniſh a Judg, as ſhould ſo beat an Innocent Decurio; whereas by ſome former Laws he forbids any of that Condition to be beaten with Plummets, how Guilty ſoever. He changed the Courſe and Rigour of his Laws, as he found the Condition and Circumſtance of the Perſons to Change.

L. 15. de Accuſation. & Inſcription. Cod. Th. & L. 14.

19. Further, about this time the Number and boldneſs of Informers and falſe Accuſers did ſo increaſe, that to ſatisfie their Malice, or bring about their ends, and yet avoid the puniſhment due to Calumniators, they were wont more than formerly to uſe the Names of other Men therein, and pretend to do it upon the Account of others. Yet there was one Caſe which in this matter of Accuſation deſerved that a Diſtinction ſhould be made, and that was of Guardians or Tutors, who in managing the Eſtates and Concerns of their Pupils, were often by Exigency of their Affairs put upon it, to accuſe their Adverſaries of Falſhood, Forgery or other matters. Now it being not their own Buſineſs, it ſeemed hard they ſhould make the uſual Inſcription required by the Laws, or ſubmit to the puniſhment due to the offence, if not proved; and yet it often ſo happened, that ſeveral ſuch Guardians might make uſe of the Advantage their Truſt afforded, to loaden with Calumnies thoſe to whom they bore Malice. Therefore a middle way was found, that thoſe who exerciſed ſuch Charges, ſhould make the uſual Inſcription, but not with that Danger which hung over them that accuſed in their own concernments; for if it proved not an evident Calumny, and plain, that wittingly and willingly with a malitious Intention they made the Accuſation, no Penalty was to fall upon them. But there was another ſort of Men, who would not ſeem to do it in the Name of another; but only to aſſiſt the Accuſer in way of Duty, Officiouſneſs, or Friendſhip. In this manner Apuleius complains to Maximus Claudius the Judg, or Proconſul, that one Æmilianus Craftily went about to accuſe him of Magick, by way of aſſiſting Sicinius Pudens a Boy, of adult Age; which the ſaid Judg refuſed to admit, and would have him do it in his own Name, as the Law required in the Caſe of Tutors and Curators when their Pupils or Minors were admitted to accuſe. There were others who to ſatisfy their Malice would not Commence the Accuſation in another mans Name, but yet make uſe of his Name who they pretended was injured; as by ſaying that the party killed was their Father, thereby to evade the puniſhment due to a Calumniator, which he eſcapes, whoever revenges his Fathers Death. But they were not ſo properly ſaid to do it in anothers Name, as thoſe who being ſuborned for the ſame purpoſe, either at the beginning of the Accuſation openly named him from whom they had Inſtructions to do it, or elſe did it without mention of him, though at his furtherance and deſire; but both of them were puniſhable by the Antient Law, as well the Accuſer, as he from whom he had it in Charge. What the Law formerly had determined againſt Accuſations, made in the Names of others, Theodoſius now confirms, ſeeming to aim at thoſe who had ſome Authority and power, and therefore were made uſe of, by ſuch as imagined they had not ſufficient Intereſt to carry them through, to Impeach thoſe to

He bridles the boldneſs of Calumniators.

L. 2. de Calumniatorib. Cod. Th. & L. 8. eod. tit. Cod. Juſt. Dat. 8. Id. Maij Conſtantinop.

to whom they bore Malice, as having committed ſomething againſt the Prince himſelf.“ Though the Emperour or his Treaſury might hence reap Advantage, yet ſuch“ an Accuſer failing of Proof, he declares ſhall be puniſhed with Deportation as“ a Calumniator and Infamous Perſon; that all manner of Perſons may take Notice,“ that they muſt not raiſe the Choler or Indignation of Princes in any thing“ they cannot prove.

20. But, whereas to prevent the vexation of Accuſed Perſons, that their Innocency might be either cleared, or their guilt the ſooner diſcovered and puniſhed, the antient Laws ordained, That the Proſecution ſhould be terminated within the ſpace of one year, to be reckoned of old from the time of the Inſcription, if the caſe required it, or, more lately, from the conteſting of the Suit, and that under penalty of incurring Infamy by the Proſecutor; this Theodoſius, by an Edict directed“ to Deſiderius the Vicar of Aſia, confirms, and further adds Confiſcation of a“ fourth part of his whole Eſtate. And indeed, great Cauſe there was that ſome diſpatch ſhould be made in ſuch Criminal matters; ſuch Perſons as were in Bonds, and anſwering for themſelves lying under great diſadvantages, as being put out of Capacity of manumitting, making any Deeds of Gift, of giving Teſtimony, impeaching others, or obtaining any Honours. But as Theodoſius ſhewed himſelf a great Enemy to raſh and Malicious Accuſations, ſo where he thought the Caſe required it, he gave way for effectual Proſecution. The Cuſtome amongſt the Romans, was, that Slaves could not ordinarily be examined by torture againſt their Owners; But by a Law inſcribed to Cynegius, this year, he declared that it might be in two Caſes. Of old time it was permitted in Caſe of Inceſt, and in that only, till the making of the Julian Law, by which it was alſo allowed in that of Adultery.“ “Now Theodoſius declares, that if a Man accuſe his Wife of Adultery; not“ only his, but her Slaves alſo, ſhall be by Torture examined; none excepted“ but thoſe that were abſent at the time when the Crime was Committed, who yet“ were not excepted by more antient Laws. And he further allows this ſeverity in“ examination of Slaves, both againſt Maſter and Miſtreſs, in Caſe each attempt the“ Life of the other, having the ſame reſpect to this ſort of Fault in them both, becauſe equal on both ſides, whereas that of Adultery is greater if Committed by the Wife. This was directed to Cynegius at the latter end of the year, who after it received one more in behalf of the Countrymen that were oppreſſed in the Carriage of Proviſions for the Army to the ſeveral Manſions. He will have the“ conveyance to be made by thoſe that lie moſt conveniently for it, and not by them“ that lie at a diſtance, except it be the Proviſion for the Soldiers, upon the Limits, to whom a more than ordinary reſpect was ſhewn, for the great concernment of his Service againſt the Barbarians. For at this time as we have already ſeen, and ſhall more, they preſſed much upon the Empire, and, if Credit were to be given to Zoſimus, they were invited in by the Provincials themſelves now haraſſed with Taxes. However, this Exception diſpleaſed Juſtinian, who taking the Law into his Code, yet left it out. And indeed both Valens, and Valentinian the Elder, his Brother, were of Opinion, and declared, that even the Proviſions for the Limits ſhould only be conveyed by thoſe Poſſeſſors that were neareſt at Hand.

L. 1. Ut intra Annum Criminalis Actio. Cod.Th.lib. 9. tit. 36. L. 1. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. hinc interpolata. Dat. 4. Id. Jul.

Yet he takes Care for effectual proſecution of real Offendors.

L. 4. ad Legem Juliam de Adulteris. Cod. Theod. & L. 32. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. 3. Id. Decemb.

L. 21. de Annona & Tributis Cod. Th. & L. 8. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

21. But let us make ſome inquiry after Valentinian the younger, and ſee what he Enacted of Conſequence, while Theodoſius thus concerned himſelf. We find him indeavouring ſome Reformation in the Courſe of Judicature, there being at this time in his Diſtrict, ſome Faults committed by the Judges themſelves, but eſpecially thoſe that had occaſion to ſue in their ſeveral Courts. For too common it was for them to neglect and paſs by the ordinary Judges of the Provinces, and betake themſelves to the higher Tribunals of thoſe called Spectabiles, or of the Illuſtrious Prefects; poſſibly by reaſon of the negligence or corruption of ſome Judges; but eſpecially out of contempt and diſdain conceived by thoſe of Birth and quality, when they ſaw Perſons of mean Deſcent and Merit preferred to ſuch places, as was that Terentius the Baker, mentioned by Ammianus Marcellinus, who was made Corrector of Tuſcia. However this Contempt of the Ordinary Juriſdiction carried with it two manifeſt injuries and Inconveniences. For thereby was the Judg of the place ſlighted and brought into Contempt, to the violation of all good Government; and the Defendant, or Party ſued, was drawn away from his own Province to Courts afar off, to his great Charge, detriment and vexation; which being a thing unſufferable, upon this Account it was, that rarely were any called up before the Emperour, however he took Cognizance of Cauſes. By an Edict directed therefore to Neoterius his Præfectus Prætorio under“ Valentinian endeavours to ſecure the juriſdictions of ordinary Judges.

Sect.4.

A.D. 385.

der whoſe Authority the Governors of Provinces were, Valentinian expreſly for-“ bids that any Perſons whatſoever, except Women or Minors (who by reaſon of“ their Infirmity, were indulged often by the Lawes) paſs by or deſpiſe their“ own proper Judg, or the Judg of the Firſt Inſtance, and betake themſelves to“ an higher, or one of the ſecond Inſtance, directly and as it were, per ſaltum.“ Any offending in this kind, he ordains as a puniſhment, ſhall loſe or forfeit his“ Cauſe, which in many other Caſes, is impoſed by the Laws upon ſuch as diſturb“ the Courſe of Juſtice. But to prevent any Complaints which might be juſtly“ made againſt ordinary Judges, their Corruption or Pride, he propounds two“ expedients. Firſt, he alleages that any unjuſt Sentence given by them, may be“ reverted by a due and orderly Appeal. In the next place, if the Party could ſhow“ that the ordinary Judg, either out of Pride or partiality, either refuſed or delayed“ to hear him, he ſhould forfeit to the Exchequer the value of the thing in Contro-“ verſie, and upon the chief of his Officials or Apparitors, and their Adjutants, who“ amongſt other Imployments, introduced or admitted Cauſes into the Secretarium,“ he impoſes no leſs a Pain than that of Deportation. Of the ordinary Judges, he“ was ſo far further careful at this time, that their Authority ſhould not be neglect-“ ed, that he tells the ſame Neoterius in another Edict, that he will have the Muni-“ cipes of every Corporation, when they Challenge any of their Members that ab-“ ſcond, to betake themſelves to no other Court for ſatisfaction therein, than that“ of their own Province, giving it for a Rule, That none ought to imagine any Ju-“ dicature ſo Competent as that of his own Country. On the other Hand, he will“ have every Curialis, who has governed a Province, to know, that he ſhall never“ reach the Senatorian Dignity, except he diſcharges all Dues to his Corporation, in“ Caſe he owe any; thereby forcing back Governours of Provinces to the Courts,“ which though it ſeemed good alſo to Theodoſius, yet other Princes were of the“ contrary Opinion: however by this it appears, that the Senatorian Dignity once“ attained at this time, put one out of Danger. If the Municipes themſelves by“ any trick hindred the Execution of this Law, or did not force back their Members,“ he Fines the Body in thirty pounds of Gold. For, Perſons of a publick Capacity, may not be free to deſpiſe their Profit, or Advantage.

L. 6. De Juriſdict. & ubi quis conveniri debet Cod. Th. Dat. Mediol. Pridie Kal. Maij. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

L. 110. De Decurionib. Cod. Th. Dat. 5. Kal. Jun. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

Proceeds to Reformation of Courts of Juſtice.

22. Yet ſtill did Valentinian ſo concern himſelf about the Reformation of Courts of Juſtice, that knowing the ordinary perfidious and mercenary dealings of the Apparitors belonging to them, and how by reaſon of their Abſence often in Collecting the Revenue and other Imployments, they might preſume upon the benefit of the Law, which regularly Condemns and puniſhes none ab-ſent or unheard, he declared that they ſhould enjoy no benefit of it; but might“ be puniſhed as Right required, though in their Abſence. In Caſe ſuch Appari-“ tors, or Officials of Judges, fled and concealed themſelves, he commands that“ they be, by an Edict openly propoſed, cited to appear. If they refuſe, then“ ſhall the Judg give Sentence againſt them; and he cuts off from them all hope“ of Pardon, that diſpairing thereof they may not expect to eſcape either by“ Flight, or by any Remiſſion of the Crime. Not long after, by another Law in-“ ſcribed to Romulus, the Conſularis of Æmilia and Liguria he indeavoured to cut“ off the tediousneſs of Suits, ordaining That after Denuntiation made, or the Ci-“ tation ſerved, the uſual Intervals of time ſhould not at all be continued or length-“ ene, no not by the Authority of a Reſcript obtained from the Emperour himſelf;“ for whereas formerly, at the beginning of Suits, the Plaintiff was wont to give ſe-“ curity; Marcus Antoninus the Philoſopher removed that Solemnity, and introduced this Cuſtom of Denouncing this ſort of War, or giving warning to the Party to Anſwer by a day, which Cuſtome yet was omitted and left off in the time of Juſtinian. For prevention of thoſe continual Troubles, which aroſe about the Cu- riales forſaking their Charges, he ordained about this time, by another Law, that whoſoever ſhould deſire to take the Oath of the (Military) Girdle as he terms it, or Liſt himſelf a Soldier, ſhould firſt in the City, where he was Born or laſt Inhabited, publickly and ſolemnly ſhew that he neither deſcended from Father or Grandfather obliged to Municipal Services, nor any way himſelf, was concerned in“ them; if he produced ſuch Teſtimonials from the Regiſter that he had ſuffici-“ ently made this out, then was he to be admitted, or elſe to be drawn back, and“ for ever ſubjected to the Services of the Courts. And he threatens the Curiales“ themſelves, if they ſhould be found, out of favour or affection to diſmiſs any of“ their Body, by giving any falſe Teſtimony in his behalf. Still further for prevent-“ ing Delays in Suits, and to bring Cauſes to a ſpeedy Iſſue, even where he himſelf

L. 14. De Pœnis Cod. Th. lib. 9. tit. 40. & L. 21. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. Kal. Jun.

L. 15. De Cohortalib. Cod. Th. & L. 6. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. Pridie Id. Jun.

L. 4. De Denuntiatione Cod. Th. Dat. 13. Kal. Jul. Mediol.

L. ult. Quid. probare debeant. Cod. Th. lib. 7. tit. 2. Dat. 6. Id. Jul.

was

Sect. 4.

A.D. 385.

was concerned, he ordained by a Law ſent to Meſſianus the Proconſul of Africk “ that in all Fiſcal cauſes or relating to the Treaſury, if the Party lived in the “ ſame Province, the matter ſhould be diſpatched in two Months time; if in a “ neighbouring Province, for producing of Witneſſes or Papers, four Months and “ no more ſhould be allowed; and ſix, if his Habitation was beyond the Sea. “ And this ſhould hold if the matter was brought in the firſt Inſtance; if in “ the ſecond, or upon Appeal, the Debate ſhould be terminated in the firſt Caſe “ within twenty days, and in the ſecond, within as many more. Theſe Rules “ he would have obſerved; if he that had Cognizance of the Cauſe was as an Ordinary “ Judg; but in Caſe the Comes Largitionum, or the other Rei Privatæ, “ heard the Cauſes themſelves; for that they did it ſometimes extraordinarily, and “ as the weight or importance of them required; he left them to the Liberty allowed “ them by Antient Cuſtomes; and yet by another Reſcript in Tranſmarine “ Judgments, he confines an Appeal within a year.

L. 13. de Jure Fiſci Cod. Th. Dat. 15. Kal. Octob. Aquileiæ Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

L. 45. De Appellat. &c. Cod. Th.

To remove grievances ariſing from the Collection of the Revenue.

23. He found out about the ſame time another grievance lying upon the People, from the Collection of the Revenue. The ordinary Judges or Governours of Provinces, who were truſted with the Collecting of Tributes, did now imploy the Palatine Officers belonging to the two Treaſurers therein, either for that they found them more honeſt than their own Officials, or rather, becauſe they carried more Authority along with them. But this Awe and Authority they improved to the vexation and oppreſſion of the Subject, and therefore he commands Principius his Præfect, that if any Judg imploy a Palatine, “ either in the Collection of Dues, or Commit the Execution of any Sentence “ to him in any private Cauſe, as well He, as his Office, ſhall for every “ ſuch Offence, incur the Penalty of five pounds of Gold. But now the Offices of the Ordinary Judges ſeem to have been exhauſted, poſſibly, becauſe of the many ſevere Laws made againſt their Avarice and Rapacity, whereby they were hindred from inriching themſelves as formerly they had done. Therefore toward the end of this year by two other Edicts, directed to the ſame Principius he took order that ſuch as were in theſe Imployments already, ſhould not forſake their Stations; and for the Supply alſo of thoſe that were actually void. “ As to the former, he forbids that any quit his Station under pretence of adoring “ the Purple, or aſpiring to any Palatine Office; To that Adoration he “ will have no Officials of Governors of Provinces, admitted; and of thoſe belonging “ to the Præfecti Prætorio, the Præfect of the City, and to Vicars, only “ ſuch as by a ſolemn Right, every year after the term of their Imployments fully “ expired, were allowed to do it. Now of thoſe belonging to the Præfects, “ not only theſe called Principes of the Office, but the Cornicularii and Numerarii “ might do it; but of ſuch as attended the Vicars, only the Principes; “ But neither by aſpiring to the place of a Palatine, nor of an Agens in Rebus “ will he have them forſake the Service, under penalty, not only of being forced “ back to it again, but of forfeiture of half of their Eſtates, and being conſtrained “ to undergo the Burthen of Manicipes. But for the Supply of Vacancies, “ though this Prince (as we have ſeen) was very ſevere againſt thoſe that “ under any pretence forſook the Services of Corporations, yet he now permited “ any Decuriones that ſerved theſe Judges in quality of Exceptores, in writing “ Records to continue; provided, they forſook not the Duties belonging to the “ Courts; and when they had diſcharged the place of an Exceptor, then returned “ to their former Obligations, and provided they were not Cohortales, nor “ had allowance out of the Exchequer as the Cohortales had, whoſe Imployment “ yet was ſometimes extraordinarily diſcharged by the Tabularii, as need required.

L. 10. De Palatinis S. L. & R. P. Cod. Th. Dat. Prid. Kal. Septemb. Aquil.

L. 16. De Diverſis Officiis Cod. Th. & L. 1. Cod. Juſt. De Apparitorib. Præfecti Urbis Dat. 13. Kal. Octob. Aquil.

L. 17. De Diverſis Officiis Cod. Th. & L. 5. Cod. Juſt. De Numerariis Dat. 4. Id. Decembr.

He calls in Privileges granted as to payment of Cuſtomes and other Duties.

24. As Theodoſius three years before, ſo now Valentinian found reaſon to complain of the abuſing of his Lenity and Indulgence, by ſeveral Perſons their procuring Reſcripts ſodainly or ſurreptitiouſly, for eaſing themſelves of the ſervices and payments they were to undergo. Such as by reaſon of their nearneſs or convenient Habitations were obliged to convey Proviſions for the maintenance of the Souldiers that watched upon the Borders againſt the Barbarians, had by Friends at Court, or money, obtained Privileges of eaſe; and thereupon the Garriſons and Prætenturæ were neglected. This drew from him an Edict to Principius (it's probable) for putting in execution an Order formerly made by one Tiberianus (whether a Præfect or ſome other Officer) for regulating of this Affair, and reformation of what was amiſs, though procured by the Power of any “

L. 1. De fundis Limitrophis Cod. Juſt. l. 11. tit. 59. Dat. 8. Kal. Octob. Aquil.

Mini- “

A.D. 385.

Miniſter, or the furtive Deprecation (as he calls it) of any Perſon, forbidding all “ ſuch Importunity and Inconvenience for the time to come. And he farther declares his diſpleaſure againſt ſuch Reſcripts as have been obtained to the leſſening “ of the Annona, or Tribute paid in Specie, or otherwiſe for publick Service, by a “ damnable Subreption, as he terms it, or Inſinuation. He pronounces it manifeſt “ that ſuch Diſpenſations cannot be good in Law, and commands that an equal “ form of Payment be obſerved, and with good Reaſon; for if Tributes were “ neglected, which are the ſinews of War, what would become of the Commonwealth? Theſe two Laws bearing the ſame Date, and agreeing much in their drift and deſign, are ſuppoſed to have made up one and the ſame Conſtitution directed to Principius, though in Juſtinians Code his Name be corrupted into Licinius. “But though he was careful of his Revenue, he was as kind, if not “ as Juſt, to continue the Indulgence formerly granted to the Veterane Souldiers, “ and not only ſuch of them as had riſen to the Protectorian Dignity, but all “ others who had obtained an honeſt Miſſion or Diſcharge; or Immunity from “ the payment called Luſtralis Collatio; but with this Reſtriction, viz. of as much “ as came to fifteen Solidi; If they trafficqued beyond the Bounds of this ſum, in Cuſtoms, they were to pay as other Merchants did.

L. 7. de Diverſis Reſcriptis. Cod. Th. & L. 7. Cod. Juſt. de Annonis & Tributis. Dat. 8. Kal. Octob. eidem Principio. Item L. 20. de Annona & Tributis. Cod. Th.

But confirms ſome granted to the Veterane Souldiers.

L. 14. de Luſtrali Conlat. Cod. Th. Dat. ad Principium Veronæ Prid. Non. Nov.

A.D. 386. Honorio N.P. & Euodio Coſs.

25. The CCCLXXXVI year of Chriſt had for Conſuls, Honorius the young Son of Theodoſius, by the ſtyle of Nobiliſſimus Puer, and Fl. Euodius; it being the eleventh of Valentinian the ſecond, and the fourteenth Indiction. Cynegius continued ſtill Præfectus Prætorio under Theodoſius; and Principius of Italy under Valentinian. Salluſt was Præfect of Rome till the beginning of July, or thereabouts, and then was ſucceeded in that Imployment by Pinianus. In the beginning of the year, Theodoſius made his abode at Conſtantinople, and Valentinian at Milan, whence he removed to Ticinum, or Pavia in February, thence to Aquileia about the beginning of April, and thence back to Milan in the Month of June. Still we find Theodoſius Author of the firſt Law in the Chronological Table, which he enacted at the beginning of the year for ſecuring his People againſt malicious and ſcandalous Libels. “Such as ſhould find any ſuch Paper he commands to tear it, ſo that none other may find and read it after him; otherwiſe if he leave it, or caſt “ away, or communicate it to the View of another Perſon, he ſhall be puniſhed “ for a Libeller, except he can produce the Author: as alſo he prohibits him from “ relating the ſubſtance of what he had read and torn, under pain of being ob- “ noxious to the puniſhments inflicted by the Law in ſuch caſes. And it matters not where the Libel was found, whether in a publick Place or private Houſe, “ the ſame Inconvenience being ſuppoſed to proceed from either. Valentinian the elder, had by an Edict forbidden, that upon a Reference of any Matter to the Emperor, from any of the Judges, the Parties themſelves ſhould follow the Proceſs (which was to be tranſmitted within thirty Days) having diſcovered that they were wont to apply themſelves to great Perſons, and by money or favour ſo to work, as to obtain Reſcripts, right or wrong, from the prejudiced and abuſed Princes. “This now Theodoſius, in another Edict directed to Cynegius, declares he had taken into full and mature deliberation, and he thinks fit what was before “ in general and indiſtinctly ordained, now ſo far to regulate; that if within the “ ſpace of a year the Prince his Anſwer be not obtained, then may the Parties “ concerned come to Court, and bring with them all the Acts, and the Copy of “ the Reference or Conſultation. For as the Emperors deſired to diſpatch theſe Buſineſſes without the Interpoſition and purchaſed Sollicitations of their Officers; ſo on the other hand would they not have theſe Suits delayed ſo long as their corrupted Scriniarii or Judges, by whom the References were made, deſired they might be.

L. 9. de Famoſis Libellis. Cod. Th. Dat. Cynegio 14. Kal. Feb. Conſtantinop.

Theodoſius reſtrains libelling.

L. 34. de Appellat. Cod. Th.

Permits perſons in Suits to come to Court.

L. 47. eod. tit. Dat. Cynegio 7. Kal. Feb. Conſtantinop.

26. Theodoſius making his uſual Reſidence at Conſtantinople bent his Indeavours, as we have ſeen already, for the Inlarging and Beautifying thereof. For the further ſplendor of it, now terming it the City of moſt Sacred Name, he directed a Law to Nebridius its Præfect, thereby injoyning “That all the Honorati, whether ſuch by Civil or Military Dignities, always ſhould uſe that ſort of Chariot cal- “ led Carruca, and drawn by two Horſes, as belonging to them. By Honorati are meant both thoſe who had diſcharged publick Offices, and ſuch as had obtained thoſe Dignities by Codicils; who, foraſmuch as in thoſe days the Uſe of Chariots was common in the City (though in the times of former Princes it was invidious if not unlawful) are hereby required not to live below themſelves, but make Uſe of that drawn with two Horſes, which was peculiar to them, as the Carpentum, or Omnes Honorati ſeu civilium, ſeu Militarium dignitatum, vehiculis dignitatis ſuæ (id eſt Carucis bijugis) intra Urbem ſacratiſſimi nominis, ſemper utantur. Dat. 3. Kal. Feb. Conſtant. L. un. de Honorat. vehiculis. Cod. Th. lib. 14. tit. 12. & L. un. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

He commands the Honorati to uſe Chariots in Conſtantinople.

He incourages the Agentes in Rebus.

or the other drawn by four, to the great Officers in actual Poſſeſſion; as the Præfects of both ſorts, the Vicars, and Governors of Provinces, who according to the diverſity of their Dignities, and Places had them more or leſs ſtately. We have heard nothing, of a good ſpace, concerning the Agentes in Rebus; for the reformation of whoſe extravagant Courſes, Princes, as we have ſeen, were conſtrained to make ſeveral Laws; and that, if we may judge charitably, with ſome Succeſs. For now we find Theodoſius extending his Favour to thoſe of them who had run through the ſeveral Employments, and come at length to be Principes of the Office; for he ordains by another Law directed to Cynegius, “That they, for a Reward of their Labours, not only enjoy the place of Principes; but that “ no Officials be ſent out upon publick Imployment, as fetching up Priſoners “ and the like, except by order of the Princeps; for they had Fees belonging to “ them from ſuch Services, as alſo upon Cauſes that were admitted to be tried, and from ſuch as were admitted firſt to be Officials. Nay, by another Edict directed to the ſame hand he declares “That by Codicils having given to ſuch as had been Principes, the Honour of being placed amongſt the Conſulares Adlecti, he will “ by authority of this Law have them honoured by all Judges in that Degree and “ Quality. He had formerly given them precedence before Rationales; but ſet them behind thoſe that had been Præſidents; but it ſeems afterward had aſſigned them place amongſt theſe laſt mentioned, by a Law which is not now extant. Having this Honour conferred on them in the Senate, it's likely that for all that, it became a Queſtion whether they ſhould be received in the ſame degree of Reſpect and Quality by the Judges or Governors of Provinces, who looking diſdainfully upon them, might grudge to own them ſo far in their ordinary ſalutations, and ſitting in their Courts; and perhaps Cynegius, being conſulted, knew not how to adviſe, and thereupon had recourſe to the Emperor. He ſeems to reprehend the ordinary Judges, it being conſequential enough, that if in the Senate they had obtained this Honour, it ſhould alſo be imparted to them in their Company. But otherwiſe the Prince, who was the Fountain of Honour, might confer it as it pleaſed himſelf. Therefore as Theodoſius gave the Principes of the Agentes in Rebus Place but amongſt the Conſulares Adlecti, Theodoſius the younger, conferred on them the Dignity of Vicars; nay, Honorius his own Son beſtowed upon them the Proconſular Dignity.

L. 3. de Principibus Agentium in Rebus. Cod. Th. Dat. prid. Kal. Mart. Conſt.

L. 5. de Agentibus in Rebus. Cod. Th. Dat. 3. Non. Martis. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

Removes an Abuſe in the Collection of Taxes.

27. About this time he endeavoured to remove another Abuſe in the Collection of the publick Taxes. When any Tax ſeemed to be unequally laid upon Lands, an Officer called Peræquator was ſent, who, upon View and other Evidence, might regulate that inequality, by laying the burthen where it ought to be, and give Relief as the caſe required. His Intelligence he uſually had from the Stewards or Managers of the Lands, or from the Husbandmen themſelves who had reaſon to underſtand the true Extent and Value, of the Grounds; and therefore their Lords againſt the time of the coming of the Peræquator would call away their Bailiffs and ſend them to ſome other place, or elſe arm their Husbandmen with contumacy againſt him, ſo as to give him no light, for making that Reformation, and inducing that Equality, he came about. To correct this Preſumption of the Lords, he ordains “that the Peræquator ſhall go on with his work, notwithſtanding the abſence of the Bailiff, and regulate the Ceſs as he ſhall ſee con- “ venient, and to his Regulation or Peræquation the Owners ſhall be bound, and yield obedience. Thus, by way of puniſhment, for Contumacy, might a Tax be laid in the Abſence of the Owner of the Ground or his Subſtitute, though ordinarily it could not be without the preſence of one of them. For great reſpect was had in thoſe times to the Property of the Lords, or Owners, though the Cenſitores, or Aſſeſſors were wont from their Husbandmen or Tillers of the Ground to Exact an Oath concerning the Quality and Value of them; againſt which Cuſtom, as opening the way to Perjury and other Inconveniences, St. Baſil declaims in an Epiſtle written to one of theſe Cenſitiores, as Gothofred obſerves.

L. 2. de Cenſitoribus. Cod. Th. lib. 13. tit. 11. Dat. Cynegio 6. Kal. Apr. Hinc interpolata. L. 3. Cod. Juſt. de Cenſu & Cenſitorib.

Concerns himſelf for Corporations.

Now ſtill again he concerned himſelf for Corporations againſt ſuch as ſhould deſert their Services; ſo that if a Curialis had procured himſelf to be made a Senator, though he had ſubſtituted his Son, or any other in his room, yet ſhould “ he be conſtrained, to diſcharge what belonged both to that Subſtitute and him- “ ſelf; that is, what Service or Expence was due both from a Senator and a Curialis; “ in like manner as at this time, if one were both a Senator, and a Dux Rei Mi- “ litaris, he was ſubject to a double burthen of that Payment called Glebalis Collatio; ſuch as were Duces, when their Offices were diſcharged, becoming Senators upon

L. 111. de Decurion. Cod. Th. Dat. Cynegio prid. Kal. Maii. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

Vide Gothofr. in. L.

Sect. 4.

A.D. 386.

For the Proximi of the Scrinia.

L. 4. de Proximis, &c. Cod. Th. & L. 1. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. prid. Kal. Maii.

upon this very account. Having formerly granted to the Proximi of the three Scrinia, viz. Memoriæ, Epiſtolarum and Largitionum, the Honour of Vicars, or thoſe that Governed Dioceſes for Præfecti Prætorio; by this ſame Conſtitution, directed to Cynegius, he declares, “That it ſhall not commence as formerly from the time of their going out of the Place of Proximus, but upon their very entring upon it. But as hereby he was very indulgent to his Officers, ſo was he, about the ſame time, as good an Husband in the management of the Revenue, with which ſome of them made more bold than welcome. Two years ago he declared, That, except thoſe whoſe number and ſervice was ſet and defined, none whatſoever ſhould have the uſual Annonæ or Allowances, nor receive the uſual New-years-gifts, nor any more than his ſet allowance. However moſt of the Palatines belonging to the Comes Largitionum had exceeded their Bounds, and both as to New-years-gifts, Cloaths and other things had procured more than what was allotted to their Quality and Condition. For, beſides New-years-gifts, which the Prince was wont to diſtribute in Gold on New-years-day, to thoſe that ſerved both in Camp and Court, they had other Allowances which conſiſted in four things, viz. the Annonæ, properly ſo called (which were Corn, Wine and Horſe-meat in ſpecie) Cloaths; Silver; and that they called Miniſterium, or Servants to attend them. And ſometimes the caſe required that ſome Perſons for their extraordinary Merit, and an Incouragement to others, ſhould have the Allowance of thoſe above them, each having more or leſs allotted him according to his Degree. But the Bounty and good Nature of Princes was ſo abuſed, or thoſe who had the overſight ſo corrupted, or partially inclined, that the ſtanding Rule was broken, and undeſerving Perſons got the greateſt ſhare; which preventing all rewards due to Virtue, and diminiſhing the Revenue, Theodoſius now commanded Proculus his Comes S. Largitionum, “That what any man had more than his Due, ſhould be taken from him, and that he ſhould ſee that no man had greater Allowance than what belonged to his Place and Quality.

L. 11. de Palatinis S. L. & R. P. Cod. Th. Dat. Non. Maii. Conſtantinop. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

But Reſtrains too great Expence in his Officers.

28. We muſt confeſs, that herein we may believe Zoſimus, that at this time, or a little before Theodoſius his ſhutting up all the Pagan Temples, great Clamours were made by the People againſt the Covetouſneſs, Rapacity and Corruption of Judges; although his Malice drives further, and derives it from other Cauſes than he ought. This the Emperor, by a publick Edict directed to the Provincials, teſtifies himſelf, wherein he commands, nay intreats them, that if any of the Honorati, Decuriones, Poſſeſſors of Lands, nay, Coloni or Husbandmen themſelves, or any other of whatſoever Rank or Quality, were by any Judge any way injured; if he knew any ſuch who had been bribed to give Sentence, that had ſpared any guilty perſon for Reward, or puniſhed out of Revenge or Malice, or, in concluſion, could prove any Judge to be corrupt, ſuch an one would either during the Adminiſtration of ſuch a Governour, or after the expiring of his Office, come forth, accuſe, and make good his Charge; and if he ſo did, he ſhould carry away both Victory and Renown. Hereby, though ordinarily a Magiſtrate could not be accuſed during his Office, which was uſually for Term, yet he permits, nay deſires he may be charged when in Authority. And as Conſtantine the Great, formerly upon conviction of the Offender, promiſed the Accuſer his Dignities and Eſtate; ſo by Glory and Renown, are not here to be underſtood Dry and Empty Fame, but Imployment in the Commonwealth. Upon this ſame account, perhaps, it was that about this ſame time he forbids “That any Apparitor belonging to the Præfectus Prætorio, any Palatine, any Souldier or other that had continued in ſuch Imployment, be by a Judge in his Province commiſſionated to put any Sentence in Execution, at the requeſt of any Perſon that hath a Suit depending, whether it be in a publick or private Cauſe. If he permitted it contrary to this Order, both he and his Office ſhould not only incur loſs of Reputation, but damage alſo in his Eſtate. The Apparitors of Præfects were very high and inſolent, as we have ſeen formerly, the Palatine Officers alſo bold and confident, a Souldier fierce and cruel; and one long practiſed in Acts of ſeverity would have little Pity; therefore all of them were unfit to be imployed; for they would oppreſs the poor Provincials, and be proper Inſtruments for a Corrupt Judge to bring about his Rapacious Deſigns. But while thus Theodoſius imployed his time in relieving of his People againſt the oppreſſions of ſeeming Friends, or homebred Enemies; a Noiſe was made of publick Hoſtility; that Thrace was invaded by thoſe who carried not only Deſtruction in their Hands but openly in their Faces. Againſt them therefore he turned himſelf.

The Rapacity of publick Miniſters great at this time.

L. 6. ad Legim Juliam Repetundarum Cod. Th. & L. 4. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. 10. Kal. Jul. Conſtantinop.

L. 8. de Officio Rectoris Provinciæ Cod. Juſt. lib. 1. tit. 40. Dat. Cynegio Non. Aug.

Sect.4.

A. D. 386.

The Gruthingi deſire to paſs the Iſter.

29. A certain Nation now appeared beyond Iſter, unknown to other ſorts of People, but called by the Barbarians of thoſe Tracts, Gruthingi, Grutungi, Gothunni, or by other Names reſembling theſe; each Country differing from other in its Pronuntiation, eſpecially of ſtrange and foreign words. This Nation being too Numerous, furniſhed alſo with Arms ſufficient for a bold Undertaking, and excelling in ſtrength of Body, made no difficulty of piercing through the Territories of other Barbarians that lay in their way, and came to the Banks of Iſter, which they demanded leave to paſs. Promotus who Commanded as Magiſter Militum, in theſe Parts, extending his Forces as far in Length as he could, upon the Rivers ſide, oppoſed them all he might, and to his other Attempts Zoſimus tells us, he added this Device. He procured ſome whom he could Truſt, and that underſtood the Language of the Barbarians to go over to them, and promiſe for a very good Reward, to Betray both the Roman Captain and his Army into their Hands. The Barbarians affirmed they could not pay ſo great a ſum; but the Meſſengers, to gain the firmer Credit, ſtill inſiſted upon it, and refuſed to make any Abatement; at length they came to an Agreement, and part of the Reward by virtue thereof was to be paid down. All things being agreed both as to time and manner of the Fact, the Meſſengers then acquaint the General in what way the Barbarians would Attacque him when Night ſhould come. The beſt part of their Army they put into Boats, and ordered it in the firſt place, to Land, and fall upon the ſleeping Soldiers, the next in worth they agreed ſhould give thoſe Relief, as occaſion ſhould ſerve, and then the reſt were to follow. Promotus making Uſe of his Intelligence, got together his Boats, and placed them ſo, as the Prowes were inward or looking one toward another. He placed them three in Depth, and in length ſtretched them out for twenty Furlongs on the ſide of the River, whereby he kept the Barbarians from Landing, and meeting thoſe who came in their little Boats, ſunk all he could light upon; for the Barbarians, the Night being dark proceeded with all Confidence, knowing nothing of the preparations of the Romans. At length, Promotus made Uſe of his great Veſſels, and plied his Gallies ſo with Oars, that he overturned all before him, or if any eſcaped, they fell into their Hands who were placed all along the ſide, and there periſhed, none being able to paſs this Rampart. So great a Slaughter being made as ſcarcely had been known in a Fight upon the Water, the River was filled with dead Bodies, and covered with Weapons, which were of ſuch Materials, that they would not ſink. If any men could Swimm they eſcaped not them, who were appointed to receive them in the Arms of Death before once they could get to Shoar.

Lib. 4. p. 762.

Auſi Danubium quondam tranare Gruthungi In lintres fregere nemus, ter mille ruebant per fluvium plenæ cuneis immanibus alni. Dux Odothæus erat, tantæ conamina claſſis. Incipiens ætas Et primus contudit annus Submerſæ ſedere rates &c. Ita Claudianus de 4. conſ. Honorij.

Are defeated by Promotus.

30. The Flower of the Barbarian Army thus deſtroyed, the Roman Soldier betook himſelf to his Booty, ſeizing as he could, the Women and Children, with ſuch Plunder as he could find. Theodoſius the Emperour lying not far diſtant, Promotus ſent for him that he might be witneſs of the Victory. He having viewed the number of the Priſoners, diſcharged them of their Bonds, and gratified them with Gifts, by this humanity to gain their Affections, that he might ſerve himſelf of them in the War he deſigned againſt Maximus. Promotus was continued in his Command in Thrace, and reſerved for the ſame deſigned War. And here our Hiſtorian acquaints us with another ſtory like to this, which he thinks it worth the while to relate. In that part of Scythia which was contained in Thrace, was a Town called Tomos, held with a Garriſon, and commanded by one Gerontius, a man excelling in ſtrength of Body, and otherwiſe very able in matters of War; and near to the Town lay ſome Barbarians quartered there by order of the Emperour, who had made the beſt Choice he could, and indeed they were men every way excellent for Accompliſhments, both of Body and Mind. Yet though by him they had been careſſed both with greater allowances and honours, than other perſons, yet never did they caſt in their Heads how they might make anſwerable Returns, but both contemned the Governour and his Garriſon. Gerontius was not ignorant of their Demeanour, nor that they had a Deſign upon the Town to make Diſturbance, which reſolving to prevent, and chaſtiſe their petulant humour, he communicated his Purpoſe to the moſt prudent of his Soldiers. They hung back out of fear, apprehending the ſtrength of the Barbarians ſuch as they ſhould not be able to graple with it; which he having found, reſolved with his own Guard to oppoſe himſelf againſt them all; and out of the Gates he iſſues, while his Men either ſlept in the Town, were by fear held in their Quarters, or repaired to the Walls, thence to behold the Succeſs. The Barbarians fell on deriding his Madneſs, who ſeemed Gerontius defeats another Party of Barbarians without Order.

to them, to court Death, and ſent out ſome of their ſtouteſt Men againſt him. With one of theſe he grapled, and contended ſo long, till a Soldier of his Guard beholding them ſo yoaked, cut off the Arms of his Enemy, and threw him from his Horſe, which done, Gerontius fell upon others of the Barbarians, to their no ſmall aſtoniſhment at his Valour. By this time they that beheld from the Walls, overcome with Admiration at the valour of their Governor, and Shame that they ſhould ſtand idle while he ſo gallantly demeaned himſelf, reſolved to Act like Romans, and iſſued out of the Gate upon the Barbarians. Some of them they killed, and ſuch as eſcaped fled to a place honoured by Chriſtians, and eſteemed as an Aſylum. Now Gerontius having thus delivered Scythia from Imminent Dangers, by Conquering the Barbarians through his great Valour, expected to be rewarded by the Emperor. But he was not a little angry at the Death of thoſe he had ſo greatly honoured, though they had proved the Bane of the Common-Wealth; and cauſing him to be apprehended, he called him to Account for the great Service he had performed to the Romans. He pleaded, that the Barbarians were Rebels, urged their Rapines, and related what Slaughter they made of the People: but the Prince would not hear him, but perſiſted in this Opinion, that he had deſtroyed the Barbarians not for any good he thereby deſigned to the Publick, but to get to himſelf the Gifts which he had formerly beſtowed on them. As to this, Gerontius replied, that he had ſent away thoſe things (being Golden Chains) after the Death of the owners, into the Treaſury; but for all this, he could ſcarce redeem himſelf from imminent danger, by all he beſtowed upon the Eunuches; ſo well was he rewarded for his fidelity to his Country. Thus Zoſimus, or Malice for him.

Theodoſius not far diſtant at the Defeat of the Gruthungi.

31. The Subſtance of his Story concerning Promotus and the Action againſt the Gothungi, we have reaſon to believe; though to it other Circumſtances may be added. He confeſſes that at the time of the Victory, Theodoſius was not far off, and indeed we find him at this time departed from Conſtantinople, and diſtant in Thrace at Melantia, ſome eighteen Miles from the City. For, thence on the third of September, he gave out a Conſtitution to Cynegius for the better Conveyance of Corn and Proviſions to the Army, forbidding on pain of Death, that it ſhould be “done as formerly, as that thoſe that lived in Inland Countreys ſhould carry it to “the Maritime, and thoſe that inhabited in the Maritime Tracts to the Mediterranean. This no doubt had relation to the War he now made upon thoſe Invaders, having in it poſſibly ſeen the Inconveniences that aroſe from ſuch a prepoſterous ſort of Conveyance. On the ſame day he inſcribed another Edict to all Comites and Magiſtri Equitum and Peditum, wherein he charges them that they take ſuch Order with the Duces, Tribunes, and Præpoſiti, that all that were Fugitives “may be returned back to the places or Courts to which they belonged, both from “the Army, and the divers Offices to which they had betaken themſelves; no preſcrip-“tion of time being allowed them, if their Fathers or Grandfathers were Decuriones, “and he threatens the Decuriones themſelves if they do not accordingly force them “back wheresoever they are found, and how unwillingſoever they be to return. This “Law we may alſo ſuppoſe to be made, when the Barbarians were beaten, Thrace “delivered, and there was now remaining no ſuch great need of Soldiers. As for the other Story Zoſimus tells, of Gerontius his bold Adventure and Succeſs againſt the Barbarians; however it proved, any unprejudiced Perſon would ſay it was more proſperous than adviſed; and that Theodoſius in prudence had reaſon to call him to Account. For the Rules of good Government will not permit that a Private Officer, as he was, ſhall without Orders attempt a matter of ſuch Concernment, when the ſafety of a Garriſon and the publick Faith is concerned. Tomos was not ſo far diſtant from Conſtantinople, nor the Danger ſo preſſing and ſudden, but that he might have acquainted the Emperour himſelf therewith: at leaſt ſome of his Superiour Officers. If private Men may ſo run on their own Heads, it's needleſs to have any Superiour Directors. Gerontius though he might not be inamoured of the Golden Chains about their Necks, yet ſeems to have been Angry with the Barbarians for their ſo well faring; A wonderful Heat it muſt have been that hurried him on upon ſuch an Enterprize contrary to the Judgment of thoſe about him, and without any Aſſiſtance, or probability of eſcaping. But ſee the Malice of this Pagan Writer. What he condemns in Theodoſius, he would have commended in T. Manlius Torquatus, or L. Papyrius Curſor.

L. 22. de Annona & Tributis Cod. Th. & L. 9. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

L. 113. de Decurion. Cod Th. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

Juſtly called Gerontius to Account.

32. However, Theodoſius on the twelfth of October, returned with his Son Arcadius in Triumph to Conſtantinople, where having leiſure to hear Complaints, and Chron. Hiſtor.

Returns in Triumph to Conſtantinople.

and to conſider what was amiſs in the State, he ſet himſelf to the reformation of ſeveral things. At the ſuggeſtion of Cynegius, upon whom he much relied; or perſwaſion, as is probable, of Nectarius the Biſhop of Conſtantinople, whoſe advice, eſpecially in matters relating to Conſcience and Religion, he much followed, toward the latter end of the Month, he publiſhed a ſevere Law againſt exceſſive Uſury; ordaining, beſides Reſtitution, a forfeiture of fourfold, for the time to “ come, if any ſhould exceed the hundredth part of the Principal; and of the Dou-“ ble value, if any could be Convicted to have done it for the time paſt; and this “ very earneſtly he requires to be Executed, without delay, without any reſt, and “ forthwith, terming this Offence no better than a Tyrannical Fury. And indeed “ ſo great was the Exceſs in this kind at this time, that the Fathers mightily declaim “ againſt the practice of Uſury; but yet Theodoſius impoſed no greater a Penalty up-“ on the Tranſgreſſors, than what of old had been done by the Laws of the twelve “ Tables. For the Antient Romans puniſhed a Thief in double, but an Extortioner in fourfold; by which its eaſie to ſee which of the two they did moſt Condemn. But much it is, that neither by this Law, nor any before it, one that exacted too much Intereſt in this kind, ſhould be rendred infamous; only that Mark was put upon ſuch who required, and took Uſe upon Uſe, by Diocleſian. Now this Law is but half of a Conſtitution, whereof the other part is againſt ſuch as received other mens Husbandmen or Farmers at this time, which together with Uſury were the two great Grievances in thoſe days, and poſſible it is, that thoſe poor men, oppreſſed with two great Intereſt for what they took up in Proviſion or Money, were even conſtrained to play leaſt in ſight. However, for prevention of ſuch great inconvenience as aroſe from thoſe men, their forſaking their Charges; he ordained, That “ whoſoever ſhould intice away any ſuch Husbandman belonging to another Perſon, “ or conceal one who abſented himſelf, ſhould for every ſuch Offence commited againſt a private perſon, forfeit ſix Ounces of Gold; and if the Man belonged to the “ Prince his Patrimony, an whole pound.

where he reſtrains exceſſive Uſury.

L. 2. de Uſuris. Cod. Th. lib. 2. tit. 33. Dat. Cynegio 8. Kal. Nov. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

Quadrupli pœnæ obligatione conſtrictus, ſine Ceſſatione, ſine requie, protinus ablata redhibebit.

Vide Gothofr. in L.

L. 2. de Fugitivis Colonis Cod. Th. lib. 5. tit. 9. & L. 2. Cod. Juſt. hinc interpolatur.

Oppreſſion alſo ariſing from Receivers of Tributes.

33. But yet one of the greateſt Grievances ſtill endured by the poor Provincials, aroſe from the Avarice and immoderate Exactions of thoſe called Suſceptores, or the Gatherers or Receivers of Tributes. It being ſuppoſed that ſuch were made out of the Curiæ or Courts of Corporations, he will have them Created not ſecret-“ ly, but in the greateſt Aſſembly of the Body, according to the Opinion, and with “ the Conſent of all, and thereof Acts to be ſolemnly made. Then will he have “ their Names ſignified to the Governors of Provinces, that they may know who “ it is they are to look to: and in the laſt place he requires that the Nominators of “ them, or the Court it ſelf, be anſwerable for their Actions, which is very conſiderable. But whereas by way of Tribute the Provincials were wont to pay four ſorts of things, viz. Wheat, Barly, Wine and Lard; and the Suſceptors were apt to exact greater quantities than were due; he renewes what he had formerly enjoyn-“ ed concerning Meaſures of Braſs or Stone, and Weights, publickly to be placed “ in all Cities and Manſions (for in Manſions alſo theſe Species Annonariæ were wont “ to be laid up) that the People might certainly know what they were to give, and “ the Officers duly puniſhed, if they forced them to exceed. And whereas as was formerly ſaid, the Receivers of Corn, Wine and Lard were wont to have an Epimetron allowed them, or ſo much over and above, for that Leakage and Loſs there would be of the Commodities in their Tranſportation; to cut off all Cheats, whereby the People had been hitherto abuſed, he declares, That it ſhall be the fiftieth part of Wheat, the fortieth of Barley, and the twentieth of Wine and Lard. This “ ſhall be allowed through the Eaſt; to the Prefect of which (Cynegius) this Law is “ alſo directed. Only in Armenia, that moſt remote Province of the Empire and “ Bordering upon the Perſians, from which yet theſe Proviſions were wont to be “ tranſported to Conſtantinople, out of Humanity, he gives them leave to take the “ fortieth both of Wheat and Barley; and of Wine and Lard the fifteenth. Thus “ he provides againſt the Frauds of theſe Collectors in the Eaſt; but particularly in Ægypt, which was eſpecially wont to abound with Oppreſſions of Officers and Complaints of poor people, he endeavoured a Reformation at the latter end of this year alſo, in another manner, by an Order directed to Paulinus the Præfectus Auguſtalis. He expreſly charges, that by holding perpetually this Office or Imployment of Receiver, none have the opportunity of vexing the Provincials (as it were by a certain ſort of Domination in Oppreſſion) but that by the Care of the Governour of the “ Province, they be changed in the ſolemn way of Election, every year; except “ the Cuſtome of the City, or the ſcarcity of Curiales therein (from amongſt “ whom “

L. 20. de Suſceptorib. Cod. Th. & L. 8. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. Cynegio 6. Kal. Nov. Conſtantinop.

L. 21. ejuſd. tit. Cod. Th. & L. 9. Cod. Juſt. Dat. 4. Kal. Decemb. Conſtantinop.

L. 22. ejuſd. tit. Cod. Th. & L. 4. Cod. Juſt. ex hac L. Conflata eſt. Dat. prid. Kal. Decemb. Conſtantinop. veluti concuſſionum dominatione.

whom they were to be choſen) required they ſhould hold for two years together. Upon Default, he threatens not only with a Fine, but other Puniſhment both the Præfectus Auguſtalis, and his Office.

Valentinian imploys himſelf the ſame way.

L. 1. de Defenſorib. Civitatum Cod. Th. lib. 1. tit. 11. Dat. 8. Kal. Febr. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

34. So imployed we leave Theodoſius this year, in providing for the Defence of Cities and Countries againſt the Oppreſſions of his Officers. And removing Weſtward, we find Valentinians Thoughts taken up the ſame way; the firſt Law of Civil Government we meet with, being concerning the Courſe and manner of the Election of the Officers which had their Name from defending the Cities, and one of whoſe great works it was to protect the People againſt the Oppreſſions of the Collectors. By his Edict directed to Euſignius, he ordains, That they be choſen by the Decrees of the Cities, that is, by Conſent or Subſcription of all the Citizens, the Municipal Honorati and Common ſort being called together by Decree of the Curiales. For the Office of the Defenſors being of the ſame Nature with that of Tutors or Guardians, they being Choſen to defend the Common People from Affronts and Injuries, (helpleſs, by reaſon of Meanneſs or Poverty) as theſe to protect Pupils (unable to help themſelves for want of Age) it was convenient that the one, as well as the other ſort, ſhould receive their Charge, not by Ambition or their own Seeking, but that they ſhould be ſuſpected if they went about to compaſs the Imployment. If any ſuch were diſcovered, by begging of Voices to get the place, He commands Euſignius that he reject him, and moreover cauſe him to fine in Five pounds of Gold to the Exchequer; for the Confirmation of thoſe Officers now belonged to the Præfecti Prætorio, though afterward, the Names of the Perſons and Decrees of the Cities were ſent up to the Emperour, and by him the Matter being examined, received efficacy; which was imitated at length by the Kings of the Goths. This Law he made at Milan; but removed ſhortly after to Ticinum or Pavia, where being ſollicited by the Meſſengers of Cities, to redreſs their Grievances, as we may ſuppoſe, but being unſatisfied with their manner of Addreſs; for regulating of theſe Meſſages of the Subject he thought fit to take further Order. And Further I ſay, for he had made Orders formerly therein, but all little enough for the Redreſſing the grievance of this uſual ſending to the Emperour for the redreſſing of Grievances; for ſuch was their uſual Deſign. Theſe becauſe we have not ſpoken of, and they (all of them together) contain what may be ſaid of this Subject, we ſhall obſerve from them what we may, that's uſeful and proper to our Work.

L. L. 8, 9, 10, 11. de Legatti & Decretis &c. Cod. Th. vide Comment. Sive integræ Diœceſis Commune conſuluerit ſive ſingulæ inter ſe voluerint Provinciæ convenire &c. L. 9.

He regulates the matter of the Meſſengers ſent to him out of the Provinces.

35. He gives leave for theſe Legati or Meſſengers to be ſent to him, and for that Purpoſe for the Provincials to meet together, to conſult, make Decrees and Commiſſionate ſuch as they ſhould think fitteſt for this Imployment of laying open their Griefs, like as other Princes had done before him. But this Liberty he now extends to Bodies or Companies (as of the Navicularii) to Cities, particular Provinces, and whole Dioceſſes, which included ſeveral Provinces in them, whether Governed by Præfects, as the Præfectus Urbi, whoſe Dioceſe were the Suburbicarian Provinces, the Præfectus Auguſtalis who had Ægypt for his Diſtrict, or by the Vicars of the Præfecti Prætorio; or by a Proconſul, as him of Aſia; or by a Comes, as for Example, the Comes of the Eaſt. In the next place he permits none to hinder or obſtruct theſe Meetings, Conſultations, Decrees or Meſſages, not any Judg or Governour of a Province, not any Vicar, not the Præfectus Prætorio himſelf, though his Authority was ſo great, that he was vulgarly eſteemed an Emperour without Purple. It's true, ſeveral would endeavour to hinder theſe Meſſages, and thereby Complaints againſt themſelves to be tranſmitted. But he will have none of the Decrees ſent by theſe Meſſengers, to be ſo much as examined or diſcuſſed by any of the Judges, and removes all Neceſſity of ſhewing them to them, whoever they were, though as we have ſeen, Valentinian the Elder, and others afterward, required that they ſhould be entred in the Regiſter of the Governour of the Province; ſo that we may juſtly conclude ſome extraordinary occaſion to have provoked the younger Valentinian to abridg them of this Power. And in concluſion, he gives leave to the Præfectus Prætorio, in preſenti or in Waiting, to conſider of the Meſſage in his Auditorium or Court; but not to determine any thing therein, but to leave the matter wholly undecided, and reſerved to himſelf in Conſiſtory, where it was to receive a Determination; ſo various and uncertain were the Caſes of the Provinces and their Complaints, as to make the Emperours vary in diverſity of times and affairs amongſt themſelves, as to this Subject. For the beſt way to reconcile Laws is to diſtinguiſh of times, that being fit Now, which at another time, would be very improper, as alſo that being ſuitable to one Nation or Country, which would ill agree with ſome other People. And therefore as to this point Theodoſius the Younger afterward thought fit once that the Præfecti Prætorio ſhould firſt conſider whether it were beſt that the Meſſengers ſhould come to be heard, or not; and at laſt reſolved they muſt be heard in his own Preſence.

36. But as Valentinian gives liberty to his People to make their applications to “ him, and make known their Griefs, ſo on the other ſide he enjoyns them, that “ they bring only probable things, and not trouble him with Superfluities or Trifles. “ And to this purpoſe he declares, that the Meſſenger ſhall exhibit all the Decrees, “ or the Subſtance of what he had to ſay, in Writing; otherwiſe he ſhall not “ be heard, but diſmiſſed without his buſineſs done. For oftentimes it hapned, that when theſe Meſſengers exhibited their Inſtructions, beſides them they pretended that ſomething was privately injoyned them which they durſt not commit to Writing, for fear of ſome great men whom it touched, the Intereſt of whom they found cauſe to apprehend about the Prince; and ſometimes under this pretence they took occaſion to vent their malice againſt one or other, according as their Paſſions or Intereſts led them. And for want of this Authentick Warrant and Teſtimony, the Meſſengers themſelves might be brought into queſtion, they that ſent them denying that they had any ſuch thing in Command, as we have already ſeen in the caſe of Jovinus, when the Tripolitans were ſo wrought upon by the Arts of Romanus the Comes of Africk, that they denied they had given him any ſuch thing in charge to deliver to the Emperor, which made the poor man wrongfully accuſe himſelf, and by endeavouring to ſhun, to incur puniſhment, ſaying that he had lied to Valentinian the Elder, who thereupon commanded him to be put to death. “ In the laſt place the Emperor takes care, that the Meſſages be not performed at too great an Expence to the Publick, or too much burthen to “ the Curſus Publicus. Therefore he defines the number; that each Dioceſe ſend “ but one or two Meſſengers. To theſe two or one he commands that the Rheda “ Curſualis be aſſigned when they come, for their Conveyance. This is the ſame with the Carpentum or Quadriga; and the weight of a thouſand pound was put upon it; drawn in the Summer time by eight Mules, and in the Winter by ten; whereas the Carrus had but ſix hundred pound weight, and the Birota had but two hundred. As for that called Angaria, it was drawn by two Yoak of Oxen, and fifteen hundred pound weight was put upon it. “ Therefore one Rheda, Valentinian grants to one or two Meſſengers of a Dioceſe; and but one Angaria to all the Meſſengers of the ſeveral Provinces of one Dioceſe; for, they might each ſend their Meſſengers, but he would allow them all but one Angaria, thereby conſulting for the good of the Provinces; but withal for the eaſe of the Curſus Publicus.

37. But of all ſorts of men none was more beholding to him than the Navicularii, in behalf of whom, now lying at Aquileia, he made a briſk Law, or rather revived one made by Conſtantine, out of which his was tranſcribed with little alteration. It commands that all Navicularii through all Ages, be relieved from “ all Burthens, Services, Conlations and Oblations, of whatſoever place or Dignity “ they be. And whoſoever ſhall Act contrary to this Law, whether he be “ Keeper of the Wharf (Cuſtos Litorum) Provoſt of the Cuſtoms (Vectigalium “ Præpoſitus) Exactor, Decurio, a Rationalis, or Judge of any Province, he ſhall “ ſuffer death; with a Confiſcation of his whole Eſtate, which he adds to the “ former Penalty. He had obſerved (or his Councellors for him) a cuſtom uſed by ſuch as begged Eſtates; that having obtained them from the Prince, as Eſcheated to him, they would endeavour to terrifie him that was in Poſſeſſion, and tire him out with a tedious Suit: Now proceeding againſt him, and then again deſiſting, with this Deſign, to conſtrain him to purchaſe ſome certainty and quiet, by parting with a ſhare of that, which, if the matter came to be fully and indifferently heard, they diſpaired of obtaining, by courſe of Juſtice. Therefore to put ſome bounds to this Liberty, he Ordains, “ That if after three Citations, ſuch an one do not appear with the Accuſer, ready to make good the “ Allegation, he ſhall not only loſe what he begged, but be Condemned in the “ expence of the Suit. This he enacted at Milan (being thither returned from Aquileia) and ſome other beſides. It was prohibited by former Laws, that any perſon ſhould govern a Province wherein he was born or dwelt; which Cuſtome is obſerved here in England as to our Juſtices of Aſſize, and with very good reaſon, ſuch as any one may eaſily apprehend. “ But now further, Valentinian forbids ſeveral Officers alſo of the Magiſtrates from executing any Sentence “ relating to the Publick, or to private perſons, in the Province of their Birth or “ “ Habitation.

Obligeth the Navicularii.

L. 17. de Navicularii s Cod. Th. Dat. ad Principium P. F. P. 12. Kal. Maij.

Reſtraines ſuch as begged Eſtates.

L. un. de Petitorib. & deſiſtentib. Cod. Th. lib. 10. tit. 13. Dat. ad Gorgonium Com. R. P. 8. Id. Jun. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

And makes other Laws.

L. 4. de Exſecutorib. & Exactionib. Cod. Th. lib. 8. tit. 8. & L. 3. Cod. Juſt. de diverſis Officiis Dat. ad Euſignium 3. Non. Decemb.

Sect. 4.

A.D. 386.

Habitation. He tells Euſignius his Præfectus Prætorio, that none of his Apparitors, “ none of the Palatine Officers ſhall dare to do it, upon pain of his Primiſcrinius, “ his forfeiting Three pounds of Gold, and that the Apparitor offending “ when out of his Imployment, ſhould be forced to become a Member of the “ Body of the Mancipes or principal Bakers. Nay, if any Domeſtick, or Protector, “ a Strator (of whom formerly) Agens in Rebus, or Palatine of both Offices “ ſhould do it, when diſmiſſed, he ſhould pay a pound of Gold; and for as “ much as the Adjutores of the Palatine Offices, the Numerarii, or Actuarii of the “ two Treaſurers were to ſee to thoſe things, he Condemns them in as much; “ if this Law through their neglect ſhall be broken. Shortly after he obliged “ the Curiales of Cities and Boroughs, by declaring that none ſhould eſcape their “ ſervices by betaking himſelf to his Houſe, that is, by Hiring his Grounds, being “ Stewards of his Res privata, or his Husbandmen; but that ſuch ſhould be drawn “ back, yet ſo as with Indemnity to his own private Eſtate, if any thing was “ owing it by the Curialis. But whereas out of the Body of theſe Curiales were wont to be Created thoſe they called Procuratores Metallorum, who overſaw the Mines; when about this time the Grutkingi invaded Thrace; and ſome terror hereof had ſpread into the neighbouring Countries, thoſe Procuratores (whoſe Wortk lay in Macedonia, the Mediterranean, Dacia, Mœſia or Dardania) thence took occaſion to pretend Fear, deſerted their Charges, and endeavoured to compaſs honourable Imployments. “ Thoſe Valentinian orders Euſignius to force back to their Charge, and not ſuffer them to obtain new Dignities, till they have filled up the term of their Procuration.

L. 114. de Decurion. Cod. Th. & l. 39. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. ad eundem 8. Kal. Jan.

L. 4. Cod. Juſt. de Metallariis &c. lib. 11. tit. 6.

A.D. 387. Valentiniano Aug. 3. & Eutropio Coſs.

38. In the CCCLXXXVII. Year of our Lord, Valentinian Auguſtus the Third time, and Fl. Eutropius were Conſuls, it being the Twelfth of Valentinian, and the Fifteenth Indiction. Cynegius ſtill remained Præfectus Prætorio under Theodoſius, and Euſignius under Valentinian; who continued this year at Milan till the latter end of September: and Theodoſius made his Abode at Conſtantinople, till they both removed to Theſſalonica, upon ſuch occaſion as we ſhall diſcover in due time and place. Now we find Valentinian's Laws firſt upon the File, and he begins with a continuation of the Priviledges granted by him and his Father, to the Phyſitians of the City of Rome; as to the Immunities of whom, we have already ſpoken from the Edicts of former Emperors. “ But in caſe any thing had been acted contrary to thoſe Laws made by them two, he commands Pinianus, who “ had ſucceeded Saluſt in the Præfectſhip of the City, that it be reſcinded, and “ the Laws made upon Reference or Relation of the Senate to the Emperors, “ be ſtrictly obſerved. For he had taken notice that contrary thereto, ſome “ Perſons had procured ſome ſurreptitious Reſcripts in their own favour, by the “ mediation of the great ones at Court. His Fathers Ordination was, that for ſupplying of Places, the Seniors in the Art ſhould be Judges of the Perſons, after they had examined them; and they ſhould ſucceed as they came, according to their time of Admiſſion; but by ſome means or other, one was lately crept in by Virtue of a Reſcript or Mandate, which diſpenſed both with his Examination, and alſo Seniority; putting him into the place of him, to whom he ſucceeded. This may very well be ſuppoſed to be the Caſe, for the very ſame happened Three years before, when Symmachus was Præfect of the City; and therefore he made Relation to this very Emperour himſelf to this purpoſe. “ As I reverence your Sanctions, ſo I highly eſteem the moſt wholeſome Laws made “ by your Father; who amongſt other things he Ordained for the publick good “ gave to Profeſſors of the Art of Medicine, Order of Succeſſion, in caſe a Room “ was vacated by the Death of any of their Number: By this Law it is required “ that the firſt or chief of the Science be Judges of the Skill of ſuch as are newly “ to be admitted; and this, they ſay, hath been ever ſince obſerved. But now “ there is one John (Vir Perfectiſſimus he calls him) who pretends not to the “ place your Fathers Edict gave him, but one next to the top, being furniſhed “ with the Priviledge of the Palatine Militia (that is, has been Archiater in the “ Palace) and further by a ſpecial Reſcript, whereby he procured the place in reverſion “ of Epictetus then alive. Now, for as much as Law and Cuſtome both “ did require that the Principal Phyſitians ſhould be Judges in the Point; the “ whole Colledge was called together to give their Opinions; of whom the moſt “ conſiderable, being on one ſide moved with a Veneration of the Law, and on “ the other, with reverence to the new Priviledge, would not dare to ſpeak “ their minds, but aſſigned to John that place empty which he ſhould have had, “

One concerning the Phyſitians of Rome.

L. 13. de Medicis &c. Cod. Th. Dat. 11. Kal. Febr. Mediol. ad Pinianum P. V. Abeſta Cod. Juſt.

Epiſt. 40. lib. 10.

if he had been admitted into the Colledge at ſuch a time as he went to ſerve “ in the Palace. But when he came to be asked for his Codicills or Letters, “ whereby his Place and Rank might be known what it was, amongſt the Palatine “ Archiatri; he affirmed they were ſtolen from him, and could not be produced; “ but on the other hand, many of the Phyſitians ſhewed ſeveral Copies “ of ſome, who though they came from Court, yet paſſed into the College in “ the ſame way and method as others did, and in obſervance of the Law. Wherefore “ perplexed in a doubtful Caſe, as neither daring to break your Fathers “ Law, nor to refuſe your ſpecial and particular commands; I have ſent the Allegations “ of the Parties, and referred the whole matter to your cognizance, “ from whom I expect what courſe to take: it belonging to Imperial Authority “ alone to interpret Laws. Such is the Relation or Conſultation made by Symmachus, to which this Law might ſeem a direct and full Anſwer, but that it bears Date in the Third year from his Præfectſhip.

Euſignius, the Præfect, his care for Buildings and Highways.

39. The Spring now coming on, Euſignius the Præfectus Prætorio of Italy, ſet himſelf to the repairing of the High-ways of that Country, which very much agreed with the Condition they were in at this time, and with the humour and Inclination of the Perſon. For now alſo he took great Care for the raiſing of a Baſilica, as they called thoſe publick Buildings with Galleries; and of a Bridge, which being committed to the care of one Bonoſus: he uſed his utmoſt endeavour for carrying on the work; but it was lett, and received much delay, by reaſon that one Cypriades a Comes and Mechanick was joyned with him, which put Symmachus to trouble as well as others, as he ſhows by ſeveral of his Epiſtles. But in order to the repairing of the ways, Euſignius procured a Reſcript from Valentinian as full as he could deſire; for, whereas ſeveral Ranks pretended an Immunity from this ſervice, as Illuſtrious Perſons, the Houſe of the Prince, Church-men, thoſe Poſſeſſors of the Emperors Lands in perpetual Right called Emphyteuticarii, and Veterane Soldiers; he expreſly commands, that none whatſoever be admitted as Free, and indemnified from this work. And as by another Law, a penalty “ had been impoſed upon the Lords of the Adjacent Grounds if they refuſed “ to contribute; ſo now, if their Actors or Bailiffs bearing themſelves high upon “ the qualities or privileges of their Maſters, would not obey; he orders that “ they be ſeized on, and condemned to the ſervice of his own Houſe, or his own “ Domaine; ſo as to be amongſt the ſervants of his Patrimony, or Res Privata. “ But however Euſignius behaved himſelf in this or other matters; a Complaint was brought to the Emperour ſhortly after, againſt his Vicars, for their Inſolent Deportment towards the Domeſticks and Protectors; whom they refuſed to admit to a Kiſs, when they ſaluted them, as the manner was toward thoſe, who for their place or Eminency were indulged this privilege. “ Amongſt theſe Valentinian tells Euſignius he will have theſe Perſons reckoned, and that whoſoever “ denies them the Honour, ſhall be eſteemed and taken as guilty of what “ was like to Sacrilege (as thoſe were ſaid to be, who were Violaters or Contemners “ of the Imperial Laws or Orders) becauſe they were thought fit enough “ to touch or kiſs his own Purple, which ſerves as an Argument from the greater “ to procure the leſſer privilege. Nay, Valentinians Hand being now in for Correction of the Arrogance of his Miniſters; he is thought to have given a Check to Euſignius himſelf, and ſet bounds to the Ambition of him as well as others: For in another Law which Gothofred thinks made up with this one Conſtitution. “ He tells him that the Illuſtrious the Comites, and Magiſtri, of Foot and Horſe, ſhall exerciſe no Power or Authority over the Provincials: neither the moſt ample Præfects over Military men. Yet did he now inlarge the Power of Euſignius in one Caſe, or give him leave to uſe his Diſcretion. Though, as we formerly have ſeen, when one Poſſeſſor had Grounds in ſeveral places; it was not Lawful to pay all Tributes in one, becauſe many Inconveniences thereupon happened; yet now it was found that when theſe Lands were but ſmall, and the Tribute thence ariſing inconſiderable, it was not worth the while to convey it; and therefore in ſuch Caſes he leaves it to his Diſcretion (to whom belonged the care and charge of Tributes) to admit this Tranſlation (as it was call'd) when convenience ſhould require, with theſe further inſtructions, “ That the payment ſhould be made where the Poſſeſſor had moſt “ to pay, and that it ſhould be done without fraud or detriment to the publick. “

Epp. 71. l. 4. 76. l. 5. & 38. l. 10.

L. 3. de Itinere muniend. Cod. Th. lib. 15. tit. 2. Dat. 4. Kal. Mart. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

The Vicars of Præfects rebuked for not admitting certain perſons to the Kiſſe.

L. 4. de Domeſticis & Protectorib. Cod. Th. & l. 1. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. Prid. Non. Martis.

Pœna enim Sacrilegii ſimilis erit.

Illuſtrious Perſons alſo.

L. 1. de Officio Magiſtri Militum. Cod. Juſt. lib. 1. tit. 29.

Tranſlation of Tribute in ſome Caſes allowed.

L. 3. Ne Conlationis tranſlatio poſtuletur. Cod. Th. lib. 11. tit. 22. Dat. 18. Kal. Maii Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

40. The Theodoſius ſubjects Curiales to the torture by Plummets.

40. The Legiſlative Power being ſuch as affords proper remedies for the Diſtempers of a State, muſt needs alter its Rules and Decrees, as the Temper of the Commonwealth it ſelf doth alter; the ſame Laws no more ſuiting a Nation, or People at all times, than the ſame Phyſick, the ſame man in all Diſtempers, or the ſame Clothes in all differences of Health and Age. Therefore Theodoſius, though he was ſo very Indulgent to Corporations, and made ſo many Laws for ſecurity of the Curiales from tortures and other matters, yet now thought fit, if not to retract, to leſſon and regulate what he had ordained concerning their Immunity. And this was by reaſon that the Decuriones, or Principal Curiales, having the Care and Management of the publick mony, making the Diſtribution of the Tributes how they ſhould be paid, and being alſo imployed in gathering of them, often ſpent the money they had in their hands, turned Bankrupts; and, as Spendthrifts muſt, if they have opportunity, be Rapacious, were immoderate and cruel in their Exactions. "He commands therefore that in all theſe Caſes the antient cuſtome of ſubjecting them to the torture of Plummets be revived, and that not only by Order of the Præfecti Prætorio; to whom, as he tells Cynegius, for the Dignity of their place, the chief Authority was committed; but alſo of the ordinary Judges, for the reſtraining of whoſe ſeverities againſt the Curiales, ſeveral Laws had been made; and therefore it might be much doubted whether they would adventure on it; though hereby he ſeemes to abate ſome of that reſpect he had for Corporations, yet much at the ſame time, he enforced ſeveral Laws he had formerly made againſt the Curiales their forſaking their Charges therein, and this of new he enjoyned, "That though by reaſon of Age a man regularly obtained Excuſe from Services, yet he will not have him wholly diſcharged, but be preſent at Elections and ſuch Decrees as might beſt be diſpatched by full Courts. But Theodoſius his Ears were now open not only to complaints he received of things done at home, but alſo from out of the ordinary Verge of the Roman Empire. Foreign Nations either for the Reverence they bore to the Majeſty of the Romans, or out of fear of their power, to which in ſome ſort they ſubmitted, often preſented the Emperors with Golden Crowns, or the Gold called Aurum Coronarium. Amongſt theſe inhabiting towards Perſia, were there certain Satrapæ, at this time, or Governors of Provinces, who owned the Soveraignty of Theodoſius. Indeed Ammianus tells us of Five of thoſe Provinces formerly taken from the Perſians by Maximian, but reſtored back again by Jovian. One now belonging to the Empire, though Governed by its peculiar Laws and Cuſtomes, was Sophene (which ſome make part of Old Syria, and others include within the bounds of Armenia) the Inhabitants whereof complained that they were burthened by the payment of the now mentioned Gold. Theodoſius hereupon directed his Edict to Gaddanas the Satrapa of the Province, and therein he tells him he decrees That it ſhall be reſtored back to them again, from whom it ſeemed unlawfully taken. "And that all Satrapæ preſent thoſe Crowns, which they owe, out of their Devotion to the Roman Empire, ſolemnly to his Serenity, at their own charge. For from him they ſeem to have renewed their Commands, and to have paid thoſe Crowns, or this Gold as an acknowledgment.

L. 117. de Decurion. Cod.Th. & L. 40. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. Kal. April. Conſtp. Non ſolum à vobis (quibus propter loci dignitatem rerum ſumma commiſſa eſt) verum à Judicibus Ordinariis.

*L.116,&* 118. ejuſd. tit. Cod. Th.

L. ult. de Auro Coronario Cod. Theod. Dat. 18. Kal. Jul. Conſtp. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt. ut temporaria & hiſtorica.

Celebrates the Quinquennalia of his Son Arcadius, and his own Decennalia.

41. Poſſibly he gained much Repute with the Inhabitants of theſe Provinces, by his favour extended to them in this kind. But however it hapned, he loſt as much Love in one of his moſt eminent Cities, by a rigorous exaction of the Tributes. We are to know that this year he celebrated the Quinquennalia of his Son Arcadius, or uſed the ſolemn and uſual way of rejoycing for his entring the fifth year of his Sovereignty, as he did alſo afterward his own Decennalia for joy that he was arrived in the tenth year of his Reign. For ſuch was the Cuſtom of Roman Princes, that, when named Auguſti by the Souldiers, to bind them the faſter to them they gave them a Donative; which was alſo obſerved by their Sons, although they ſucceeded by hereditary Right, as Herodian notes concerning Commodus. The Emperors, in like manner, gave the Military men a Donative in their fifth and tenth years (Quinquennalia and Decennalia) becauſe, as Dio writes, this was a kind of Renovation, or New beginning of their Empire, viz. to every man five Aurei; which ſolemn cuſtom was at length aboliſhed by Juſtinian, if he that wrote the ſecret Hiſtory fathered upon Procopius, tell true. This was performed by Theodoſius at this time, and being to make this Largeſs, both upon his own and his Sons Account; the Expence muſt neceſſarily require a great ſum of money. For this he exacted an anſwerable Supply of the People, which caſt the Inhabitants of Antioch into a great ſedition, inſomuch that they demoliſhed his Statues, as Libanius the Sophiſt relates. But Zoſimus muſt ſtill write in his own way; for after the ſad ſtory told of Gerontius he adds, that, Matters going ſo wretchedly in the Reign of Theodoſius, and no excellent Action or what tended to Virtue, being incouraged; but every thing conducing to Effeminateneſs and Luxury increaſing by whole Ells, as the Proverb then went; the Citizens of Antioch, that great City of Syria, not enduring that multiplication of Tributes, which every day was contrived by the Exactors, fell into tumult, defaced both his Statues and thoſe of the Empreſs, and caſt out Speeches, not untrue or unproper for the ſtate of Affairs, but ſuiting the Liberty and Urbanity of Speech which was familiar to them. The Emperor hereat being angry, threatened to puniſh this Offence, according to its deſert; which the Decuriones of the City underſtanding, ſent their Meſſengers to him to excuſe what had been committed by the Multitude. They imployed on this Errand Libanius the Sophiſt, famous for the Books he left behind him, and Hilarius, a Perſon renowned both for the luſtre of his Family and his excellency in all ſorts of Learning, And the Sophiſt in an Oration had before the Emperor and Senate, ſo much prevailed, that the Prince changed his Reſolution, and ceaſing from all Anger with the City, injoyned him another Speech concerning this Reconciliation; moreover out of Reſpect to the great Virtue of Hilarius he preferred him to the Government of all Paleſtine. Thus writeth Zoſimus concerning this matter, who, if he could have done it, would have blamed Theodoſius for his Clemency; why he aggravates every thing againſt him, and minceth every offence he had cauſe to puniſh we ſufficiently underſtand. But however, we are informed elſewhere, both of the true occaſion of this Tumult and the extravagancy thereof, and by what means the Emperor was brought to remit the puniſhment.

*Hoc donativum recentior Latinitas Auguſtaticum dixit. Vide Valeſiij Annot. in Ammian. Marcel. p.*314.

Is at great expence, and raiſes money.

παντὸς δὲ
τρυφῆς καὶ ἀκολασίας εἴδους κατὰ πῆχυν (τὸ λεγόμενον) ἐφ' ἑκάστης ἐπιδιδόν-τος, &c.

Thereupon the Antiochians fall into a tumult and demoliſh his Statues.

42. That the occaſion of it was the great expence, which according to the Cuſtom, he was to make in careſſing the Souldiers, and otherwiſe, upon his Sons and his own account, Libanius teſtifies; although our Church-Hiſtorians, as Theodoret and Sozomen, aſcribe it to the Preparations for War, which ſome apply to that which ſhortly followed againſt Maximus. The Statues both of him and his late wife Flaccilla (by ſeveral called Placilla) they demoliſhed, ſhe being dead the year before; and not only theirs, but thoſe alſo of his Sons Arcadius and Honorius, and of his Father Theodoſius the Elder. To chaſtiſe this Inſolence and Rebellion were diſpatched away, by the angry Emperor (who moſt took to heart the injury offered to his deceaſed Wife) Cæſarius the Magiſter Officiorum, and Ellebichus the Magiſter Militum, of whom we have heard already, and are likely to hear more out of the Laws. In the mean time John, who was ſirnamed Chryſoſtom, and then reſided in that City, by his Eloquent Orations, fitted to that great danger which then impended, moved the People that committed the Offence, to a great ſenſe of their Guilt, and Puniſhment. The firſt he made was ſeven days after “the commiſſion of the fault, which he ſo much exaggerated, as that his drift was to ſhew that the Hainouſneſs of it could not be expreſſed. In order to this, he inſiſted both on the Newneſs and the Immanity of the thing. Nothing, he ſaid, had been formerly than that their City more venerable; and now at preſent nothing was rendred more miſerable. The Inhabitants thereof had been as compoſed and gentle, formerly, as an Horſe tame and uſed to the Hand, that would meet thoſe that made much of him; but now all on a ſuddain it kicked and ſpurned, and had done ſuch miſchief, as it was not any way fit to ſpeak. He tells them he lamented and mourned, not for the ſad Effects of the Emperors Threats, expected by them, but for the madneſs of the follies committed. For, although the Emperor were not angry, would not at all puniſh or chaſtiſe; yet he demands how they ſhould be able to bear the Ignominy which they had contracted? And ſo falling into a paſſion, as he ſeemeth, he tells them that ſorrow interrupts him in what he hath to ſay. He both laments himſelf, and excites his Auditors to do the ſame; and adding that Almighty God permitted this to fall out becauſe they tolerated ſuch as had blaſphemed him, he exhorts them to Repentance in many words.

Vide Chronic. Hiſtoric. Cod. Th. ad hunc. Ann.

ἀνδριάντ.

Vide Baron. ad Eund. Ann.

43. The Holy time of Lent now was come, wherein the Antiochians flocked to Church, having no other comfort but what there was afforded them: and therein Chryſoſtom Preached conſtantly to them, being exceedingly touched with a ſenſe of their condition, whom, according to his Place and Calling, he earneſtly exhorted to Repentance. The Homilies are ſtill extant; and in them ſufficiently appears what Eloquence can do when joyned with Neceſſity. But the Judges in Commiſſion

He ſends Officers to puniſh the miſdemeanor.

Whom certain Chriſtian Eremites reſtrain.

miſſion for trial and puniſhment of the Offenders are now arrived at Antioch, which firſt they degrade from the honour of being the Metropolis of Syria, and then they ſhut up all the publick places; as the Baths, Theatres, Forums and others. Laodicea is made what Noble Antioch formerly had been; and the moſt eminent of them that were known or ſuſpected guilty are apprehended and ſent to Priſon, to whom Tortures are preſented, a ſufficient Guard being in the mean time beſtowed up and down the City, to prevent any Riſing of the Inhabitants. The Judges prepare ſevere Inquiſitions, and the Eſtates of thoſe that are moſt ſuſpected are ſeized, the Tables of Proſcription being faſtned upon their Doors. A great part of the Citizens, after the commiſſion of the Fact, being aware of what would follow, when they heard that Judges, and an Army would be ſent down, withdrew themſelves; of ſuch as remained, ſome were ſent to Priſon, and the reſt expected hourly the Officers to be at their Gates, having no other Conſolation than in their Devotions and the good effects of Chryſoſtom his Sermons. The Noiſe hereof could not but be ſtrong and fly far and wide; and to the Mountains it came, where many Chriſtians then lived an Eremetical life, who no ſooner heard what Deſtruction hung over the Heads of the Citizens, but haſted thither, applied themſelves preſently to the Judges, and by their importunate Arguments drawn from Chriſtian Piety and Mercy, prevailed with them to reſpite all farther Proceedings, till ſuch time as a Meſſage might be ſent to the Emperor. For procurement hereof they adventured their lives, and for four days together watched the Gates of the Court, to prevent the execution of condemned Perſons, as Chryſoſtom affirmes, who upbraided the Philoſophers of Antioch in this manner: Where are they now that wear the Pallium, and ſtretch out their long Beards, “ with their Staves in their Hands? Theſe Philoſophers of the Gentiles, theſe Cynical Miſchiefs, more miſerable than Doggs under the Table, and doing all “ things for the ſake of their Bellies. They all then forſook the City, all ran “ away, and hid themſelves in holes: they only, who by their works ſhew forth “ true Philoſophy, as if there had been no danger at all, appeared unconcerned in “ the Forum. Thoſe that lived in the City betook themſelves to Mountains and “ Holes; and Hermits living in Mountains came down as Inhabitants, in this dreadful “ time, into the City.

The miſerable Eſtate of the City during the four days of proceedings.

44. But how lamentable the Face of things was in Antioch theſe four days, wherein the Judges ſate and examined the matter before they were prevailed with to ſtop their proceedings, the ſame Perſon, who was an eye-witneſs, puts his Auditors in mind afterward, to make them ſenſible of their Deliverance. He tells them “That when the greateſt part of the Citizens out of fear was run away “ and had hid themſelves in Caves and Holes, the Houſes were without Women, “ and in the Forum were no men to be ſeen: poſſibly two or three in the middle “ thereof, and like nothing ſo much as walking Ghoſts. Going then to the Hall “ of Juſtice, to ſee what would be the Iſſue, and ſeeing the remainder of the Citizens “ ſtanding at the Gates, he moſt admired, that though a multitude thither “ had flocked, there was as profound a ſilence as if no body had been preſent, “ one looking at another, but no man daring to ask him that ſtood next him, or “ to hear from him what the News was. For every one ſuſpected his Neighbour, “ when they perceived many taken ſodainly out of the Crowd and carried in, “ when no ſuch thing was once thought of. But all of them together looked up “ to Heaven, and in ſilence ſtretched out their Hands thither, expecting deliverance “ from above, and beſeeching God to ſtand by thoſe that were to be tried, “ and to ſoften the Hearts of the Judges to the producing of ſome milde ſentence. “ Now being got into the Hall, a more terrible Sight preſented it ſelf, viz. “ of Souldiers every way armed, ſo as to keep peace and order, while the Judges “ did their work. Now becauſe the Wives, the Mothers and Children of thoſe “ that were condemned ſtood at the Gates; that no noiſe nor diſturbance might “ ariſe, when they ſaw their Relations led to Execution, they cauſed them to be “ removed all away. But the moſt ſad Spectacle was, that of the Mother and Siſter “ of one of the Priſoners who crept through the Croud of Souldiers, and lay “ proſtrate on the Earth at the Feet of the Judges, where hearing nothing but “ the Noiſe of the Executioners, the ſound of the Blows they gave, the mourning “ of thoſe that indured them, and the dreadful Sentences of the Judges themſelves, “ they ſeemed to indure greater Torments than they who underwent the Puniſhment, “ being chiefly concerned leſt theſe that were tortured, by extremity of pain “ ſhould be driven to accuſe their deareſt Relations. The Relator of theſe Paſſages “

Sect.4.

A.D. 387.

ges declares, that, he ſeeing thoſe who at home had their Maids and Eunuchs to “ attend them, and nothing wanting to their Eaſe or Pleaſure, now lye upon the “ bare ground at the feet of the Company, and hearing them with all the expreſ- “ ſions of ſorrow they could utter, begging thoſe preſent that they would inter- “ ceed with the Judges, he could not but break out into that expreſſion of So- “ lomon; Vanity of Vanities, all is Vanity, and it put him into a profitable Fit of “ acting the true and Chriſtian Philoſopher in other Meditations ſuitable to the pre- “ ſent occaſion.

45. Theſe that now were arraigned were the Principal of all the City; and joyful they would have been, if they had brought them word that they might redeem their lives, by parting with whatſoever elſe they had, even liberty. The day being over, and the iſſue of the Trial expected, all perſons were in greater expectation and anxiety, and prayed that the matter might be put off and reſerved for the cogniſance of the Emperor himſelf, from whom they hoped for ſome eaſie Sentence: and now every where were plenty of Prayers and Tears to be obſerved of ſuch as, touched with a love to their Country, deſired of Almighty God that he would ſpare the Remainders of the City, and not ſuffer it quite to be rooted out. In the mean time the Judges were moved with none of theſe things, intent only upon that for which they came, and drove on Foot and in Chains through the Forum into Priſon thoſe who a while ago had Horſes enough of their own they kept at home, and needed not to have walkt, beſides multitude of Servants to attend them: their Goods were ſeized, Bills of Proſcription ſet upon their Dores, and their Wives and Children conſtrained to ſeek for Lodging they knew not where, for every one was afraid to receive them. And yet they ſeemed pretty well ſatisfied in parting with their Eſtates, and the deſpicable condition to which they were reduced, in that they ſtill injoyed their lives, which they expected alſo ſodainly to part with. But ſee, when nothing but death and ſlaughter ran in their minds, ſodainly they were ſurprized with exceeding Joy; when the Judges reſolved that the matter ſhould be firſt reported to the Emperor. Not only the Monks but the Clergy then in the City, laboured abundantly in this work; one reſolving at firſt to go with his life in his hand to the Court, and others beſeeching, intreating and falling at the Feet of the Judges till they had procured a Reprieve, then kiſſing their Hands and their Feet to thank and keep them in the ſame humour. He that went to Court to intercede, was Flavianus, Biſhop of the place, who foreſeeing the Danger undertook the Imployment ſhortly after the Fact was committed, and in his way met with the Commiſſioners that were ſent to examine and chaſtiſe it. Being come to the Palace, as Chryſoſtom deſcribes him, and was ſuitable to the trouble of mind he underwent, he ſtood at a diſtance from the Emperor, in a ſilent and weeping poſture, hanging down the Head, and not daring to look up, as if he had been the man that committed the Crime; and that with this Deſign, that he might firſt move Theodoſius to compaſſion, and that done, then begin his Defence. For guilty Perſons can only be allowed to be ſilent, and ſay nothing in Excuſe for what is done.

The Judges reſolve that the Puniſhment ſhall be referred to the Emperor.

Flavianus the Biſhop goes to the Emperor.

46. The Emperor at length eſpied him in this poſture, and came to him much moved to ſee him in ſo ſad a plight; and though he knew his errand, gave him not one angry word, never upbraided him with the Sawcineſs and Rebellion of thoſe for whom he came to intercede; but began a grave Expoſtulation, wherein he related how kind he had been to the City ſince his firſt coming to the Government, and then demanded if he deſerved ſuch a requital, and what ill turn it was he had done them, for which they had deſigned him ſuch a Reward? Whatever it was they might have revenged it upon the living; but that would not ſatisfie them, except their Indignation extended it ſelf alſo to the dead. He ended with a proteſtation, that he had eſteemed Antioch above all other Cities; that it was more valuable in this Thoughts than his own Country; that he had deſired to ſee it above all things, and all thoſe that converſed with him were ſufficient witneſſes of his Vow. At this Flavianus fetching a deep ſigh, and pouring forth plenty of Tears, replied, that they could not but be ſenſible how much he had reſpected their City, and that therefore the greater was their Ingratitude and Guilt; inſomuch that though he burnt or demoliſhed it, and put them all to the Sword, yet he could not inflict a Puniſhment ſo great as they deſerved; and whatever he could do, this would ſtill remain as their greateſt plague, that they had been ingrateful to their Benefactor; and ſhould be condemned as an Inſtance of Ingratitude, by Poſterity. For had their City been broken open by Barbarians, and

Who Expoſtulates about the injury done to him.

Flavianus confeſſeth the greatneſs of it.

and the Inhabitants thereof carried away Captive, they could ſtill have been comforted by this conſideration, that he being alive, and bearing them ſo much good Will, would amend what was amiſs, and reſtore the place to as great a Luſtre as formerly. But now what hope was remaining, that after ſuch a misfortune ſuch a Deliverance would come, he from whom they were to expect it, being diſobliged? To whom now could they betake themſelves? what Refuge could be remaining in ſuch a Caſe? But however, if his Majeſty pleaſed, there would not be wanting a Medicine for this Diſeaſe. For amongſt private Men great quarrels and fallings out often procure as great Acts of Charity and Friendſhip. When God had made Man and placed him in his Paradice, the Divel envying his happineſs tempted him to diſobedience, and thereby caſt him from this Station; but God not only not forſook him, but, inſtead of Paradiſe, opened Heaven unto us thereby, both demonſtrating his own goodneſs, and inflicting on the Devil greater Puniſhment.

But uſeth great Arguments to induce him to pardon it.

47. He adviſed the Emperour herein to imitate his Maker. For the Devils had left no ſtone unturned, to bring into Diſgrace with him, that City which of all others he moſt loved. He prayed him that though he did puniſh the Crime, yet that he would not exclude the Citizens from his favour even in Conſideration hereof; but, to be revenged upon theſe their Enemies, rather write Antioch amongſt the chief of thoſe he reſpected. If he overthrew or deſtroyed it, he ſhould do what they aimed at; but if he would remit his diſpleaſure and reſtore it to his former favour, he would do them the greateſt deſpight imaginable, thereby ſhewing that they not only profited nothing by their Plot, but every thing happened quite contrary to what they propoſed to themſelves. And herein he would be juſt, in ſhewing Mercy to that City which the Devils envied, becauſe of his Friendſhip. For if he had not ſo much loved it, they would not have ſo much hated it; ſo that though Strange, yet it was true, that it had undergone this Calamity for his ſake. How much more bitter than all Turnings and Subverſions were thoſe words he uttered, that he had by this Fact being more affronted than had any of his Predeceſſors? But he pray'd him out of his Goodneſs and Wiſdome to conſider that this Affront that was offered him, would afford him a Crown more Noble, and of greater value than the Diadem he wore. His Diadem indeed was a Token of his Virtue, and of the Liberality of Almighty God. But the Crown woven out of this his Compaſſion and Mercy, would be his alone, and the reward of his Wiſdome. And all the world would more admire him for his Conqueſt over his Paſſion, than for the gliſtering pretious ſtones he wore on his Head; Though they had demoliſhed his Statues, yet if he forgave the Demoliſhers, and would not take the Revenge of them that he deſigned, he would have as many Statues Erected him as there were at preſent, and would be Men in the world. For Poſterity would hear of this his Clemency, and for it would both admire and love his Memory. And that what he ſaid was not out of Flattery, but true, and upright dealing, he would ſhow by diſcovering to him from a paſſage of former times, that neither Armies nor Arms, Money nor multitudes of Subjects, nor any other thing could render Princes ſo Illuſtrious, as Clemency, and the Diſcipline of the Mind, in bringing it into Subjection unto Reaſon.

48. There's a Story, ſaith he, ſuitable to this occaſion, of Conſtantine of bleſſed Memory, his Statue being defaced; for which he was vehemently moved by ſome Flatterers to take Revenge. As a Motive to it, they told him, that his Face was grievouſly battered; at which words, he felt his Face with his Hand and ſmiling replied, that he could feel no wound he had received, but that his Face and Head were ſound and unbroken. This put the Flatterers to ſilence, but the Saying he uſed hath ſince that been ever ſpoken of, neither will it haſtily be forgotten. Now was not this Conqueſt more noble than the many Trophies he erected? That Prince built many Cities, and was Conquerour of Multitudes of Barbarians, yet of theſe things nothing is remembred; but this Speech of his, is in every ones Mouth, which by all Poſterity will be recorded. Now if for it he obtained ſo great Fame amongſt Men, how ſhall Almighty God, the bountiful rewarder of all good works, Crown his Clemency? But what need is there, ſaith he, that I ſhould inſtance in Conſtantine or any others, when the Caſe requires, that I put you in mind of your own good Deeds? Call to mind what formerly you have done; how in this Faſt of Lent before Eaſter, you ſent out your Letters through the world, whereby was injoyned, that Priſoners ſhould be pardoned, and ſet at Liberty; and this not ſufficiently expreſſing your humanity, you uſed theſe words, in the ſaid

Letters:

Sect.4. A.D. 387.

Letters: I wiſh I could reſtore thoſe already dead to Life. Remember theſe words; for now you have your wiſhed for opportunity of calling the Dead to Life again; the Citizens of Antioch being already dead before Condemned, the City lying now upon the Brink of the Grave; therefore now reſtore it, as you may do without money, without Charge, without expence either of time or Labour. One word from your Mouth will do it; and the poor Town will acknowledge it ſelf more indebted to you than it's Founder, and that with Reaaſon. For he only gave a beginning to it and ſo deſiſted; but you will reſtore to its grandure a great and mighty City deſtroyed and brought to as bad as nothing, after a great time of tranquillity and Repoſe. It would have been no ſuch great exploit, if being taken by the Enemy, you had reſcued it out of their hands, as now it will be generous to pardon it. For many Princes have done as much as that can amount to; but this will be your Atchievement alone, and work beyond expectation. It's a thing ſo far diſtant from wonder, that it's practis'd every day, that Princes do good unto their Subjects; but that one who had ſuffered ſuch Affronts ſhould put them up and forget them, this exceds the ſtrength of humane Nature. Conſider that now as to the matter in hand, you do not only conſult about the ſtate of one City, but concerning your own glory, nay of Chriſtianity it ſelf. For now the Eyes of Jews and Greeks, and Barbarians, who have alſo been acquainted with what hath happened, are upon you, and expect what Sentence you will paſs upon the Offendors. If it be milde and gentle, all will commend it, praiſe God for it, and ſay; Of what great power is Chriſtian Religion, which is able to reſtrain a Man that has no equal upon Earth, who has power to puniſh and deſtroy at his pleaſure, and hath taught him ſuch Philoſophy as no private perſon would practiſe the like. Certainly great is the God of Chriſtians, who of men makes Angels, and ſuch as are above all natural Neceſſities.

49. Neither let that vain and groundleſs Fear poſſeſs you, into which ſome perhaps would have you caſt, as if ſparing this City would make others confident and refractory, and your Government to ſit too uneaſy upon your ſhoulders. Indeed had you been in no Capacity to puniſh, and that theſe Rioters had contended and got the better of you, then might you have entertained ſuch a Suſpition. But for as much as they are aſtoniſhed, already half dead, in me their Deputy lye now proſtrate at your Feet, expect nothing but deſtruction, and place all their Refuge in Almighty God, whom they ceaſe not continually to invoke to proſper my Journey; in a word behave themſelves no otherwiſe than thoſe that are at the point of Death, how cauſeleſs and ſuperfluous is this fear? Had they preſently been ordered to be put to death, they had not ſuffered ſo much as now they endure, living ſo many days in Fear and Trembling; when Night comes, they expect never more to ſee the Day, and when Day comes, they do not hope to reach the Evening. Many by ſeeking to eſcape the Danger in the Mountains, have fallen into the Jawes of wilde Beaſts; not only Men, but little Children and Women, both Beautiful and well born, lye lurking in Caves and Dens, much more proper for other ſorts of Animals. A new ſort of Captivity hath ſeized the City. The Buildings and the Walls do ſtand, and yet they ſuffer more than if Fire had deſtroyed their Houſes. Though there be no Enemy, no Barbarians appearing, yet they are more diſperſed than thoſe that ſhun Captivity, and worſe diſpoſed of than ſuch as are taken Priſoners. If a Leaf of a Tree do but wag, they are thereby ſcared and terrified all the Day: Prolong not therefore their Miſeries, but give them ſome time to take Breath. It's eaſie to awe and affright, but to procure ones ſelf Friends and Lovers, ſuch as will be quiet, obedient and heartily pray for ones proſperity, it's very difficult. This is the way to effect it. You might be at infinite expence, and raiſe innumerable Armies, and yet by all your Endeavours not be able to purchaſe or procure ſo much hearty affection, as by this Courſe, both from them that you oblige, and others that ſhall heare how you have obliged them. And if you have ſuch Returns from Men, how much will God himſelf reward you, not only for what you do at preſent; but as this Example will operate in future Ages? For if ſuch a Riot as this ſhall happen (which God forbid) and thoſe that are injured, ſhall give way to their Paſſion and Revenge, how will they Bluſh and be confounded, when they reflect upon this Act of Self-denyal? Hereby you will make your ſelf an Inſtructor to Poſterity, and will herein excel them, though they arrive at the higheſt pitch of Philoſophy. For it's one thing firſt to begin and ſet ſuch a Copy; and another, only to imitate or write after it.

50. Who

Sect. 4. A.D. 387.

50. Whoſoever therefore for the time to come, ſhall give any Inſtances of Clemency and good Nature, you will be partaker with them of the Reward: And for the preſent none can partake with you. If no ſuch perſon there ſhall be, yet will all Generations Conſpire to reverence your Memory, when they conſider how at ſuch time as a great City lying under Guilt, and obnoxious to Puniſhment, when thereat all Perſons were affrighted and aſtoniſhed; when the greateſt Captains, Officers and Judges ſtood amazed, and out of horror durſt not offer one word in its behalf; one poor old Man, God Almighty his Prieſt, ſhould by his looks and Acceſs move the Emperor to reſpect, and that the Prince ſhould grant that to this Old man, which he would not yield to any of thoſe about him, out of reverence to the Laws of God. And truly in this point the Citizens have ſhown their Duty to you, and how much they honour you, in that they have made me their Meſſenger, having this Opinion of you, that you Reverence the Prieſts of God, though all men be ſubject unto you, and the Prieſts conſidered in themſelves are mean, and have nothing to recommend them. But I pretend not only to come from them, but am ſent by the Common Lord of all Meſſengers (Angels) to declare thus much to your moſt milde and gentle Soul, that if you forgive men their Treſpaſſes, then will your Heavenly Father forgive you yours. Remember then that day wherein we ſhall give an account of our Actions. Conſider with your ſelf, that by this Act of Charity you will cover a multitude of Sins. Other Meſſengers bring Gold and Silver, and other Gifts with them: I only have brought with me the Holy Scriptures, pretend to make no other Preſents, but therewith beſeech you to imitate your own Lord and Maſter, who being every day injured by us yet ceaſes not to give us all good things. Do not defeat our Expectations, nor make null our Promiſes. If ſo be you will be reconciled, if you will receive the City unto your former grace and favour, and put away your diſpleaſure, I ſhall then return with great Alacrity and Comfort. But if you preſerve your Indignation againſt it, I will not only not go thither, but renounce it for the time to come; and fix my Habitation at ſome other place. For I will never own that for my Country or Home, with which you, who are the moſt merciful and good natur'd of all Men, refuſe to be reconciled.

51. Flavianus having ſpoken to this Purpoſe, it fared with the Emperour as of old time with Joſeph; whoſe Eyes were big with Tears; but he refrained himſelf becauſe of the By-ſtanders. He only ſpake one word (Chryſoſtome ſtill tells us) but this word was ſuch, as more became and adorned him, than his Diadem, viz. What great or admirable matter is it, if we who are contumeliuſly uſed, forgive thoſe Men who ſo treat us, we being Men our ſelves? when the Lord of the world deſcending from Heaven, made a ſervant for our ſakes, and Crucified by thoſe who received benefit by him, prayed to his Father for his Crucifiers, ſaying, Forgive them, for they know not what they do. What a wonderful thing is it then, if we
He prevailes. forgive our fellow-Servants? And that theſe were not feigned words, the ſe-“ quel ſhewed; for the Biſhop intending to ſtay and Celebrate with him the ap-“ proaching Feaſt of Eaſter, he compelled him to haſte away and ſhow himſelf to his People. I know ſaith he, how diſturbed they are now in their minds,“ and that yet there are many remainders of this Calamity; go and comfort them.“
If they ſee once the Pilot they will forget the Tempeſt. The Biſhop deſired“ that he would ſend his Son; but He willing to ſhow that he was abſolutely“ reconciled, bade them pray, that thoſe obſtacles might be removed, theſe“ wars extinguiſhed, and he would come himſelf without fail. Now, ſaith the“ Relator, what can be more calm and ſerene than this Soul? For the time to come, let the Pagans be confounded, or rather, not ſo, but let them be Inſtructed, and leaving their Error, betake themſelves to Chriſtianity ſo fruit-“ full in virtue, being taught our Philoſophy by an Emperour and a Biſhop.“
But as for the Emperor, he contented not himſelf with ſending the Biſhop away,“ but when he was gone out of Town, and had croſſed the Sea, he ſent after“ him for fear he ſhould loiter, and defraud thereby the City of half of“ their Joy, by keeping of Eaſter in another place. The Biſhop, as ſome greedy“ of praiſe would have done, did not neglect to ſend away the Joyful News till“ he himſelf ſhould bring it, but for that he travelled more ſlowly, diſpatched“ away one by Poſt, with Notice of their deliverance, leſt by reaſon of the ſlow-“ neſs of his Return, their Sorrow ſhould be continued. For he had no Deſign“ that he might bring the Tidings, but that the City might take breath again as“

Sect.4.

A.D. 387.

ſoon as might be, and this they improved to all expreſſions of Joy, kindling “ of Lights, and placing Beds before the Houſes (as was wont to be practiſed in “ Feaſts, when ſome extraordinary good thing had hapened) ſo that Antioch ſeemed “ to Celebrate the Feaſt of a new and late Nativity: And to increaſe their “ Joy, their Biſhop with the Pardon came timely enough to Celebrate Eaſter “ with them; which Chryſoſtome in another Sermon laboured to make them ſenſible of, as a tranſcendent Favour of Almighty God, in reſtoring the Head to the Body, the Paſtor to his Flock, the Maſter to his Scholars, the Captain to his Soldiers, and the Biſhop unto his Prieſts.

52. This is the Relation made by Chryſoſtome concerning the Tumult at Antioch, the danger the City was in, and the manner of procuring Pardon and Indemnity; which being his Account he gave to the Citizens preſently after the thing happened; and there being opportunity enough of knowing the truth or falſity thereof, and the moſt material paſſages being notoriouſly known; as of the Hermites their coming down, the Meſſage undertaken by Flavianus; his ſending a Poſt before him with News of the Pardon, and his bringing with him the Act of Grace it ſelf, and the like; No indifferent Perſon can queſtion the Veracity of that truly golden mouthed Orator, of whom it may juſtly be ſaid, that whereas ſome are words without matter; others are matter without words, moſt neither words nor matter; he was one of thoſe few who were both matter and words together. This renders unlikely what Sozomen writes, that Flavianus perſwaded the Boys that ſung at the Emperors Table, to put into their Songs thoſe Sayings which were in the Petitions of the Antiochians, and that Theodoſius thereupon touched with a ſenſe of their miſery, ceaſed any more to be angry with them. But whereas Baronius will have Libanius to have been dead long before this time, it was becauſe he was unacquainted with his Writings, wherein mention is made of this tumult of the Antiochians, particularly two Orations to Theodoſius upon this occaſion. And whereas he placeth it in the ſame year that Theodoſius undertook the Expedition againſt the Uſurper Maximus; others with more reaſon fix it in the year preceding, or that whereof we now write. For, firſt it happened at ſuch time as Theodoſius reſided at Conſtantinople, as ſeveral Paſſages teſtifie; and the year following, he was at Theſſalonica, as appears by ſeveral Laws. Then it hapned after the Conqueſt of the Barbarians, or Grothingi, or rather when ſome few Sparks of that Invaſion were ſtill remaining, or feared to be ſtill lurking; and after the death of Flaccilla; in Winter-time, before Lent, which was not utterly expired when the Biſhop brought them their Pardon. Indeed that Theodoſius was now preparing againſt Maximus is very probable, not being ignorant of what Deſigns the Tyrant had in his Head. For towards the later end of this very year he brake into Italy, and frighted away Valentinian, who fled with Juſtina his Mother, and his Siſter Galla, to Theodoſius into Illyricum, and made his Abode at Theſſalonica, whither Theodoſius removed to him.

Vide Chron. Hiſtoric. Cod. Theod.

Lib. 4. p. 766.

Maximus thinks of Invading Italy.

53. For Maximus (as Zoſimus hath it) not thinking he had yet got enough, or that matters had fully ſucceeded as he thought was ſuitable to his Worth and Dignity, while he only Reigned over thoſe Nations which had formerly obeyed Gratian; reſolved if he could, to remove Valentinian alſo out of the way, and get all his ſhare; at leaſt ſo much of it as he could come by. Overpowred by theſe thoughts he prepared for paſſing the Alps into Italy; but when he perceived that his way muſt lye over ſuch ſteep and craggy Hills, and beyond them over Lakes and Meeres, and thereby his March be rendered very ſlow, with ſo great Forces as he purpoſed to take along with him, he cooled in his heat, and took more time to conſider of it. Valentinian now from Aquileia ſent his Ambaſſadours to treat of a better grounded and firmer Peace betwixt them, and to the conditions thereof Maximus ſeemed very willing to ſubmit. This ſo well ſucceeding, Valentinian ſent away one Domninus a Syrian, a Perſon of very good Note, and one ſo familiar with him, that he imparted to him his moſt ſecret Affairs, whom Maximus received, and courted to a very high Degree; and after the Delivery of his Meſſage preſented him ſo highly, that he imagined his Maſter could have no better Friend. Nay, he was at ſo much pains and Charge to deceive him, that he committed part of his Army into his Hands, as for the Emperor's Uſe, to be imployed by him againſt the Barbarians that infeſted Pannonia; which, as it made Domninus depart in a very joyful humour; ſo by paſſing the Alps the neareſt and ſafeſt way back into Italy, he thereby diſcovered it to Maximus, who expecting the ſame, and being prepared for a March, followed him

Sect. 4.
Effects it by cunning.

with all his Forces, ſending ſome Scouts before him, who ſhould intercept all perſons whatſoever that might carry News of his Approach. And this was eaſily enough effected, for ſuch as paſſed theſe præcipitous places could not be hid. When therefore he had the way clearly diſcovered by Domninus his paſſing below in the ſame Tract, both over the Mountainous and Fenny places, there being no Enemy to oppoſe him, he eaſily got over into Italy, and none interpoſing, led his Army towards Aquileia. Valentinian with ſo ſudden a thing ſurpriſed, ſeemed to caſt away all Hope; and his Miniſters feared that Maximus would get him alive into his power. Therefore he preſently took Ship, and Sailed to Theſſalonica, having with him in his Company his Mother Juſtina; who had been formerly the Wife of Magnentius, and after his death being very beautiful, Married to the Emperour Valentinian; and ſhe took along with her, her Daughter Galla. Being arrived at Theſſalonica, they ſent to Theodoſius to intreat him that now at laſt he would revenge the inſolent Injuries offered to all the Family of Valentinian.

Valentinian thereupon flies to Theſſalonica.

54. Thus much Zoſimus writes concerning the expedition of Maximus, and the care that Valentinian and thoſe about him had to prevent that Invaſion which they had ſo much reaſon to apprehend. But whereas he mentions their ſending Ambaſſadors before Domninus, he either knew not, or would not mention the Embaſſy of Ambroſe Biſhop of Milan; whom, though Juſtina an Arian in Religion had much perſecuted and termed a Tyrant, yet now ſhe had recourſe to him, knowing what ſucceſs his firſt meſſage had, when ſent to allay the fury of the Uſurper, the ſame year that he Murdered Gratian. He readily undertook the Imployment for preventing ſuch miſchief as was like to follow, and, as in an Epiſtle, wherein he gives to the Emperour an Account of his Negotiation, he writes, the day after his Arrival at Triers, in order to his Addreſs went to the Palace. There came forth to him an Eunuch and a Gall by Nation, the Præpoſitus Cubiculi; who when he demanded Audience, asked him if he had brought any Letters from the Emperour. He told him he had; to which he replied, that he could not be heard but in Conſiſtory. Ambroſe ſaid, that Prieſts were not wont to be ſo received, and that he had ſomething in Charge which he would gladly deliver to his Maſter alone: Hereupon he went in to him, but returned with the ſame anſwer that his former might be believed to be true. Ambroſe ſaid, that thoſe of his Function were not wont to be ſo treated; yet notwithſtanding he would condeſcend to any thing that ſhould conduce to the diſcharge of his Truſt, to the ſervice of him that ſent him, and to the reſtoring of Brotherly love. Maximus hereupon ſitting in Conſiſtory, Ambroſe was introduced; to whom he aroſe that he might give him the kiſs. But he without ſteping forward ſtood amongſt the Conſiſtorians, who bad him go up, and Maximus himſelf called to him: But inſtead of going, he asked him why he would offer to kiſs him, whom he would not own; for had he owned him for a Perſon of his Condition, he would not have received him in that place. Hereat ſaith he, Biſhop are you moved? Not, replied he, with the Injury; but with ſhame, that I ſtand in a place not proper to my Function; But quoth Maximus, in your former Embaſſy you came into the Conſiſtory. That was not my fault, he returned, but his that ſent for me. He asked him why he would then come in; and he replied, that then he came to ask Peace in behalf of an Inferiour; but now of an Equal. Who may he thank for that ſaith Maximus? Almighty God, ſaith Ambroſe, who hath preſerved to Valentinian that Kingdom which he gave him.

The Embaſſy of Ambroſe Biſhop of Milan.

Ep. 27. Vide Baron ad Ann. 387.

Diſcourſe betwixt him and Maximus.

55. At length the Tyrant broke out into Choler, and told him he had over-reached him as that fellow Bauto did, who under the pretence of ſerving the Intereſt of the Boy, deſigned to ſet up for himſelf, and ſent upon him the Barbarians; as if, ſaith he, I could not bring ſufficient Numbers of them into the Field, of whom ſo many Thouſands ſerve under me, and receive my Pay. But at what time you came to me, and held me back; who was there that could have withſtood me or my Power? Ambroſe mildly anſwered, that there was no cauſe why he ſhould be angry, and deſired him to hear what Return he could make. He acknowledged that therefore he was now come, becauſe in his former Embaſſy when he credited him, he ſaid he was deceived. For, this that he had done in behalf of the young Emperour, he no otherwiſe could look upon, but as tending to his own Reputation. For, whom ſaith he, ought Biſhops to defend more than the Fatherleſs? “ It being written, Judge the Fatherleſs, and plead for the Widdow; and again, the Judges of Widdows and Fathers of Orphans; yet will not I upbraid “ braid Valentinian with what I did for him. To ſpeak the truth, how did I ſo withſtand you, that you could not paſs into Italy? What Rocks did I caſt in your way? What Forces or Armies did I oppoſe? Or did I ſtop up the paſſages in the Alps with my Body? I wiſh I could ſay ſo; I would not fear your Accuſations, or Reproaches. With what promiſes did I abuſe you, to draw you into a Peace? Did not you ſend Count Victor to me near unto Moguntiacum in Gall to ask it? Wherein therefore did Valentinian deceive you, whom firſt you your ſelf asked the queſtion? wherein did Bauto, who but ſerved his Prince? Was it becauſe he did not betray his Maſter? How did I circumvent you, who at my firſt coming, when you demanded why Valentinian did not come to you as a Son to his Father; made Anſwer, that it was not to be imagined that a Child in the ſharp ſeaſon of winter ſhould travel with his Mother over the Alps, and without his Mother it was not fit he ſhould be put upon ſuch a Journey, eſpecially things ſtanding ſo doubtfully as they did. I told you that we came to treat of Peace, and had no Commiſſion to meddle with his Coming, which therefore I could not Ingage for: To this you returned, Let us ſtay then and ſee what Anſwer Victor brings, who while I was retained with you, went to Milan, and received a denial to what he propounded: they agreed there to treat of Peace not of the Emperours Coming, who by no means was to be removed. I was with you when Victor came back; How then did I put a ſtop to the Coming of Valentinian?

Eſay. 1. 17.

56. The Ambaſſadors, ſent again into Gall to declare he ſhould not come found me in that Country; and in my Return, I met with Soldiers of both Parties ſet to the Cuſtody of the Paſſages. What Armies of yours did I recall? What Troops did I draw back from Italy? or what Barbarians did Count Bauto ſend? And what great matter had it been if he had ſo done, when you threatned the Roman Empire with the Auxiliaries of the Barbarians, and Troops that came from beyond the Borders, whom the Province maintained; eſpecially he being born in the Parts beyond the Rhine? But conſider what difference there was betwixt your threatning humour, and the mildneſs of Valentinian the young Emperor. You required, that with an Army of Barbarians you might fall into Italy. He diverted the Huns and Alans as they were falling into Gall, and drew them back through the Coaſts of the Alamans. What great matter was it if Bauto ingaged Barbarians againſt ſuch as themſelves? For while you ſeize upon the Roman Forces, and he on both ſides is to look to himſelf, the Juthungi within the Bowels of the Empire waſte Rhætia, and therefore againſt the Juthungus the Hunn was to be expected. Yet becauſe he was troubleſom to Alamannia, and began to indanger Gall, he was conſtrained to quit his Triumphs, that you might have no apprehenſion of Fear. Compare now the Actions of both together. You are he that cauſed Rhætia to be haraſſed. And Valentinian with his own Gold purchaſed you Peace and Security. Behold him there that ſtands at your right Hand, whom Valentinian, when he might eaſily have vented his Sorrow and Indignation upon him, yet ſent back to you with reſpect. He had him then in his own Dominions, and even when the Meſſage of his Brothers death was brought him, reſtrained himſelf; neither did he return to you the like; or revenge himſelf upon him, who was far from being of the ſame Dignity with his Brother, but ſtands in the ſame relation unto you. Be you now Judge your ſelf, betwixt you both. He ſent you your Brother back alive: It were to be wiſhed you would reſtore to him the dead Body of his dear Relation. Why do you deny this to him, who did not deny to ſend you Succours againſt himſelf? But you are afraid that if you ſend the Body; at the ſight thereof the Souldiers may fall into paſſion: for this you allege. Do you think that him, whom yet living they deſerted, they would now defend, when he is ſlain? Why do you fear him that's dead, whom you ſlew when you might have preſerved him? You ſay you ſlew your Enemy. No. He was none of your Enemy; but you were his. He is not now ſenſible of any Defence to be made for him: make the Caſe fully your own. If any one ſhould now riſe up againſt your ſelf and uſurp; I pray, whether would you call your ſelf his Enemy, or him yours? I am miſtaken, if it be not the Uſurper that makes War, and the Emperor that defends himſelf. Do you then refuſe to give up the dead body of him you ought not to have ſlain? Let Valentinian the Emperor have the Remains of his Brother, which may abide as Hoſtages of Peace betwixt him and you, and of your ſecurity. How could you pretend that you gave no order to kill him, whom whom you forbid to be buried? Will any believe that you did not envy him “ his life, to whom you grudge the benefit of a Sepulchre?

Sect.4.

A.D. 387.

57. But I will forbear. I hear you complain that thoſe who are with Valentinian the Emperor, have rather betaken themſelves to the Emperor Theodoſius, “ than to you. Could you expect it ſhould happen otherwiſe, when you ſought to “ get them into your Hands to deſtroy them, whereas Theodoſius inriched them with “ Preſents, and preferred them? Hereat, ſaith he, whom have I killed? Ambroſe anſwered, Balio: and him that was ſo worthy a Perſon, ſo great a Souldier. Was this a juſt Excuſe for putting him death, becauſe he was faithful to his Prince? He replied, I did not command him to be put to death. Ambroſe added, but we heard you did; and to this he confeſſed, that if he had not killed himſelf he had ordered him to be carried to Cabillonum, and there to be burnt alive. This was then the Reaſon, ſaid the Biſhop, why it was believed that you ſlew him. But who can promiſe any ſecurity to himſelf, when ſo valiant a Warrior, ſo faithful a Souldier, ſo uſeful a Comes muſt be put to death? In concluſion, at parting, Maximus pretended that he would treat. But afterward when he found that Ambroſe abſtained from Communion with theſe Biſhops, that had joyned with him, and who had been for putting to death certain Hereticks (Priſcillianiſts he means) being incenſed by them he commanded him forthwith to be gone. And he very willingly complied with him herein, though moſt men believed that he could not eſcape thoſe that would be ſent to intrap him; and he began his journey, only ſorrowful to find that Hyginus an aged Biſhop was ſent into Exile, when he had nothing at all left him but his miſerable life. He took the pains to go to the Officers of the Tyrant, and to intreat for him, that an old man might not be hurried away without any Cloaths or ſo much as a Pillow to lye on; but while I interceded for him, ſaith he, I was hurried away my ſelf. This is the Account of mine Embaſſy. Emperor farewel and ſecure your ſelf more ſtrongly againſt a man, who endeavours to cover and conceal an intended War under the ſpecious vizard of a Peace. Thus much Ambroſe himſelf declares concerning what paſſed betwixt the Tyrant and him, and it's very remarkable for ſeveral circumſtances, which elſe never would have been made known.

Maximus commands him to be gone.

58. His Advice to Valentinian at the cloſe of his Relation was good, if he had had the happineſs to follow it; but inſtead of that, thinking by fair words to perſwade him, he ſent, it ſeems, Domninus to him, who being deceived by his hypocritical carriage became a Leader or Directer of his Forces into Italy; and thereupon followed the flight of Valentinian and his Relations to Theſſalonica. Thence when Theodoſius had received their meſſage, Zoſimus tells you that he was amazed at the News, began a little to forget his extravagant Luxury, and remit ſomething of his ſenſeleſs proſecution of Voluptuouſneſs. A Council being held, it was reſolved that he and certain of the Senate ſhould remove to Theſſalonica, which being done, upon a new Conſultation it was agreed, that the Villanies of Maximus ſhould be puniſhed. For by no means that man was to be ſpared any longer who had murdered Gratian, uſurped his Authority, and proceeding in ſuch courſes had now deprived his Brother of that Dominion, which had been left him. Theodoſius with theſe things was offended; but by reaſon of his natural Effeminacy, and that Sluggiſhneſs which he had all his life-time been guilty of, was ſlow in his preparations for the War, alleaging thoſe miſchiefs which are wont to happen in civil Broils, and ſhewing that whatever the Succeſs ſhould prove, yet the Commonwealth thereby muſt grievouſly ſuffer. He ſaid, that Maximus was firſt to be ſent to; and if he could be prevailed with to reſtore the Empire to Valentinian, and imbrace Quiet and Repoſe, then was the Empire to be divided amongſt them all, after the antient manner; but in caſe he refuſed, and was governed by his rapacious Appetite, the War was to be proſecuted without delay. And of the Senators none there was that durſt move any thing in oppoſition to what he ſaid. But Juſtina, being an experienced woman in the Affairs of the World, and ſagacious enough in what concerned her Intereſt, knowing ſufficiently how Theodoſius was addicted to love-matters, brought Galla her beautiful Daughter before him, and falling at his feet, humbly beſought him not to ſuffer to paſs unrevenged the death of Gratian, who had conferred the Emperial Dignity upon him, nor ſuffer her and her Children to lye deſtitute and forlorn in this ſad Condition. With that ſhe produces her Daughter weeping amain and bewailing her fortune. By theſe Sights Theodoſius could not but be exceedingly moved; eſpecially at the Beauty of the Girl, and he ſufficiently betrayed his inward Thoughts; yet did he defer what

P. 768.

Theodoſius removes to Theſſalonica.

Sect. 4.

A.D. 387.

what was to be done, and put them off at the preſent with this Anſwer, that they ſhould be of good courage. But his love increaſing every day more and more towards the Lady, he had a conference with Juſtina, and deſired her Daughter in Marriage, Placilla or Flaccilla (for ſo the Romans called her) his firſt Wife being already dead. She granted his Requeſt; but upon no other terms, than that he ſhould make War againſt Maximus, revenge the Death of Gratian, and reſtore to Valentinian the Empire which had deſcended to him from his Father. He accepted of the Conditions; thereby obtained Galla for his Wife, and ſet himſelf all manner of ways to provide for the War.

Prepares for War.

A.D. 388. Theod. Aug. 2. & Cynegio Coſs.

59. So paſſed over this year; and the following, being the CCCLXXXVIII. of our Lord, had for Conſuls Theodoſius Auguſtus the ſecond time, and Cynegius: it was the firſt Indiction, and the thirteenth year of Valentinian. Theodoſius having left his Son Arcadius at Conſtantinople, was come (as we ſaid) to Theſſalonica. Now Zoſimus further acquaints you, that, being thereto moved by the Woman, he procured the good affections of the Souldiers, by increaſing their Pay; and now being taught by experience, he ſo far corrected his former ſloth, that he fell upon the practice of ſome things, which, after his departure, would have great influence into his Affairs. Cynegius his Præfectus Prætorio, dying in his Journey from Egypt, when he conſidered whom to put in his place, and had thought upon diverſe Perſons, at length he found a man fit for this Charge, one Tatianus, whom he ſent for from Aquileia, a Perſon in all reſpects, of ſingular virtue: and having ordered him the Enſigns of Magiſtracy, he made his Son Proculus alſo Prætor of the City. In this matter Zoſimus is ſo extravagant as to commend him, ſaying, he did well in beſtowing theſe places upon ſuch Perſons as would in his Abſence ſufficiently provide for the good of the Subject. The Command of his Foot he gave to Promotus; and that of the Horſe to Timaſius; and when now all things ſeemed ready for the expedition, a rumour was brought that the Barbarians, in conjunction with the Roman Legions, by great promiſes were urged by Maximus to revolt. But ſo timely knowledge he had of it, that they having notice of his Intelligence, betook themſelves into the Fenns and Lakes in Macedonia, and hid themſelves in the Fortreſſes thereof. Yet were ſome ſent to hunt them out, who by one means or other brought them to deſtruction for the moſt part; ſo that the Emperor delivered from his Fears as to this matter, ſet himſelf for his expedition. Before we bring him from Theſſalonica, it will not be amiſs to relate how the Laws confirm what the general current of Hiſtorians affirms concerning his removal to this City. By ſeveral Subſcriptions we find him there this year in the Months of March and April, at what time, while his Armies were bringing into Order, he enacted ſomething for reformation of Abuſes in Eccleſiaſtical and Civil matters. He received information of the cruel practices of the greater ſort of Citizens of Alexandria, who being naturally very prone to raiſe Seditions and tumults, were alſo tyrannical towards their Neighbours, if inferiors to them, ſo as they would often apprehend and even dare to keep them Priſoners without any Authority intervening. Now, for as much as the Right of having a Priſon is a Royalty not lightly communicable to other perſons, Theodoſius declares, that whoever for the time to come ſhall detain any accuſed perſon in a private Priſon, ſhall be guilty of no leſs than the crime of Treaſon.

L. Un. de privati Carceris cuſtodia. Cod. Th. lib. 9. tit. 11. Dat. Cynegio prid. Kal. Maii. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

60. He committed Juſtina, with her Son and Daughter, to ſuch as ſhould ſafely convey them to Rome, being verily perſwaded that the Romans, who hated Maximus, would gladly receive them; reſolving himſelf, through the upper Pannonia and the Appennine Mountains to march for Aquileia, and fall upon the ſecure and heedleſs Enemy. So writes Zoſimus, and accordingly by certain Reſcripts we find him at Stobæ and Scupæ, places of Macedonia, in the month of June. At the later, he received a complaint how the Curiales of ſeveral Towns or Manſions in Bithynia, had by running away withdrawn themſelves from theſe ſervices which were due from them to the Courts, particularly thoſe of Claudiopolis, Pruſias, Tottaium and Voris. “He commands that by Edicts they be cited to return to their ſeveral Habitations and Charges: and in caſe of default, he injoyns “ Tatianus, who by this time had ſucceeded Cynegius in the Prefectſhip of the Eaſt, “ that out of other fit and convenient Bodies, and eſpecially out of the number “ of his Officials or Apparitors, who had well diſcharged their Offices, fit Perſons ſhould be choſen and put not only into the Places, but alſo Eſtates of theſe Fu- “ gitives, who undergoing their burthens ſhould alſo, the better to bear them, in- “ joy their Patrimonies, of which the former owners ſhould for ever be deprived “

He makes towards Aquileia.

L. 119. de Decurionibus Cod. Th. Dat. 11. Kal. Scupis. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt. utpote temporaria & localis.

being

Sect.4. A.D. 388.

being made incapable of returning. Of theſe places of Bithynia the two former, viz. Claudiopolis and Pruſias (formerly known by the name of Cius) were Towns; and the two later, viz. Tottaium and Voris were Manſions, the firſt having been but a Mutation in the days of Conſtantine and Conſtantius; but afterwards altered to a Manſion, as appears by the Itinerary Tables. Hence it ſufficiently appears, that there were Curiales or Decuriones, as we formerly hinted, not only in Cities and Towns but alſo in the greater Manſions, ſuch as this Tottaium was: in like manner as in the greater ſort of Manſions ſome Biſhops had their Seats, as in the Council of Chalcedon, mention is made of Helpidius, Biſhop of the Manſion, called Termenſis. Not this Edict alone being directed to Tatianus; but five more concerning this Subject of Corporations; and ſeveral Epiſtles being alſo written to him by Libanius; from all of theſe it appears, that he was much inclined to favour the common Intereſts of the Curiæ.

Zoſimus p. 770.

61. But, to proſecute the Expedition of Theodoſius, He, as we ſaid, reſolved to paſs the upper Pannonia, and the Appennines towards Aquileia. Maximus as ſoon as he could underſtand that Juſtina and her Children deſigned to croſs the Ionian Gulf, ſent, to intercept her, if poſſible, Andragathius with ſome Pinnaces, or other light Veſſels; who, though he uſed his utmoſt Endeavour to ſend theſe perſons after Gratian, yet miſſed his Purpoſe, they having got over before his arrival; which perceiving, he ſtrengthned himſelf with the acceſſion of many Ships, believing Theodoſius intended to make War by conveying his Forces over the Sea. But he proſecuted his Journey towards Pannonia and the Streights of the Appennines, fell upon Maximus his men, when they leaſt of all expected it, and were ſufficiently ſecure as to their condition, as they Imagined. For after the Tyrant had ſeized on Aquileia, not only all Italy but Africk alſo fell off to him, Sigonius well obſerving that our Gildas writes how he extended one of his Wings to Spain and the other to Italy; and ſetling the Throne of his Dominion at Triers, raged with ſo great madneſs, that one of the Emperors he expelled from Rome, and another out of the World it ſelf. But of all other Italians, thoſe of Bononia teſtified moſt their Reſpect to, or their Fear of, him, erecting a Pillar, which in Sigonius his time, was ſtill to be ſeen at the diſtance of a mile from the City, whereon was this Inſcription, To our great Lords, C. Maximus and Fl. Victor, Pious, Happy, always Auguſti, born for the good of the Commonwealth. Having ſecured, as he thought, Italy and Africk he ſet himſelf wholly to ſcrape up moneys for the as right maintenance of what he had ſo juſtly got. But hearing of Theodoſius his preparations, or ſuſpecting them, ſome ſay he paſſed over the Julian Alpes into Pannonia, and having taken and fortified Petovio, proceeded to the River Savus, where he ſeized on Sciſcida and there ſate down. Theodoſius having notice that there he had ſeated himſelf, haſted through Macedonia, and incamping upon the Savus, when he ſaw a fit opportunity paſſed the River, and offered him Battel, which he refuſed not to accept, but came out of the Town. Theodoſius his men received him ſo warmly, and fought with ſuch courage, that his Souldiers would not ſtand before them, but fled, of whom ſuch as ran to Sciſcia, either filled the Ditches with their dead Bodies, or ran upon the ſharp Stakes ſet upon the Walls, or ſtopped up with their Carkaſſes the Gates which they had opened at their breaking forth: as for ſuch of them as the greatneſs of the River intercepted, they trembling and imbracing one another, caſt themſelves from the Precipices into the water, and there periſhed; amongſt whom was the Standard-bearer of the Expedition, whoſe body could not be found.

De Occid. Imperio. lib. 9. p. 206.

Defeats Maximus at Sciſcia.

62. Theodoſius having obtained this Victory, removed to Petovio, where Marcellinus the Brother of Maximus, oppoſed himſelf againſt him. He put his men into order of Battel; yet the day being far ſpent, thought not fit then to ſet upon him, but in the morning following he gave him Battel, and that with no worſe Succeſs than formerly. For, the Enemy was put to flight, ſuch as eſcaped the Sword, taking into the adjoyning Woods, under the coverture of the Night. Many came with their Colours, and caſting them and themſelves at the Feet of the Emperor begged Pardon, whom he kindly received. But, Maximus thus twice defeated betook himſelf to his Heels, and with great ſpeed came to Aquileia, whom Theodoſius followed well nigh with as much haſte. Hæmona the firſt City at the root of the Alps, as one enters Italy, yielded to him; the Inhabitants thereof iſſuing forth to meet him in a Triumphant manner, for being delivered by his preſence from the Seige, which Maximus had laid unto them. They came out Dancing, and with Muſick of ſeveral ſorts. The Nobility or Chief of the Town appeared before the Gates, the Senators in their Habit, the Flamines in their Municipal Purple, the Prieſts in their Caps; the Gates were ſet with Garlands, the

And his Brother Marcellinus at Petovio.

Pacatus in Panegyric. c. 37.

Streets

Sect.4.

A.D. 388.

Follows Maximus to Aquileia.

Who is delivered up by his men.

And put to death.

Streets adorned with the choiſeſt Hangings, and the light of the day was increaſed by the Fires that were kindled, ſo that Theodoſius ſeemed already to triumph, before he had compleated the War. But being intent upon this, he followed Maximus ſo cloſe at the Heels, that by a great and ſore March, he reached Aquileia in one day, and as ſoon as there arrived laid ſeige to the City. Maximus perceiving how unable he was to endure the ſhock, deſpaired of making reſiſtance, and in a manner ſeemed to quit that power which he had ſo Tyrannically uſurped; which his men perceiving, to provide for themſelves before the taking of the place, they laid Hands on him as he was deſtributing Money amongſt them, and being deſpoiled of the Imperial Ornaments, led him bound to Theodoſius. He, when he ſaw him, demanded with what confidence he could enter upon the Civil War, to which he anſwered, that he pretended he had his conſent and favour in his Uſurpation; for except he had feigned himſelf adviſed thereto by him, he could never have drawn the Souldiers to his party. Hereat Theodoſius was angry, yet did not condemn him to any cruel puniſhment; but holding down his Head and bluſhing, on the contrary, uttered words full of mercy towards ſo horrible an Offendor. But when thoſe about him perceived it, they took away Maximus out of his ſight, and at three miles diſtance from the City, cut off his Head, towards the later end of Auguſt; though as to the very day there be ſome difference amongſt the Writers of the ſtory.

Zoſimus his malice to Theodoſius in this Story.

The Favourable Account given by Pacatus the Panegyriſt.

Jus feciale violare.

63. Such was the deſerved end of Maximus, even as Zoſimus obſerves, who, though he tell the ſubſtance of the Story right, yet can let no action of Theodoſius paſs without fixing ſomething to it that may hurt, at leaſt, his Fame and Reputation. Though he can inſtance in no Act which might denominate him ſo debauched, effeminate and ſluggiſh as he makes him, nor could hope, that, his Wars and many Atchievements conſidered, he could make his Reader believe, he was wholly given up to Idleneſs; yet he will leſſen his valiant performances as much as poſſible; and becauſe the End and the Deſign gives the ſtamp to any Moral Action, he would have it believed that not any noble motive provoked him to undertake the War againſt the Tyrant, not any kindneſs or compaſſion towards Valentinian; but kindneſs to his Siſter Galla, and compaſſion toward himſelf; he being ſo deſperately inamoured of her, that to allay his paſſion and quiet his reſtleſs Appetite, he condeſcended to the Expedition, and was content to raiſe one Civil War to ſuppreſs another more inteſtine, to kindle one flame that he might quench another more deſtructive to himſelf. But it happens ſo unluckily for Zoſimus his purpoſe, that Marcellinus, a Chronologer of theſe times placeth the Mariage of Theodoſius and Galla in the preceding year, and all other Hiſtorians of this Age attribute it to the goodneſs of his Nature, and kindneſs to Valentinian, from whom, after he had recovered his Empire, for him he took nothing, but left it intire to him, as at the firſt. If we may hear what Pacatus the Panegyriſt ſaith of this performance, the motive and the manner of it (and why not a Friend as well as an Enemy?) We ſhall have far other thoughts of the Temper and Diſpoſition of this Prince. He having declared what miſchiefs befell his Country of Gall, from the Cruelty and Rapacity of the Tyrant, adds, “That at length God was pleaſed to look upon them, and being intent upon the good of the Eaſt, to think of their miſeries, and to ſtrike this Villain with madneſs, ſo that he broke the League, violated the Law of Arms, and feared not to denounce a War. Can I, ſaith he, imagine it came but by Providence, that he who might have cunningly diſſembled under the name of Peace, and by lying quiet might have eſcaped the puniſhment of his former wickedneſs, ſhould erect a ſecond and third Standard of civil robbery, and having paſſed the Cottian Alps, open alſo the Streights of the Julian, and impoſe upon you, O Emperor, though you were true to the Faith you had given him of pardoning what was paſt, a neceſſity of overcoming him? The Commonwealth whoſe Avenger was now at Hand drove him headlong; and its Lord, who had been openly murdered, now required ſatisfaction by his puniſhment. It was not Confidence but Madneſs, not Raſhneſs, but a kind of Neceſſity ariſing from that madneſs: neither did he provoke you by War, but could not any longer refuſe to ſubmit to Juſtice.

64. How could he otherwiſe, have been ſo audacious, that, being ſo ſluggiſh and fearful of death as he was, he ſhould ruſh upon the Sword and meet it in the face? He, who when he was even overcome, had not the courage to kill himſelf? And you, truly, for aſſerting the Intereſt of the Commonwealth, and obtaining the victory, needed not but to have come alone to the War. For, if in old

Sect.4. A.D. 388.

old time, when Lords (he means the Scythians) were to fight with their Slaves “ went againſt them furniſhed with no other weapons than Whips in their Hands, “ and ſo great was the force and power of Conſcience, that thoſe that were armed “ at all convenient points, were overthrown by them that were naked, and “ ſuch as offered at firſt their breaſts to wounds, at length ſubjected their backs “ to Scourges; why then might not you, meerly by ſhowing your ſelf have put “ an end to the Controverſie, without the Legions? Then, after a compariſon made betwixt the Nobility and Baſeneſs, the Virtue and Flagitious Wickedneſs of the Prince and Tyrant; he further tells him, “ That though he had ſuch an Adverſary to deal with, and came down not ſo much to fight with an Enemy, as to bring a “ Rogue to his deſerved puniſhment, yet he had gone as adviſedly to work, as if “ he had had to do with ſome Perſeus, Pyrrhus or Hannibal himſelf. For in the firſt “ place he had ſecured the fidelity of thoſe Kings who lay upon the Eaſtern Borders, “ by a new League on both ſides confirmed; that, being ſecure from abroad, he “ might leave nothing in a dubious poſture at home. In the next, he divided his “ Forces into three parts, the better to make the Enemy ſenſible of his Danger, “ and to prevent his flight. In the laſt, to ſuch Nations of the Barbarians as voluntarily “ offered their aſſiſtance, and vowed to ſtand by him, he committed the “ work of fellow-ſouldiers, thereby to draw them off from the Borders, where they “ were moſt ſuſpected; and to procure Supplies for his Army: This Condeſcention “ once known, all the Scythians flocked out in ſuch Swarms, that he might ſeem to “ have enjoyned that Raiſing of men to the Barbarians, which he had remitted to “ his own ſubjects. Now did the Enemy of the Romans march under the Roman “ Captains and Enſigns, and followed thoſe Standards which formerly he had ſtood “ againſt: Now did the Souldier fill thoſe Gariſons of Pannonia which he had formerly “ diſmantled. The Goth, the Hunn and Alan anſwered to his Name, ſtood “ Sentinel in his Turn, and was afraid to be abſent when he was called. From the “ Barbarians themſelves now proceeded no tumult, no confuſion or plundering; for “ if Proviſions were ſcant they patiently endured it; and though Corn, through “ their numbers was rightly judged to be defective, yet by their parſimony they “ rendred it abundant; requiring no other Wages or Reward, but that they might “ be eſteemed and called Yours. How great is that Ambition which proceeds from “ Virtue. You received a kindneſs, but ſuch an one, in ſuch a manner, and with ſuch a Deſign, that you might acknowledge that you had received it.

65. After many other things ſpoken ingeniouſly in a Panegyrical way, of which we ſhall here take no notice, in commending the goodneſs of Theodoſius his diſpoſition, and the Clemency of his nature, he preſſeth ſomething that we muſt needs obſerve, viz. his ſo noble uſing of the Victory. “ He denies not but that the effects “ of his valour might be by the Pencils of Artificers, commended to the eyes “ of poſterity, as, his Paſſing the tops of the Alps, Swiming over the Rivers, or “ Overthrowing his Enemies in Battel: the deſcription of theſe Atchievements “ might be effected both by Painters and Statuaries. But in what Air, with what “ Colours, in what Braſs or Gold ſhall theſe Lines be drawn, he demands, whereby “ the Emperor muſt be deſcribed ſo far a Victor of Victory it ſelf, that together “ with his Arms he laid aſide all diſpleaſure; inſomuch that not after the War, no “ not after Maximus any were puniſhed. For, excepting a few Moors, which, as “ an Infernal Troop, he now about to dye, had ſhut up with himſelf, and two or “ three which as ſo many Fencers of this furious Gladiator were ſlain, to expiate the “ Offence, Pardon was granted to all others whatſoever, and an Amneſty ſecured them “ as it were in a Mothers Lap: the Eſtates of none were ſet to Sale, no man was deprived “ of his Liberty; no not ſo much as degraded from any Honour he formerly “ had enjoyed. Not any mark or diſtinction was ſet upon any man, not one reproached “ or reprehended, ſuffered any puniſhment as much as by hearing one unacceptable “ word. All Perſons were reſtored to their Houſes, all to their Wives, “ and (what is more contenting) all to their Innocence. He bids the Emperor “ conſider what he had procured by this clemency, viz. that he being Conqueror “ no man eſteemed himſelf conquered. And he tells Rome, that ſhe from her ſeven “ Hills beheld this, and though high before in her ſevenfold munitions, yet at “ this ſight was more elevated by Joy: ſhe which formerly had experimented the “ furies of Cynna, the cruelty of Marius after baniſhment; had felt the felicity of “ Sulla in her own overthrows, and the mercies of Cæſar to ſuch as were already “ dead; ſhe that trembled at the noiſe of every triumph which ſounded to civil “ diſcords; which, beſides the ſlaughter of Souldiers, that ſhe loſt as well on the “ one ſide as the other, at home had ſeen the eyes, as it were, of her Senate put out, “ the heads of her Conſuls fixed on Poles, her Cato's conſtreined to die, her Cicero's be- “ headed and mangled, and had wept, as at all theſe Sights, ſo to ſee her Pompey's lie “ unburied; ſhe to whom the fury of her divided Citizens had wrought more inju- “ ry than the Carthaginian at the Gates, or the Gall received within the Walls; to “ whom Æmathia had been more deadly than the Allian Day, Collina more dire- “ ful than Cannæ, having left in her ſo deep Scarrs, that ſhe, who ever felt her own va- “ lour more heavy upon her than that of others, feared nothing ſo much as her own “ ſelf. But ſhe now had ſeen a Civil War ended with the ſlaughter of her Enemies, “ peace to the Soldiers, the recovery of Italy, and with her own liberty. In Conclu- “ ſion, ſhe had ſeen ſuch a Civil War brought to Concluſion, as to which ſhe might “ juſtly decree a triumph. This Pacatus uttered, being at Rome, whither Theodoſius “ went ſhortly after the Victory, as we ſhall ſee anon.

66. To what he ſaith, in reference to breaking the League and the Law of Nations, We may add what St. Ambroſe relates concerning the falſeneſs of Maximus to Valentinian, whom he adviſed not to truſt him; for that he concealed but war in a Cover of Peace. And we may alſo take in what Socrates writes, that Maximus ſent Ambaſſadors to Theodoſius; but he neither admitted nor rejected them, and yet grieved to ſee the Empire of the Romans oppreſſed with Tyranny under the Vizard of an Imperial Title, but at his going to Theſſalonica neither made Show of being on the one ſide nor the other: yet gathering a great power of Men together, he haſtened to Milan, at which City Maximus was before arrived. But as Maximus broke the League, it cannot be laid to the Charge of Theodoſius, that he did ſo with him. For as it muſt not be denied, that he yielded him the Title of Emperour, and admitted of the Erection of his Statues, ſo it is to be taken for granted that Valentinian the young Prince was comprized in the Agreement, for whoſe ſake Theodoſius was glad to bear with the Tyrant that he might not, having ſuch Advantages, make Uſe of them and ſwallow him up. And yet he could not but be aware of his Ambitious Deſignes, and diſcover more of his Temper; and if he, as Zoſimus ſays, provided for management of a War againſt him, the Sequel ſhewed that his Fears That he would renew his Parricide and Uſurpation upon the other Brother; were but too well grounded. For his Calmeneſs and Clemency in uſing his good Fortune moderately, St. Ambroſe in a few words, as one obſerves, comprizeth many things; when he ſaith that the very Daughters of his Enemy he had recalled out of Confinement, and committed “ to a kinſman of theirs to be maintained; and to his mother had ſent mony out of “ his own Purſe: moreover at the Interceſſion of the ſaid Biſhop, he had delive- “ red many from Exile; many out of Priſon; and many from the imminent dan- “ ger of Death. And herein further appears his Chriſtian Abſtinence and moderation, that having by deſtruction of the Tyrant, not only freed Italy, which was the portion of Valentinian; but moreover recovered Gall, Spain, and Brittain, which he had ſeized and held ever ſince the Death of Gratian, yet did he not touch theſe Provinces ſo as to pretend to any Sovereignty to them by way of Conqueſt; no not ſo much as to divide them betwixt Valentinian and himſelf; but quitted and relinquiſhed them to him, having ſtaid ſo long in theſe parts till he could reſetle his Intereſt and reduce all things into their former methods.

L. 5. c. 12.

How Pacatus is to be underſtood.

67. But whereas Pacatus ſpeaks of Theodoſius his degrading none for their former Honours, it muſt not be underſtood as if he confirmed what ever Maximus had pretended to do in the Advancement of any to dignities under himſelf during his Uſurpation; but of ſuch as had in former times been received. For it had been a notable Incouragement to Rebellion and Uſurpation, had the Rewards of joyning in Treaſon, granted to his fellow Rebels by the Uſurper, been confirmed afterward by the Conquering and lawful Prince. So far was Theodoſius from tranſgreſſing the right Rules of true Government in this kind, that having ſubdued Maximus, on the two and twentieth of October he gave out an Edict at Aquileia, forbidding that any ſhould dare to aſſume to himſelf any Honour, “ which the Audaciouſneſs of the Tyrant had granted; but that ſuch preſumption “ ſhould be recalled to its former Condition. And becauſe, for partiality, and out of Faction many doubtleſs had been oppreſſed, as well loyal Subjects ruined, as Traitors preferred, upon ſuch a Turn in the Common-wealth, by another Law dated at Milan (whither he removed ſhortly after) on the tenth of October, he commands that all ſuch deſigned and injurious Judgments be revoked, as had been “ promulgated by him, whom he termes Infandiſſimus Tyrannorum. Theſe Laws “ concerned

L. 6. de infirmandis his quæ ſub Tyrannis. Cod. Th.

L. 7. ejuſd. tit.

Sect. 4.

A.D. 388.

L. 8. ejuſd. tit.

concerned Italy where they were made, and that we may ſpeak to this matter all at once, as he directed them to Trifolius Præfect of Italy; ſo on the fourteenth of January following, he inſcribed another Conſtitution to Conſtantianus the Præfect of Gall, whereby he alſo ordains, that all, who being promoted through the “ Uſurpation of the Tyrant, had received the unlawful Title of any Dignity, “ ſhall produce and give in all ſuch Letters or Codicils. Moreover, all ſuch “ Sentences and Decrees of thoſe, who never having been Lawful Judges could “ not juſtly pronounce, he commands to be aboliſhed and taken from amongſt “ the Records, that their Authority being nulled, none may offer to rely upon “ them, which time had obliterated with their Author. He excepts only ſuch “ matters as had been tranſacted by agreement and Conſent of the parties, provided “ no fraud or Conſtraint in them appeared. And to theſe he adds, Donations, “ Emancipations, and Manumiſſions, in all which, he ſaith, it was ſufficient “ to have willed them. But this was after the death of Victor, a Boy, the ſon “ of Maximus, to whom he had given the Title of Auguſtus, and left him at “ Triers, to the Charge and Defence of Nannienus and Quintinus the Magiſtri Militum; of whoſe Carriage in Gall during the late Revolutions in Italy, ſomething here is to be added.

Motions in in Gall during the late Revolutions in Italy.

Sigonius de Occid. Imperio. lib. 9.

68. While Maximus lay beſieged within Aquileia, the Francks under the leading of Genobald, Marcomere and Suno paſſed over the Rhine, and invaded the lower Germany; many perſons they ſlew, and waſting the fertile Country adjoyning, ſtruck great terror alſo into Colein. Nannienus and Quintinus, to whom Maximus had committed the Care of the Country, as well as his Son, hearing of their Motions, marched preſently with an Army to Colein, where they found that ſuch as were loaded with Booty, had repaſſed the Rhine, into their own Country, and the reſt were ſtill in the Roman Territories. and had renewed their Depredations. On theſe Rovers they fell, at a place called Carbonaria, and deſtroyed moſt of them, and then was it debated betwixt the two Generals, whether they ſhould invade France. Nannienus was utterly againſt it, and returned to Maguntiacum, but Quintinus with his Forces, paſſed the River at a Caſtle called Niviſium; where Coaſting down by the Rivers ſide he found many Villages and poor ſtragling Houſes void of Inhabitants; for the People pretending Flight, had betaken themſelves into more remote Woods and Fenns, having ſtopped up the Paſſages, as they would have it believed, with the trunks of trees. Quintinus having burnt all the Houſes, kept his Men in Arms all the Night, and then by break of Day, paſſing into the Wood, wandred about, and intangled himſelf in the Thickets, and By-ways till Noon, and had opportunity enough to view the ſeveral Quarters thereof. But he found them, to his ſmall Contentment, Fortified with ſtrong Hedges and Fences on every ſide; and therefore was forced to get out into the Champion adjoyning to the Woods. Endeavouring to do this, the Enemy appeared, though in no great Numbers, on the Boughes or Bodies of Trees joyned together, and as from ſo many Turrets annoied his Men with ſhowers of Arrowes, envenomed with the deadly Juice of Herbs; ſo that though they did but pierce the Skin without violating any principal part, yet the Wounds proved mortal. The Numbers of the Francks increaſing ſo, that the Army was beſet with them, it got out into the Plains, and that with great contentment, though the Enemy on deſign had left them free to their Acceſs. But the Horſe gladly making Uſe of the Advantage they had of firſt eſcaping, as they imagined, found only a ſwifter paſſage out of the World, being ſwallowed up in the Bogs; wherein the Bodies of Men and Horſes together, intangled, and ſunk one another, by their Strugling. The Foot having ventured far enough to find the place impaſſable, retired into the Woods in a trembling Poſture. The whole Party being thus diſordered and defeated, Heraclius the Tribune of the Joviani, and almoſt all others who had any Command, were Killed; and but few eſcaped by the obſcurity of the Night, and the Aſſiſtance that the Woods afforded.

Quintinus receives a Defeat in the Country of the Franks.

69. But Maximus the Tyrant being Slain, as we ſaid, Valentinian ſent Arbogaſtes his Magiſter Militum into Gall, for the ſuppreſſion of Victor his Son, and in the rooms of Nannienus and Quintinus, he put Carietto & Syrus. The Deſign was accompliſhed without any great Conteſt: For Victor in the firſt Attempt was defeated, taken, and ſlain. All Gallia was recovered to obedience, and Caryetto and Syrus, having nothing elſe to do, went and ſhowed themſelves with their Forces againſt the Francks on this ſide the Rhine. Newes hereof, Zoſimus tells us, Victor the Son of Maximus ſlain.

Sect.4.

A.D. 388.

us, coming to the Ears of Andragathius, who Cruiſed now with his Ships to and again upon the Ionian Bay, he knowing he was ſeverely to be Treated (for his Murdering Gratian) would not expect the coming of the Enemy, but puniſhed himſelf by leaping into the Sea, which he choſe to truſt, rather than his greateſt Adverſaries. And this Hiſtorian further is pleaſed to add, that Theodoſius delivered over to Valentinian all that Empire which had been held by his Father, which ſeemed congruous to thoſe good offices he had received from their Family. Such things as were Choice and poſſeſſed by the followers of Maximus he beſtowed amongſt his own Men: and permitted Valentinian to diſpoſe of the Affairs of Italy, Gall and other parts of his Empire, his Mother being preſent and aſſiſting him; ſupplying alſo what was defective in him, by reaſon of his Youth, with ſuch Prudence and Skill, as her Sex afforded her. Then talks he of Theodoſius his return to Theſſalonica, as if he preſently quitted the Weſtern parts and would not intermedle in the Settlement of what he had lately recovered; whereas he remained in theſe parts for three years, after the Overthrow of Maximus, or near thereabouts; and imployed moſt of his time in the right Eſtabliſhment of the Intereſt of theſe Quarters.

The Emperors command that Metals for making of Arms be paid in to the Forges in kind.

L. 2. de Fabricenſibus Cod. Th. lib. 10. tit. 22. & l. 1. Cod. Juſt. eod. Dat. 15. Cal. Nov.

70. Having had ſo much occaſion to make Uſe of Arms this year, and thereby to find what Inconvenience lay in the ordinary method of furniſhing them, the two Emperours now conſtantly lying together, concluded of a courſe of Reformation. And this was to diſcourage and diſown that Cuſtome which for ſome Reaſons in other times had been of force, whereby the Provincials, inſtead of other Metal, were permitted to find Money. The only deſign of the State was, to be furniſhed with convenient Weapons; but the Fabricenſes receiving money from the Provincials, who were to finde Metals for this purpoſe, ſatisfied themſelves with the Oare of ſuch Mines as were no whit proper, but which upon Tryal in the Forge, was wont to fly and break in pieces. Theodoſius therefore, and Valentinian, to prevent ſuch Frauds, Command that for the time to come in all “ Ages, it be held for a Law, that the Forges be ſerved in Specie and not in Money; “ and that out of the Noble Veins of the Earth; particularly in ſuch Metal “ as will readily Melt, and not lye and multiply, like Droſs, in the Fire. In like “ manner, ſeveral Emperours Commanded that Tributes ſhould be paid in kinde, though ſometimes other Princes, reaſon of State requiring, allowed of the taking of Money. In particular, the Inhabitants of the Mountain Taurus, by reaſon of the Excellency of the Iron which was found in their Territories, were obnoxious to this Collation. Becauſe this Law reſpects the Metal of Iron, therefore is it directed to Tatianus the Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt, the Tribute whereof belonged to his Cogniſance; whereas, had it properly related to the Forges, or the Management thereof, it had been directed to the Magiſter Officiorum.

A.D. 389. Timatio & Promoto Coſſ.

71. The year that next followed, was the CCCLXXXIX of our Lord, and had for Conſuls Fl. Timaſius and Fl. (for at this time Flavius was the General prænomen) Promotus for Conſuls: it was the fourteenth of Valentinian the ſecond, and the ſecond Indiction. Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt Tatianus ſtill continued; one Conſtantianus held that Office in Gall; and in Italy Trypholius: Albinus was Præfect of Rome, and Proculus the Son of Tatian, of Conſtantinople. After the Defeat of Maximus, the two Emperours made their abode at Milan till towards the beginning of June, where, beſides what they Enacted for repealing and nulling ſuch things as had been done by the Tyrant, they thought fit to make other Laws for the good Government of the State, and the promotion of Juſtice. Though they now reſided at Milan, yet Rome was in their Eye, whither ere long they reſolved to go; and very probable it is, that that City had been Faithful and Loyal to Valentinian, during the late Uſurpation, as far as the Nature of the Times would permit. For, being ſolicited in behalf of the Decuriæ or certain Colleges or Bodies belonging to it, He (or they) takes occaſion to declare, that he will ſuffer nothing to “ be loſt of any privilege or Indulgence granted to the Æternal City. But will ſo far “ maintain all its antient Privileges as to be ready to grant any new favours, if reaſon ſhall require it. In particular therefore, whereas the Decuriales of Rome were “ from old time wont to be ſupplied with two out of each City of the Province, he “ will for their Defence have the ſame Orders obſerved as were granted by himſelf “ or Predeceſſors. And if any one would pretend that the Perſon was not ſuch, as to “ whom ſuch privileges did belong, the matter ſhould be tried and decided before the “ Judg of the Decuria himſelf. As we have formerly ſaid, there were various Decu- “

Valentinian makes a Law in behalf of the Decuria of Rome.

L. 3. de Decuriis Urbis Romæ Cod. Th. lib. 14. tit. 1. Dat. ad Triſolium Pf. P. 14. Kal. Febr. Ejus pars maxima abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

riæ in Rome, as of the Librarii, Fiſcales and Cenſuales, and ſo alſo in the Cities and Municipia, as of Librarii and Scribes, who wrote for ſuch as were in Law, or upon other occaſions. But of thoſe of the (principal) Cities of Provinces, we find here, what no where elſe occurs, and that two were wont, and that of old time, to be ſent up to Rome, like as the Senate and other places of Repute and Truſt were Communicated to thoſe of the Provinces, either, that by virtue of this Communion betwixt City and Country, the People and Senate of Rome might have a juſt Account of what was done in the Provinces, or that the Provinces, when they came to Rome upon Buſineſs, might have ſuch as they could reſort to; or for both theſe Reaſons; in like manner as the Companies of Rome had their peculiar Defenſors, ſo had theſe their Judges in Caſe any denyed one of them to be a Decurialis, or would object any thing againſt the Immunities he enjoyed; but whether this Judg was to determine the matter Solely, or refer to the Court, to the Præfect of the City, or the Præfectus Prætorio, to whom the Law is directed, doth not evidently appear. However, had it not been for this Law, we had known nothing of theſe Particulars.

Theodoſius refuſes to take any thing given him in Codicills.

L. 2. de Teſtam. & Codicillis. Cod. Th. lib. 4. tit. 4. Dat. 10. Kal. Febr. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt. potiſſimâ ſuâ parte.

72. This may be more peculiarly aſcribed to Valentinian, becauſe directed to the Præfect of Italy; and for the like Reaſon, as well as for others, the next we find made in order of time, or but four days after, we muſt judg to have been Enacted by Theodoſius, though mutual aſſiſtance (eſpecially in the former) they might contribute each to other. By the antient Law of the Romans, the Emperours might be made Heirs, or have Legacies bequeathed them, as well as private Men, by Codicils or Letters, as well as Teſtaments. Nay, in ſome difficult times, Teſtators were glad, if not forced to do it. But whereas Princes were ſaid to be above the Laws, herein Theodoſius ſhewed an extraordinary Example of Humanity and Self-denyal, in that he refuſed the Benefit thereby allowed to other Perſons. By a Conſtitution directed to Proculus the Præfect of Conſtantinople, he declares that he will not admit any thing left to him, or his near Relations, by any Codicils “ or Epiſtles, though he will have the Right and Cuſtome to continue amongſt “ private Perſons; but leaves it to fall as it would have done to the Children or “ next Kindred of the Deceaſed. By his Relations, he doth not mean his Slaves or “ Freedmen, not his Friends as ſome have imagined, but his wife Galla, (not Flaccilla “ as Gothofred inſtanceth by miſtake, ſhe being now dead) his Daughters Galla and Placidia, and his two Sons Arcadius and Honorius. Now the Reaſon why he rejects any thing thus left by Fidecommiſſary Codicils or Letters, is, becauſe thoſe Inſtruments were leſs ſolemn, than were Teſtaments, and therefore Fraud might more eaſily be committed, It's true, the matter might be diſcovered by Torture, yet however, becauſe they were ſubject to Fraud, therefore he diſclaims all Benefit that might from them accrue to him or his. But where the Solemnity was greater and the certainty more clear, as in Teſtaments, there he rejects not what ſhould freely be given him by any. However, the goodneſs of Theodoſius was ſo remarkable herein, that Symmachus, of whom we have made ſo much mention, extols it to admiration, in an Epiſtle written to Flavianus his Brother, as he calls him, ſometime Præfectus Prætorio of Illyricum and Italy.

His Law in general, eſpecially this extolled by Symmachus.

Lib. 2. Ep. 13.

73. Having with my pen, ſaith he, ran through the Commendations which our Lord Theodoſius deſerves, both for his Government in War and Peace, (for I confeſs “ I have rather touched at them, than handled any particular according to its “ Importance) to the matters relating to Peace, I have added his Laws, which, as I “ know they have taken off all Admiration from ſuch as were Enacted before his “ time, ſo I do not think that they have left place for the like Reputation to any “ that ſhall be made after them. Eſpecially this new Sanction concerning Fidecommiſſa “, and the Profits ariſing from Codicills being for ever rejected by the beſt “ of Princes, ſo much in Renown exceeds the luſtre of what has been done before, “ as it is more Noble and Excellent for a Governour to lay a reſtraint upon himſelf “ than other perſons. And it's my Wiſh, that the Avarice of private men may underſtand “ the meaning of the Law-maker, and from his Laws frame good Manners “ to themſelves. For it's not to be doubted, what he would have other Perſons to “ do, who firſt of all abhorred thoſe profits which he knew to be ſuſpected. But I “ am afraid, that the Covetouſneſs of bad men, will think this profit that he has rejected “ to be for their own turne, and the Cauſe of Innocent Perſons will be rendred “ worſe, if thoſe only may have occaſion of fraud, who neither from Law “ nor Shame have any Reſtraint upon them. Therefore ſeeing that the Emperours “ themſelves are more tied up, let their condition work as a Legal Medicine upon “ the depraved Deſires of private men. Antient Conſtitutions, the vigour whereof“ fell with the Makers of them, are become of no efficay with guilty perſons.“ Therefore is ſo much ſeverity to be added as may ſuit and ballance the Increaſe of“ Naughtineſs. Otherwiſe if the greater Number receive no amendment, in vain“ doth the Emperour alone, whoſe Goodneſs and Integrity was always remarkable,“ bind himſelf to what is juſt by ſevere Decrees. Here Symmachus concerns himſelf“ for having the Subject to imitate the Goodneſs of the Prince. For though he binds himſelf by this Law, yet he leaves it free to others to receive any Emolument left them by theſe Codicills or Letters; yet ſo, that if there be any Controverſie moved concerning the truth and validity of the Writing, whether the Action be Criminal or Civil, (for either it might be) the Proof of the truth thereof ſhall lie upon him that produceth it, or is to receive benefit by it. Otherwiſe in Law the preſumption lies for the Writing, and he that Sues is to prove the Forgery; and if, in other Caſes, the Defendant be put to prove in a Suit of Forgery, yet is he not in the firſt place as here, or alone, to do it. But thus we ſee ſome Excellent Princes have not only been pleaſed to equal themſelves with their meaneſt Subjects, as to Privilege in Law, but even reſtrain and put ſtricter Obligations upon their own Perſons, and their neareſt Relations. In former times they challenged nothing due from an Imperfect Teſtament, nor by any naked Promiſe or raſh Offer, no more than private Perſons, Conſtantine affirms the Cauſes of private men to be of more Conſequence to him than the Defence of the Treaſury; ſomething ſuitable to what Pliny affirms, The Cauſe of the Exchequer never to be bad but under a good Prince. And Capitolinus writes of Marcus Antoninus, That he never favoured it in matters relating to Profit. Moreover Auguſtus, Tiberius and Adrian refuſed to take any thing by virtue of the Teſtament of an unknown Perſon. However, in ſuch Matters as theſe relating to good Government, the Prince is to conſult his Prudence as well as his goodneſs of Nature; for without Treaſure can be no diſcharge of publick Service. Where he may do it, it's his Duty to be Indulgent, the Safety and comfort of good People being the End of Government; but neceſſary Expences muſt be defrayed by lawful Means. Therefore we cannot but in Charity think Juſtinian governed by this ſentiment, and urged by the like occaſions, when he ſuppreſſed this Law, and approved and preferred ſuch former as allowed of the Prince his receiving Benefit by Codicills, and Epiſtles.

74. Valentinian not long after concerned himſelf in Eſtates, not left by Will, Codicill or Epiſtle; but ſuch as ſhould deſcend from an Inteſtate. By the ancient Law of the Romans, as well that of the twelve Tables as Prætorian, in Succeſſion no regard at all was had of the Cognati. For the Decemviri, and thoſe that came after them, being concerned for the Dignity and Propagation of Families, deſigned the Succeſſion to belong to thoſe alone who were of the ſame Stock and Houſe. Therefore Grandſons (as we call them) or Nephews by the Daughter, being not of the ſame Stock or Family, but Branches iſſuing from another Root, though by a Cien ingrafted, could not ſucceed their Mothers Father, but only their Father, or Grandfather, by the Fathers ſide, or other Anceſtor; in whoſe power they were till Emancipated. For the Daughter propagating only the Family into which ſhe married, and not that of her Father, her Children were excluded not only by the Sons and Daughters of the Deceaſed, but alſo by thoſe they called Agnati, which were Kindred by Perſons of the Maſculine Sex, as born together or Connate with the Father. Such were Sons of the ſame Father, their Uncle, or the Fathers Brother, the Sons of Brothers, and the like. After this manner was the Right of Repreſentation introduced, the Law admitting Nephews by the Son, with their Uncles and Aunts, to Succeſſion, for ſo much as their Father himſelf ſhould have been admitted to. But Valentinian conceiving the Nephews by Daughters to have too hard meaſure in this Point, now ordained, “ That in caſe a Man died and left Sons, and Nephews by a Daughter,“ theſe Nephews, if ſhe was dead, ſhould receive two Parts of three of ſo“ much as ſhe ſhould have received amongſt her Brothers; and the third ſhould fall“ to the Brothers and Siſters of her that was dead, being the Uncles and Aunts of“ the Nephews. But in caſe one ſo dying left no Sons, but only Nephews by a“ Daughter, and ſuch Agnati, or Kindred, as we formerly mentioned, which by“ the Old Law were preferred before ſuch Nephews; he ordains, That only a fourth“ part of the Inheritance ſhall go to ſuch Agnati, and the Nephews obtain the reſt.“ And what he thus Ordains concerning the Eſtate of a Grandfather by the Mother,“ he extends to that of a Grandmother either by the Fathers or the Mothers ſide;“ there being the ſame Equity and Reaſon, as he ſaith, except ſuch Nephews had“ been“

Valentinian concerns himſelf for the Succeſſion of Grandchildren by Daughters.

L. 4. Cod. Th. de legitimis hæreditat. Dat. 5. Kal. Mart. Mediol. & L. 9. Cod. Juſt. de ſuis & legitimis. Hinc à Triboniano mutilata. Vide Juſt. Inſtitut. de hæreditat. quæ ab Inteſtato. Sect. 15, & 16.

Sect.4.

A. D. 389.

Actio in officioſii Teſtamenti.

been diſhinherited by their Mother; for in ſuch Caſe being cut off from Succeſſion “ to their Mother, they were alſo cut off from any benefit they could have of Re- “ preſentation. But further, as by the Laws of the Romans, If Parents made their “ Wills, and either paſſed by their Children, or diſhinherited them without a Cauſe, “ notwithſtanding the Will, yet ſuch Children had their Action at Law, whereby “ they might recover their legal ſhare of the Inheritance; ſo in caſe theſe Nephews “ were paſſed by, by any of theſe their Relations, Grandfathers, or Grandmothers, “ in the ſame manner, he leaves them in the ſame way to proſecute their juſt “ Claims to their ſhares in their Eſtates, which they might recover by way of Repre- “ ſentation of their Mother: But if ſhe was either diſhinherited by her Parents “ juſtly, or they, her Children by her, then did the Right of Repreſentation fail; “ and to nothing could they Succeed. Such Proviſion did Valentinian make for “ thoſe for whom the Ancient Law did nothing provide, which though good in compariſon of their former Condition, yet ſtill ſeemed very ſcant, part of what fell to the Mothers ſhare being yet appropriated to others. Therefore in caſe the Grandfather deſigned them their entire ſhare, there was neceſſity for Codicills or a Teſtament to be drawn, to convey the Eſtate to them in a certain Forme. And Juſtinian afterward more inlarged the Right of theſe Nephews by the Daughter; firſt, by taking away all the Right of the Agnati their coming in for a tenth part; and afterwards by cutting off the Uncles and Aunts from their Share of what formerly they recovered of their Siſters part. Thus was that great Concern, which the Old Civil Law had for Families regulated and leſſened by the Conſciences of later Princes. But after the Laws of the Lombards, or thoſe we call Feudatary came to be in force in the Weſt; few are ſo little ſighted but may take notice, how Lands have been limited moſt commonly to the Eldeſt Son; or ſo as the Services due to the Lords might beſt be performed.

Theodoſius forbids any thing to be Exacted for good News.

Habe Tatiane K.N. B. L. ult. N. quid publicæ lætitiæ mentis &c. Cod. Th. Dat. 4. Kal. Maii. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

75. But by this time, not only the Noiſe of the Deſtruction of the Tyrant Maximus; but alſo of the Defeat and Death of his Son Victor, and the intire finiſhing of that Civil Diſſention, might arrive in the Eaſtern Parts of the Empire. Therefore Theodoſius, to prevent ſuch Abuſes as we formerly mentioned to have hapned upon the coming of ſuch Tidings, by an Edict ſent to Tatianus, renewed the Law he had formerly made, whereby he decreed, That nothing ſhould be Exacted from the Provincials in the way of Congratulation. By reaſon of Senators their too highly valuing themſelves, and eſteeming their Order too great to recieve any Aſſiſtance or Protection from Inferior Perſons, it came to be a Queſtion amonſt them at this time, whether to Pupills, and ſuch as were Adult, though under Age, of this Senatorian Rank, Tutors and Curators might be aſſigned from amongſt thoſe of Inferior Condition. Theodoſius was Conſulted and Concerned in the Matter, ſo far as to publiſh a Conſtitution for Determination and Settlement of it. “He Ordains for “ quieting of all Animoſities, That the Præfect of Conſtantinople (for to Proculus, “ the Son of Tatian, the Edict is directed) take to him Ten Senators for his Aſſi- “ ſtants, together with their Prætor called Prætor Tutelaris, (to whom belonged theſe Matters of Guardianſhip) and with them, their advice and Conſent concurring, appoint Tutors and Curators to them as he ſhould ſee cauſe. Indeed of Old Time it belonged to the Præfect of the City to aſſign theſe Guardians; but as in Old Time in certain Caſes the Prætor at Rome had Ten Men to aſſiſt him; and as the Prætor, aſſiſted by the major part of the Tribuni Plebis, who were Ten in Number, formerly diſcharged this Truſt, ſo Theodoſius thinks fit to add theſe Ten Perſons to the Præfect. And not only them, but the Prætor, called Prætor Tutelaris; for as in Old Time there was a Prætor, which eſpecially concerning himſelf about Liberty, (beſtowed on Slaves) had thence the Title of Prætor Liberalis; ſo alſo Marcus Antoninus the Emperour Inſtituted another, who from his Principal Charge of Tuitions and Curatorſhips, obtained that of Tutelaris; for it concerned the State as much that Perſons under Age ſhould be Protected, and their Eſtates ſecured; as that, by virtue of Manumiſſions, new Citizens ſhould be added to the Body Politick. But, as for ſuch as were by the Præfects, and theſe Perſons, to be aſſigned, to ſatisfie the Doubt thereupon, the Emperour declares, that they may be of any Order, ſo they be juſt and fit Perſons. For, Fidelity doth not depend upon Dignity, or Being of ſuch a Race or Stock, Honeſty and Integrity being often conſpicuous, nay ſometimes more in thoſe of leſſer quality. So that to a Boy of Senatorian Rank a Perſon of Equeſtrian Order, or a Plebeian, might be aſſigned Tutor; yet ſo as he excepted ſuch as were bound to the Services of Corporations, from being aſſigned Guardians to the Sons of Senators. In the laſt place, he ſo far inforces this Law, as only to have place, L. 3. de Tutoribus & Curatoribus creandis. Cod. Th. lib. 3. tit. 17. & L. 1. de Tutorib. vel Curatorib. Illuſtrium vel clariſſimarum perſonarum. Dat. 6. Kal. Jun. Mediol.

Ordains how Guardians ſhall be aſſigned to Youths of _Senatorian_ Degree.

Sect. 4.

A.D. 389.

Place, where no Guardians were aſſigned by Teſtament, or ſuch as by Law and of Courſe were to have the Charge, were wanting. And in other matters he leaves the Conditions and Eſtates of Minors to be Regulated and Ordered by the ancient Laws.

The Emperors reſtrain ſuch as ſeized upon Confiſcated Goods.

76. Now it's to be concluded, the Officers of the Revenue were buſie in Gall, in confiſcating the Eſtates of Maximus and his Followers. For, though Pacatus ſpeaks ſo much like a Panegyriſt, of the mildneſs ſhewed by Theodoſius after the Victory, and have the Fortunes and Eſtates of guilty Perſons were ſpared; yet is he not to be underſtood, as if there were no Confiſcation at all; for, beſides it would how been imprudent to leave ſo dreadful a Rebellion and Uſurpation altogether unpuniſhed, we are aſſured of proceedings in this way from the Contents of a Law publiſhed this year at Triers, on the fourteenth of June. Among the Goods belonging to the late Tyrant, his Son and Officers, were (as needs muſt be) found alſo ſuch as belonged to private perſons, which they had unjuſtly ſeized; and the Emperors were informed, that without any due Proceſs or Form obſerved, after publication made of the Eſtates of the Traitors, ſome private Perſons laid Hands upon ſeveral things they pretended to belong to themſelves, not ſtaying for any due Tryal or Sentence, but being their own Judges in the point. Hereof the Emperors ſhow an high and juſt Reſentment, and command that all “ things ſo ſeized ſhall, notwithſtanding, be appropriated by the Treaſury, in way “ of puniſhment of theſe Arrogant Perſons, who, when they might have had a “ fair Tryal, would not ſtay for Judgement, but deſpiſing that Victory, which “ Juſtice at length muſt have brought them, made choice rather of that Conqueſt “ which their own Audaciouſneſs objected to them. In caſe ſuch Perſons had “ Right on their ſide, yet in way of Puniſhment for their Impudence, they Ordain “ that they loſe their Suit, or the thing that was in Queſtion, though of Right “ it belonged to them. And in caſe the thing ſo ſeized, or invaded, did not of “ Right belong to the Seizor or Invader, he ſhould forfeit the Value of the Thing “ ſo unjuſtly ſeized. Now what they Ordain in reference to the Publick, as to “ this Concern, they alſo think fit to Apply to the Affairs of particular men, im- “ poſing the ſame Penalty upon any Violent or Forcible Enterer whatſoever. In “ Concluſion, they enact like themſelves, that their Exchequer ſhall not begin any “ Action upon theſe People being in poſſeſſion, though of the whole Confiſcate “ Eſtate; that it do not make any Queſtion or Examination, but receive all ſuch “ Quarrels and Demands. This Conſtitution is directed to Meſſianus, the Comes Rei Privatæ, to whoſe Treaſury theſe Confiſcations did belong, and to whom they give the Title of Magnificence.

L. 3. Unde vi. Cod. Th. lib. 4. tit. 22. Abeſt. prima hujus L. Sententia à Cod. Juſt. ut Hiſtorica.

Illud autem ab Officio Magnificentiæ tuæ cavendum eſſe decernimus ut Sacratiſſima Domus noſtra litem expectare, non inferre cogatur, neque expetat ſed patiatur examen.

77. Though Theodoſius was now in Italy, and a great diſtance from his own Diſtrict, yet had he ſtill his thoughts upon it, and eſpecially ſuch parts thereof as were expoſed to the Incurſions of Barbarians. And need there was for his ſo doing; for Zoſimus writes, that ſuch of them as had hid themſelves in the Fenns, and in the Woods adjoyning to the Mariſhes, upon the falling down of the Romans upon them, now hearing that he was imployed in the Civil War, took the Advantage and made great havock of all things in Macedonia and Theſſaly, without reſiſtance. Whether it were in reference to theſe motions or for repreſſing the Inſolence of the Gruthingi; the ſtate of the Times required that Illyricum ſhould be well defended. For this purpoſe, whereas Gratian had ordained that the Souldiers called Comitatenſes ſhould receive their Proviſions in kind; but thoſe that lay upon the Borders in Money: Theodoſius now thought fit, that, what Supply was wont to be made out of the Eaſt to Illyricum, “ ſhould all indiſtinctly be paid in Money. Poſſibly becauſe in Illyricum there was plenty enough of Proviſions to be bought up, and it was found, by experience, that what was brought ſo far received detriment by the Conveyance. He inſtanceth in three things, viz. Bacon, Oyl and Salt, and ſets the Rates to be paid for them; one Solidus for eighty pounds of Bacon, and as many of Oyle, and as much for twelve modii of Salt; ſo that it appears that Bacon and Oyl was of the ſame value in thoſe days, and eighty pounds of each was of the value of one Solidus or Aureus. But this courſe of receiving Proviſions in kind, or Money in lieu of them was altered according to the pleaſure of Princes, and exigency of Affairs. And as he might find reaſon to change Proviſions into Money becauſe of their ordinary corrupting, by reaſon of the length of the ways; ſo at this time he was certified of the corrupting of Money it ſelf where this Supply was to be had. “ This provoked him by an Edict directed to Tatian to declare ſuch Perſons as ſhould falſifie the Coin (whom “ he “

Theodoſius Orders the Eaſt to ſupply Illyricum with Money in room of Proviſions.

L. 17. de Cohortalibus Cod. Th. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

Sect. 4.

A.D. 389.

he calleth by the name of Paracharactæ) to be guilty of the Crime of High “ Treaſon; this Offence being generally eſteemed a violation of the Rights of Majeſty.

L. 9. de falſa moneta. Cod. Th. Have Tatiane, KNB. χάραγμα Nota. figuratio, typus; παραχάραγμα falſa ſculptio, παραχαράκται falſæ monetæ Rei.

Theodoſius accompanied with Valentinian and his Son Honorius goes to Rome.

78. But now went Theodoſius to Rome, accompanied by Valentinian and by Honorius his Son, towards the middle of June, and there they reſided for the moſt part of three months, viz. June, July and Auguſt following. For by the Dates of certain Laws made at that City, we find them there on the ſeaventeenth of June and the twenty eighth of Auguſt; and betwixt thoſe Dates ſeveral other Conſtitutions made, as for the good of the Empire in general, ſo principally for the concerns of that Mother City. The firſt is of Religious concernment, it being a good and profitable thing for Princes to begin with ſuch matters, which being to conſider in its proper place, we ſhall take notice, that though he now reſided in the City of Rome, and principally concerned himſelf, with Valentinian, for that Mother City, yet his thoughts ran upon the Beautifying and Adorning the other of Conſtantinople, poſſibly moved by ſome Indignation that the Daughter, and which was now the Seat of his own Empire, bore no greater reſemblance to the Mother. He directed an Edict to Proculus, Præfect of that City, wherein he takes notice, “ That it's a very unſeemly thing, that the publick Splendor of a City ſhould be cor- “ rupted, or ſpoiled, by the adjoyning of private Houſes; and that the Ornaments “ that had been added in his time or before it, ſhould be eclipſed by ſuch works “ as had only their riſe from greedineſs after Money. Therefore he impowers him “ (to whom he gives the Title of His Sublime Eminence) to remove all ſuch In- “ croachments, if they ſpoiled the Proſpect or the Beauty of the Place, whether “ they had been introduced by the meer preſumption of the Builders, or by leave “ ſurreptitiouſly procured; leaving it fully to him to demoliſh or let ſtand what “ he ſhould think fit. By theſe private Buildings are to be underſtood Shops, which as in every publick place, where multitudes or concourſe of People are, were not only then and there erected, but we ſee now to creep up every where for the readier ſale of, often times, but trifling Commodities. So now it happ'ned at Conſtantinople, where the Forum, the entrances to the publick Baths, as we ſee at this Day the Entries into Churches (uſually with Books and Beads) and the places of publick Adminiſtration of Juſtice were peſtered. But we muſt needs take further notice of what Theodoſius mentions in this Law, concerning publick Ornaments which were added in his Days; to whom the Writings of ſeveral other perſons bear witneſs: particularly thoſe of Themiſtius, of which we have ſpoken heretofore. Theſe were an Haven or Port, an Aquæduct, a Palace which bore his Name, Baths, Porticus, Gymnaſia, and the Forum which was alſo called after him, of which is made mention in an old Deſcription of Conſtantinople. There was alſo when the Tyrants were overthrown and deſtroyed, a Column erected in the Hippodrome, when Proculus was Judge or Præfect of the City (on which were ingraven two Inſcriptions or Epigramms, the one in Greek, the other in Latine) which accords with this very year.

L. 25. de Operibus publicis Cod. Th. Dat. Romæ 6. Kal. Auguſti. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

Thence he directs an Edict for the Beautifying of Conſtantinople.

79. Theodoſius thus, at Rome provided for the luſtre of Conſtantinople, but it was, probably, as we ſaid, by having a view of that old Soveraign City; that he knew the better how to correct the miſtakes committed in the contrivement of the New. He might the more conveniently behold the Buildings, becauſe he made his Entry in Triumph; ſometimes in his Chariot and ſometimes on Foot, and ſo, as one changeth the Word, He triumphed over War, and Victory it ſelf. In the Court-Houſe he ſpake to the Senate, and at the Roſtra to the People, carrying himſelf as a Prince to them all in general, and as a Senator to each in particular. In the Senate Houſe he was commended by Pacatus, a moſt Eloquent and Witty Perſon, in that Panegyrical Oration of which we have made ſo much uſe already, and muſt do more, wherein touching at other matters, he hath eſpecially celebrated this War, Victory and Triumph over Maximus. Concluding his Speech, at the cloſe he tells him, That it ſhould ſuffice to have ſpoken of ſuch of his Acts as were already paſt; “ and now when in courſe he was to make mention of what he did at preſent, he “ would rather chooſe to make an end of his Oration, than to invade the Office “ of the moſt ample order of the Senators. He hopes that he ſhould obtain par- “ don for his pious temerity, whereby he did not ſo much invade what belonged “ to other perſons, as made uſe of what was common to all Subjects. That it was, “ he hoped, lawful for him to ſpeak of ſuch things as were happily performed by “ him, amongſt Barbarous Nations, and in foreign Provinces for the Soveraign com- “ mand, with his Permiſſion and the favour of the Senate, leaving what he had done “ and “ Sigonius.

How he demeaned himſelf at Rome.

Pacatus his Panegyrical Oration to him in the Senate Houſe.

and ſtill continued to do, at Rome, to Roman Wits. To them it belonged to ſhew in what manner he appeared the firſt day he arrived; how he behaved himſelf in the Court, how at the Roſtra; how he followed the Spoils of War, one while in his Chariot, another while on Foot; (the more ſetting himſelf forth by this change of Poſture) as triumphing both over War and Pride: how to all in general he demeaned himſelf like a Prince, and no otherwiſe than as a Senator to every one in particular; how often and how familiarly he took a view, not only of the publick works, but alſo of private Houſes, without any Guard to attend him, as being far ſafer and more fenced by publick Love. Let theſe things, ſaith he, be ſet forth and commended by their Tongues and voice, who by the aſſiſtance of the common Joy may both more excellently ſpeak of matters of greateſt moment, and more juſtly and fitly of what is of private and particular concernment. Then falling into a kind of extatical fit, he cries out. O my happy travel! the pains I have taken have been well beſtowed. At what glorious things have I been preſent, with what Joys prepared, what wonderful matters ſhall I, at my return make known to the Cities of Gall! with what multitudes of aſtoniſhed People? with how great an Auditory ſhall I be crouded, when I ſhall ſay, I have ſeen Rome, I have ſeen Thodoſius, and I have ſeen them both together: I have ſeen him who is Father of a Prince, Avenger of a Prince, and alſo the Reſtorer of a Prince. To me they will flock from far and wide; from me the whole ſeries of all the Paſſages from firſt and laſt will be derived; from me both Poetry and Hiſtory will receive its Argument. I will requite you, Sir, for the injury I do you; though I ſpeak nothing of you my ſelf, that's fit to be read, I ſhall inſtruct them, that may ſpeak or write it.

What Reformation he made in the City.

80. He tells us what brave things in general Theodoſius did at Rome, but we muſt conſider what he acted in particular for that City. We find as for the eccleſiaſtical ſtate thereof, ſo for the amendment of the Civil he made ſeveral Laws. In order to the better adminiſtration of what concerned the Prince his Patrimony in the venerable City of Rome, as they term it, the Emperors tell Albinus the Præfect thereof, that Appeals ſhall lye from the Rationalis to the Comes Rei Privatæ, if the ſum in contention exceed two hundred pounds of Silver; if it do not amount to ſo much, then to himſelf the Præfect. They received a complaint that the publick Slaves belonging to Forges or other publick works, at this time deſerted the ſervice, and went and joyned themſelves with private Perſons, and took as Wives their Women Slaves. To reſtrain this they Ordain that, “ Thoſe ſo offending, with their Wives and alſo their Children, be forced back to their former condition and labour. But Socrates alſo writes that, though the Emperor Theodoſius ſtaid but little in Italy, yet in that ſpace he did much good to the City of Rome, partly in beſtowing what was profitable for it; and partly in taking away what was miſchievous to it. For as he Demonſtrated his Bounty and Liberality to it in many reſpects, ſo he removed two things out of the way which were great blemiſhes unto that Place. There were great and ancient Buildings at Rome, in which that Bread was baked wherewith the City was ſupplied; the Overſeers or Governors whereof the Romans in their own Language called Mancipes, who in proceſs of time turned thoſe Houſes into Dens of Thieves. For by reaſon that the Bakehouſes belonging to them were under ground, and on the ſides of them were Victuallers and Tipling places full of Whores; many that reſorted thither, whether for ſatisfying of their hunger, or their Luſt, were craftily ſpoiled of all they had, and moſt commonly ſo diſpoſed off as their Friends could never hear of them after. A certain privy Conveyance there was diviſed, to throw them down from theſe Tipling Houſes into that blind Bakehouſe, by which means many, eſpecially if Strangers, were caſt away. For being thus caught in the Trap, they were compelled to grind in the Bakehouſe, and moſt of them never ſuffered to depart, but kept in perpetual ſlavery; their Friends believing that they were long ſince departed out of the World. It happed that one of Theodoſius his Souldiers was thrown into this Hole; but being in the cloſe Bakehouſe, and by no other means able to procure his Liberty, he drew his Dagger, and ſlew ſuch as ſtopped his paſſage, and the reſt being afraid of their lives let him eſcape. The Emperor informed of all circumſtances, grievouſly puniſh'd the Mancipes, and commanded theſe Houſes which were the Receptacles of Thieves to be demoliſhed, and by this means freed Rome, the Queen of all Cities, from one very diſgraceful thing. The other was this. If a Woman were taken in Adultery, the Romans uſed ſuch a kind of puniſhment, as removed

L. 49. de Appellation. &c. Cod. Th. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

L. ult. de Servis fugitivis. Cod. Juſt. lib. 6. tit. 1. Dat. ſunt hæ L.L. ad Albinum Romæ. 8. Kal. Aug.

Socrates lib. 5. c. 18.

removed not the Sin, but increaſed the Vice. For they ſhut her up in narrow “ Stews, and compelled her beaſtly without all ſhame to play the Whore; nay “ they procured a noiſe to be made with ſome ſounding Veſſel, while the Deed “ was doing, that the Neighbours might know it, and that by that tinkling Sound “ all might be made privy to that filthy and ſhameful kind of Correction. The “ Emperor hearing of this horrible Cuſtom, thought it was by no means to be ſuf- “ fered, but the Seſtra (ſo the Baudy-Houſes were called) he commanded to be de- “ moliſhed; and made other Laws for puniſhment of Women taken in Adultery. “ And thus was Rome, by Theodoſius his means delivered from theſe two foul and filthy Abuſes.

81. But as for Socrates his later ſtory concerning the Adulterous puniſhment of an Adultereſs, there's not any thing in Antiquity that bears Teſtimony to it: not any Footſteps of ſuch Law or Cuſtom at Rome, where the Julian againſt Adulterers, Baronius tells you, was always vigilant and Vigorous: only one Cuſtom, he ſaith, there was in his Days in ſeveral Places in Italy, to deride with ſuch tinckling Sounds the Marriages of ſuch Widows as entred the ſecond time into the ſtate of Wedlock; as in ſome places of England they are wont to make ridiculous thoſe Wives that beat their Husbands. For the former, concerning the Bakehouſes and the Mancipes, it is very true, that the Overſeers of theſe publick Houſes went under this Name, as well as others, that belonged to the publick Baths. And as he makes mention of Theodoſius his puniſhing the Mancipes, by which puniſhment the Body of them might be diſſipated, and a Want follow of ſuch as were to execute that Charge: ſo at this very time we find a Law made by theſe two Emperors for recruiting or filling up the Body of the Mancipes, which muſt ſuppoſe ſuch a Want. It's dated at Rome, and directed to Albinus the Præfect thereof, and therein they command, “ That whoſoever by ſurreptitious Reſcripts contrary to former Laws had obtained diſmiſſion from this Service, or lived idle in any leſſer, “ or more inconſiderable Bodies, or Companies, ſhould be forced to undergo this “ Function; there being no need, I ſuppoſe, of any new Command for forcing back ſuch as were run away, or had deſerted the Charge upon that Perſecution which fell upon them, if ſo they did. And this Law might very well ſeem to have relation to this ſtory of Socrates, if ſome other Circumſtances did not rather incline us to another Interpretation. By Mancipes are meant in Law-books and others, not only theſe publick Bakers, but, as we ſaid before, ſuch as had the Management of the publick Baths and of Salt-pits; and it happens ſo direct for the Interpretation to go for them, that Symmachus, who was Præfect of this City four or five years before, hath an Epiſtle ſtill extant, directed to Theodoſius himſelf, wherein he makes Relation that theſe very Mancipes of the Baths, from a great number, being reduced to a very few, and not poſſibly able to undergo the Burthen, obtained upon their Petition, that ſuch as had been excuſed by Decree ſhould be returned back, and other Supplies be made out of other unſerviceable or idle Companies without delay.

Ad Ann. 389. n. 59.

L. un. de Mancipibus. Cod. Th. lib. 12. tit. 16. Dat. 18. Kal. Septemb. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

Lib. 10. Ep. 58.

82. This Reſcript being pleaded; thoſe that by Decree had been diſmiſſed from their Company, alleaged that they were protected alſo by the ſuffrage of Macedonius (who bore the Office of Comes Sacr. Largitionum, under Gratian, Valentinian and Theodoſius) and they procured a Relation of theſe their Pretences to be made. Now Symmachus tells the Emperor, that it's only in his (or their) power to reſcind Reſcripts unjuſtly procured. But, ſtill the defect continuing, they called alſo the Navicularii that were obnoxious to the bringing of Wood for the ſervice of the Baths, to undertake their Charge, that both Companies together might ſupport the Burthen the better. But they choſe rather to deliver up ſome of their Body, than to joyn together unanimouſly in the Work; and theſe being willing, it was ſo wrought, that certain Perſons were joyned with the Mancipes. Now he tells him, the publick Cauſe required his delivery of his Judgement therein, leſt by Inſtruments clandeſtinely procured, an whole Company ſo ſerviceable ſhould be reduced to nothing. He adds, that with the Relation he had ſent the account of what was tranſacted, about their Affair who pleaded the Judgement of Macedonius; as alſo what had paſſed before himſelf in relation to the Navicularii, their addicting ſome of their own Body to the Mancipes. And concludes with telling him, that it is his work to revoke the Priviledges of thoſe whom their own ambitious Practices had diſcharged: and to cut off all acceſs to his Perſon from ſuch as would petition to be diſingaged from that Service to which their own Company had adjudged them. This Epiſtle is ſo direct to the Interpretation of this Law, that it ſeems to have taken away all thoughts of its having been made in reference to the Bakers. Theſe Mancipes of the Baths had alſo the Charge of the Saltpits, which were in the eleventh Region of the City, near to the Gate called Porta Tergemina, and they received the Profit or Advantage of them; which Priviledge, for their Incouragement was confirmed to them by Valentinian. Therefore are they indifferently termed Mancipes Thermarum and Salinarum; and, as Juretus obſerves, they were under the Diſpoſition of Macedonius as Comes Sacrarum Largitionum, the buſineſs of Salt belonging to his Juriſdiction. Yet the Overſight of the Baths, or other publick Works of the City belonged to Symmachus the Prefect, whoſe courſe of procedure in his Office is much illuſtrated by his Epiſtles. But we ſee by this and other of his Addreſſes in this Nature, that though Theodoſius was diſtant at Conſtantinople, yet the great Officers had recourſe to him in matters of Conſequence, probably the more becauſe of the Minority of Valentinian, whom we may believe he aſſiſted in making Laws and other Acts for the good eſtabliſhment of thoſe Countries he had again ſubjected to his Command, whilſt yet he remained in theſe Quarters.

In Ep. Sym.

83. But however, the Law concerning Mancipes might be intended; whether in Order to that Chaſtiſement of Bakers, of which Socrates writes; there is another extant which made up part of the ſame Conſtitution, being of the ſame Date, and directed to the ſame Perſon, and tending alſo to the correction of Manners. We have already ſpoken how greatly the Art of Magick was abhorred in this Age, eſpecially in the Days of Valens; how the Practice thereof was eſteemed next to that of High Treaſon, and the Practiſers themſelves were reckoned for no leſs than Traitors and publick Enemies. Now it being a thing ſufficiently known, that it was lawful to kill a publick Enemy or a Traitor to his Country, who might be diſpatched by the Hand of a private Perſon whereever he met him; this gave incouragement to ſeveral ſorts of Perſons to ſerve the ends, either of their ſelfiſh Deſigns, or their Malice, upon thoſe that were commonly and notoriouſly infamed with this Crime. For ſome there were who were guilty of it themſelves, and when they feared to be diſcovered by thoſe that were (poſſibly) not ſo much to be blamed as they, to avoid accuſation, they began firſt, killed the Party, and thereby evaded that puniſhment, which was moſt deſerved by themſelves. Others upon private Spleen and Malice, for ſatisfying of their private Revenge took this courſe to be rid of thoſe they moſt deſired to have out of the way. The Emperors now at Rome, taking notice thereof, command Albinus the Præfect, “That, whoſoever ſhall find any Perſon guilty of this Crime, he ſhall ſeize, and preſently bring him forth, and ſubject the Enemy of the publick Safety, to publick Judgement. And eſpecially they lay this Injunction upon thoſe called Agitators, or the Chariot-drivers of theſe times, who ran Races in the Cirque, and were wont to be guilty of this Crime, even upon this double account: For, this ſort of men is wonderfully belied if they did not practiſe the Art of Magick to obtain the Victory in thoſe Races. And hence they were wont to accuſe and kill firſt, that they might not be diſcovered; and alſo to brand their Adverſaries with this Crime, and render them Infamous; that removing ſuch out of the way, as they thought moſt Expert in the Art of Driving; they themſelves might win the deſired Prizes in the Cirque.

The Emperors reſtrain malicious Accuſations upon pretence of Magick.

L. 11. de Maleficis & Mathematicis. Cod. Th. & L. 9. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

84. That theſe men were wont to uſe Inchantment for obtaining the Victory in Courſes, by hindring the Speed of thoſe that were to run againſt them, and intercepting one way or other the Swiftneſs of their Horſes; as alſo by breaking the Wheels of the Chariots, or the Legs or Necks of the Riders or Horſes, is ſufficiently teſtified by ſeveral Writers, as Ammianus and others. Now, if any of theſe Agitators, “or any others of what ſort ſoever ſhall offend againſt this their Injunction, or Clandeſtinely kill any Perſon, though manifeſtly guilty of the Crime of Magick, they pronounce he ſhall not eſcape Death himſelf, as ſuſpected guilty of the Inducements we now mentioned, viz. that, he either had removed a Malefactor on purpoſe, that he might not diſcover his Aſſociates, and ſo eſcape his due and ſevere tryal at Law, or under pretence of this publick Juſtice, had deſtroyed his own Enemy, and that out of a more malitious Deſign. The Hands of the Emperors now being in, and they ſetting themſelves to promote the Conveniences of the City, where they at preſent reſided, eſpecially in relation to Victuals; the condition of the Suarii was repreſented to them, who found Hogs-fleſh for it, as we have already ſhewn. They being a Body Politick among themſelves, had ſeveral Lands belonging to them, conferred ſeveral ways upon their Company, for the Carrying on Vide apud Goth. in h. l.

L. 5. de Suariis Cod. Th. lib. 14. tit. 4. Abrogat. à Cod. Juſt.

The Emperors ordain ſeveral things in relation to the Suarii.

on of their Service, as divers other Incouragements granted them by Princes for this End. But theſe Lands, though deſtined to publick Ends, yet (as we find at this day in every place) were imbezeled, and by private perſons drawn to their own Uſe and Accommodation, by various Tricks and Sleights of Law. “The Emperors Command Albinus, to whom they give the Title of His Sublime Eminence, either to recover theſe Lands to their due Uſe and Deſignment, or elſe to force ſuch as were Poſſeſſed of them to undergo that Charge and Service which by Right was to lye upon the owners; For indeed theſe Lands were ſo deſtined to that Service, that they could not be transferred to other Uſes. And they affirm it a Matter both of Equity and Law, that the Kinſmen, and Originales, as they terme them, or the Sons and Poſterity of the Suarii, being by their Blood and Original obnoxious to the Function, be alſo forced to the Charge. This Order or Edict was directed to Albinus on the Eighteenth of Auguſt; and eight days after, he was ſerved with another Conſtitution in behalf of the ſame Company. Herein the Emperors ſignifie, that they had it repreſented to them, how that being put to much labour and toile for the benefit of the People of Rome, the Emperor Gratian had thought it fit, that they ſhould not be ſubject to ſordid Imployments. They therefore command his Illuſtrious Authority (ſo they terme him) to maintaine the Authority of the Imperial Conſtitutions, and with Competent Threatnings to be urgent with his Officers to put in force what undoubtedly had been before Decreed, and never had been nulled by any Repeal. Now what the Functions or Services were, which went under the Name of Sordida Munera, we have already ſhewn, neither is this of Suarii to be reckoned in their Number.

L. 6. eod. tit. Cod. Th. & L. 1. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

They remove from Rome to Valentia.

85. The Emperors, while they were in Rome, further took care againſt the Abuſe of the Aquæducts of that City, and then their leave of it, (after about three Months ſtay) on the firſt of September, and came to Valentia; not that City of Italy ſituate among the Brutij, but probably another Town lying near to Brunduſium. Hence bears Date on the third of this Month another Edict directed to Cæſarius, the Magiſter Officiorum of the Eaſt, the ſame that was ſent by Theodoſius to Antioch upon the occaſion of the ſedition raiſed in that City. “Whereas four ſorts of Military Men, who were wont to travel, and be ſent to and fro upon publick Errands for defence of the Empire, viz. The Inferior and Leſſer ſort of Comites, who were deſtined for the Safeguard of the Limits, the Tribuni Militum, the Domeſtick Protectors, and the Agentes in Rebus, were indulged ſo far as to make Uſe of the Vehicular Courſe, or the Publick Waggons; this Theodoſius prohibits for the time to come, and for their greater Speed and Diſpatch will have them have Horſes only allowed. And that therein they be not too burthenſome, by requiring too great a Number of theſe Horſes, he aſſigns how many ſhall be allowed to each Rank, viz. to the Comites Four beſides a Sumpter; to a Tribune Three, and to the Domeſtick Protectors, and the Agentes in Rebus, but Two a piece: And of this he will have the ſeveral Governours of Provinces to take care. Valentinian, about the ſame time, had a deſire to reward and incourage ſuch as faithfully ſerved him in his Scrinia; for he ordered by an Edict directed to Conſtantius the Præfectus Prætorio of Gall, “That in the preſence of the ordinary Judges, or Governours of Provinces, they ſhould enjoy three ſorts of Honours or Privileges: The firſt of theſe was, That they ſhould be admitted to Salute or receive a Kiſs from them upon occaſion, when they met them. The next was, of Coming freely into their Secretaria or Courts of Juſtice when they pleaſed; which none but ſuch privileged Perſons could do, except they were ſent for by the Judge, or had buſineſs depending. And not only will he have theſe Scriniarii injoy this Honour, but alſo liberty of ſitting with them upon the Bench, when they ſhall ſo pleaſe. The reaſon he gives for it is, becauſe ſuch had liberty to come into the Prince his Conſiſtory, and therefore might well be admitted into the Secretaria of the ordinary Judges, viz. the Conſulares and Preſidents, for of ſuch the Law makes mention; and therefore thoſe Governours, which by Degree were Spectabiles, as Proconſuls and Vicars, are not hereby to be underſtood. So great Reſpect did Valentinian bear to theſe his Officers; though the ſame Honour was alſo given to others, as to Domeſticks and Protectors at another time. In caſe there was an Omiſſion of this Civility; he impoſeth a Mulct of three Pounds of Gold upon the Princeps, Comicularius, or other Heads of the Office of the ordinary Judge, to whom it ſeems it belonged to introduce Perſons to the Ceremony of the Kiſs, and into the Secretarium.

L. 5. de Aquaductu. Cod. Th. l. 15. tit. 2. & L. 3. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. hinc & ex ſeq. interpolata eſt.

Where they make Edicts for the Eaſe of the Curſus Publicus.

L. 49. de curſu publ. Cod. Th. lib. 8. tit. 5. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

And in favour of the Scriniarii.

L. 5. de Proximis &c. Cod. Th. lib. 6. tit. 26. & L. 2. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. & L. ult. Cod. de Offic. div. Judic.

89. This Law was not Dated, (as the Copies corruptly have it) but Received at Triers on the eighth day of November; for the Emperors from Rome, by the way of

Sect. 4.

The come to Milan.

A.D. 389.

L. 19. de Hæreticis Cod. Th.

L. 120. de Decurionibus. Cod. Th. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

Valentia and Foroſaminum, removed to Milan, where, by the Subſcription of another Law, we find them on the ſix and twentieth of this Month. Thence alſo they gave out an Edict on the ſeventeenth of December following, to Tatianus the Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt, (the Succeſſor of Cynegius) commanding him to write to the Magiſter Officiorum, under whome ſerved ſuch as were ſaid to be in the Militia Magiſteriana or Scholaris; as alſo to the Comes Sacrarum Largitionum and Comes Rei privatæ, under whom were the Militia Palatina, that all ſuch Curiales, or obnoxious to Corporations, as had crept into Imployment under them, ſhould be rendred back to the Services of the reſpective Bodies from which they came; which is rationally thought intended for the relief of the City of Antioch; for under this Tatianus, as appears by an Epiſtle of Libanius, directed to him, was a meſſage ſent to the Prince for ſupplying the great Want there was in the Court of this Corporation. The Francks about this time making new Deprædations in Gall; Arbogaſtes thought ſuch Inſolence was not to be endured, and therefore put Valentinian in mind, that they were to ſmart for it, except they made ſatisfaction for ſuch miſchief as they did the preceding year, when they defeated the Legions; and delivered up the Authors of the War, in whom their perfidiouſneſs ſhould be puniſhed. After a few days he went to them himſelf, and had Conference with Marcomeres and Suno their Reguli, of whom he required and obtained Hoſtages, and ſo returned into his Winter-Quarters to Triers.

A.D. 390. Valentiniano A. 4. & Notherio Coſs.

Valentinian takes care for the ſafety of his Perſon.

L. 12. de Palatinis S. L. & R. P. Cod. Th. lib. 6. tit. 30.

L. L. 26, 27, 28. de Operibus publicis. Cod. Th. lib. 15. tit. 1. Abſunt à Cod. Juſt.

They forbid the raiſing of New Works.

Reſtraine Contributions made to greater Cities.

Take care for Orphans.

L. ult. de Tutor. Cod. Th. lib. 3. tit. 17. L. 2. Cod. Juſt. Quando mulier tutelæ Officio fungi poteſt, hinc deſcripta eſt.

87. The CCCXC. Year of our Lord had for Conſuls, the Emperour Valentinian the fourth time, and Neotherius. The Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt was Tatianus; of Illyricum and Italy, for ſome time, Polemius; and afterward Flavianus and Neotherius. The two Emperors continued at Milan together till towards the Month of Auguſt, where they made ſeveral Orders directed to the Officers of both their Diſtricts. “ Valentinian, as if he had ſome jealouſie or apprehenſion of what ſhortly after befell him, to avoid the treachery of thoſe that were near about him, commanded Severus his Comes and Caſtrenſis, that none ſhould be admitted to Attendance about his Perſon, but thoſe that had firſt his own approbation. The Governours of Provinces were now very liberal of the publick Purſe, in raiſing publick Buildings, with deſign of fixing their own Names to the Walls, and thereby to gain Fame, and perpetuate their Memories; which being found to exhauſt the Treaſury; the Emperours, by one Conſtitution, though directed to two Perſons, Viz. Albinus the Præfect of Rome, and Polemius the Præfectus Prætorio of Italy and Illyricum, command that no New Works be raiſed, either in the Æternal City, as they term it, or in any other. This they inforce by a triple Penalty, whereof the firſt is, that ſuch Judges or Governours, ſhall be obliged to perfect ſuch Works ſo raſhly begun, at their own Charge; the next, that no allowance ſhall be made of any Sums of Money to the Caſheers that laid it out upon ſuch Uſes; beſides, a Fine of Ten Pounds of Gold they lay upon ſuch Judge and his Office that ſo offend. We have formerly ſaid, That in Caſe the Revenues of the moſt eminent City of any Province did not ſuffice for the maintenance of its publick Buildings, it was to be ſupplied out of the Incomes of thoſe that were of a lower rank. But this liberty and Indulgence had given occaſion to unreaſonable men to require and exact more than was convenient, and when there was no need of Aſſiſtance from other places; which cauſed Valentinian now to qualifie that Licence, which formerly had been in Charity given in this kind, ſo as no Contribution ſhould be made, except all the Revenue belonging to the Principal City it ſelf and deſtined to this Uſe were exhauſted; and then too, the Emperour himſelf ſhould be informed both of this Supply, how much it was, how laid out, and what was effected by it. Theodoſius, about the ſame time, was advertized from the Eaſt, of great havock made in the Eſtates of Infants and Minors, to whom their Mothers were Guardians; For they marrying again very commonly, their ſecond Husbands reckoned on all as their own, which they could make (right or wrong) out of the Goods and Poſſeſſions of the Children. To prevent this miſchief for the time to come, he preſcribed now to Tatianus the Præfect ſix Rules, according to which either Mothers or other Perſons ſhould be aſſigned Guardians. “ That the Tuition ſhould be committed to them, and by Name. That they ſhould not be forced to it, but be aſſigned Guardians upon their own ſeeking. But not Confirmed in that Charge till they had Ingaged in Court that they would not marry again. Neither ſhould any be admitted to the Tuition, except they themſelves were of full Age, or twenty five years old, it being unreaſonable that they ſhould manage the Eſtates of others, who could not tranſact in their own behalf. Neither yet in the next place ſhould their Requeſt be granted, except there were failure of another law- “ ful Tutor, whether ſuch by Succeſſion and Kindred, or aſſigned by the Teſtament “ of the Parent. If there wanted ſuch an one, or if he was excuſed by Privilege, “ was removed as a ſuſpected Perſon, or was found by reaſon of ſome Infirmity of “ Body or Mind not fit to manage his own Eſtate, then might the Mother be ad- “ mitted upon her Deſire being a Widow. And laſtly, in Caſe ſhe married after- “ ward, the Eſtate of her ſecond Husband ſhould (by a tacite Right) be ingaged “ to anſwer and make good the Intereſt of the Minor. Such were the Terms on “ which Theodoſius would admit of Mothers to be Guardians, the ſtrictneſs of which was altered in aftertimes, ſo as the Grandmother might be admitted as well as the Mother: But at this day, there's no need ſhe ſhould deſire the Imployment, or be confirmed in it. And both Mother and Grandmother are preferred before the Tutores Legitimi, or thoſe of the Kindred, though not before ſuch as the Teſtaments of the deceaſed Parents had aſſigned. A Change of Laws following the Mutation of Manners.

Reſtraine the Immoderate Privileges of Senators.

L.8. de Incolis, &c. Cod. Juſt. lib. 10. tit. 39.

L. 2. ubi Senatores vel clariſſimi civiliter vel criminaliter conveniantur. Cod. Juſt. lib. 3. tit. 24.

88. Great Men, that were obnoxious to their Creditors, would pretend they had greater Immunities than the ſafety of the Publick would permit they ſhould; ſo ſo that it was uncertain in what place they could be Sued. To clear this Point, and that both they, and thoſe they gave Cauſe of Action to, might be in ſome certainty, the Emperours now declared, “ That in reſpect of their Dignity, the Reſidence of “ Senators ought to be ſuppoſed to be at the moſt Sacred City, meaning that of “ Rome, or Conſtantinople. But withall, they tell the Senate, that in pecuniary Cau- “ ſes, whether they dwelt in the City or near unto it, they ſhould be convened in “ the Court, either of the Præfectus Prætorio, or the Præfect of the City, or of “ the Magiſter Officiorum, if he received their Order for it; but in the Provinces “ they ſhould anſwer, where they fixed their Habitation, or where the greateſt part “ of their Eſtates lay, and they were commonly reſident. To be ſure Conſtantinople, at this time, was much inlarged by the Care and Munificence of Theodoſius, and thereby afforded much conveniency of living both to Senators and others. The place where it ſtood, or Byzantium, had been inhabited in former Ages, and, as we formerly ſhewed, was conſiderable in the World in reſpect of its Scituation and Wealth. And therefore, we perceive, in digging and laying the new Foundations, many old ones were diſcovered, and not ſeldom, Treaſure was found hidden or loſt in thoſe places where they had occaſion to open the Ground. Hereupon much Envy and Contention followed, thoſe that could not have the ſame good fortune themſelves grudging that of their Neighbours, and pretending to intitle the Emperor to it as his due. Theodoſius, to obviate all ſuch Informations, and to incourage Builders, as it ſeems, had Ten Years before declared in an Edict directd to the People of Conſtantinople, “ That whoſoever found any hid Treaſures, Jewels, Me- “ dals, or rhe like, laid there in Ancient Times, and the Owners whereof could not “ be knowne, ſhould have and freely enjoy them, without fear of any Information “ or Trouble thence ariſing in his Exchequer. But, as he ſaith, he then thought “ fit, out of Natural Equity, to add ſome Temperament to this Indulgence, ſo as “ he, who found the Treaſure in his own Ground, ſhould have it freely and abſo- “ lutely to himſelf; but he that found it in another Man's Ground, ſhould admit the “ owner of the Soil to a fourth part of the Value. And he prohibited that any “ ſhould make uſe of this Licence to dig when they liſted in other Mens Lands, or “ pretend a fame of any thing to be therein hidden. “

Vide omnes leges tit. de Theſauris Cod. Th. lib. 10. tit. 18. & Goth. Com. Abſunt omnes à Cod Juſt.

Theodoſius determines Controverſies about finding of Treaſure.

89. By the antienter Laws made by ſuch Emperors as were too much addicted to the increaſing of their Revenues, whatſoever Treaſure was found, though in a Mans own Land, was adjudged to the publick Treaſury. So it ſtood before the Reign of Nerva and Hadrian; but Nerva granted it freely to the Poſſeſſor of the Land, and ſo did Hadrian, following Natural Equity therein; and ſo the Law ſtood under the Governments of Severus and Antoninus Caracalla; under Heliogabalus Alteration ſeems to have been made, which that excellent Prince Alexander Severus again reformed; yet ſo as if the Treaſure was great, he ordered his own Officers to go ſome ſhare with thoſe that diſcovered it. After his time it was again adjudged to the Treaſury, though found in the Land of the Diſcoverer till the days of the Emperors Carus and Carinus, who again left it free as before, till at length under Diocletian, Maximian and others, it was again appropriated to the Exchequer. Conſtantine, when he came to the Government, took a middle courſe betwixt the two former which had ſo perpetually varied, and ordained, That if any diſcovered Treaſure, and of his own Accord revealed it to the Officers of the Treaſury, he ſhould have half half of it, & be free from all manner of Trouble or Proſecution, there being reaſon to truſt ſuch an one as of his own accord had made the Diſcovery. But if any Perſon found ſuch Treaſure, and not revealing, was convicted of it, he ſhould by no means enjoy the former favour. After Conſtantine, as Chriſtianity took greater Root, ſo greater Liberty was Indulged, as by that Law of Theodoſius, which e're now we mentioned, whereby whatſoever Treaſure was found in any Mans Ground, it ſhould be his own, were it never ſo great, or with whatſoever Character it was Stamped; for as Alexander Severus excepted the greater Treaſures, ſo it is noted of Tamerlane, That ſuch Coins as bore the ſtamp of a King he ordained ſhould be Confiſcated. Some indeed have been of opinion, that all Treaſure exceeding the Fortune of a Private Perſon ſhould belong to the Prince, as in France, ſome think at this day the Treaſures of Gold to belong to the King. Indeed the Governour of the Low Countries, when not long ſince the Sepulchre and Treaſure of Childerich King of the Francks was diſcovered, ſeized on it in the Kings behalf, but gave, as it's ſaid, the value of it to the Poor of Tournay, where it was occaſionally found. But further to incourage the Finder, or rather the Building of Conſtantinople, Theodoſius gave three Parts of four to him that ſhall diſcover any in another Man's Ground, and only the Remainder to the Owner of the Ground; although at this day in France it be equally diſtributed betwixt the Owner, the Finder, and the Prince. But this he interprets to be underſtood only of accidental finding, for he will not permit upon this occaſion, that any one ſearch another Man's Ground, under pretence of preſumption or fame of any thing to be there hid, or that the Common People did believe that ſo it was, pretending the Place to be haunted, as it was ordinarily believed that Spirits were wont to watch about Treaſure. Thus much, as we ſaid, did Theodoſius Decree in an Edict publiſhed Ten Years before to the People of Conſtantinople, which now by another directed to Neotherius he confirms in theſe words. “We permit, that thoſe who, either by the Revelation of the Divinity or Conduct of Fortune, do find any Treaſure, enjoy what they found without all fear for ſo doing. The ordinary Speech concerning the Conduct of Fortune, as a Chriſtian Prince, he mitigates with the Providence of God, as St. Auguſtine corrects it upon another occaſion. The Heathen alſo aſcribed the finding of Treaſure to the favour of their Gods, and particularly impoſed this Taske upon Hercules and Mercury, and for this purpoſe they offered Sacrifice, and conſulted their Magicians. But this, as Theodoſius ſeems here tacitely to diſallow, ſo Juſtinian afterward forbad that any, by Sacrifice, or any other courſe odious to the Laws, ſhould go about to ſeek for Treaſure; which when found, he left intirely to the Owner who found it in his Ground. Though after him it became again Confiſcated, and ſuch was the practice of the Goths.

Sect. 4. A.D. 390.

Anaſtaſis Childerici per Chiffletium.

Eos qui ſuadente Numine, vel ducente fortuna, Theſauras repererint. &c.

90. At this time were the Emperors ſo ſeverely bent againſt ſuch as made forcible Entries upon the Lands or Poſſeſſions of other Men, as Conſtantine, for very great reaſon, formerly had been, “That ſuch Slaves as ſhould be convicted to have done ſuch violence, by Witneſs, or their own Confeſſions, ſhould, if they did it, unknown to their Maſters, ſuffer death. If they did it for fear, and at the Inſtigation of their Lords, they then declare it evident by the Julian Law, That ſuch Lords ſhall incur Infamy, and enjoy no Privilege of their Place or Dignity; that is, if they were Perſons of Place and Dignity, if not, they ſhould incur the Loſs of Life impoſed by the Conſtitutions of Princes, though not by the Julian Law; as alſo ſuch as ſhould after this be convicted to have committed the ſecond offence; and their Slaves that obeyed their Commands be condemned to the Mines. And in the laſt place, they inflict the pain of great Infamy upon that Judge that ſhall preſume to Omit, Defend, or Leſſen the Puniſhment of any Perſon ſo Convicted. Afterward Valentinian the Third required the value of the Injury unpuniſhed by ſo negligent a Judge to be levied when he went out of his Office, and Athalarich King of the Goths commanded him to be deprived of his Girdle, and forfeit ſo much to the Treaſury, as the Enterer by force had cauſed detriment to the Invaded; ſo hateful was this Crime of Violence to Chriſtian Princes; more than what the Julian Laws expreſſed. “In thoſe times of War and Danger they ſhewed themſelves indulgent to the Primicerius of a Fabrick or Forge, vouchſafing to him not only Vacation or Freedom from Service after two years, but alſo the Liberty of Adoring their Æternity, as they terme it, or the Purple amongſt the Protectors. But they thought fit to reſtraine the Office and Imployment of the Curioſi alſo about this time, ordaining that they ſhould be only choſen out of the Agentes in Rebus, as more reſolute Perſons than the Officers of the Præfects or Vicars, that

L. 4. ad leg. Juliam de vi publica & privata. Cod. Th. lib. 9. tit. 10. & L. 8. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. ad Albinum. P. u. perdie Non. Mart. Mediol.

L. 3. de Fabricenſib. Cod. Th. lib. 10. tit. 21. & L. 2. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. 8. Id. Mart. Med. ad Rufinum Mag. Officiorum.

Sect. 4.

that one out of them ſhould be placed in the moſt Eminent City of every Pro-“ vince, whereas formerly two had been imployed in each Province, and his work “ ſhould only be to look to the Uſe and Charge of the Curſus Publicus, who (and “ how) made uſe of it: ſo that it ſeems they were no longer now to be Spies or “ Diſcoverers. Great was the Care and Circumſpection this year of Tatianus, “ the Præfectus Prætorio about the Navicularii, and the conveyance of Proviſions by Water, which the Emperors by an Edict do Approve and Confirm, ſo that both “ their Sons, and thoſe that ſucceed in their Eſtates when dead, by whatſoever “ right, ſhall be obliged to the ſame Function, and ſtill continue in the Rank of the “ Curiales, ſo as no Priviledge obtained from the Prince himſelf ſhall obviate or “ null the Force of this Conſtitution; but the Son ſhall alſo ſucceed to the Office “ and Imployment of a Curialis. Now was Theodoſius the Emperor at Verona, whi-“ ther he removed from Milan, and there abode the two Months of Auguſt and September. At the later end of November we find him there again, where on the twenty third of December, to provide for the better Security of the Provinces, by a Law directed to Polemius the Præfectus Prætorio of Illyricum they prohibit that any Governor of a Province ſhall dare to come to the moſt Auguſt City, “ meaning Conſtantinople, without their Command. If it ſhall appear that any “ one offendeth againſt their Decree, they Denounce that he ſhall incur a Puniſh-“ ment ſuitable to his Contempt.

A.D. 391.

L. 7. de Curioſis. Cod. Th. lib. 6. tit. 29. & L. ult. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. ad Neoterium. 5. Cal. Jun.

L. 19. de Naviculariis. Cod. Th. Dat. 6. id. Septemb. Veronæ.

L. 9. de Officio Rectoris Provinciæ Cod. Juſt. lib. 1. tit. 40.

91. In the CCCXCI year of our Lord Titus Fabius Tatianus and L. Aurelius Symmachus had the Title of Conſuls. Tatianus was ſtill Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt: and Flavianus held this Office in Illyricum and Italy. The Emperors continued together at Milan, till about the Month of May, and there made three Laws, which are yet extant. The firſt was of Religious Concernment, and the ſecond tended to the practice of Mercy, and Compaſſion towards ſuch Children as had been ſold to ſatisfie the Neceſſities of their Parents. Although the Law of the Romans did not allow that Ordinarily and Regularly any ſhould either Sell, or give to Pledge their Children; yet was it permitted them to do it in extream want or neceſſity, and that out of reſpect, as well to the one as the other. That in this Age whereof we now write, this was practiſed, appears from ſeveral Teſtimonies, and ſometimes it was done to ſatisfie the Debts due to the Treaſury. But though they were Slaves at preſent, yet was it not thought fit they ſhould ſo continue, the ſeveral Emperors agreeing in this point, that they ought to be reſtored to liberty. But they differ'd in the manner of it. Conſtantine was of opinion, that the value of their ſervice was to be paid, or another Slave to be delivered in the room of the Infranchiſed. This now Theodoſius ſeems to repeal, commanding all ſuch as for want of Victuals had been ſold, to be re-“ ſtored to their former Ingenuity, as the term is, or Free Condition, without re-“ quiring any remuneration of price, which was ſufficiently paid by the ſlavery “ of a Free Perſon, though continuing for never ſo ſmall a time. This had been formerly Ordained by Trajan concerning ſuch as were expoſed, that they ſhould be reſtored to Liberty, though the charge of their keeping were not defrayed. But Valentinian the third afterward, when a cruel Famine had raged in Italy, declared indeed, that ſuch as had been ſold in it ſhould be free, but that the Buyer ſhould receive the Value back with the addition of a part, ſo that he ſhould neither repent of his Purchaſe, nor that Liberty ſhould be loſt. For if all hope of recompence was taken away; what expectation ſhould there be that ſuch charity would be practiſed? on the other Hand, If a neceſſity of Recompence were impoſed, liberty the moſt ineſtimable thing in this life, would miſerably be loſt through that Neceſſity. Juſtinian approved beſt of the Law made by Conſtantine, and ſo did Princes vary in their Opinions according to the circumſtances of times, and thoſe Reaſons and Arguments which they affoarded: To be ſure the ſence of later Ages is moſt full of Mercy and Goodneſs, which ſince Chriſtianity hath taken firmer Root and Settlement, forbids any to be made Slaves, or ſold, though under pretence of Neceſſity, but to be relieved. And moſt full of Equity is that Law and Cuſtom of our own, of putting ſuch Children Apprentices, as we borrow the word, whoſe Parents are not able to keep them. So as we diſtinguiſh betwixt Service and Slavery, as well in point of time as to the quality of the Bondage.

A.D. 391.

Tito Fabio Tatiano & L. Aurelio Symmacho Coſs.

Theodoſius provides againſt the ſlavery of Children.

L. un. de Patribus qui filios diſtraxerunt. Cod. Th. lib. 3. tit. 3. Dat. id. Martii Mediol. ad Tatianum.

In Servitium dantur non ſervitutem ut recte Gothof. de Chriſtianorum uſu in h. l.

92. From Milan Theodoſius departed for the Eaſt, by the way of Concordia, where in the Month of May he made three Edicts in matters belonging to Religion, and came to Vincentia in the parts of Venetia, whence alſo beare Date three other Laws of Secular concernment. The firſt of theſe takes care for preſerving Removes toward the Eaſt by the way of Concordia.

the Rivers clean and pure, where the Legions lay incamped and were wont to drink, that no filth ſhould be derived down into them, nor that the Souldiers ſhould be obſcene in ſhewing their naked Bodies in the Water; but if they would ſwim, they ſhould do it towards the Mouths of the Rivers, and below the uſual Incampings of the Army. This was agreeable to the Uſe and Cuſtom of the Romans, who appointed the place of Swiming at Rome down and below the River, that ſo no Sordes or Filth might come down, and the Common Poculum (as a River is often called) might not be polluted. And, however Nakedneſs might be approved by the Lacedæmonians, who cauſed their Youth to Exerciſe without their Cloaths, as well Men as Women; yet amongſt the Romans it was eſteemed Immodeſt and obſcene, Ennius accounting it the beginning of Naughtineſs, to uncover ones ſelf amongſt the People. This Conſtitution ſeems principally intended for the Francks or Germans, who, as we have ſeen in the Hiſtory of Jovian his Retreat, after Julians death, were very expert in Swiming, and therefore took much delight in that Exerciſe. And indeed the Law it ſelf is directed to Richomer, under the Title of Comes and Magiſter utriuſque Militiæ, or of both Horſe and Foot; and with the Attribute of Sublimis Magnificentia tua. This Richomer, a Noble Frank by Birth, was very eminent at this time, both in reſpect of his great Command, of his Valour and Military Experience, and alſo of the high Favour he was in with the Princes of theſe times. We have ſeen how he was imployed by Gratian, as Comes Domeſticorum, and into Thrace, to the aſſiſtance of Valens with Profuturus and Trajan; and upon other Occaſions. Under Valentinian he had now the place which this Law mentions, and upon the Rhine as it's thought. Under Theodoſius he was deſigned Conſul and imployed againſt Maximus the Tyrant with good ſucceſs, and with him he returned into the Eaſt, and was deſigned General of the Horſe againſt Eugenius the Uſurper, but died before the Expedition. Great kindneſs and Entercourſe by Letters paſſed betwixt him and Symmachus the Conſul of this year, as alſo Libanius the Sophiſt, to whom he was dear, as well upon the Account of his Pagan Perſwaſion in matters of Religion, as otherwiſe. And now of late his Memory hath been Precious to James Gothofred, that learned Commentator upon Theodoſius his Code, upon the account of his Original, which in Favour to the French Nation he hath revived as much as he could, upon Occaſion of this Law being directed to him.

L. 13. de re militari. Cod. Th. lib. 7. tit. 1. & L. 12. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. 6. Kal. Jun.

Vide Gothofr. in Com. ad h. l.

The Emperors give Perſons liberty to diſpoſe of their Eſtates.

93. On the ſame day, the Emperors, who were ſtill together, after Grave and Mature deliberation, thought fit to Repeal a certain Law, made of later times for reſtraining Perſons from alienating their Eſtates. Of old by the Roman Law any one might freely alienate, except in certain few Caſes, as appears by many Paſſages, even in the time of Diocleſian. But it ſeems that Conſtantine the Great was moved to change the Cuſtom by ſome that more affected the preſcripts of the Moſaick Law in things of this Nature, whereby the neareſt a Kin might redeem and recover the Inheritance from ſuch as were ſtrangers to the Lineage. Conſtantine thought this Moſaick Rule conſonant enough to Chriſtian Life, and to have a ſhare of Equity and Decorum in it, that though every man might ſell how and to whom he pleaſed, yet the Kindred, Conſort, or Joynt Purchaſer or Tenant in Common might have the firſt Refuſal, offering as much as another would give. And when the Seller ſhould receive the ſame Price, Profit or Advantage, what Inconvenience could ariſe, but that a reſpect ſhould be had to Kindred and Conſortſhip? For, as for Kindred, great is the Dearneſs and Affection which is wont and ought to be betwixt thoſe that deſcend from the ſame Anceſtor; and it's a Seemly as well as Prudent thing, that an Inheritance be not alienated from an antient Family. It makes alſo for Advantage and Reputation of Bargains and Entercourſe, that a conſideration be had to Conſortſhip. However the Emperors thought fit to repeal this Law, as a grievous injury, covered over, as they ſay, with a vain Pretence and Show of Equity or Honeſty, ſo as they leave it free to every man “ to make choice of what Buyer he pleaſeth. And Juſtinian afterward, or “ Tribonian rather, admitted this their Repeal into his Code, yet with this Proviſo, or Exception: If any Law in Special prohibited any Perſon to uſe ſuch liberty in the Sale. Which Exception is not added in relation to Kindred or Conſorts, but to others in general terms. For both of old time and henceforth beſides an acknowledged agreeableneſs that Relations and Conſorts ſhould be preferred, ſeveral ſorts of Perſons challenged a Right of Præemption; as perſons that Inhabited the ſame Town; when Sale was made of a Debtors goods. He that was both Creditor and Kinſman ſhould be preferred before a meer Creditor on equal terms, but a meer Creditor before a meer Kinſman: and of Creditors he who was moſt deeply concerned; moreover, Contracts begat a Right of Præemption, as alſo the Holding of Lands in that way, which they called Emphyteuſis.

L. 6. de Contrahenda Emptione. Cod. Th. lib. 3. tit. 1. & L. 14. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

Vide Gothofr. com. in L. Cod. Th. & Notas aliorum in L. Cod. Juſt.

94. In like manner, long after this and Juſtinians Law, by a Conſtitution of the Emperor Romanus Lacapenus the Elder, to five ſeveral ſorts of Perſons this Right of Præemption was allowed; if they were Partners and kindred; if they had any Society and Fellowſhip with the Seller. Sometimes the poor were preferred in buying the Poſſeſſions of the Rich, (which again was Repealed) a Neighbour before a Stranger, and at length by univerſal conſent, as it were, all Laws and Cuſtoms again returned to this Centre, by two ſorts of Recoveries called Gentilitius Retractus and Feudalis. Hereby, though liberty was given to ſell to any Perſon an Inheritance, yet might the next Heir at Law, as we ſay, or the Lord, retract and make void this Sale. And upon theſe foundations were built ſeveral Laws and Conſtitutions of Saxons, Italians and others, whereby the old Law of Conſtantine was reſtored, with various amplifications: and here in our own Country the Law of Fees and Settlements cut off from many Perſons the liberty of diſpoſing of their own Eſtates. But, as to our preſent buſineſs; the Emperors repealed the Law of Conſtantine, upon the ſuggeſtion, as it ſeems, of Flavianus the Præfectus Prætorio of Illyricum and Italy to whom it is directed, who indeed had the Eſteem of a notable, and very wiſe man, but he was a Pagan, and therefore averſe to any thing of Moſaical Laws, or of Chriſtian Convenience and Honeſty according to that Pattern. But by another Branch of this and the ſame Conſtitution (though now made another Law) they tell us that what they did herein “ was done not without long deliberation; and therefore they declare that no Per- “ ſon whatſoever, ſhall pretend Ignorance of their Conſtitutions, nor diſſemble the “ knowledge of them, being ſo weighed by long deliberation. It's a moſt known and approved ſaying that, the ignorance of Law excuſeth no man, part of which theſe premeditated or adviſed Conſtitutions made; as for Reſcripts they indeed were of more private concernment, being Anſwers to ſuch matters as were propounded to them for their Opinion and Determination, and yet ſuch as have been entred amongſt theſe Laws and regiſtred in the received Books, being fitted to all other caſes of the ſame Nature, have alſo the force of Law. And indeed this being at firſt intended to put in Execution the Conſtitution for repealing Conſtantines Law, that none might pretend Ignorance to it, or diſſemble it, hath been afterwards applied to all other Conſtitutions of Princes ſo adviſedly made. Flavianus was, as we ſee, Præfect both of Italy and Illyricum, and no wonder, Probus having been formerly both of Italy, Illyricum and Africk, and Gall was ſome time alſo under his care. And by Illyricum, whatever Zoſimus or others have written, all Illyricum is to be meant, which was under the Empire of the Eaſt, and one Governor; till the death of Valentinian the Younger; after which it became divided into Eaſtern and Weſtern, and the former fell to the ſhare of Theodoſius.

L. 2. de Conſtit. Princip. & Edict. Cod. Th. lib. 1. tit. 1. & L. 12. Cod. Juſt. de Juris & Facti Ignorantia hinc tranſlata eſt.

Theodoſius removes to Aquileia.

95. From Vincentia, Theodoſius removed to Aquileia; whence he ſent before him an Edict to Proculus the Præfect of Conſtantinople againſt the extravagant humour of appealing. Of old time it was lawful twice to appeal, becauſe of the Diverſity and ſubordination of Magiſtrates: as from the Prætor to the Præfect of the City, and from him to the Prince himſelf, but this being very dilatory in the Defendant, and many times defrauding the right owner of his Goods, at leaſt deferring his injoyment of them, he thought fit to bridle this liberty, by Ordaining that he who “ had already received two Judgements or Sentences in the ſame Cauſe, and both “ againſt him, ſhould be forced to quit the ſaid Goods, and the poſſeſſion of them be “ transferred upon the other or adverſe Party, till the thing ſhould be determined. “ This puniſhment of transferring poſſeſſion is otherwiſe impoſed in caſe of Contumacy or Knavery, by the Laws. As it was lawful twice to appeal, ſo Juſtinian afterwards forbade it to be done the third time; but Athalarich the Gothick King prohibited the ſecond. It ſeems by the Inſcription and Date of another Conſtitution, that Valentinian accompanied his Colleague thus far on his way Eaſtward. For on the ſame day we find another Edict directed from the ſame Place to Magnillus the Vicar of Africk (though not ſaid to be received at Hadrumetum till the beginning of the following year) which was in his Diſtrict. The Exactors, as they were called, or Officers of the Treaſury, whoſe work it was to diſtrain on the Goods of ſuch as were Debtors to the Publick, and to expoſe them to Sale, often covenanted fraudulently with the Buyers, to ſell them under worth, and receive

Where he bridles the liberty of Appealing.

L. un. de poſſeſſione ab eo qui bis provocaverit, transferenda. Cod. Th. lib. 11. tit. 38. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt. Dat. 16. Kal. Jul. Aquileiæ.

L. 3. de Fide & Jure Haſtæ Cod. Th. lib. 10. tit. 17.

ſome Profit themſelves over and beſides, or beſtow them as Favour or Intereſt inclined them. Valentinian, to obviate this fraud, ordains, “ That the Thing received in Pledge ſhall be prized before it be ſet to Publick Sale, it being Notified “ what Meaſure ſhall be taken of the Worth by Two Standards, Viz. the Quality of the Moveable Thing, or the Quantity of the Revenue. And in Caſe “ it was found, that ſuch Goods or Lands were ſold at an under Rate, the Sale of “ them ſhould be reſcinded, as had been practiſed by the Ancient Laws in other Dues “ owing to the Exchequer.

L. 16. Cod. Juſt. de reſcindend. venditione. Dat. 13. Kal. Jul. Aquil. Acc. Id. Jan. Hadrumeti, Poſt Cons. Tatiani & Symmachi V V.C.C

Thence to Theſſalonica.

96. Theodoſius in his way to Conſtantinople came to Theſſalonica, where he found the Affairs of Macedonia in a great Perturbation; For, the Barbarians, who having been mixed with others in his Army, had revolted from him Three Years before, when he moved againſt the Tyrant Maximus, had betaken themſelves to Lakes and Fenny Places; and, while he was buſied in the Civil War, thence made Excurſions, and Havock of all things in Macedonia and Theſſaly, without Controll. But when the Fame of his Victory and Returne arrived, they again betook themſelves to their Lurcking Holes, and Places of Security in the Faſtneſſes, whence they privily ſtole out by Night; and having made their Depredations, retired again, when Day appeared; ſo that the Emperor imagined they were Spirits and Apparitions, rather than Men. Being doubtful in Mind what to do, Zoſimus tell us this Story of an Adventure he made, ill Conſiſtent with that Sloth and Luxury he uſually aſcribeth to him. He made Choice of Five Perſons to accompany him, to whom he gave in Charge, That each ſhould take Three or Four Horſes with him, that when one tired, another might be at Hand for the Rider. Making his Purpoſe known to none, with them in a Diſguiſe he ranged about the Country, and when he wanted Refreſhment, went to ſome Country-houſe or other to get Victuals. At length he came to a ſmall Inne, kept by an Old Woman, and ſhe received and entertained him Civily with Wine, and other Conveniences; and here he was perſwaded to lodge all Night. When he was retired into his Chamber, he eſpied a certain Man, who would anſwer no Queſtions, but ſeemed to have a Deſire to Conceal himſelf. Theodoſius hereat calls up the Woman, and asks who he was. She profeſſes her Ignorance as to that Point; but confeſſes, that ſince the Report of the Emperors Returne out of the Weſt with his Army, this Man was wont to lodge at her Houſe, to go out in the Morning, and be abroad all the Day, then at Night again to return as from Work, to his Supper and Lodging. He makes Uſe of her Information, and ſeizing the Man, Commands him to ſhew his Condition, and manner of Being, which he obſtinately refuſeth, though beaten, till he cauſed his Men to prick him with their Swords. and declared himſelf to be the Emperor. Then he confeſſed he was a Spie, ſent by the Barbarians, that lay in the Fenns, to liſten where he was, or what Places or Perſons might beſt be ſet upon and overcome.

Zoſimus lib. 4. p. 771.

His Exploit againſt the Barbarians.

97. The Emperor preſently cauſed his Head to be ſtruck off, and going to the Army, which lay at no great diſtance, led it to the Place where he had learnt the Barbarians lodged, and falling upon them, cut in Pieces a great Number of every Age and Condition, partly drawing them out of the Fenns, and partly killing them in the Waters. Timaſius, one of his Officers, admiring his Valour, deſired his Favour in behalf of his Soldiers, who being ſtarved almoſt for hunger, were not able any longer to indure the toile of drawing the Barbarians out of their retiring Places, that they might take a little Refreſhment. He granted his Requeſt; and the Trumpet Sounding to a Retreat, the Soldiers left off their Purſuit. But going to their Repaſt, and being now overcome with Wine, as well as Labour and Toil, they fell faſt aſleep; and the Remainders of the Barbarians having notice of it, with Swords, or ſuch things as they had at Hand, fell upon them, and killed many, amongſt whom, you muſt know, the Emperor himſelf had miſcarried, and with him all his Army; but that ſome who had not compleatly dined, ran to his Pavilion, and gave him notice of what had hapned. The Emperor was diſturbed at the News; but thought it beſt to run away, as he did with thoſe he had about him. It hapned well for him and his, that Promotus, another of his Captains, whom he had lately ſent for, meeting them in their ſpeed, deſired of him, that he would look to the Preſervation of himſelf, and followers, and leave him to deal with the villanous Barbarians, whom he would ſufficiently Chaſtiſe for their Contumacy. He fell upon them, and meeting ſuch as yet hovered about to catch the Soldiers napping, he laid them aſleep ſo faſt, that few of them ever waked to carry any News into the Fenns of the Succeſs of the Sally. Such were the Adventures that befell Theodoſius in his Return, after the Defeat of Maximus, as Zoſimus tells us; who, though he relates relates a Story, wherein the Emperor was admired for his Valour, yet keeps true to his Principle of adding a Sting to the Tail of his moſt Favourable Narrations. We can tell the Reader farther, That though Theodoſius attempted fully to Suppreſs thoſe Rovers by Force of Arms; yet finding that Courſe not fully Effectual, what he could not do by his Sword, it being too late, he was reſolved to effect by his Pen. By this, he gives free Liberty to all the Provincials (of Macedonia, to whom the Edict is directed) to make Reſiſtance againſt Soldiers or Private Perſons; who by Night ſhall enter their Grounds, or lye in wait in the High-ways; and to kill them who had a Deſign to deſtroy others; it being better to prevent a Miſchief, than afterwards to have ones Death Revenged. He Charges, that none ſpare that Soldier, againſt whom a Weapon was to be prepared as againſt a Thief. This he did very ſeaſonably, the Provincials doubting, whether they might by Arms make any Reſiſtance againſt theſe Thieves; it being declared for Law formerly, That no Private Man ought to levy War, without the Knowledge and Approbation of the Emperor; but in Caſe of Foreign Invaſions, every Man became a Soldier againſt Publick Enemies. Being arrived at Conſtantinople, he found Complaints of ſuch as had alienated their Lands, that they were ſtill conſtrained to pay the uſual Ceſſe, or Capitatio, for them. He Publiſhed an Edict to Tatianus, Commanding, That every New Owner of a thing of ſuch Nature, ſhould preſently, after his becoming Poſſeſſor, cauſe his Name to be entred into the Regiſter, or Ceſs-Book, for ſo much as he was become Owner, and to ingage to pay what was due for it, to the End that the old Proprietor might not be troubled for what was now out of his Hands.

Sect.4.

A.D. 391.

L. 2. ad Legem Corneliam de Sicariis Cod. Th. lib. 9. tit. 14. & L. 1. Cod. Juſt. Quando liceat cuicuiq; ſe vindicare vel publicam devotionem. Dat. Kal. Jul. Ad Provinciales.

L. ult. ſine Cenſu. Cod. Th. lib. 11. tit. 3. Dat. 15. Kal. Octob. Conſtantinop. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

Theodoſius at Conſtantinople.

A.D. 392. Arcadio Aug. & Fl. Rufino Coſs.

98. Shortly after Theodoſius his Arrival at Conſtantinople, followed the CCCXCII. Year of Our Lord, wherein Fl. Arcadius Auguſtus the ſecond time, and Fl. Rufinus were Conſuls. Tatianus continued Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt till the Month of July or Auguſt, and then was ſucceeded by Rufinus: and Apodemius exerciſed the ſame Authority through Illyricum. Theodoſius now again this Year ſhewed himſelf a great favourer of the Curiæ. Having formerly condemned Poſſeſſors of Lands (though by Bargain and Sale) to a Penſion anſwerable unto them, and forbidden any Grounds, or Slaves, belonging to Curiales, to be ſold without a Decree obtained for ſo doing: He now further ordained, “That in caſe a Man married the Daughter of a Curialis, if he paid no Service to the Court, and having no Children, was made Heir by her in her Teſtament, he ſhould be forced to the Services of the Corporation. In like manner, if an Actuary were found to be the Son of a Curialis; though much favour was wont to be indulged to ſuch, as thoſe who in the Army paſſed the Accounts of the Souldiers, (what Pay was due to each, and ſignified what Arrears were behind, to the Suſceptor) yet he muſt alſo be condemned to the Functions of theſe Courts. “Though at his firſt coming to the Government he had granted Immunity to all the Curiales from Stripes and Tortures; yet afterward he reſtrained it to Particular Perſons; and now this Year again, doth he deveſt thoſe called Principales of that Privilege, if ſo be theſe Men (who gathered the Tributes) were owing any thing to the Treaſury. In Caſe they were ſolvent and clear, he allowes it them by an Edict directed to Potamius the Præfectus Auguſtalis, whom he charges to ſee it performed under pain of a Fine to be incurred both by himſelf and his Office. It ſeems, that at this time there were Complaints made concerning the oppreſſion of theſe Citizens by the Civil Officers, and well might it ſo happen, when they who were to relieve them, contributed themſelves to the Grievance. For it appears they ſo did by another Edict directed to this ſame Potamius this very Spring, wherein he Commands, “That thoſe called Defenſores ſhall not carry themſelves inſolently or unjuſtly, but only do that Duty which their Name imports. That they impoſe no Mulcts, nor put any to Torture; but defend the Common People and Decuriones from the Inſolency and Raſhneſs of Bad Men; ſo that they may not indeed ceaſe to be what they are called. As for Mulcts, the Rule in general was, That none by Law could impoſe them, but thoſe to whom was committed publick Judicature, inſomuch that neither a Curator of the Common-wealth, nor the Procurator of Cæſar, could do it; therefore neither could theſe Defenſores, who were ſcarcely to be numbered amongſt Magiſtrates; though, as the Emperours expreſs it, they were in the ſtead of Parents to the Common People and Decuriones, and as their Children did protect them. “They are alſo here forbidden to examine any by Torture, being not in Capacity in thoſe days as much as to Impriſon, though afterwards this, in ſome meaſure, was indulged them. But the great Argument Theodoſius uſeth for keeping them within their Bounds, is taken from Takes care to ſupply the Curiæ.

Repreſſeth the Extravagancies of the Defenſores.

L. 124. de Decurionibus. Cod. Th. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

L. 125. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

L. 126. de Decurionib. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

L. 2. de Defenſorib. Civitatum. Cod. Th. lib. 1. tit. 11. & L. 5. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. 3. Non. Mart. Conſtp.

from their Names or Title of their Employment. He bids them only attend to, or Execute the Office of their Names; and to ſee only to this, that they may not ceaſe to be what they are called. Thus are other Perſons, in this and other Ages, frequently admoniſhed to their Duty by ſignification of their very Names, as Biſhops, Clerks, Philoſophers, Monks, and Chriſtians in general. But the Ægyptians ſeem moſt, of all other Nations, to have ſtood in need of this Admonition; of whom both the Writers of this Time, and more Ancient Days do teſtifie, that they were turbulent, factious, light, and injurious; nay, ſo vain and inconſiderate in their extravagancies, as ſtill to covet Innovations; and for this End they turned Ballad Makers, Libellers, Aſtrologers, Southſayers; and what not? And it is not improbable, that Potamius now going into Ægypt to take upon him the Office of Præfectus Auguſtalis in the room of Hypatius, had this Law, amongſt other things, given him in his Inſtructions; which were uſually drawn, as the preſent ſtate of Affairs required.

Nominis ſui tantum jungantur officio. Ut de tantum quod eſſe dicuntur, eſſe non deſinant. Vide Goth. Com. in h. L. Alexandrini & Antiocheni ab Auſonio ita audiunt: Vitiorum turbida vulgo. Utraq; & amentis populi malè ſana tumultu.

99. As by this Edict Theodoſius reſtrained theſe Defenders of the Cities from doing what was contrary to the Signification and Importance of their Name; ſo five Weeks after, abating one Day, he required more fully of others of them, what their Name Imported. For at this time, great Robberies were frequently committed throughout the Regions of the Eaſt; partly, becauſe the Offenders were not ſought after and puniſhed, which gave them ſtill Hopes of Impunity; and partly, becauſe they had Men in Power, their Patrons, which bore them out in their Enormities. To prevent them, he requires, that Defenſors be choſen out of the moſt honeſt “ and diligent Perſons, which may watch againſt theſe Enormities. Such care “ did Theodoſius take for defending his own Subjects of the Eaſt, from open and publick violence, and as we may conclude with good Succeſs. Happy had it been for himſelf and his Colleague, could he have procured for him any ſuch ſafeguard from Clandeſtine Attempts upon his Perſon. All this year we hear nothing of any Laws made by Valentinian in the Weſt, which ſilence one might be a little inclined to take as an ill Omen; for it ſo hapned with his Brother Gratian in that which uſhered in his diſmal Tragedy. And this very Year was Valentinian found ſoddainly ſtrangled in his Palace, as Epiphanius exactly notes the time; On the Ides (or fifteenth) of May, on Whitſun Eve, or the Saturday preceding it, and was carried forth the Day following, or on Whit-ſunday, which was then the twenty ſecond Day of the Ægyptian Month Pachon, the twenty third of the Greek Month Artemiſius, and according to the Romans, the ſeventeenth of the Calends of June. Having been given to underſtand in Gall, that the Barbarians hovered over the Borders of Italy; to provide for the ſafety thereof, he had reſolved to repair thither, and removed for that purpoſe to Vienna, thence to march, as occaſion ſhould ſerve, to the Alps. There was now with him Arbogaſtes, a Franck by Nation, who, by the Emperor Gratian, had been preferred to the Dignity and Power of Magiſter Militum in the next place after Bauto. Gratian being dead, by his Induſtry, and Kindneſs to the Souldiers, he obtained ſuch Authority, for his Military Skill, and Contempt of Money, that he advanced himſelf to the Chief Command, even without the warrant and conſent of Valentinian; and having got great Wealth, now in effect, exerciſed Dominion over him; ſo that he would contradict and hinder any thing by him ordained, if he ſo pleaſed, how juſt and prudent ſoever. The young Emperour hence conceived as great Indignation as the Importance of the thing Merited, but his Neck being thus yoaked, nothing could he do, againſt one whom the great Favour of the Souldiers protected. Yet conſulting now about the Expedition into Italy, and finding him again oppoſing what he deſigned, he could not contain himſelf, but drawing his Sword, attempted to kill him, which ſome of the By-ſtanders hindred, by plucking back his Arm. Being asked why he ſuffered himſelf to be ſo tranſported, he anſwered, He would kill himſelf rather than be Emperor and not obeyed. Zoſimus writes, that Valentinian, bearing this oppoſition moſt heavily, often ſet himſelf againſt him, but to no purpoſe. At length, not able any longer to indure to be ſubject to him, as he ſate on his Throne, ſeeing Arbogaſtes come towards him, with an Angry Countenance, he reached him a Paper, wherein was contained an Abrogation of his Command; which having read, he told him plainly, That he neither gave him his Command, neither ſhould it be in his Power to take it from him. Which having ſpoken, he tore the Paper, and caſting it from him on the ground, went his way.

L. ult. de Defenſ. Cod. Th. & l. 6 Cod. Juſt eod. tit. Dat. 6. Id. Apr. Conſtp.

De Ponder & menſur. Vide Baroni ad h. An.

Vide Sigonium de Occid. Imp. p. 214. Zoſimum lib. 4. p. 774.

Valentinian oppoſed by Arbogaſtes.

Philoſtorgius.

In Effect a Priſoner.

100. Things growing to this Extremity, Valentinian continued in a manner a Priſoner, and beſieged by Arbogaſtes, who deprived him of his Royal Service and Attendance,

Sect. 4.

A. D. 392.

tendance, and reduced him to little better Eſtate than that of a Private Perſon, committing the Charge of the Army to his own Countrymen and Creatures the Francks, and drawing off from him his Domeſticks to ſuch diſreſpect, that very few dared either to hold any familiar Diſcourſe with him, or obey any of his Commands. In this Preſſure and Affliction he ſent to Theodoſius, beſeeching him to pity his Condition, affirming with an Oath, That if he did not ſpeedily relieve him, he would make his Eſcape, and come to him. They in Italy now apprehending great Danger of an Invaſion to be made by the Barbarians; Ambroſe, the Biſhop of Milan, was perſwaded by the Honorati of that City to undertake a Journey to Valentinian, and deſire his Preſence in that Country. He readily yielded, but the Day following received ſome Letters, which acquainted him how the Manſions upon the ways were furniſhed, and preparation made, which ſignified, that the Emperor would ſpeedily be with them; whereupon, with their Conſent, he ſtopped his Journey. But this begat a Rumor, that Ambroſe was coming, and upon what account; whereat Valentinian very much rejoyced, hoping, that by his means, the poſture of his Affairs might be much amended, and when he ſaw he came not, he wrote to him, deſiring him that he would haſt into Gall, not there to preſide in any Synod, but to initiate him by the Holy Sacrament of Baptiſme. Indeed he had good hopes, that by his Authority with Arbogaſtes, (which the Biſhop confeſſed afterward was great; ſo that had he been preſent, he could have ſweetned Matters between them) he might draw him off to more moderate Councils; and having received his Letters, he preſently put himſelf upon the way; but e're he had well paſſed the tops of the Alpes, he underſtood that he was murdered, which came to paſs after this manner. Arbogaſtes was now ſo accuſtomed to Power, and his own Will, that he could not think of any thing but how to continue it. He had reaſon to think he had done already too much; and this prompted him ſtill to do more, both to keep his Authority, and prevent a Reckoning, which elſe he could not but conclude he might make at laſt to his ſmall advantage; for, fear of Puniſhment or deſpair of Pardon, uſually produceth the greateſt and laſt Enormity in Treaſon, and procures, that there is little diſtance betwixt the Priſons and Graves of Princes. There was then in Court one Eugenius, a Man ſo excelling in the learning of that Age, that he profeſſed Oratory, and opened a School for ſuch as would be inſtructed in that Art. He was exceedingly prized by Richomer, as a very Elegant and pleaſant Perſon, and he recommended him to Arbogaſtes, with deſire that he would admit him into the company of his familiar friends, as one who would ſtand him in ſtead, if ever he ſhould have occaſion to try his Friendſhip. He took his word, and after the departure of Richomer into the Eaſt with Theodoſius, uſed him with ſo much Familiarity and Confidence, that there was nothing of Moment but he communicated it to him, and in all things asked his Advice.

Is murdered.

101. Concluding, Zoſimus tells you, That in reſpect of his great Learning, and the Gravity of his Manners, he was moſt fit, of all others, to make a good Emperor, he broke the buſineſs to him; But he was offended therewith, inſomuch that he was put to the trouble of Comforting and perſwading him not to reject ſo great things as now were offered him by Fortune. Having prevailed with him, he reſolved that Valentinian was firſt to be taken out of the way before he could be promoted; and therefore as he lay at Vienna, and was exerciſing ſome Souldiers near the Wall of the Town, he ſlew him, when he leaſt expected any ſuch Attempt. Some ſay, That he hired the Eunuches, that waited on him in his Chamber, to fall upon him, and ſtrangle him, when he was aſleep, or while alone he beheld an Exerciſe of the Soldiers from his Window, which done, they tied a Cord about his Neck, and hung him up, (as if he himſelf had choſen to dye by the Halter, and his own hands) to avoid the Suſpicion of the Murder. To ſuch an End came this young Prince in the ſeventeenth year of his Reign, counted from his Promotion, and the twenty ſeventh of his Age but begun; a Perſon of ſingular Hopes, and one of whom Zoſimus himſelf ſpeaks no Ill at parting, though upon the Account of his Religion he could not bear him any good will, as we may ſee hereafter. There are certain Laws extant in the Code of Juſtinian, which bear the name of Valentinian, and his two Colleagues, Father and Son, which being not marked by any year, by reaſon of the Names of the Conſuls, and their bearing no Date of any Day, cannot be aſſigned to any particular part of his Adminiſtration. Of ſuch as are fit to be taken notice of in this place, one declares to Potamius the Præfectus Auguſtalis, That the Exhibition, or ſetting forth the Curſus Publicus, ought to be committed, according to the “ Cuſtome of Places, either to the Curiales, the Cohortales, or thoſe whom the moſt “ Eminent “

L. 14. de Curſu publico Cod. Juſt. lib. 12. tit. 51.

Vide Com. Goth. in l. 51. de Curſu publico. Cod. Th. L. 4. de Officio Præf. urbi. Cod. Juſt, lib. 1. tit. 28.

L. 1. de Colonis Illyricanis. Cod. Juſt. lib. 11. tit. 52. & L. 1. de fugitivis colonis Cod. Juſt. lib. 11. tit. 63.

Eminent Præfects appoint to that Charge, after ſufficient Caution taken for their “ Fidelity. So Tribonian hath made up his Law; whereas that of Theodoſius, out of which this is Interpolated, mentions only Curiales, which live at convenient Diſtance, and are ſufficiently Rich, and otherwiſe fit. By another Edict it ſeems, that the Power of the Præfect of the City became queſtioned within his own Diſtrict, whilſt that of the Præfecti Prætorio was rampant ſtill in thoſe Days. For there ſtood need of a Declaration thereof, as appears by a Law directed to Severinus the Comes Largitionum, wherein is expreſſed, That all the ſeveral Bodies, or Companies in Conſtantinople, together with all the Citizens and Common Sort, ſhall be ſubject to his Government. But the Præfect of this City was but of late ſtanding, and therefore might his Authority be more queſtioned. In thoſe Days great Complaint was made of Husbandmen, ſuch as were bound to the Service of the Place, their deſerting their Work, and running away; which drew forth ſeveral Laws for the recalling them and their Children, and Prohibiting the Entertainment of them by other Perſons. And now alſo, whether by reaſon of the Wars, which cauſed ſome to be difficult to inhabit, or becauſe of the Barrenneſs of Grounds themſelves, the Owners of them often forſook them, and the Tributes thence ariſing thereby failed. To prevent this miſchief, theſe Emperors declared, “ That “ in Caſe any other Perſons would apply themſelves to the Tilling and Manuring of “ theſe Lands, both for their own Private, and the publick Emolument, they would “ give them free leave ſo to do. But in Caſe the Owner of the Land came and demanded “ it within Two Years, he ſhould be reſtored to his former poſſeſſion, paying “ the Charge which the New Comer had been at in the Melioration of his Ground. “ If ſo be he were ſilent Two Years, he ſhould be utterly excluded from all Propriety “ in the Thing; the Neceſſity of the State ſo requiring it.

L. 8. de omni agro deſerto Cod. Juſt. lib. 11. tit. 58.

SECT. V.

From the Murther of Valentinian the Second, to the Death of Theodoſius the Great.

The ſpace of Two Years and Eight Months.

Zoſimus p. 776.

Eugenius declared Emperor.

Ric-meer maxime potens.

I. VALENTINIAN being dead, though by ſuch treacherous means, yet all kept ſilence at Vienna, out of reſpect to the Dignity of that Man who they knew procured it, and was in high Eſteem with them for his Valour, and eſpecially his Contempt of Money, which made the Soldiers to revere him. He preſently declared Eugenius Emperor, which they alſo the better digeſted, becauſe Arbogaſtes did it, and the Perſon himſelf promiſed much from the good Parts wherewith they knew him to be furniſhed. The new Emperor, or Uſurper, conforming himſelf fully to his Will who had given him the Power, to ſtrengthen that Title which he knew would be queſtioned, provided himſelf of a ſufficient Power of Men raiſed partly out of the Romans or Natives of the Empire, and partly out of the Galls, or Francks, and ſecured preſently all the Gallick Territories. But when the Rumor of the Murder of Valentinian flew further about, all Perſons were therewith affected, as became them; and above all others Theodoſius was exceedingly perplexed, grieving, that he had loſt a Colleague, and an Allye, in the Flowr of his Age, who had fal'n into the Hands of Men, that could not but be alienated from himſelf, and ſuch as were not to be deſpiſed, Arbogaſtes being Valiant and Bold, and Eugenius both Learned, and indued with other Virtues. This he both conſidered within himſelf, and let not to utter upon occaſion; and yet he reſolved once more to venture for all, and to make all Preparations poſſible for a War. He pitcht upon Richimer to Command his Horſe, having, upon divers occaſions, had ſufficient tryal of his Abilities, and upon ſeveral others, to have the Conduct of the Legions; but Richemer was taken away by Death, while as yet he deliberated upon the Expedition; and ſo he was conſtrained to betake himſelf to new Councils. In the mean time, that we may look Weſtward, the Siſters of Valentinian Redeemed his Body, and it was carried to Milan, there to be Interred. This, when Theodoſius underſtood, he wrote to Ambroſe the Biſhop to ſee his Funerals performed;

Sect. 5.

A.D. 392.

performed; which being done, he Compoſed a Treatiſe in his Commendation, and afterward publiſhed it, wherein this is conſiderable, That he affirms him young in Years, but as to Wiſdom and Council, an Old Man.

His Character of Valentinian

2. Having declared, how much they of Italy were obliged to him, for his Reſolution of hazarding his Perſon to preſerve them in ſafety, he adds, That he corrected the Errors of his Youth, even before he had learned any. He was reported at firſt to be much delighted with the Circencian Games; but this Blot he ſo far wiped off, that even on the Solemn Days of the Nativities of the Emperors, and for the Honour of the Imperial Majeſty, he thought not fit that they ſhould be Celebrated. Some reported of him, that he was ſo far delighted with Hunting, and taken up therewith, that he neglected Publick Buſineſs; whereupon he commanded all thoſe Wild Beaſts he had made uſe of that way, ſpeedily to be killed. His Ill-willers gave out, That he made too much haſt to Dinner; which underſtanding, he betook himſelf to ſuch a Courſe of Faſting, that moſt commonly he Feaſted thoſe about him, and eat nothing himſelf; thereby gratifying both Religion, and the Humanity of a Prince. There was a Report, that all the young Noble-men in the City were faln in Love with a Woman that Acted publickly upon the Stage; this Woman he commanded to be brought to Court. The Meſſenger was corrupted by Money, and returned without her; whereupon he ſent another, that he might not appear to deſire to reforme the young Noble-men, without Effect. Hence ſome took occaſion to Traduce him; but when the Woman came, he never ſo much as looked on her, but commanded ſhe ſhould be had away; both that his Commands might not be diſobeyed, and that he might admoniſh the Young Men to ceaſe to be inamoured of that Creature which was deſpiſed by him, though he had her in his Power. And this he did, being unmarried; and ſhewed himſelf as temperate, as if he had been bound in the Bonds of Wedlock. After this he falls into this Exclamation: Who ever was ſo abſolute a Lord over his Slave, as he was over his Body? Who ever was ſo ſevere a Judge of other Perſons, as he was a Cenſor of his own Age? To what purpoſe ſhould I ſpeak of his Piety? who when Noble and Opulent Perſons were accuſed before him of any Crime, and the Judge Aſſiſtant urged him to Severity, would anſwer, That no Bloody Act was to be Committed, eſpecially on Holy-days. After this the Biſhop laments, That he could not have timely Notice; that he might have interpoſed betwixt him and Arbogaſtes; whome he doubted not but to have drawn to Terms of Duty and Moderation.

Theodoſius prepares for War againſt the Uſurper.

3. But to return to Conſtantinople, we there find Theodoſius Vigorous in Preparations to Chaſtiſe the Uſurper, and thoſe that ſet him up: and that upon Principles of Honour, rather than what Zoſimus ſuggeſts, as the great Incentive to this Undertaking, This Writer, as in former Paſſages, he makes him to have been acted by Women, and eſpecially by his love to Galla, the Siſter of the Deceaſed Prince; ſo in this his Deſign alſo he inſinuates, That he was chiefly induced to the revenging of his Death by her Tears and Lamentations. He writes, That upon the News of it at Conſtantinople, ſhe made a Noiſe, and diſturbed all the Court with her Cries and Tears; whereas others place her Death before his at the Diſtance of no leſs than Two Years, or the CCCXC. Year of Our Lord. This hapned while her Husband was ſtill in the Weſt; and ſhe was Buried by his Son Arcadius; and at the ſame time was Erected in the Forum of Conſtantinople, not far from the Church, a Columne, on the Top wereof was placed the Statue of Theodoſius in Silver; as alſo that Year an Obeliſk in the Cirque of the City. Theſe probably were Erected upon occaſion of her Death, and to her Memory, who left only one Daughter behind her, viz. Galla Placidia, of which Lady we are like to hear much hereafter. What Motives ſoever Theodoſius had to the War, great Preparations he made for it both this and the following Year, which whether Eugenius was aware of or not, he ſent away as Ambaſſador to him one Rufinus an Athenian, to know of him, whether he would Conſent, that he ſhould Reign together with him, or reject his Advancement as null and frivolous. In his Negotiation he took no Notice at all of Arbogaſtes, nor brought any Letters from him. Theodoſius was wary, and uſed delays in his Anſwer, of which, while he conſidered, another Matter of Conſequence fell out. When firſt he came to the Government, he admitted ſome Perſons out of the Barbarous Nations to Friendſhip and Society in War, and ſought to oblige them by Gifts and fair Promiſes for the future. The Chief Captains of the ſeveral People he Courted, and ordinarily admitted to his Table. Amongſt theſe Men there was now riſen a Contention; for ſome of them were for breaking the Oath of Fidelity which they had taken when they were firſt received; and others of them Contended, that Vide Baron Annal. ad An. 390. num. ult.

Zoſimus.

Eugenius ſends to him to know his Inclinations towards him.

by no means their Faith was to be broken. Of the former Opinion was one Priulfus, who uſed Arguments to his Country-men, to Infringe their Oath, and Frauſtius was as Active in diſſwading his from committing any ſuch Abſurdity. For a long time nothing was known of this their Difference; but at laſt, being at the Emperors Table, and heated with Wine, they freely declared their Judgments, and flew ſo high, that he put an End to the Entertainment. Being gone from Court, they were ſo inraged by each others Words, that Frauſtius drew, and killed Priulfus; at which ſight, the Soldiers that were about them, were ſo netled, that they had done the like by Frauſtius himſelf, but that they were hindred by the Emperors Guards, which ſuppreſſed the Tumult. Theodoſius having Notice of what had paſſed, made little of it, but ſuffered them in this ſort to make an End one of another. As for the Ambaſſadors, he diſmiſſed them altogether deceived with his Preſents and fair Words, and, after their Departure, applied himſelf to Military Preparations.

He gives the Meſſengers good words.

4. This while he did, he neglected not Matters of Civil Concernment, as appears by ſeveral of his Conſtitutions. Upon the Courts of Corporations he ſtill had his Eye, upon the well Government of which depended the quiet of the ſeveral Provinces. As in the Schole of the Domeſticks, there was one Primicerius, or Head, whom followed Ten others of the Chief in Number; and as in the Great Senate, there was one they termed Princeps Senatus, who was firſt asked his Opinion; ſo in theſe Inferior Senates, there was one they called Primus; on whom now Theodoſius “ thought fit to confer the Honour and Degree of Comes of the Third Rank. “ Hereby he received Immunity from Tortures, and all Injuries, and poſſibly from all Collations or Charges belonging to Senators; but ſtill he will have him, for all this “ Honour, bound to the Duties and Ties ariſing from his Birth, as ſtill belonging to “ the Body, of which he was a Member. There was need at this Time of extending, “ though not this Honour, yet his Protection, to others of theſe Courts. For his Military Officers, whom we find to have been much Cheriſhed by him, out of reſpect to the need he frequently had of them, were now exceeding high, and miſerably oppreſſed the poor Curiales, eſpecially thoſe amongſt them called Principales, who Exacted the Tributes, and were to Protect the Country People; Beating and Torturing them at their Pleaſure. This appears by an Oration of Libanius, Publiſhed by Gothofred, which he made this very Year, as the Tranſlator concludes, upon great Preſumptions. For now Theodoſius took notice of this their Inſolence, by an Edict directed to Abandantius, by the Title of Comes, and Magiſter utriuſq; Militiæ; wherein he Charges and Commands, That Military Men have nothing at all to do “ with the Curiæ; nor meddle with that wherein they had no Authority: That no “ Tribune, be he Dux or Comes, offer to beat, abuſe, or touch any Principal Curialis, “ If any hereafter ſhall be ſo Raſh and Inconſiderate, as to dare to do it, or injure “ any of theſe Principal Men, he will have him know, that he ſhall incur a Fine “ of Ten Pounds of Gold.

He takes care for the Honour and Safety of the Curiales.

L. 127. de Decurionib. Cod. Th. Dat. prid. Kal. Jul. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

L. 128. ejuſd. tit. Cod. Th. & L. 42. Cod. Juſt. eod. Dat. prid. Kal. Aug.

5, About this Time the Country of Illyricum, for that the Barbarians had been very troubleſome to the Provinces thereof, or for other Reaſons, ſtood in great need of holding Aſſemblies, to make known and redreſs their Griefs; but there was ſome Doubt again, how they ought to be Called and Managed. To explain this Doubt, we find two ſeveral Edicts Inſcribed to Apodemius the Præfectus Prætorio of that Diſtrict, within the ſpace of ſeven Weeks and leſs; the one bearing Date on the Twenty Eighth of July, and the other of the Tenth of September. We have formerly told the Reader, how theſe Councils or Aſſembles of the Provinces were either Ordinary, (afterward by Honorius fixed to the Time Intervening from the Ides, or Thirteenth of Auguſt, to the Ides, or Thirteenth of September) held once a year, or elſe were Extraordinary, upon ſome preſſing Occaſion, which required ſome ſuddain help; when the Prince was to be ſent to, or the Præfectus Prætorio, who was next unto him. Concerning the latter Sort, or Extraordinary, he ſeems now Conſulted, and Anſwers, as to the Power by which, and the Time, at which they were to be Aſſembled. The Power of Calling or Appointing it, he “ declares to be in the Præfect, yet with the Aſſent of the Provincials, neither was he “ by his Authority to diſturb or govern it; as in the Church, (Gothofred tells you) “ the Right of Appointing the Times of Councils doth not infer any Abſolute Power. “ For the Place, he will have it Summoned to the Richeſt or moſt Populous City of “ the whole Province, which he ſignifies ought not to be grudged by others, as if “ they were thereby injured; for great Emulations there was wont to be betwixt “ them, and Contentions which of them ſhould have theſe Aſſemblies; in which the Judges

L. L. 12, 13. de Legatis &c. Cod. Th. & L. 5. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

He determines how and when Provincial Councils ſhould Aſſemble.

Sect.5. A.D. 392.

Judges ſhould Winter; and in other things, wherein their Profit was concerned. In the moſt Populous Cities, he will have the largeſt Places to be choſen for the Meeting, where moſt may come together, that matters relating to all may not be determined by a few. As for the Perſons which were to Conſtitute the Aſſemblies, he Wills, that all Sorts be admitted, and come thither; not only the Common People, and the Curiales, and Owners of Lands, but the Primates of Cities, Villages, or Caſtles, and all the Honorati, or ſuch as had borne Offices, except Perſons of Præfectorian Rank, or ſuch as had exerciſed the Office of Præfects. Thoſe in the former Law he would have Conſulted in their own Houſes; as the Laws allow Perſons of Dignity to give Teſtimony at Home, and to be gone to upon other Occaſions, to preſerve their Honour, and yet that their Advice may not be wanting. But in the latter, he alters his Mind, giving Liberty to all of Præfectorian Rank, or Primates, either to be preſent in the Aſſemblies, where Place and Reſpect ſhould be allowed them, according to their Quality, or, if they pleaſed, they might ſend their Proctors or Deputies to declare their Opinions; as in other Matters the Laws permit Dignified Perſons to make their Proxies, and ſometimes conſtraine them ſo to do. In the laſt Place, he will have that alone Authentick and Good, to which the Major Part ſhall aſſent, as is, and ever was the General Rule; however at this Day, in the Northern Parts of Europe, the Diſſent of one Deputy makes Fruitleſs the Meeting aud Debates of the whole Aſſembly.

Vide l. 25. de Procuratorib. Cod. Juſt. lib. 2. tit. 13.

6. Toward the latter end of this Year he received Information, true or falſe, That ſome Publick Officers or Governours of the Provinces Oppreſſed, and exerciſed Rapine, in the Places committed to their Truſt, againſt which Crime he now proceeded with all Severity. He directed a Conſtitution to Rufinus, lately advanced to be Præfectus Prætorio in the room of Tatianus, wherein he tells him, “That by former Laws, ſuch Judges as had afflicted the Provinces by the Crime he terms Peculatus, ſhould be ſubject to the Penalty of a Mulct. But foraſmuch as this Puniſhment is not adæquate to the Offence, nor the Vengeance taken ſuitable to the Sin, he is pleaſed to change it by a more ſevere Cenſure; that whereas ſcarcely can a Puniſhment be found fit for ſuch Wickedneſs, nor ſo great Villany be Expiated by Condign Torture, the Penalty Incurred ſhall be Death, and the Crime be Reſtrained by the moſt Severe Animadverſion. Indeed, by the Ancient Laws, one ſort of that they called Peculatus, viz. Converting the Publick Money, belonging to the Treaſury, (taken in War, or raiſed out of Mines) to ones own uſe, was puniſhed by a Forfeiture of Four-fold; and by this Name was alſo underſtood the Suppreſſion or Stealing of Monies, belonging to the Cities and Provinces. But Oppreſſion, and exerciſing Rapine upon the Subject himſelf, is alſo Signified by this Word, and the Wording of the Law ſeems to aim at the ſame Offence; of which Rufinus, the newly Advanced Præfect, either found, or made ſome Perſons Guilty. We muſt know, that of late he was crept into great Favour with the Emperour, and Contrived the Ruine of his Predeceſſor, and Accompliſhed it in this following manner, if you believe Zoſimus, whoſe Story that we may relate, we ſhall uſher it in with the ſame Reflexions that he makes upon Theodoſius.

Is Severe againſt Judges that oppreſs their Provincials.

Pridem fuerat conſtitutum ut hi Judices qui peculatu provincias quaſſaviſſent, multæ diſpendio ſubjacerent. Sed quoniam &c. L. 1. de Crimine Peculatus. Cod. Th. lib. 9. tit. 28. L. un. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. hinc à Triboniano deformata eſt.

7. Being Returned to Conſtantinople, (after his Diſguiſe, and the Succeſs of Promotus) he was much Elevated for the Victory he had obtained againſt Maximus; but being yet very ſad upon what the Barbarians attempted upon him, and his whole Army, he Reſolved to bid farewell to all Wars, and Contentions that way. Having committed to Promotus the Care of ſuch like Matters, he himſelf calling to mind his former Courſe of Life, made Magnificent Suppers, and was Curious in deviſing Pleaſures, frequenting the Theatres, and the Games in the Circus. And here, ſaith he, I cannot but admire the Humour of this Man, and his Courſe of Living, which was eaſily inclinable both ways. For, whereas by Nature he was Sluggiſh, and given to Supine Negligence, and the Vices above recited: and if no ſad or formidable Thing afforded him Trouble, he gave up the Reins to Luxury: yet if any ſuch Neceſſity preſſed him as indangered his Eſtate; he put off his Sloth, and bidding farewell to his Pleaſures, reſumed a Manly Courage, and Returned to a Laborious and Painful way of Life. Then again, though by ſuch Experience Inſtructed, when freed from his Cares and Fears, he would ſubject himſelf to the Vices of his Lazy and Slothful Genius, which by Nature were incident unto him. But of all his Officers, to whom he committed any Charge, the moſt he ſet by was Rufinus, a Celtick Gall by Nation, and Maſter of Zoſimus p. 773.

Zoſimus his Reflections upon him.

his Palatine Attendants. Him he truſted with the whole management, and none “ others he regarded, which gave Offence to Timaſius, and Promotus, that after ſo “ many Dangers and Labours ſuſteined for the Service of the Common-wealth, “ they ſhould be Eſteemed leſs than he. However, Rufinus wonderfully pleaſed “ with his good Fortune, and puffed up therewith, at a certain Publick Council, “ ſpake ſomething ſharply againſt Promotus; who, not able to bear it, ſtruck him on “ the Face. He preſently betook himſelf to Theodoſius, who, upon ſight of the “ Bruiſe, fell into ſuch a Paſſion, as to ſay, That except they would ceaſe to be Envious “ againſt Rufinus, they ſhould in a ſhort time ſee him Reign. Rufinus ſtill “ more Intoxicated with Pride and Ambition, after he had heard theſe Words, as he “ was fierce, and harſh towards all Men, in Particular he perſwaded Theodoſius to “ command Promotus out of the Court, to Exerciſe ſome Soldiers for the War. “ This having obtained, as he travelled into Thrace, he cauſed ſome Barbarians to “ lye in wait for him, and cut his Throat; a Man who had both contemned Riches, “ and had faithfully demeaned himſelf toward the Princes. But, ſaith our Writer, “
He was juſtly ſerved, for being imployed by thoſe, who ſo careleſly and impiouſly “ Adminiſtred the Affairs of the Common-wealth.

Rufinus the new Præfectus Pretorio cauſeth Promotus to be murdered.

8. The Rumor of this Villany flying every where, while it is in every Mans “ Mouth, and every Modeſt Perſon abhorreth it, Rufinus, as if he had done ſome “ worthy and conſiderable Matter, is deſigned Conſul. And now are Tatianus and “ Proculus his Son brought into trouble, though they had no otherwiſe offended “ him, than for that they were both Præfects, one of the Prætorium, and the other “ of the City, which Offices they had Exerciſed without Corruption, and as their “ very Duty of their Places obliged them. That his Deſigns againſt them might “ be brought about, Tatianus is firſt put out of his Place, and brought to his “ Tryal, Rufinus being advanced to be Præfect. For Forme and a Colour, others “ were joyned in Commiſſion with him to hear and judge him, but the Authority “ of paſſing Sentence reſerved to him alone. But becauſe Proculus ſufficiently “ knowing what he was to expect, had fled for his Safety, and Rufinus was afraid “ of him as an Induſtrious Man: Therefore, leſt he ſhould make ſome “ ſtir, and by his Wiſdom diſturb his Proſperous Condition, he Circumvented “ firſt his Father by Oaths, and other ſorts of Fraud, and perſwaded the Emperor “ to promiſe great Matters to them both, whereby the Old Man, from “ his True and Juſt Suſpicions, was brought to approve of vain Dreams, and “ by Letters to recall his Son. He being apprehended, is ſtraight Committed “ to Priſon, and his Father Confined to his own Country; and the Commiſſioners “ have often Meetings for Diſpatching the Proceſs againſt Proculus, “ whom at length, as had been agreed betwixt them and Rufinus, they Condemn “ to Death, to be Executed upon him at Sycæ, a Place not far diſtant “ from Conſtantinople, (now called Pera, and Galata) whither they Command “ him to be Conveyed. The Emperor conſidering of it, ſent after to ſtop “ Execution; but the Meſſenger received Inſtructions from Rufinus to move ſlowly, “ ſo that he came not to the Place before his Head was cut from his Shoulders. “ Such is the Story concerning theſe Two Eminent Perſons, their Tryal and Cenſure, which whetherſoever Juſt or Unjuſt, the Law we now mentioned is Rationally thought to have been part of the Reſcript obtained by Rufinus in order to their Examination, and ſuch Iſſue as they either Merited, or he Deviſed. The Country of Tatianus was Lycia, which hereupon he procured to be Infamous, but Four Years after was reſtored to its former Credit by Arcadius. The Day of the Execution of Proculus was the Sixth of December; of whoſe Death Claudian the Poet takes Notice, in his Firſt Book againſt Rufinus, againſt whom he inveighs for his unparallel'd Cruelty for Killing the Son, and Baniſhing the Father: And he takes Notice alſo of the Mercy of the Emperor, eluded thus by this Mercileſs Præfect.

Procures Proculus to be Beheaded.

Vide Chronic. Theod.

Eſſera torquebant avidæ præcordia curæ. Effugeret nequis gladios, neun perderet ullum, Auguſto miſerante, nefas, &c.

9. Little leſs than a month before the death of Proculus, or on the eleaventh of November, Theodoſius publiſhed an Edict in behalf of Married women, directed to Martinianus the Comes of the Eaſt at this time. In this he declares that he will have them injoy the ſame Honour and Nobility with their Husbands, and “ and that they anſwer upon any Impeachment in that Court of Juſtice where “ their Husbands ought to abide their trial, or to which their place of Habitation “ doth belong, which muſt be underſtood concerning their own private matters and cauſes; for in ſuch as reſpected the publick Charges or Functions belonging to Lands, they were to be owned and diſcharged where the Wife had her Original. As the Theodoſius publiſheth Edicts in behalf of Wives.

L. 7. de Juriſdictione & ubi quis conven. deb. Cod. Th. lib. 2. tit. 1. & L. ult. de Incolis Cod. Juſt.

the Wife received Honour and other Conveniences from her Husband, it was thought fit that ſome reſpect ſhould be ſhowed to him in way of Recompence for this, and all the Charge he ſuſteined by the Marriage. But by the former Laws Huſbands in certain Caſes found Ingagers or Sureties for preſerving and repaying the Dowers or Portions of their Wives, received with them; and, this might be more a Cuſtom in the Eaſt, where all ſorts of Places and Perſons abounded in Luxury, and men were wont to have very great Fortunes with their Wives. But this way of finding Sureties or giving Caution, now might juſtly ſeem very burthenſom in the Commonwealth, as that which diſturbed and perplexed the Eſtates of many Families, amongſt ſo many Mariages, ſo many Securities being required, and conditions of Perſons ſtanding in ſo ticklish a poſture, a man being rich to day, and often by ſome or other accident, eſpecially of War, reduced to Poverty the day following. This therefore Theodoſius thought fit to aboliſh at this time by another Edict directed to the ſame Martinianus, but rationally thought to have made up with the former, one and the ſame Conſtitution, by Gothofred, whoſe opinion concerning this Interpretation of the Law we gladly cloſe with, as moſt proper; but whereas he would have voluntary Agreements and Contracts alſo nulled by it, we cannot think that this extended to a mans own free and voluntary Act, which might be founded upon great Reaſon and Equity.

And Huſbands.

L. un de Fide juſſorib. Dotium. Cod. Th. lib. 3. tit. 15. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

10. The CCCXCIII year of our Lord had Theodoſius Auguſtus the third time, and Fl. Abundantius for Conſuls. Rufinus continued Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt; Apodemius of Illyricum and Italy; and Aurelianus was Præfect of Conſtantinople in the room of Proculus. Theodoſius opened the year by creation of a new Emperor, which was Honorius his younger Son, whom he promoted to that Dignity on the tenth of January. Betwixt the Death of Valentinian and the Advancement of Honorius hapned two Solar Eclipſes. One is mentioned by St. Hierom, who writes that it was ſeen with the conſternation of many Perſons about the days of Pentecoſt. But it hapned on the ſixth of June, one and twenty days after Whitſunday. And the ſame year there was another Eclipſe on the ſecond of December, which, becauſe it fell out ſome forty days before the Inauguration of Honorius, Marcellinus and Proſper writ as if it happened the ſame day, for which they are taxed by Jacobus Cappellus who alſo blames Calviſius for placing it at the twentieth of November. Theodoſius continued all this year at Conſtantinople, where, as he carried on his preparations for the enſuing year, ſo he made as great proviſion for the well governing of the Commonwealth by ſeveral Laws, and the more need there was of it, becauſe none at this time were made in the Weſt, where Eugenius the Uſurper had his abode; at leaſt that afterward were owned as Authentick. And thoſe which we meet with bearing the moſt early Date, are two ſeveral Edicts directed, the one to Rufinus, and the other to Drepanius, the Comes Rei Privatæ, for reſcinding the Acts of Tatianus, ſo as ſuch Goods or Eſtates as had fallen to the Treaſury by any Proſcriptions or Confiſcations made by him as Præfectus Prætorio ſhould be reſtored to the Owners if they were alive, or elſe if they had already ſuffered death, to their Heirs. Moreover, by another Law inſcribed to the ſame Rufinus, he takes off all extraordinary Taxes or Impoſitions laid by the ſaid Tatianus upon the Provincials, being Payments to be made of the Annonæ, or Proviſions for Uſe of the Army, out of, and beyond, the ordinary Tax or Preſtation. This Emperor lately, as we have ſeen, prohibited the Officers of his Army to Moleſt or Injure any of the Principal Curiales in intermedling with their Affairs, and ſo alſo he found Reaſon in the beginning of this Year to reſtrain their Interpoſing in the buſineſſes of all other private Perſons, by an Order directed to the Comites and Magiſtri utriuſque Militiæ; for to theſe Magiſtri was added the Dignity of Comites. He forbids, That they they give to any that Protection, which the Ordinary Judge of the Province was wont to afford to ſuch as had Reaſon to fear the Inſults or Violence of great Perſons, or to commit any thing Decreed by ſuch Judge to Execution by force of Armes. Hereby he only admits of their giving their Help and Aſſiſtance in publick Cauſes, which other Laws indeed do allow off; as to protect the Navicularii from ſuch as injured them; to ſearch for and apprehend Theives; to the Officers that collected the Tributes; to protect Churches, or the like. Although ſeaven years before this, Theodoſius had forbidden Souldiers thus to meddle, though aſſigned by a Judge, either in publick or private Buſineſſes, Yet was there neceſſity now to renew the prohibition.

A.D. 393. Theodoſio Aug. & Fl. Abundantio Coſs.

Advanceth his Son Honorius to the Dignity of Emperor.

In Eccleſiæ Chriſtianæ Centuria 4. ad An. 392.

He reſcinds the Acts of Tatianus.

L. L. 12, 13. de Bonis proſcriptorum. Cod. Th. Abſunt. à Cod. Juſt.

L. 22. de Annona & Tributis. Cod. Th. Dat. Prid. Id. Jan.

Reſtrains Military Officers from medling in Civil Matters.

L. unic. de Officio Judicum Militarium. Cod. Th. lib. 1. tit. 9. & L. 1. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. Conſtantinop. prid. Id. Feb.

11. Into

Sect. 5.

A.D. 393.

Aurelianus ſucceeds into the place of Proculus.

11. Into the place of Proculus, lately put to death, ſucceeded one Aurelianus, and, to him and to Rufinus joyntly, Theodoſius not long after gave out a Conſtitution, wherein he Conſulted for the Dignity and Emolument of the Senatorian Order, the good of the Curiales, and the Beauty and Ornament of their Cities. But that herein he might not look too much backward, he premiſeth this Conſideration, That all Conſtitutions, do not raiſe Calumnies to what is paſt; but impoſe Rules upon ſuch matters as are to come. As he thought fit to abrogate ſuch things as he was informed to have been unduly practiſed by Father and Son, ſo neither would he give way to great Reflections. And therefore he tells them that the Laws are intended to look forward and not backward, though ſometimes in certain caſes this Rule doth fail, and eſpecially in reſcinding the unjuſt Acts of Uſurpers and Magiſtrates. For aſſerting the Rights of Senators he * prohibits any thing to be paid out of their Lands, to thoſe they called in thoſe days Syriarchi, who were Pagan Prieſts in that Country, whoſe Employment it was to ſet forth Shows and Paſtimes (as of Wild Beaſts) to the People. He alſo reſtored to the Cenſuales formerly ſpoken of, the Right of naming Prætors to a certain ſort of work, when they had been formerly called to be Prætors in general by the Senate, which had been taken away from the ſaid Cenſuales by Conſtantius. In the third Place, He permits that the Curiales, or Mancipes, may be admitted to the Degree of Senators, provided, that They have diſcharged all Services belonging to the Courts, and their Eſtates be ſo far obnoxious to the ſaid Courts, that ſufficient Perſons may be ſubſtituted in their room, as he had formerly declared his Reſolution in this Matter, though ſometimes he again varied therein, as he thought the Caſe required. In the next place he tells Rufinus the Præfectus Prætorio (for to him and no other this could be directed) that in reference to heating the Baths at Antioch, the antient Cuſtom muſt be obſerved as to Payments; For as much as it is Evident that whatſoever Tatian had innovated therein, was deſervedly to be aboliſhed. That the City of Antioch was famous for its Baths, is evident from ſeveral Teſtimonies. The heating of theſe Baths is alſo reckoned amongſt perſonal Services, and there's no doubt but the Curiales were wont to contribute towards it; but it ſeems that Tatianus had, during his Power, increaſed the Contribution thereof ſo much, that it was become burthenſom. As alſo in caſe a Curialis had three Sons, Tatianus had either Ordered that he might free all his Sons from their Obligation to the Curia, or elſe none of them could he make free; to take off which extremity, on either ſide, Theodoſius now determined in his Reſcript to Aurelianus (or rather Rufinus) that if any Decurio had three Males he might if ſuch was his Quality, prefer one to be a Senator, the reſt remaining tied to the Obligations contracted by their Original. It appears moreover that Tatianus, or his Son Proculus, had applied themſelves to the erecting of new works in Cities, neglecting the Old Buildings; for, this by another Branch of this Conſtitution the Emperor prohibits: It's true, by Licence obtained from the Prince, old Houſes might be pulled down to erect new Fabricks; but he now declares, that in caſe ſuch Houſes exceed in value the ſum of fifty pounds of Silver, or two hundred and fifty Solidi, that it ſhall not be done without a particular Account or Relation made thereof unto himſelf.

To him and Rufinus a Conſtitution is directed.

Omnia Conſtituta non præteritis calumniam faciunt, ſed futuris regulam imponunt. l. 3. de conſtit. Princip. & Edict. Cod. Th. lib. 1. tit. 1. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt. ſunt enim ibi plures aliæ ſimiles in eandem ſententiam leges.

 L. 1. de Prædiis Senatorum. Cod. Th. lib. 6. tit. 3.*

L. 26. de Prætoribus. Cod. Th.

L. 130. de Decurionib. Cod. Th. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

L. 131. de Decurionib. Cod. Th. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt. ut temporaria & localis.

L. 132. de Decurionib. Cod. Th. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt. abrogata per l. ult. de Decurionib.

L. 29. de operibus publicis. Cod. Th. lib. 15. tit. 1. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

L. 30. ejuſd. tit. & L. 9. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

12. The Bread which Conſtantine had given to the Citizens of Conſtantinople, at this time by ſeveral Laws he indeavoured to reduce to the true intent of the Donor, and declared that his Will was, that what was granted to Military Perſons was in contemplation of their building Houſes in that City. To ſuch he confirms it, whether tranſmitted to their Heirs, or ſold by thoſe of the Scholæ to which this Right belonged; and to other Perſons that had a Title by their Houſes; ſo as to them he creates a new Right, in lieu of ſuch alienations; and repeals what Proculus by his own Authority had done herein. For a ſupply of ſuch as ſhould ſtand in need for the time to come, he now beſtows an hundred and twenty five Modii of Wheat, over and above the old Allowances granted by Conſtantine and Conſtantius his Son, to be daily paid out of the publick Granaries of that City; order for this purpoſe being ſent to the Præfect of the Eaſt, for this ſupply to be made in all ſucceeding times. Of this New Canon of Corn, (as then they termed it) by him inſtituted and conferred on this City, mention is made both by Arcadius his Son, and Theodoſius the Younger his Grandſon, in Laws made by them upon this Subject, which in their due time and place we may hear of. But that, while he provided Bread for Suſtentation of the People of Conſtantinople, the People of the Country might not have theirs ſnatcht out of their Mouths Vide L. L. 9, 10, 11, 12. de Annonis Civicis & pane gradili. Cod. Th. lib. 24. tit. 17.

Theodoſius inlarges the allowances of Bread formerly granted to the Inhabitants of Conſtantinople.

L. 2. de Annonis Civilibus. Cod. Juſt. lib. 11. tit. 24.

He regulates the raiſing of Tributes.

Mouths by unequal Contributions toward Suſtenance of the Army, he provided by a certain Law directed to Rufinus, whoſe care, as Præfect, it was, to have the Proviſions duly raiſed. By order of Valentinian the Elder, theſe Tributes were to be paid thrice every year, or at every four Months; and of ſuch Tributes ſo raiſed, the Apparitors of the Duces were wont to make Breives and ſend them to the Office of the Præfect, that it might be known how much was ſpent upon the Souldiers commanded by every Dux. Now to make this more evident he Ordains That before ſuch Quadrimenſtruons Breives be ſent to the Seat of his Highneſs “ as he ſtiles him, the like ſhall be delivered to the Office of the Ordinary Judge or “ Governour of the Province, that they may be Compared togather in the “ preſence of both the Apparitors of the Military Duces, and the Officials of the “ Ordinary Judge, that ſo by Comparing them, any Error or Cheat may diſco- “ vered; and the Breive may be rejected. Otherwiſe if the Breives diſagree, “ and the Levies be not rightly made, the Danger will fall upon the Suſceptors, “ or thoſe that nominated them, who, as we have formerly ſeen, were to Anſwer “ for their Miſcarriages.

L. un. de Quadrimenſtruis Brevibus. Cod. Th. lib. 11. tit. 25. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

13. Whereas the Governors of Provinces now took upon them to excuſe the Curiales for ſome time (for neceſſary Reaſons pretended) from the Services of their Courts; Theodoſius thought fit, to allow of no ſuch temporary Vacation, except granted by “ himſelf, and that for Cauſes true and proved, of ſuch Importance was it to have “ theſe Services diſcharged, for the good of the whole Provinces depended upon “ the well government of theſe Cities, Towns or Caſtles, to which for the moſt “ part the whole Country belonged, and was divided, and did depend on them. “
He alſo found at this time great Complaints made againſt Courts of Juſtice in reference to Appeals, whereof ſome might be juſt, and others made by ſuch Appellants as were themſelves in fault by reaſon of their irregular proceedings. Therefore this year to obviate Abuſes in both ſorts, he enacted that a Fine ſhould be “ ſet upon him who would by his Proctor appeal before Sentence or before a Grava- “ men, and as for the Judge, if he refuſed to admit of ſuch Appeals, as by Law “ and Right were to be admitted, he himſelf ſhould incur the Penalty of thirty “ Pounds of Gold, and his Office one of no leſs than fifty; but on the other ſide, “ when Appeals were received, the Judex ad quem ſhould receive or try nothing “ but what had lien before the Preſident, or Judex a quo in the firſt Inſtance, ei- “ ther proved, begun, or relating near to the ſame Allegations. There was another practice diſcovered at this time, which intrenched upon the Soveraign Authority, and violated the Regalia of the Imperial Diadem. The Right of Coyning Money, as we have already ſeen, belonged only to the Prince; and yet ſometimes it hapned that private Perſons either were connived at, to ſtamp Braſs, or ſometimes obtained Licence to do it from the Emperors themſelves. This he thought not fit to be permitted, but as well to preſerve his own Right as to hinder that liberty which others might take of Falſifying and Counterfeiting the Coin; he commands Rufinus, that if any for the time to come ſhall wreſt ſuch Power “ to himſelf of ſtamping Braſs by virtue of any Reſcript or leave obtained from “ himſelf, he ſhall loſe both the Advantage he propoſed to himſelf thereby, and “ further incur the penalty he deſerveth, viz. of Coyning Falſe Money. Thus antiently in France the Kings gave leave to the Prelates and Barons of the Kingdom to Coin Money, as Gothofred informs us from the Records of the Court of Finances in Paris; and namely in the year M.CCCXVI in the Reign of Lewis Hutin; a certain Weight and Image for ſo doing being preſcribed them. But afterward theſe Privileges were revoked and bought off. In particular, one Noble man ſold to the King that Right of his for five thouſand Liures. And we have lately ſeen, at Home, that licentious liberty which Private Tradeſmen took in our Cities and Towns of ſtamping Braſs or other Farthings with very good Reaſon recalled, and new ones warranted by the Royal Stamp and Authority, diſperſed for publick uſe throughout the Nation.

L. 135. de Decurionb. Cod. Th. & L. un. Cod. Juſt. de iis qui a Principe vacationem acceperunt.

The matter of Appeals.

L. L. 50, 51, 52. de Appell. & Conſult. Cod. Th. Abſ. à Cod. Juſt.

Reſtrains private Perſons from Coyning.

L. ult. de falſa moneta. Cod. Th. lib. 9. tit. 22. & L. ult. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. 4. Idus Jul. Conſtantinop.

14. Theodoſius, his Military Preparations againſt the enſuing war now growing to an Height, thought fit to reinforce what his Predeceſſors commanded, for the Safety and Eaſe of their Subjects upon ſuch occaſions. Knowing how the Souldiers were often wont in their Marches and Quarters to oppreſs thoſe that lodged them, by exacting of them ſeveral things relating to Victuals, and other Conveniencies, beſides the ordinary Proviſions made for them: to reſtrain this liberty he ſent out his Edict directed to Abundantius, Stilicho and the other Comites of both the Militia's, requiring and charging them, That no man in military ſervice whatſoever ſhould

Sect. 5.

A. D. 393.

He takes care that Souldiers do not oppreſs the Countrys.

ſhould require any thing in the way of, or, for his Salgamum, that is either Wood or Oyl, or Pallets to lye on. By Salgamum, which is rationally derived from Sal or Salt, was originally ſignified Herbs or other things pickled, or preſerved in Salt and Vinegar, and hence thoſe that ſold them were called Salgamarii. But ſecondarily, becauſe of the Pleaſure taken in theſe things by the Souldiers or others, was the word applied to ſignifie all things needful to the Suſtenance and Refreſhment of the Body, which ſtill they would Term and Exact by the name of Salgamum. Becauſe the Souldiers, to put themſelves into Money, were wont to require and take the Price of the Proviſions they were to receive in kind, and often, when they had got the one, exact the other too, or when Victuals were dear, then to take money wherewith to buy in time of plenty; he commands theſe ſame Officers that no man dare to exact Money in lieu of their Proviſions, under pain of loſing the price and thing alſo which he would have exchanged. But whereas there were ſome Provinces, which by reaſon of their diſtance, or the roughneſs of the way, were not in capacity to ſend their Proviſions to ſuch Poſts as were taken up by the Army, nor indeed to the Granaries belonging to the Emperors private Exchequer, he commands that what Tatianus had formerly ordained in this point ſhall be obſerved. In this caſe he had Ordered that ſuch like Provinces ſhould be allotted to the Proviſions allowed to the Officials belonging to their Governors or Ordinary Judges.

L. 3. de Salgamo hoſpitib. non præbendo. Cod. Th. lib. 7. tit. 9.

Dat. Abundantio, Stilichoni, & cæteris Comitibus utriuſque militiæ, 3. Kal. Aug. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt.

L. L. 18. & 20. de Erogatione Militar. Annonæ. Cod. Th.

L. 19. ejuſd. tit.

15. Theſe Laws were ſuch as muſt needs gratifie the Provincials who often ſuffered much from the Inſolence of Souldiers; yet they were not to be named or regarded in compariſon of a famous Edict he publiſhed at this time, and directed to Rufinus concerning Speeches uttered againſt his own Perſon. “If any one, ſaith he, being a Stranger to Modeſty, and void of Shame, hath thought fit to abuſe our Names by naughty and ſawcy Language, and out of a giddy Humour be a turbulent Declaimer againſt the Times, we will not have him Puniſhed, nor ſuffer any Harme: becauſe if it proceeded from Levity, it is to be deſpiſed: if from madneſs, it's moſt worthy of pity: if from Injury, to be remitted. Therefore let the whole Matter be reported to us, that by the Perſons of the Men we may weigh and conſider their Words, and ſo reſolve whether they be fit to be neglected or inquired into further. Hereby he Prohibits the Judges, or Governours of Provinces to puniſh any ſuch Offendors, but commands that he himſelf have the hearing of them, by a certain Sentance moſt full of Clemency and Indulgence, promiſing in a manner his Grace and Pardon, if any one out of levity, madneſs or an injurious humour had reproached Himſelf or the Times. And this he did out of his Connate Eaſineſs and Clemency, being a Prince, whatſoever ſome have maliciouſly written againſt him, moſt eminent for Chriſtian Policy and a merciful diſpoſition: of which there are many teſtimonies given him by Heathen Writers of this Age, as well as other Laws he made upon this Subject, which ſo far evince his Genius to have been ſuch, as that by ſome he is rather blamed for his too much Lenity, which incouraged ill natured perſons to offend. Of all others, this Law for the Matter and Manner of it hath become moſt renowned, both in the Courts of Princes, and of Juſtice; being wont to be applied to ſeveral Arguments upon occaſion; as whether Puniſhments are to be differred or mitigated; when the queſtion is, whether Princes ought to ſlight or diſſemble their knowledge of licentious Speeches; concerning matters reſerved to the cogniſance of Princes themſelves, and relation thereof to be made to them by their Judges; concerning the puniſhment of High Treaſon; or laſtly when the ſeveral virtues becoming a Prince are exhibited, Mildneſs and Clemency ſo much expreſſed and ſet forth by this Law, are moſt inculcated as thoſe which moſt adorn his Crown.

Makes a famous Law for ſparing ſuch as utter ſeditious Speeches.

L. un. Si quis Imp. maledixerit. Cod. Th. lib. 9. tit. 4. Dat. 5. Id. Aug. & L. un. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Quoniam ſi id ex levitate proceſſerit contemnendum eſt: Si ex inſania miſeratione digniſſimum: ſi ab injuria remittendum.

16. The Crime here to be remitted or inquired of is a ſort of Treaſon, which according to the Roman Laws is contracted both by Words and Actions, but in the former ſence is eſteemed leſs, not of ſo high a Degree, of ſo deep a ſtain as the later. But theſe words were of two kinds, being caſt out either, againſt the Prince himſelf or the Times, which amounted to much the ſame, reflecting upon the management of his Affairs. And never did any times more abound with theſe Calumniators, than thoſe of theſe Chriſtian Princes. For it was a common thing, an univerſal practice of the Pagans, amongſt other Taunts and Abuſes, to impute all Calamities that befell the Empire, or any particular place to Chriſtian worſhip, as if the Decree of Nature by a certain Law tended to the puniſhment of that which they blaſphemouſly termed Impiety. Theſe old Objections are ſufficiently known out of the Apologies of Ancient Chriſtians. If any War ill ſucceeded, if any Army miſcarried, if any Plague, Famine, or any other Publick Calamity fell upon any Nation, then Chriſtianos ad Leones; the Chriſtians as the cauſe of this muſt be expoſed to Wild Beaſts: at leaſt when the Scepter became Chriſtian, and no Authority would incourage this Injuſtice and Cruelty, all muſt be imputed to the Sacrilege of them. For, when the Empire laboured under its own Weight, and the Barbarous Nations (as all things, through viciſſitude of Affairs are ſubject to mutation) broke in and made Havock of the Provinces. When the City which had been lately Miſtreſs of the World became ſubject to their Inſults and Impetuoſity; all this alteration the Pagans with vociferation aſcribed to a fancied provoking guilt and enormity of Chriſtianity it ſelf, which they thought could not be expiated but by ſuch miſeries and devaſtations. And herein the ſawcy Impudence of the Ethnicks both Writers and others cannot but be admired; how daring they were, and what Deſigns they drove, (even contrary to this Law) to rereproach the Perſons and Governments of the Emperors. For no other thing did Eunapius aim at in writing his Chronica; nor Zoſimus in the compoſure of his Hiſtory as we hope we have ſufficiently made out already, and more ſhall do, as alſo the egregious malice vented by others againſt all theſe eminent Princes of the Chriſtian perſwaſion.

17. But their Choler was the more moved, and they found more pretence to vent it from things which fell out at this very time. For the year before, Theodoſius had abſolutely prohibited the Pagan Worſhip to be exerciſed by any Perſon, or in any place throughout the Eaſt; of which in its proper place more largely. Then upon a ſecular account and in reference to civil matters we may find by Zoſimus what his Friends, the Ethnicks, talked and objected againſt the Adminiſtration of this Prince, as that the Form of the Army and Military matters was changed, more great Officers made than formerly, and thence extraordinary Tributes exacted, that Barbarians were received and much favoured, and great diſcourſe there was of the Tyranny and Oppreſſion of his great Miniſters, as Rufinus, againſt whom was objected the fall of Tatianus, and the death of Proculus his Son. But beſides theſe general pretences, what the Particular or Immediate Cauſe of the making of this Law ſhould be, is capable of further Inquiry. Some think this to have been his Act of Grace or Indemnity granted to the Antiochians after the defacing of his Images and the Reconciliation made in that manner, and by that means we have formerly declared. And indeed the obſcurity which is to be found in moſt Writers as to the time of this Tumult at Antioch renders their Opinion very excuſable, for though Zoſimus relates it as hapning about the time of the Expedition againſt Maximus, yet others have caſt it back to the later undertaking of Theodoſius againſt Eugenius. Moreover, the Argument of the Law might incourage one to ſuch like thoughts, it being of Speeches or Reproaches caſt out againſt the Prince, which Zoſimus, Libanus and others affirm to have been the Crime, in a great meaſure, of them of Antioch, who followed therein the ordinary Humour and Genius of their City. Beſides, by what this Law ſpeaks of weighing the Speeches according to the Quality or Condition of the Parties, one may very well Collect that there were ſeveral ſorts of Offenders in this kind; and Libanus relates how the Comes of the Eaſt, or ſome other Officer put many to death after the tumult at Antioch, one accuſing another, without any reſpect had to Sexes or Perſons: then what Arguments or Reaſons the Emperor gives for exerciſing his Clemency, in this Edict, are juſt the ſame with what the Meſſengers ſent from that City, viz. Flavianus, and Libanius, do uſe in moving him to Compaſſion toward that miſerable People. Again the very ſanction of the Law might ſeem to conclude for this perſwaſion, therein he commanding that Relation be made to himſelf concerning the whole matter of complaint, which was the great thing deſired as we have ſeen, and by the great labours of Religious Perſons, at length, (by prevailing upon the Judges, Cæſarius and Ellebichus) brought about, Theodoſius grieving afterward, that in the Interval any Perſons had been put to death. Hereupon it may ſeem probable alſo that the Indulgence commended ſo much by Libanus, and particularly to the Court of Antioch, is the very ſame with that contained in another Law, which together with this made up one and the ſame Conſtitution. The laſt thing is the Place whence this Conſtitution bears Date, viz. Conſtantinople, whither Flavianus and Libanius were ſent to him.

18. But, for all this, the Tumult at Antioch hapned almoſt ſeven years before, and therefore this Law could not be made to anſwer that occaſion. For it fell out in the Decennalia of Theodoſius and the Quinquenalia of Arcadius his Son, when Vide Gothofr. in h. l. he was at Conſtantinople, after the ſubduing of the Barbarians or Gruthungi; after the death of Flaccilla, when only one Son of Theodoſius was Auguſtus, and when he made preparations for his Expedition againſt the Uſurper Muximus. Then, beſides, it fell out in the Winter ſeaſon before Lent; and Chriſoſtom ſaith that the Pardon granted to the Antiochians was with them before Eaſter, and therefore this our Law could not be it, which is dated on the ninth of Auguſt, and is inſcribed to Ruſinus, as Præfectus Prætorio; whereas there was no ſuch Præfect that had any thing to do in the Antiochian Tumult, which therefore fell out in the year CCCLXXXVII. as we have already ſet it. Some others aſſign as an occaſion of this Law what Sozomen writes concerning a Perſon Illuſtrious by Dignity, condemned by Gratian, for having reviled him, and freed by the intervention of Ambroſe the Biſhop of Milan; but very wide, as if this had been made by Gratian, dead long before, and of which Theodoſius was the Author. Gothofred rejecting theſe ſeveral opinions, from the Law lately ſpoken of, which with this is rationally thought to have made up one Conſtitution, conjectures that the immediate occaſion proceeded from the licentious liberty of the Curiales, at this time taken (and probably by thoſe of Antioch) to ſpeak againſt the Emperor and his Government. For although that Law be not at all of this Drift or Deſign, yet they being directed to the ſame Perſon at the ſame time, nay making up one and the ſame Conſtitution, and the one being made for rectifying matters belonging to the Curiales, he concludes with ſome Reaſon, that they were the Perſons aimed at in both. For indeed the Curiales were the ſubſtantial Inhabitants of Cities and Towns, and of them the Body of the Commons of the Empire conſiſted; below them were ſuch perſons as the meanneſs of their Eſtates and Conditions rendred them inconſiderable, and above were the Honorati, who had diſcharged great Offices, and thoſe who were in actual poſſeſſion of them. Now, to put them into this Sawcy and Tumultuous Humour, ſome of the foregoing things which they eſteemed Grievances might give occaſion. As the rigorous ſuppreſſion of Paganiſm now carried on; the greatneſs of Ruſinus, who probably afforded too much occaſion for Envy; his proceedings againſt Tatianus and his Son; or poſſibly, there were ſome Acts of Tatianus and Proculus which were too ſevere in Correcting the Petulancy of the Tongues of the Curiales, and upon ſuggeſtion of Ruſinus, they ſeemed fit to be Repealed, and the like for the time to come Reſtrained, as we ſee ſeveral of their Orders and Methods in Procedings were nulled. Whatever the Occaſion was, he thought fit to reſtrain the Violence of the Judges, who often would be double diligent, and buſie in puniſhing ſuch like Offences, thereby to ingratiate themſelves with the Emperor. He doth not ſay that they ſhould be wholy neglected and paſſed by, as ſome have erroniouſly concluded; but the whole matter related to himſelf, who thereupon no doubt would proceed with that great Prudence he hints at, in weighing the Sayings of men by their Perſons, Qualities and Conditions; and according to thoſe three Acts of Clemency, viz. Contempt, Pity and Pardon (or Indulgence) which he oppoſeth againſt ſo many Originals or Sources of this Opprobrious Language.

Laws for fill- up Corporations.

19. However the Curiales behaved themſelves at this time, it appears that the Curiæ in the Eaſt were much Exhauſted by ſome means or other; for in the ſpace of one year and an half, beſides the Law lately mentioned, as part of this Conſtitution, were five others directed to this Ruſinus for filling them up, by recalling their Members from other Imployments to which they had betaken themſelves. Beſides, in this now named Law, he Commands that ſuch Inhabitants and thoſe “ they termed Vacantes, or were not joyned to any other Body, ſhall alſo be “ forced to theſe Services, provided they be fit Perſons, having ſufficient Eſtates, “ which Valentinian the Third afterward limited to the Value of there hundred Solidi at leaſt, permitting others to be made Clerks. But Theodoſius forbids that any “ one be obliged only for this Reaſon, That his Mother was deſcended from a Curialis; “ ſo that the Privilege granted formerly by Julian to the Antiochians, ſeems abrogated by this Law: but the Reaſon he gives for it is this general one, That “ no man can be obliged to any Condition or Service, by relation to that Perſon “ which it ſelf is free or not obnoxious to it, as the Mother was not. But not only were theſe Senates of the City Empty at this time, but the Senators of Conſtantinople, many of them, ſo indigent, that the Senate it ſelf taking their Caſe into Conſideration, made a Senatuſconſultum thereupon, That ſuch Senators as could “ not pay that which they called Glebalis Collatio, ſhould be anſwerable for ſeaven “ Solidi yearly for their Portion or Share. If they thought fit to pay it, then they might continue in their Station, or elſe they muſt relinquiſh the Dignity, which

L. 137. de Decurionib. Cod. Th.

L 4. de Senatorib. & de Glebali, &c. Cod. Th. Abeſt. à Cod. Juſt. Dat. ad Aurelianum P. U. prid. Kal. Septemb.

Theodoſius

Sect.5.

A.D. 393.

Theodoſius adds to the Senatus-Conſultum, as the Cuſtom was in this Age for Emperors to confirm theſe Decrees of the Senate, to Corroborate them, and to add what Penalty they thought fit. This now was thought reaſonable in the Eaſtern Parts; whereas in the Weſt, the payment of two Folles ſeemed enough for the Senators of loweſt Fortunes; but ſo Theodoſius intended both to gratifie Senators of loweſt Eſtates, and yet exact what to him ſeemed ſomething agreeable to the Dignity of the Place. But as the Condition of theſe ſeveral Bodies now mentioned ſeem at this time Impaired; ſo that of the Navicularii alſo was in no good Eſtate, ſome complaining that they were too poor to undergo the Function, and others pretending, that by reaſon of their Original they were not obliged to the Service. The whole ſtate of the Matter did now Theodoſius refer to the moſt approved Honorati “ in every Province for Wiſdome and Fidelity. But becauſe they might alſo be “ concerned themſelves; (out of whom the Body of the Navicularii by ſome Laws “ were to be ſupplied) therefore in this Matter alſo he requires, that their Judg- “ ment herein be reported to himſelf; the beſt Courſe to keep Judges firm to the “ Rules of Prudence and Moderation. But for the Incouragement of ſuch as “ ſhould be continued in the Service, wherein the Maintenance of the City of “ Conſtantinople was ſo much concerned, he declared by another Edict directed, as “ the other to Rufinus, that the Navicularii, and they only, ſhould be freed from the Vectigalia, or Cuſtoms ariſing from Merchandize Imported: And all other Merchants whatſoever, (though ſome, as the Veterani and Clerks, were otherwiſe, by ſome Laws, excuſed) ſhould be obliged to thoſe Duties, without any Exception.

Another for the Navicularii.

L. 22. de Navicularii Cod. Th. Dat. 3. Non. Sept. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

L. 23. ejuſd. tit. Dat. 3. Id. Decemb. abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

A.D. 394. Arcadio 3. Honorio 2. A. A. Coſs.

20. The CCCXCIV. Year of Our Lord had for Conſuls Arcadius Auguſtus the third time, and Honorius Auguſtus the ſecond. Rufinus ſtill continued Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt; and one Herodes was Proconſul of Africk, being Succeeded the following Year by one Theodorus. All this Winter was, as well as the preceding Year, ſpent by Theodoſius in Preparation for the War, for which by this time he was fully ready. As a Chriſtian, he made uſe of the Means which True Religion directeth to, for accompliſhment of that End he juſtly deſigned; while his Enemy in the Weſtern Parts applied himſelf to Paganiſh Superſtitions and Vanities, by Perſwaſion of Flavianus the Præfect, who being of Ethnick Perſwaſion, promiſed himſelf great Matters for Propagation of that Impiety, which now ſo faſt fell to the ground, before the Power of Truth. Arbogaſtes in the mean time having ſecured Gall, proſecuted his old Grudges againſt thoſe of his own Nation; particularly Suno and Marcomeres, Two Subreguli of the Francks, whom having now the Power of the Weſtern Empire in his Hands, he reſolved to Sacrifice to the Ghoſts of his Anceſtors. For this Purpoſe, in the depth of that Winter which followed the Death of Valentinian, he removed to Agrippina, or Coleigne, with Reſolution to range over the moſt inward Receſſes of the Country then Inhabited by the Francks, at ſuch time as the Woods being dry and without Leaves, could not afford lurking Holes or Receptacles for any Ambuſcadoes. He paſſed the Rhine, and waſted the Bructeri, that lay next the River with a Village called Aetia, Inhabited by ſome of the Chamani, without any Oppoſition, ſave that ſome few of the Ampſiuarii and Chatti ſhewed themſelves on the farther Hills, being led by the late mentioned Marcomeres. The next Year preceding that whereof now we write; Eugenius (or Arbogaſtes for him) was mightly inflamed with a Deſire of Yoaking Italy in the ſame Bondage with Gall, not remembring how Maximus his Predeceſſor (as we may terme him) fared in the ſame Attempt: but Flavianus his Præfect, a Man given up to Pagan Prophecies, puffed him up with hope of Victory. Before he ſhould begin his Journey, he concluded, that the Germans, whome he was to leave at his Back, were to be obliged to terms of a Fair Underſtanding, leſt, in his Abſence, they ſhould paſs the Rhine, and harraſe Gall. He Marched to the River, and on the Bank thereof ſhewed himſelf with great Numbers of Men he had newly raiſed, to the Nations of the Francks and Alamans; and by the Terror thereof drew them to renew the League. This, ſo well performed, he returned, and with Arbogaſtes Invaded Italy; which after his Entrance into Milan, he eaſily got into his Power.

Arbogaſtes Invades the Territories of the Francks.

Sigon. ubi prius.

Eugenius gets Italy into his Power.

4. Theodoſius having Intelligence hereof reſolved to ſet himſelf, with all Convenience, againſt ſuch Tyranny and Uſurpation; and for this Purpoſe cauſed all the Forces he had raiſed to Muſter at Conſtantinople; amongſt which were Multitudes of Goths, Alans and Hunns. For his Chief Officers, he made choice of Timaſius to Command the Romans, together with Stilicho, or Stelicho, as Zoſimus calls him, who Writes, That he was Married to Serena, Theodoſius his Brothers Daughter.

Theodoſius prepares to go againſt him.

ter. The Barbarians he Committed to the Leading of Gaines, Saules, and Bacurius an Armenian Born, one of Honeſt Principles, and well Skill'd in Martial Affairs. Amongſt the Officers of the Goths, Alarich now Served, that Famous Alarich that afterwards took Rome, and firſt of others brought the Barbarians to Invade Italy. Having thus Prepared for his Expedition, Zoſimus tells us, That his Wife Galla died in Childbed, when he was ready to ſet forward, whom having once bemoaned after Homers manner, he departed. But Arcadius his Son, whom he had formerly declared Emperor, he left behind him; and becauſe he was but Young, he Committed him to the Charge of Rufinus, who was now to Govern all Matters according to his own Will, and Appetite. As to the Time when Theodoſius began his March, we find by the Dates of ſeveral Laws, that in the Months of January, February, and March, he was ſtill at Conſtantinople, where, while he continued, by his Endeavours for True Religion, and the removing of Grievances from his People, he Exerciſed himſelf as became one who was about ſuch an Undertaking, wherein the Safety of the State, and his own Perſon and Family was concerned. But certain Cuſtoms there were of theſe Times, to which he could not but ſubmit; ſome things which could not ſo well be amended. The Empire was ſo great, the Provinces ſo many, and ſo Manifold the Buſineſſes ariſing out of them, that beſides the ordinary and ſet Ways and Courſes of Adminiſtring Juſtice by his Officers, there was a Neceſſity of his being inſtructed and moved by thoſe about him in Particular Concernments of Private Perſons and Bodies Politick. Thoſe that thus Sollicited and Moved, were termed in this Age Suffragatores, and their Sollicitation or Moving Suffragium, for which they were wont to receive Rewards, and that by Agreement from their Clients. Hereupon much Oppreſſion and Conteſts often happened, while ſometimes thoſe that had obtained their Deſires, and done their Buſineſs, were ingrateful to them that had imployed their Time and Labour therein, and often, they that Sollicited in their behalf, threatned, troubled, and exacted more, than was juſt and reaſonable, from the Suitors.

L. 2. Si certum petatur de Suffragiis. Cod. Th. lib. 2. tit. 29. Dat. 4. Non. Martii. Conſtp. & L. un. Cod. Juſt. tit. de Suffragiis.

22. To prevent theſe Diſorders, he publiſhed now an Edict, Inſcribed to Rufinus, before his departing from Conſtantinople; wherein he Ordains, in Caſe ſuch a “ Promiſe have been made, of what force it ſhall be, and what Action it ſhall produce. “ In the firſt place he declares, That ſuch Agreements ſhall be performed, and “ he grants Cauſe of Action againſt thoſe that had ſo ingaged themſelves, otherwiſe “ than what Julian formerly Ordained concerning ſuch as procured Perſons to ſollicite “ for Honours to be conferred on them, and promiſed Rewards for obtaining “ the thing deſired, that if thoſe that Sollicited had already got into their Hands “ the Fee or Reward they might keep it; but otherwiſe no Liberty to Sue would “ he grant. But this Indulgence he would have only extended to ſuch as had obtained “ what they went about. And in Caſe the Party had agreed to give any thing “ Moveable, as Money, an Horſe, or other Things, the Delivery of the Thing “ ſhould ſuffice to alter the Propriety in it, without the Intervention of any Writing, “ or any Publick Record to be made thereupon. But in Caſe any Thing Immoveable, “ as Land lying in City or Country; then for changing the Propriety, he “ requires Three Things: Firſt, That it be done by Writing, as is requiſite in other “ Matters of Conſequence; then that there be a real Delivery of Poſſeſſion; And “ in the laſt Place, That the Matter be Regiſtred or Atteſted by Publick Acts: otherwiſe “ if any of theſe Solemnities be wanting, there ſhall be no transferring of “ the Dominion, or, as we ſay, the Propriety in the Thing; as in other Caſes, “ all are null and void, which are not tranſacted in the Eſſential Forme preſcribed by “ the Laws. And good Reaſon there was, that Lands and Inheritances ſhould not be transferred without theſe Conditions, leſt Perſons diſtreſſed, when they had Buſineſs at Court, ſhould, by the greedy Courtiers, be drawn in, and cheated of their Eſtates, who would often, out of Covetouſneſs, promiſe to do what they could not, or ought not to attempt, or would not be worth what they ſo greedily deſired in way of Recompence for the Undertaking. On the other ſide, a Concurrence of all theſe Circumſtances would ſhew, that the Agreement was tranſacted bona fide, without any Cheat, or Circumvention. In the laſt Place, the Emperour declares, That in Caſe the Party had by a Writing called in thoſe Days Commonitorium, “ (wherein he expreſſed his Deſire to have the Thing done, and promiſed to give “ ſo much in Reward) obliged himſelf to ſuch and ſuch Terms; if hereupon only, “ and without the other neceſſary Solemnities, the Suffragator Seized upon any “ Lands or Immoveables, he ſhould be Outed again of ſuch Poſſeſſion, as guilty of “ Raſhneſs and Violence, and the Thing be reſtored to its former Owner, the Inva- “ der being excluded from any Claim or Suit for that Thing for which he ought, " without being his own Judge, in a fair way to have proceeded.

He Marches.

L. 18. de cohort. lib. Cod. Th. Dat. 3. Kal. Jun. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

L. 23. de Hereticis Cod. Th.

23. Now to attend Theodoſius on his Journey Weſtward, on the Thirteenth of May, we find him at Heraclea, by the Date of a certain Law, whereby he forbids, " That any Officials belonging to any Conſularis (as of Paleſtine or Phenice) ta- " ken from out of the Office of the Comes (of the Eaſt) or out of that of Rufinus, " to whom he gives the Title of Culmen veſtrum, be ſuffered to fly, and betake " themſelves to the Army. From Heraclea he removed to Hadrianople, where he " lay on the Seventeenth of June, as appears by auother Edict of Religious Concernment, not in this Place to be medled with. Henceforth we cannot trace him by any Dates of Laws, there being none Extant that after this time can be attributed unto him. But from Thrace he moved into Pannonia, while, in the mean time, Eugenius, incouraged by the South-ſayings of Flavianus, who promiſed him Victory, which ſhould be accompanied with the Ruine of Chriſtian Religion, being aware of his coming, got together a vaſt Body of Men. Reſolving to expect him rather at the Threſhold, than within the Bowels of Italy, he quitted Milan, together with Arbogaſtes and Flavianus, affirming by Oath, That when he came back, he would make a Stable of the great Church, and cauſe the Clerks thereof to take Arms. Proceeding as far as Aquileia, he came and Incamped himſelf by a River called Frigidus, diſtant ſome Thirty Miles from that City, and as Sozomen writes, he ſeized and ſecured the Julian Alps, being the Gates of Italy, as affording but one Paſſage, Fortified on both ſides by vaſt Rocks and Mountains. Theodoſius from Pannonia Marched directly to theſe Straits, and driving out the Guards ſet to defend them, quite contrary to the Expectation of the Enemy, brake through, Flavianus here dying, when he might have eſcaped, as by miſtake ſome write. Having without much trouble paſſed the Mountain, on the Seventh of September, he deſcended into the Plain, and offered Battel, which was as readily accepted, the Soldiers on both ſides being inflamed with a Deſire of Fighting. Theodoſius Erected the Standard of our Saviour, and Eugenius that of Hercules. The Emperor diſpoſed his Army into two Battalions, in the one of which ſtood the Romans, and in the other, ſuch Barbarians as had come over to his Service. The Romans againſt Romans fought Manfully, and the Succeſs was doubtful; but the Barbarians on the Emperors ſide were worſted, and forced to retire with great Slaughter; and beſides, aloof on a Hill, he diſcovered a Body of Men, which he apprehended might fall down upon his Back.

Lib. 7. c. c. 22, & 24.

He Breaks into Italy.

24. Being in ſuch Straights as he knew not how to extricate himſelf, he fell down on his Knees at the Head of the Army, and humbly Implored the Aſſiſtance of his Maker, ſaying, Help me O Lord I beſeech thee, leſt the Pagans ſay, where is now the God of Theodoſius. And his Prayer had a ſpeedy Return. For preſently the Officers of that Party, which he ſaw upon the Mountain, ſent to him, and offered to come in upon Honourable Terms of being preferred by him, which he readily granted, and having neither Ink nor Paper at Hand, he took a Writing Table from ſome there preſent, and therein promiſed, that they ſhould have the Command of thoſe Forces they ſhould bring over to him. Hereupon out of Hand they joyned with him; but ſtill the Event ſeemed very dubious, till Bacurius, who commanded the Barbarians that were diſadvantagiouſly ingaged, ſtirred up his own Spirits, and the Courage of his Followers to ſuch a Degree, that falling on with greater Violence, and renewing the Fight, they either killed, or forced to run, thoſe with whom they were ingaged. In other Places however, the Enemy ſtood his Ground, and Eugenius, for whom they fought, riding up and down, exhorted them to Conſtancy as ſecure of the Day, telling them he was well aſſured, that Theodoſius, out of deſperation, would ſpeedily lay violent hands upon himſelf; but he deſired they would not let him ſo eſcape, but bring him alive into his Preſence. Now aroſe a moſt violent Tempeſt, ſuch as no Man alive could remember, which drove with that violence upon the Army of the Uſurper, that they could not keep themſelves in order. It's reported, That the Arrows they let fly againſt Theodoſius his Men, were retorted back upon thoſe that ſhot them; that their Targets were forced out of their Hands, and driven againſt their own Faces, and their Eyes ſo diſturbed with Wind and Duſt, that their Sight was thereby taken from them. On the other hand, ſuch Darts or Arrows as Theodoſius his Soldiers Shot, did double Execution, whereby Animated to ſo high a Meaſure as the Matter ſuggeſted, with all Alacrity they improved the Advantage, and ſo far prevailed upon the Diſcouraged Enemy, as quickly to put them to the Rout. Sozomen, Oroſius, and others, relate late the Matter after this Manner; though a Story different in Circumſtances be told by Zoſimus, and ſuch as follow him. Zoſimus tells us, That Theodoſius paſſing the Alps in ſo unexpected a manner, terrified Eugenius with the ſuddenneſs of his coming. That the Emperor thought fit firſt to try what the Barbarians could do, and ſent Gaines to Ingage, who was followed by all, both Horſe and Foot, that conſiſted of the Northern Nations. Againſt them Eugenius led forth his Men, and the whole Armies Ingaged, when in the time of the Fight, ſo great an Eclypſe of the Sun happened, that the greateſt part of the time it ſeemed to be Night rather than Day. And the Battel being fought as it were in the Night Seaſon, ſo vaſt a Slaughter was made, that the greateſt Part of Theodoſius his Confederates miſcarried, together with Bacurius their Captain, who moſt valiantly expoſed himſelf to all Dangers before his Men.

Defeats him in Battel.

P. 778.

25. The real Night coming on, both Parties retreated to their Camps, and Eugenius puffed up with Victory, diſtributed Rewards to ſuch as had beſt deſerved; and permitted them to take their Supper, as not thinking of any more Fighting after ſuch a Defeat. Theodorite relates how Theodoſius was now adviſed by his Captains to put off the Matter till the following Spring, and then to come with greater Forces, to be able to grapple with the Uſurper in Numbers. However, Zoſimus farther Writes, That when Eugenius his Men were taking their Repaſte, Theodoſius perceiving the Day to be Dawning, with all the Remainders of his Forces fell upon them, while they yet lay upon the Ground, and Killed them, when they dreamt not at all of any ſuch Thing. That going on to the Tent of Eugenius, he fell upon his Guard, and Killed alſo moſt of them, but ſome fled for it, and were taken, with whom was found Eugenius himſelf. He being taken, his Head was Cut from his Shoulders, and being ſet upon a long Pole, was carried round about the Camp, to let thoſe of his Party, who ſtill ſtood refractory, know, that ſeeing they would be Eſteemed Romans, they ought to return to Obedience to their Emperor, eſpecially the Tyrant being now Extinct. And in a manner, all thoſe who ſurvived the Battel, came ſpeedily in to him, Saluted him with the Title of Auguſtus, and begged Pardon for what they had done; which, ſaith the Writer, he readily granted. As for Arbogaſtes, he deſiring not at all to try the good Nature, or Clemency of the Conqueror, fled away into the higheſt and moſt Impaſſable Mountains, where perceiving that all Places were ſearched by thoſe that were ſent to find him out, he killed himſelf, thinking it better to die a voluntary Death, than to be taken by the Enemy. Thus much writeth Zoſimus concerning this Victory of Theodoſius. Others, as to the End of Eugenius, ſay, That certain of his Troops being convinced of their folly to fight againſt Providence, as diſpairing now of the Victory, followed their Captain Arbitio to the Emperor, and begged Pardon, who were thereupon preſently received, and ordered to fetch Eugenius to his Preſence. He ſeeing them come in great haſt, and concluding it was with News of the Victory, inſtantly demanded if they had brought Theodoſius along with them; to which they anſwered, That they came not to bring him, but to carry himſelf to the Emperor; and therewith pulling him from his Chair, tied his Hands behind him, and in that Poſture carried him along with them. Theodoſius, when he ſaw him, recounted to him what Villanous Acts he had committed againſt Valentinian, and jeering him for his Religion, and putting his Confidence in Hercules, he Pronounced that Sentence againſt him which he had deſerved, and his Head accordingly being cut off, and ſet on a Pole, at the ſight of it, his Followers ſubmitted themſelves.

And puts him to Death.

26. Whether but one, or two days the Fight continued, is not ſo material; but ſo writes Oroſius and others, who, by their Nearneſs to this very Time, might have as much reaſon to know as Zoſimus or Theodorite. This is not ſo Conſiderable a Circumſtance, as that which ſeveral relate concerning the Tempeſt, and the Dreadful Effects it had upon Eugenius his Army. And although they be Chriſtian Writers, which relate the manner of this Tempeſt, and the Conſequents thereof, yet are there ſufficient hints, and that from Pagan Authors concerning the Truth of the ſame. Zoſimus, as it appears by his own Story, was not utterly ignorant of what paſſed; but to avoid all Pretence of an extraordinary Cauſe, he tells a Tale of an Eclypſe of the Sun, which then ſhould happen at the very time of the Fight; whereas the Sun was Eclypſed at that Time we lately mentioned, and the Aſtronomical Tables are utterly ſilent as to any Defect of this Luminary, near that of this Ingagement. But he took Things upon Truſt, and very ſlight Informations, not caring what he wrote, ſo he could but drive on his great Deſign of raiſing prejudice in his Readers againſt Chriſtian Princes, and Chriſtianity it ſelf. He tells us, That Bacurius was by Birth an Armenian; whereas Rufinus Writes, That he was an Iberian, a King of the Iberians, and that he was Comes Domeſticorum to Theodoſius; that he was a very good Religious Man, being familiarly himſelf acquainted with him at Hieruſalem, when he lay there as Dux of that Limit; and from him he acknowledges to have received that Relation which he makes concerning the Converſion of the Iberians to the Chriſtian Faith in the Days of Conſtantine. As full of Truth is that which he writes concerning Theodoſius his taking Honorius his Son along with him in his Expedition againſt Eugenius; whereas Claudian the Poet, beſides others, expreſly writes of his ſending for him after the finiſhing of the War, and Poetically mentions the ſeveral Places, through which he paſſed into Italy. And as for the Tempeſt we now ſpake of, this ſame Claudian, though as earneſt a Pagan as Zoſimus himſelf; yet having told how Theodoſius eaſily paſſed the Straits, adds, That a vehement Wind from the Mountains overthrew the Enemies Forces, and drove back their Arrows and Pikes againſt themſelves: In Concluſion, That the Air and Winds and all fought for Honorius, to whoſe good Fortune it is that he aſcribes the Victory.

Sect.5.

Vide Baron. ad An. 194. n. 2.

De 3. Conſulatu Honorii.
Te propter gelidis Aquilo de monte procellis.
Obruit adverſas acies, revolutaq; tela
Vertit in auctores, Et turbine repulit haſtas.
O nimium dilecte Deo cui fundit ab antris
Æolus armatas hyemes; cui militat æther, Et Conjurati veniunt ad claſſica venti.

27. But as to the manner how Theodoſius uſed the Victory he had ſo wonderfully obtained, Zoſimus tells you, That when the Army of Eugenius ſubmitted, and asked Pardon, he eaſily * granted it. And well may we believe him from that Account we have from others concerning his incomparable Clemency ſhewed toward his Enemies. Some that were yet no Chriſtians, but Conſcious of their own Guilt, had fled to a Church, and there taken Sanctuary; upon this occaſion he cauſed them to be made ſuch, and Imbracing them with Chriſtian Love, he took nothing from them, but on the contrary conferred Honours on them. He ſuffered none to exerciſe private Revenge upon thoſe that were Conquered. He managed not his Civil Wars, as did Cinna, Marius, Sylla, and ſuch like, who would not ſuffer them to ceaſe when ended; but he rather ſorrowed that there was occaſion for them, than ſuffered any to be injured by them after they were brought to a Period. After the Victory he removed to Milan, not to Rome, as Zoſimus again miſtakes; and thither he ſent for his Son Honorius, from Conſtantinople, finding himſelf now, it ſeems, indiſpoſed, and falling into a Dropſie, which accelerated his Death, and accompliſhed it within a few Months. In the mean time we hear little of Arcadius, and his Governor Rufinus, their Tranſactions at Conſtantinople, only two or three Laws we find made by him in the Abſence of his Father. The firſt of them (for his it muſt be, if the Place be not miſtaken in the Date) is concerning publick Buildings, as to which the Governors of Provinces were at this time to be reprehended. Some of them were grown ſo Audacious, as when a New Work was made and finiſhed at the Publick Charge, yet they would cauſe their own Names to be put upon it in room of the Emperors, as Founders and Authors of the Building; whereas they were only allowed to do it as Curators, as having the Charge and Overſight of the Work. But though the Emperors generally (Trajan excepted, who was called Herba Parietaria, Parietina, or Pellitory, as Ammianus hath it) were Modeſt and Cautious this way, ſo as not to inſcribe their Names upon Buildings, though repaired in their own Time, but to renew the Name of the Founder; nay, though they permitted the Governors to ſet theirs upon Walls, in that manner, and with the Reſtrictions lately mentioned; yet would not they contain themſelves within the Bounds preſcribed by Reaſon and Modeſty. To give a Check therefore to this Idle and Ambitious Courſe, Arcadius “ declares ſuch Judges guilty of Treaſon, as Uſurping thoſe Privileges which belong “ to the Prince alone; private Perſons excepted, who if they built any Work at “ their own proper Coſt and Charge, were (and that with Reaſon) permitted by them to tranſmit their Names to Poſterity. But further, whereas theſe Governors, out of the ſame Principle of Ambition, would now ordinarily neglect the Repairing of Old Buildings, and Erect New Structures; this Law impoſes the ſame Pe- “ nalties upon them as formerly had been done, as that they ſhould refund ſuch pub- “ lick Monies as they had beſtowed upon theſe Works; moreover, finiſh theſe Buil- “ dings at their own Coſts and Charges; and over and above, that they ſhould not be “ ſuffered to depart out of their Provinces till both were accompliſhed. In like manner we have ſeen, that ſuch Duces as, during their Government, had neglected to build Towers or Caſtles upon the Borders, were forced to continue there till they had done it. And that Governors of Provinces were conſtrained to abide a certain time in their Juriſdictions, to ſee what Complaints would, by the Provincials, be brought againſt them.

He uſeth the Victory with great Moderation.

* κ̀ ὁ Βασιλεὺς ῥᾷον ἐπένευεν.

Vide Aug. de Civitate Dei lib. 5. c. ult.

L. 31. de Operibus publicis. Cod. Th. Dat. 3. Non. Jul. Conſtp.

Sect.5.

A.D. 395. Olybrio & Probino Coſſ.

Theodoſius dies.

28. The CCCXCV. Year of Our Lord had for Conſuls Sex. Anicius Olybrius Hermogenes, and Sex. Anicius Probinus. Rufinus ſtill continued Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt, Dexter bore this Office in Italy, and Theodorus over Gall. Theodoſius now was thinking of his Journey Eaſtward, purpoſing to return ſpeedily to Conſtantinople, but was arreſted by Death before he could accompliſh ſuch Preparations. And upon the Departure of ſo great a Soul, ſeveral Accidents happened, which were reputed as Preſaging ſuch a loſs. For betwixt the Victory, and his Death, from the Month of September, ſome Countries were ſhaken with Earthquakes; exceſſive Rains fell, and ſo great Darkneſs happened, as ordinarily had not been obſerved. But let us hear what Zoſimus tells of him at parting, after the Battel fought with Eugenius. “Things, ſaith he, having thus ſucceeded, Theodoſius, being now at Rome, Declareth Honorius his Son Emperor; Stilicho being made Commander of the Legions in theſe Parts, and withall aſſigned Tutor to this his Son. Now did he call the Senate to him, which was fixt and conſtant to the Religion and Rites of their Fore-fathers, neither could hitherto be prevailed with to conſent to ſuch things as had been done in Contempt of the Gods. He made a Speech to them, wherein he adviſed them to Correct their former Error, (for ſo he termed it) and to imbrace the Faith of the Chriſtians, which promiſed to its Followers Freeneſs or Indempnity from all Sin and Impiety. But none of them being willing to admit of what he propounded, nor to depart from the Rites of their Anceſtors, which had been derived down to them from the firſt Original of the City; and before them to prefer ſuch an Aſſent as was void of Reaſon, (for they alleged, that for almoſt One Thouſand and Two Hundred Years, in the Obſervation of thoſe Rites, they had Inhabited an Invincible City; and if they ſhould change them for others, they were ignorant what might happen) he then ſaid, that his Exchequer was burthened with the Expence that was made upon Sacrifices and Offerings; and therefore he would aboliſh ſuch Matters, foraſmuch as he neither could approve of ſuch Things, and knew for certain, that the Neceſſities of the Armies required a far greater Expence. The Senate anſwered, That Sacrifices could not rightly be made, but at the publick Expence; yet notwithſtanding the Law for ſuch things was aboliſhed, and other were things ſuffered to lie neglected, even whatſoever had been tranſmitted from their Anceſtors; and thereupon the Roman Empire, by little and little was diminiſhed, and became the Home, or Abiding Place of Barbarians; or rather having loſt all its own Inhabitants, was now (in his time) reduced to that Condition, that not ſo much as the Places where Cities once ſtood could be diſcerned. That ſo Matters ſtand, the following Narration in Particulars ſhall demonſtrate. But the Emperor Theodoſius having delivered Italy, Spain, Gall, and beſides, all Africke, to his Son Honorius, died in his way to Conſtantinople; and his Body, being duly Prepared, was Buried with his Predeceſſors, in the Burying-Place of the Emperors, at Conſtantinople.

The time of his Death.

Unde Chron. Theodoſ.

The Dirt caſt upon him by Zoſimus.

29. As he began, ſo he ended, in the Opinion of Zoſimus, an Enemy to the Gods, and the Religion of his Fore-fathers; and how can any imagine, but ſuch an Irreligious Perſon ſhould alſo be Luxurious, Effeminate, Sluggiſh, and what not? to make him up a Compleat Monſter? But before we take a view of his Features in this kind, we muſt firſt declare, that he died at Milan, after his Son Honorius his Arrival from Conſtantinople, on the ſixteenth day of January, when he had Reigned ſixteen Years wanting a day or two, in the fiftieth Year of his Age, as ſome have reckoned, in the ſixtieth, as others, and as ſome, moſt improbably, in the ſixty fifth. With what Character Zoſimus hath ſet him forth, we have already ſufficiently ſeen, viz. as one given up to all Vices of Luxury, to his Belly, and his Eaſe. Theſe Vices of his Temper cauſed other diſorders in the State. For thence came it to paſs, that to pleaſe his Appetite, he maintained a great Number of Cooks, Butlers, and ſuch like, about him. This vaſt Expence, and his Profuſeneſs to unworthy Perſons, emptied his Coffers ſo much, that to fill them again he took up baſe and unworthy Courſes; one in particular, than which nothing could be more diſadvantagious to to the Empire; which was ſelling Places of Magiſtracy, and Governments of Provinces, to ſuch as would give moſt for them; So that one might ſee in the Forum thoſe who had followed baſe Trades and Profeſſions to wear the Enſigns of Authority, and deliver up the Provinces to ſuch at would give the beſt Peny worth. In Concluſion, as hereby he ruined the Civil Government, ſo did he the Military, in making ſo many Magiſtri Militum, and other great Officers; for finding of Pay and Proviſions for whom, the People were alſo miſerably harraſed. This is the ſum of that Infamy wherewith Zoſimus deſigned the memory of Theodoſius to be loaded.

Wiped off by the fairer Teſtimonies of other Pagans.

As Pacatus.

Who inſiſts on his Gifts of Fortune.

30. In a ſcrutiny into which we ſhall proceed in no other terms, than we did in the matter relating to Conſtantine, and ſearch for naked truth without any partiality; for the finding out of which, nothing can be more convenient, than to hear the Teſtimonies of other Perſons, who had as much reaſon to be prejudiced againſt him, upon the Account of Religion, as Zoſimus had. We ſhall not repeat thoſe great things that are ſaid of him by Pacatus the Panegyriſt, of which we have already given an Account upon his Conqueſt of Maximus, but take notice that before he comes to the Defeat of that Tyrant (which was the occaſion of his Speech,) he premiſeth other things in his Commendation. He begins with his Country, which was Spain, and commending it for its Fertility in Fruits, eſpecially in producing ſo great Perſons, as were Trajan and Hadrian, he magnifies it moſt in beſtowing him upon the Roman Empire. From his Country he comes to his Family, and affirms that, if others had Sirnames given them from the Nations which they had Conquered, his Father Theodoſius might well be rendred Famous to Poſterity by thoſe of Saxonicus, Sarmaticus and Alamanicus, having beaten theſe ſeveral People, as well as forced back the Scots into their own Fenns. Herein he aſſerts the Nobility of the Perſon to whom he ſpeaks, that He was the Son of him who ought to have been Emperor, who would not have leſſened but ſuited the Grandeur of the Roman Dominion, not only by his Valour and Conduct, but alſo by the Statelineſs and Dignity of his Perſon. And he no leſs commends him the Son, for the greatneſs of his Preſence and Perſonage, as being anſwerable to his Fortune; inſomuch that he affirms it a Queſtion made by them who ſaw him, whether they were more won upon by the Vertue and Goodneſs of his Mind, or the charmings of his Countenance. He tells them that he knows how, not long ſince, he had rejected ſuch Commendations as this: But he intreats him to permit that this may make up but a part of his, which was wont to conſtitute the whole of that praiſe which was given to others. It's true, his Virtue deſerved an Empire; but withall, his Beauty and Comlineſs, added her ſuffrage alſo with that of Virtue. Virtue made it behoveful that He ſhould Reign, but his ſhape and Stature rendred it decent that he ſhould ſo do. And indeed, in declaring him Emperor, ſo far was any thing from being omitted which ſhould be conſidered of; that a reſpect to his years was alſo had, a thing of ſuch Importance with their Anceſtors, that in beſtowing not only the greateſt places of Magiſtracy, but alſo thoſe of Pretor and Ædilis, a Perſons age was inquired into; neither was any man (ordinarily) preferred for his Nobility, for Favour or Reward, to ſuch Offices, before the terms preſcribed by the Comitial Law. And with good reaſon. For ſuch as will by Virtue be Adopted in the ſlippery time of Youth, do ſtumble to prevent falling. He inſtanceth in Sulla, Catulus and Scipio, who by Luxury made Shipwrack of Virtue, and being toſſed by the Tempeſt of Vice, were through mature Age ſcarcely reſcued from the Peril of Drowning.

And in theſe Indowments of his mind.

What he did together with his Father.

31. But theſe things were but the gifts of Fortune; he tells him he will now deſcend to ſuch as he ought to himſelf. For, that glory which he had formerly obtained by Martial Acts, performed with ſo much toil were not to be aſcribed unto her who was worthy of reprehenſion in this reſpect, that whom ſhe had deſtinated to a Scepter and a Throne, ſhe never uſed with any manner of Indulgence. But as ſevere Fathers are ſharper with thoſe Sons they moſt love, ſo ſhe trained him up in many Wars, and difficult times that ſhe might fit him by ſuch preparations for the Empire. Before he would come to ſpeak of what he had done in mature Age he ſaith he would touch at what he performed joyntly with his Father, viz. that with him he paſſed over Winters under Skins, or Tents, ſwet out Summers in the toils of War; either by Watching or Fighting ſpent both Nights and Days, and fought battels of great Conſequence both by Sea and Land. Then when by reaſon of a potent Adverſary he returned to a private life in Spain, he enumerates in how many ſeveral ſorts of labours he buſied himſelf, for the Relief of his Friends and Neighbours, and his own Exerciſe, with as great Commendations, as the Curii, Coruncani and Fabricii, betook themſelves to their Manual works when diſingaged from Affairs of the State; and in this reſpect with greater praiſe; for they did it out of Want and Poverty; which preſſure lay not at all upon him. For, Poverty diminiſheth the Honour due to Patience in labour; and that Labour is of greateſt Example which is performed without Neceſſity. As the Heavens are in perpetual motion, and all things are preſerved and

Sect. 5.

A.D. 395.

And while a private man.

perfected by a conſtant Revolution, ſo had he been exerciſed without intermiſſion in one kind of Employment or other, from Spain to Sarmatia, from Iberus to Iſter. And when he had arrived at thoſe years and ſuch a ſtanding in the Military Profeſſion, as might have excuſed him from taking ſuch pains; yet did he not when he might only have commanded, divide his time betwixt Buſineſs and Idleneſs; and ſlacken his Induſtry as one who would live upon that Honour and Repute he had already got. But he would either in the firſt place, or to be ſure with the firſt, diſcharge all Duties belonging to a Souldier; ſtand Sentinel, Scout and Watch when occaſion ſerved; and as his lot fell, toil at the Fortifications; anticipate the Enemy in the choice of Ground; order the Camp, firſt begin the Fight and come laſt from it: in concluſion, in Council and Advice demean himſelf as a Captain, and by Example as a Souldier; ſo that even then at that time it might have been underſtood, that others fought for the Emperor but he for himſelf. Yet this was moſt to be admired, that whereas he ſo demeaned himſelf in every thing, that it was behooful he ſhould Reign, yet with deſign that he might Reign he never did any thing at all.

His modeſty in refuſing the Empire.

32. As evidence for this he alleageth and inſtanceth in that Day that was Eminent for the Publick Good it brought along with it, wherein when he was called to undertake the Government, he endeavoured to ſhun that Empire which was offered him: neither did he this only in ſhow, that he might ſeem to be forced unto it, but earneſtly and long; and as one that had hope to prevail. Neither was there any cauſe of Diſſimulation. For the Emperor, he tells him, did not ſet upon him at home, and when none were preſent as to try him, but publickly and in the Court or Comitium, when he could do nothing elſe; ſo that except he had indeed and in reality been unwilling to accept, he might have done it Securely and with Reputation enough. Here the Panegyriſt perſonates the Commonwealth, which, now fruſtrated of that hope ſhe had conceived of him, by his backwardneſs to the Promotion, he introduceth thus ſpeaking to him: Thinkeſt thou, O Theodoſius, that the Fates have been ſo little tardy themſelves, that thou alſo indeavoureſt to increaſe their Delays? Art thou ignorant that thereby thine own Concernments are impaired? Knoweſt thou not that thou thy ſelf art involved in my Decays? Whatſoever the Goth doth waſte, whatſoever the Hunn doth ravenouſly ſnatch, whatſoever the Alan takes away, that in time to come will be miſſed by Arcadius. I unfortunately have loſt Pannonia, I now mourn for the Deſtruction of Illyricum, and daily behold the Ruine of Gall. The Elder of the Emperors is not ſufficient of himſelf to undertake and manage ſo great Wars: the Younger, though he is like to prove moſt Valiant, yet at preſent is in his Minority. Doſt thou ſtick at erecting and ſupporting me thus faln, which, that thou maieſt not defer thine aſſiſtance, cannot but be late enough performed. Doſt thou thus requite me, me who deſired thee for my Prince, when in a happy Condition? When peaceable Nerva, Titus the Love and Delight of Mankind, and Antoninus, memorable for his Piety, were poſſeſſed of me; when Auguſtus adorned me with Walls, Hadrian inſtructed me by his Laws, and Trajan added to my Bounds and Limits, I did not think my ſelf happy, becauſe, as yet I was not thine. What wouldſt thou do to me if thou waſt in thine own Power? Behold, he who is my Lord intreats thee; behold, he who is yet thy Lord and Maſter beſeecheth thee, and he who may compel, yet chuſeth rather to requeſt. It is now as unlawful for thee to refuſe that Sovereignty which is conferred upon thee by an Emperor, as it would have been wicked to have accepted it without him.

33. Thou only, O Prince, thou only, (thus he proceedeth) of all that have hitherto Reigned, haſt made thy ſelf a Prince indeed. Some the purchaſed ſuffrages of the Legions, others the vacancy of the Court, and others Royal Affinity have impoſed upon the Commonwealth: thee neither Ambitions ſeeking, nor Occaſion, nor Kindred have created; for thou waſt a ſtranger to the Emperors Family, and waſt made the third in order, and being averſe waſt compelled to it, I ſay averſe. Hear you this you publick Parricides, who forgetting your Faith and Allegiance, have taken the Scepters of your Maſters, and by no leſs danger than wickedneſs, ſetting your Lives at Stake for the Empire, have purchaſed a Royal Name with the price of Blood. Here the Sovereignty it ſelf hath ſuffered a repulſe, and one hath appeared candidate that he might not be elected. Will future Ages believe this, and give us glorious credit in this matter, that in ours ſuch a thing hath been done, which in no times before or after hath been attempted, nor is like to find any Example? But he who ſhall underſtand the courſe

Sect. 5.

A.D. 395.

and manner of thy Life will eaſily give his aſſent, neither will doubt the Empire to have been refuſed by one that hath Reigned in ſuch a manner. For, they, even they, may well deſire, and that greedily, to Reign, who are delighted with a manner of life that's looſed from the reſtraint of Laws; whoſe cruelty in killing the Innocent, Covetouſneſs in taking the Eſtates of private men, and a Luſt to conſaminate all honeſt things, required ſome Law and impunity to ſupport them. What did it concern you to be Prince, who though Emperor was to be a private Perſon? except perhaps at this day you are more remiſs in your love and reſpect to Modeſty, leſs fearful to ſhed mans Blood, or have a greater Appetite after thoſe things that belong to others. You are the ſame you were, and ſo much you can now do, as formerly by the Laws you might have done. You meaſure Sovereign Power by being in a condition to do good, not by ſecurity in ſinning. One thing your Advancement hath done for you, that now we are ſatisfied, that even under other Emperors you lived by the preſcripts of your own Laws. For He who doth nothing licentiouſly, when he can with impunity, never had a deſire to do it.

His good Example when he had accepted it.

In temperance and abſtemiouſneſs.

34. As ſoon as you had undertaken the Government, not content to be in your own Perſon, beyond (or free from) Vice, you ſet your ſelf to rectifie and amend the vitious practiſes of others; and that by methods of moderation, that you might ſeem rather to perſwade than compel them to honeſt courſes. And becauſe either by reaſon of a long cuſtom in the Eaſt, or the remiſſneſs of former Princes, ſo great Luxury had infected many perſons, that the Habitual wont of Wantonneſs, now grown ſtrong, appeared as not eaſie to be amended by other Applications; that no man might think himſelf injured, You would begin your Cenſure upon your ſelf, and by retrenching the Expenſes of the Palace, not only by rejecting what was ſuperfluous, but ſcarcely admitting of a neceſſary Allowance, that which is moſt difficult in nature you performed, making good men ſuch as were willing now to be reduced. Would any be grieved to admit of ſuch reſtraint as he ſees his Prince impoſe upon himſelf; or think much to abate of his private Luxury when he beholds the Emperor, who hath all in his Power, the Lord both of Countries and Men, living ſparingly and contentedly, ſatisfying his hunger and long faſting with mean and Souldierly fare? Beſides, when he ſees a Court, in every part of it with more hardſhip to be indured than the Gymnaſia (or places of Exerciſe) of the Spartans; abounding with examples of Pains-taking, Patience and Frugality? When none therein is to be found, who ſhall dare to require as additional to this Royal manner of Diet, either the Fiſh of remote Shores, the Fowl of a foreign Air, or the Flowers that are not growing at the ſame time? Theſe Delicate and Effeminate Princes, to which the Commonwealth was often forced to ſubmit, never thought themſelves ſplendidly ſerved, except in Luxury they turned over the whole year; except Roſes ſwam in their Cups in Winter, except in Summer they corrected their Wine of Falernum, which they drank in capacious Gemms, with cold Ice. Our world was too ſtrait for the Throats of theſe men. For not meaſuring the goodneſs of the Diſhes ſet before them by their Taſte, but Expence; they were only ſatisfied with ſuch Meats as were furniſhed either out of the utmoſt parts of the Eaſt; out of Colchos lying beyond the Roman Pale, or ſuch Seas as are Famous for Navigation, which the Perils of men ſnatched as it were from unwilling Nature, which parted not with them without Reluctancy. To ſay nothing of thoſe Fowlers, who by an infamous ſort of choice were inrolled in the Provinces; and thoſe Cohorts, which under the Banners of Hunters ſerved at Banquets; have we not heard of a Prince, that had not only his Dinners, but his Diſhes of the value of an whole Patrimony of a man of Equeſtrian Degree? Your Meals, O Emperor, being more ſpare than thoſe of Ordinary Tables, are only furniſhed with Proviſions of Place and Time. Hence comes it to paſs that all are aſhamed of Luxury, and now a love and regard to Parſimony hath prevailed, and the Threats of Laws having nothing to work upon; every one hath repented in private. For ſo it is; ſo it comes to paſs; an Auſtere Command and Correction exaſperates; but pleaſant and acceptable is that which proceeds from example.

35. Such Influence had this Conduct of yours upon the Manners and Courſes of Men. But, yet nothing ſo much conduced to the rooting out of Vice and Implanting of Virtue, as this, that you conſtantly addicted your ſelf to the ſociety of thoſe Perſons whoſe practice ought to be imitated univerſally. To ſay nothing of thoſe upon whom you light the very firſt day of your Promotion, Perſons of ſuch Virtue, that they might ſeem not taken out of the Crowd, but deſignedly

Sect. 5.

A.D. 395.

The good Councellors choſe at his firſt coming in.

His unparalleld friendſhip.

ſignedly choſen out of a multitude. Afterwards, how many, and how great, did you make choice of for the Government of Provinces, the chief Commands in the Armys, and for your Inward and Truſty Councellors? You having made two ſeveral Choices, the one out of Judgement, and the other as it Hapned; it's uncertain whether your Wiſdom, or your Fortune procured for you, the better men, having either received or found men of that worth and fitneſs, that the former deſerved to be retained, and the later by all means to be choſen. But whatever Emperor was he that thought a ſtrict obſervation of Friendſhip was reckoned amongſt ſuch things as commend a Prince? This virtue is low and humble, and it's doubtful indeed whether for a virtue it was formerly eſteemed; whether worthy to enter into a Palace, or rather to be a Companion for Dangers. You might ſooner procure money to be paid out of the Treaſury, than any faithfulneſs out of an Emperors heart. The beſt of them all, it's true, would make rich his Attendants, but never love them; he knew well how to do them kindneſſes, but was ignorant as to any Cordial Affection. You have not only recalled Friendſhip, formerly only a Name, and belonging unto private Perſons, into the Court; but being firſt clothed with Purple, and adorned with Gold and Precious Stones have received it into the Throne it ſelf, and in Deeds not Words only, have aſſerted, that The mind of a Prince by ſo much ought to be the more frank and kind to thoſe about him, by how much his Fortune and Eſtate is more excellent than that of others. You carry it to them with equal fidelity and command of your ſelf; and give that to your Familiars, which you your ſelf would have deſired when a private man. Yet how could any one have wiſhed for thoſe things which moſt have obtained in your Government? I ſpeak not of thoſe Honours which the Emperor is conſtrained to confer. Is any Dux created? The Diſcipline of the Camp requires it. Is any raiſed to the Dignity of Præfect? The Province muſt have an Head. Is a Conſul deſigned? The year muſt have a Charactariſtical Name. In thoſe chiefeſt and moſt eminent Employments there is ſome Advantage made of theſe deſerving Perſons. You by a new way of Benignity, confer that Honour upon your Friends, which may be wholy their own; and nothing thence redounds to your ſelf, but the pleaſure of beſtowing it; who having at Home Sons of your own, (theſe two Hopes and Eyes of the Commonwealth) yet deferred to nominate them, and adorned firſt your Friends with the Conſulſhip. Now, truly, had that Divine-man, the Author of the publick felicity, your Father, been alive, what more could he have expected from his Son, than to have been preferred before his Grandſons? You have therefore done for your Friends ſo much, that you could not have done more for your Father. O ſingular deſign of your kindneſs! That Dignity, which can receive no addition in Greatneſs, you augment by the timing of it. Your Friends are declared Conſuls before your Sons; becauſe more than Conſuls they could not be.

36. Having farther proſecuted this Argument, at length he tells him, that Foraſmuch as he can not confer Honours upon all with the ſame meaſure of Benignity (there being not place enough; what he had in his Power being of a narrower Size than his Will; and the Empire, how large ſoever, not being capacious enough to contain his Mind) yet, whom he hath not yet preferred, he comforts by his condeſcending carriage to them. And indeed ſome it ſeems have not been ſatisfied with this Conſolation. One is honoured by being ſpoken to; another is made happy by being received at Table; and another Conſecrated (ſo he words it) by a Kiſs: and ſo all, who have promiſed themſelves ſomething by your Government, have either arrived at Dignity, or been ſatisfied with your Humanity; Humanity I ſay; which is as Famous, as it is Rare in an Emperor. For Pride being the ordinary Attendant on Great men, ſcarcely is any to be found who abounds with Fortune, and wants Arrogance: of which our Anceſtors were ſo impatient, that they ever eſteemed Contempt more grievous than Servitude, and for this Reaſon were Conſtrained, after they had had ſuch Warriors as the Tulli, ſuch Sacrificers as the Numæ, and the Romuli, the Founders of the City, to hate the very Name of a Kingdom. In concluſion that Tarquinius, ſo much talked of, they Curſed and Abominated to all Eternity; and a man that was carried headlong with Luſt and Self-will, blinded with Avarice, Cruel to a Wonder, and mad with Fury, they termed Superbus or Proud, and they thought that word conteined in it ſelf ſufficient Infamy and Reproach. But if poſſible it were, that Brutus, that aſſerter of Roman Liberty, and Hater of Royalty, could return for a while to Life again, he would find this your Age filled with Love

His rare Clemency and good Nature.

Love of, and Indeavours after, Virtue, Parſimony and Humanity: no appearance would he find in the whole World of Pride Luſt or Cruelty: and you your ſelf he would find contented to live both publickly and privately, as ſeverely as any of the Antient Captains; as Chaſte as the Pontifices; as Moderate as the Conſuls; and as Meekly and Familiarly as any Client or Suitor: He would change his Opinion, after ſo long a time: and finding the Roman Dignity and Liberty joyned together: he muſt neceſſarily confeſs that they are now in a better Poſture, you being Emperor, than they could have been when he was Conſul, and that Tarquinius was to be removed, but not the Kingdom.

Eaſie of Acceſs.

37. In the next place, he admires him for his extraordinary Condeſcention in ſhewing himſelf abroad, and receiving the Petitions and Requeſts of any that would make their Addreſſes to him. Whereas the Cuſtom of former Princes was far otherwiſe, who imagined that Royal Majeſty was diminiſhed, and made cheap, except with great Veneration, being Cooped up within a private Appartment in the Palace, they were at a diſtance conſulted, as in ſome Veſtal place of Secreſie, being fortified by ſolitude, and by deep ſilence that was extended far and wide. Or if ever they came into the light, and beheld open Day, they were yet ſhut up in Litters and cloſe Coverts; and being Walled about with Files of Armed men, moved ſlowly, and as it were in certain Numbers, and counting all their ſteps: then was the People driven away, and the Hand of the Sargeant or Uſher was not idle in keeping off the Multitude with Rods; that this ſecret thing might be in publick. But this our Prince ſaith he, is expoſed to every mans view, and it is as free to ſee him, as the Day or the Sun. And yet though things free and permitted, are apt to beget ſatiety and ſurfeit, yet never doth he ſatisfie the admiring Eyes: the ſight of him is more and more deſired; and (what is ſtrange to be ſaid) being preſent he is yet wanted. But can we wonder, that in your Cities you are ſeen by your own People, whom ſcarcely any Nation hath not ſeen upon its own ground, and that ſo often, that this Face is well nigh as much known to the Barbarians as to us. And no wonder, when as paſſing all Summers abroad, and Winters at home, you equally divide the year betwixt your Enemies and your Subjects. Or if by chance there be any Barbarians who have not felt the force of your Valour, yet being ſtruck ſpeechleſs, as it were by the terror of your Name, they are very quiet. For at the thoughts of your Arms, not only theſe ſeveral People do tremble which are ſeparated from our World, either by great Woods, Rivers or Mountains; but they alſo, which Nature it ſelf hath ſet at a diſtance, being inacceſſible by perpetual Heats, continual Winters, or the interflowing Seas. The Indian is not ſafe by the Ocean, not the Boſporan by Colds; nor the Arab by the intervention of the Sun; whither the Roman Name had formerly reached, the Empire now hath arrived. Shall I ſpeak of the Goths received into ſervice, both as Souldiers for your Camp, and ſufficient Tillers for your Fields? Shall I mention how the rebellious Saracens have been puniſhed for breaking the League? Shall I hint any thing concerning the Scythians being prohibited Tanais, and the Bows of the flying Albanian now rendred ineffectual? Whatſoever Nation of the Barbarians was formerly troubleſom by reaſon of its ſtrength, fierceneſs or numbers, now thinks fit either to be quiet, or rejoyces to ſerve under the Name of a Friend. Perſia it ſelf, formerly a Rival of our Commonwealth, and famous for the death of many Roman Captains, now excuſeth by a Compliance, whatſoever formerly it acted ſeverely againſt our Princes. Nay, that King, who once would not condeſcend to own himſelf a man, now confeſſeth that he is fearful; and Worſhips you in thoſe Temples wherein he himſelf is Worſhipped; as well by pretending to ſend Ambaſſadors as by preſents of Gemms and Silk, and his triumphal Beaſts do draw in your Chariot, Although as yet he is not a Confederate, yet already by courting of you he is become a Tributary.

38. After this Pacatus deſcends to the occaſion of this preſent Congratulation; or his Expedition againſt Maximus, and extolls his Prudence, admirable Clemency, and Valour as we have already ſeen. Now though this be uttered with extraordinary Wit, and with High and often Poetical Expreſſions in the preſence of the Emperor, to which ſomething is to be allowed, can any imagine he would be ſo inſulſe and ſo Brazen faced, as to extol him for temperance and abſtemiouſneſs, when all his Auditors knew him Infamous for the other extreams of Luxury, Effeminateneſs and Lazineſs? Would any Orator have admired Nero for his Clemency, or Heliogabalus for the ſeverity of his life? But to leave him, we ſhall next produce the teſtimony

Sect. 5.

And Themiſtius.

A.D. 395.

Ἐπὶ τῇ φιλανθρωπίᾳ τοῦ αὐτοκράτορος Θεοδοσίου.

mony of as great an Orator and Philoſopher as any in his time, in the Greek Language, and that is Themiſtius, who in theſe or other reſpects will confront Zoſimus his Accuſer. The fifth of his Orations now extant, was made in the Senate, and bears this Title, Concerning the Humanity or Good Nature of Theodoſius. He begins with a ſtory how, when Lycurgus the Spartan, entred the Temple of Apollo “ at Delphos, the Pythia or Propheteſs told him, that ſhe knew not whether to “ call him God or Man, but of the two, rather the former. Of this he demands “ the Reaſon of Apollo; why he thought fit to call Lycurgus a God. Whether it was for “ the renowned Victories, or becauſe he gathered together the Bodies of his ſlain Enemies. “ Or was it, ſaith he, becauſe he was incircled with a Guard of thoſe that “ bore Spears and Darts ſhining with Gold? Or for that Golden Chariots, drawn “ with Niſæan Horſes, went in proceſſion before him? Or laſtly, becauſe he gliſtered “ with Golden Chains, a Train and Purple? Indeed the Entertainer of Xerxes “ at the Helleſpont, by ſuch Pomp and Gaudy Furniture, was drawn into Admiration, “ ſo as to term that Son of Darius a God. Yet I (Apollo would ſay) knew “ that little account was to be made of ſuch matters, which are poſſeſſed by moſt “ wicked and fooliſh Princes. Whom it is ſo far unfit to term Gods, that it is “ not decent to call them Men; as even that very Xerxes, who was ſo far ſenceleſs “ and mad as to chaſtiſe the Sea, and to put Fetters upon the Helleſpont. As “ for me, if any ſhould ask the queſtion whether he was a God or Man, I ſhould “ little doubt how to anſwer it; but whether to call him a Man or a Beaſt, I ſhould “ rather conſider.

39. Neither did I doubt at all concerning Nero, many Ages after, Emperor of “ the Romans, when he came to this Temple, whether or no it was ſome God that “ came to me; for I knew very well that under the ſhape of a man a Beaſt was “ covered. Though he appeared in the poſture of holding an Horſe in his Hand, “ and in the Stole of ſuch a Muſitian, as Poets and Painters think to be acceptable “ to me. Becauſe he was a Fool and a Sot, and had filled the Empire “ not only with external, but alſo domeſtick ſlaughters; I rejoyced not at his coming; “ but abhorred and abominated him ſo much, that at his going away I intangled “ a Fillet in his Hair, and pulled therewith his Crown from off his Head. Neither “ did I much Eſteem Crœſus, the King of Lydia, though he filled my Houſe partly “ with whole, and partly with half Tiles of Gold; for that compellation of Soft-foot “ proceeded from Luxury and not from Virtue. The matter ſtanding thus, what “ could I ſee in Lycurgus when I called him a God rather than a Man? Even good “ Nature, Juſtice and Piety; and Humanity the chief of all theſe, by the benefit “ of which alone Kings come to be like unto God himſelf. For, he having taken “ into his Hands the Affairs of Sparta, which was then in a diſturbed Condition, “ for want of Laws, and filled with the tumults of War; ſupplied it both with Peace “ and excellent Ordinances. And was of ſo mild and quiet a diſpoſition, that one “ who had in the Aſſembly ſtruck out his Eye, whom the Lacedæmonians for ſo “ doing would have ſtoned, he preſerved and ſaved from puniſhment; and having “ brought him Home to his own Houſe, he informed him, and made him ſo pliable, “ that from a very bad Citizen, he made him an extraordinary good man. For “ that King knew very well that a Prince ought to appear ſuperior to others, not “ by returning Injuries, but by well deſerving of them by whom he hath been provoked, “ to Indignation and Revenge.

40. Therefore, ſaith he, ought you to anſwer this Queſtion, Dear Apollo. If “ the Governor of one City, or, at moſt, having the Command of a ſmall part of Peloponneſus, “ who both himſelf was poor, and governed poor men: who had his “ Commons in the Phiditium, and drank of the Water of Eurotas; if he for his good “ Nature and Clemency cauſed you to doubt of what appellation he was worthy: “ what would you ſay of him, who having the Dominion of almoſt the whole Earth “ and Sea; by the means of whom the Eaſt is ſubject to the Roman Empire, the “ Weſt is quieted; whom all Nations and People do venerate, not only thoſe that “ are under his Command, but ſuch alſo as deſire to be Governed by him, yet he “ is indued with ſuch eaſineſs of Nature, ſuch ſweetneſs of Manners and ſuch Mildneſs, “ that thoſe who were convicted of Treaſon, and condemned by the Laws, “ he hath looſed from that obligation, and recalled from the Gates of Death, to the “ Sun and light again? Wilt thou doubt and conſider whether ſome God, or ſome “ man came into the Temple to us, neither wilt thou pronounce more boldly, than “ concerning the number of the Duſt upon the Earth, that an Heavenly Name belongs “ to ſuch a Prince? Not long ſince we looked upon this as a moſt excellent “ and “

Sect.5.

Who inſiſts much upon his Clemency.

A. D. 395.

and admirable thing, to ſee Gold returning from two Treaſuries (of the Largitiones and Res Privata) to them again, from whom it had been unjuſtly exacted. But now we have ſeen Men reſtored from the Gate of the Inferi unto Life, whom the Law truly had ſent thither; thence the Prince and Lord of the Laws hath reduced them: who ſaw plainly, that for one thing a King, and for another thing a Judge, is to be commended; for a Judge is to follow the Dictates of the Laws, but a Prince finds, that ſometimes they are to be Corrected, and their ſeverity and hardneſs declared; he himſelf being the Living and Breathing Law, not placed in fix'd and immoveable Letters. For this ſeems to be the Cauſe, why the Power of Kings is, by God, ſent from Heaven upon the Earth, that there might be a Refuge ſetled for Men to fly to, from a fixt and conſtant Law, to one that's Breathing and Living. Come hither ye Muſes which Inhabit this auguſt Temple of Council, and Chant with me that Song, which I am about to ſing to him for his late Humanity and Clemency. For your parts, he ſo Cheriſhes and Imbraces you, that he had made his Empreſs your Fellow-lodger, and has put her Statue in the ſame Chappel, where are placed the Images of the Emperor, and his Sons. In this reſpect your Company and Chorus, by ſuch Communion and Society, will be more Auguſt.

41. But you ſhall not begin your Song, where Homer adviſeth you to begin. For you ſhall not ſing of Wrath, but of good Nature and Clemency, by which this Prince hath made it manifeſt to all Men, that the Niger Calculus, or Condemnation, is a Thing utterly hateful to him, and eſtranged from his Nature and Will. And therefore is the contrary moſt acceptable to him; for it is impoſſible, that when the Stone (of Sentence or Suffrage) comes into his Hands, it ſhould not turn Colour. He has learnt indeed to toſs a Target on either ſide, either to the right or left; bnt this Calculus or Stone he has learnt only to caſt to the right, not to the left: Neither hath he two Pair of Golden Ballances, as Jupiter in Homer, of Life and Death; neither ever is that of Life preſſed down by any deadly Weight or Graines; but that which tends to Death and Darkneſs ſetling downward, the other End riſes up, and looks toward Heaven. Neither are there two ſeveral Barrels placed upon the Emperors Floore, as Homer will have two to ſtand upon the Throne of Jupiter, full of Deſtinies, the one of Good, and the other of Evil. For our Emperour hath no Barrel of Death, but one always full and abounding with Life, which he draws pure and clear from it, and pours upon Men. The Aſſertion of the Aſſyrians (he means the Jews or Christians) makes very well for this Purpoſe, which affirms, and that truly, the Heart of the King to be kept in the Hand of God, which cannot incline towards a Writing of Condemnation. For it is neceſſary, that he who writes ſuch Letters, ſhould fall out of that Hand which perpetually gives Life to all things. In former times, O Emperor! the Conſent of the State gave you an Appellation of Divinity; not for that a vaſt quantity of Gold was in your Power; not for that you had abundance of Crowns and Purple Robes; not becauſe you had the Power of making a Man Rich from very Poor; for theſe things are far more inferior than Heaven, and the Image thereof. But becauſe it is in the Power of one God, and one Prince, to beſtow Life; for no Man when he Invocates God calls him Victor, Triumphator, Germanicus, or Sythicus; but Lover of Mankind, Holy, and the Saviour. Therefore is that Virtue to be Imbraced by you: and by that means it ſhall come to paſs, That that Hand ſhall never ſhake you out of it; as in times paſt it did Nero, Domitian, and the Son of Severus; though not Trajan, or Marcus, nor Antonine, your Country-men and Anceſtors, from whom God derived your Government to us.

ȣ̓ γὰρ μῆνιν
ἀείσεϑαι· ȣ̓λο-μένην ἣ μυρί' Ἀκαιοῖς ἄλγε' ἔϑηκεν· ἀλλὰ πρᾳότητα ϗ φιλανϑρωπίαν

42. But, I conceive this Trophy of yours to be much more Famous, than that you ſet up over the Scythians. And yet this you have Erected alone, and without any Aſſiſtance of Arms: Nay, ſo far hath the Sword been from Contributing any thing in this Matter, that therein the Edge of it hath been Blunted: Never did that Son of Philip Erect the like, though he pierced from Macedonia as far as India: yet he eaſily Conquered Darius, and Porus; but he himſelf was overcome by the Drunkenneſs and Folly of Clitus. He did not revenge himſelf upon Wine with Wine, but with the Sword; neither could he bear the Boldneſs of Philotas, who to an Harlot had babled ſomething too Inſolently, but with him he killed his Father Parmenio. You have not done thus, Moſt Divine Emperor, who for the ſake of the Innocent have ſpared the Guilty; and have freed him who had affected certain v. in things, with another who had heard the ſame through a certain unhappy Fate. Of ſuch Weight with you is every ſmall Matter that conduceth to Clemency. And this is the Cauſe; By Nature you are Divine: for every one hath need of little incitement or provocation to that to which by Nature he is inclined. Formerly there was no Diſtinction made in Crimes of this Nature, and it was accounted one and the ſame Offence, to attempt any unlawful thing, and to have heard the ſame, though againſt ones Will. This was to reprove the Nature of Man, for having given him open and large Ears, with a Deſign that he ſhould not ſhut them, as he can do his Eyes and Mouth: for this Senſe alone, in a manner, is out of our Power and Liberty, and whatever enters there, doth it as into an Houſe that hath no Doors, ſo neceſſarily muſt it receive all things. But you have diſtinguiſhed the Hearing of the Crime from the Crime it ſelf. Upon the Guilty you have thought fit to animadvert no otherwiſe than by Words. Than which Egregious Act, whereas nothing can be more worthy, yet did you add a Saying thereto more admirable than the Thing it ſelf. For when all admired your Patience and Facility, therein you alone blamed the ſlowneſs of it. Which was as much as to ſay, Therefore you grieved, that you had not prevented the Convicted Crime with Pardon, and made the Sentence of Abſolution more early than that which paſſed for the Parties Apprehenſion.

43. And yet what could be more Swift, than that you were pleaſed to term Slowneſs? For you did not diminiſh your Anger by Degrees, nor by little and little the Fears of thoſe that were accuſed; neither after Judgment did you doubt, and were anxious what to do: but the ſorrowful Sentence of Condemnation was prevented by another given by God, which came ſo ſuddenly, and without all delay, that many heard of it before the other. For my part, I only heard that Voice, which in its Swiftneſs would have exceded the bearing of Lamps, which is Celebrated in Honour of Vulcan, that which was uſed (by the Perſians) in the long and vaſt Journies performed by their Couriers or Poſts; being like thoſe Beacons which are ſet on fire to give notice from high Scituation; ſo that one happy Noiſe thereof reſtrained thoſe drawn and Elevated Swords which were about to give the Stroak. May we call that therefore a Slow Clemency which was not diverted by the Swords which now hung over the Necks of the Guilty Perſons? As for Jupiter in Homer, if Homer may be believed, although he was his Son, yet could he not undo and recall that Fate which hung over the Head of Sarpedon, and when he began to think of it, was diverted from his Purpoſe by the Entreaties of Juno. But this Our Prince hath diſſolved a Neceſſity of inexorable Judgment, no leſs than that, without any regret; his Wife alſo freely conſenting to it, being his perpetual Aſſociate and Partaker in Councils: Moreover, their only and moſt dear Son following the Authority of them both, whom they Inſtruct and Educate to the ſame Courſes and Manners, herein imitating both Father and Mother; for that he may be the liker to him, it much concerns him to be indued with the ſame Piety and Clemency. And in ſuch manner were thoſe Perſons delivered. But as for them whoſe Faults were formerly mentioned, and were to be aſcribed more to the Nature of their Ears than their Will and Pleaſure, was there longer Conſultation uſed, and more delay for their Security? Were not they preſently delivered of their Fears; and as if they had never been ſuſpected for any Crime, did they not preſently and ſuddenly keep Holy-days? and inſtantly change from that abject and idle Habit, wherein they had appeared, to one more Comely and Elegant?

44. This Alteration I much more admire than that of Ulyſſes, mentioned in Homer; whereby, from a wrinkled and ragged Old Man, Minerva changed him into a Splendid Condition by the help of Clothes, and made him ſtrong, and in the Flower of his Age, at ſuch time as he was to be known by his Son. This was only a Change in ſhew, and as to the Superficies of his Body. Yon have returned their Souls into their Bodies:Neither can I call your Rod or Scepter leſs Beautiful or Golden than that of Mercury is termed by Homer: For it recalls not from ſleep, but from Death: This is a Fortification ſtronger than all Iron, this will preſerve your Empire much more than thoſe Fires, the cutting open of Veins, and Axes, which when the moſt cruel Roman Tyrants forced upon their Subjects, they did not thereby repreſs, but increaſe their hatred againſt them. So did not your Anceſtors and Progenitors, who were of Opinion, that Subjects might better be kept in order by Shame, and good Will, than by Fear; good Will being a much more ſtrong and invincible a Defence than Fear can be; for that we know, by Fear it could never be vanquiſhed, whereas it hath often Conquered all other Letts and Obſtacles. As for Example, ſuch Emperors as have been Famous for Meekneſs, except they were very negligent and careleſs of their Affairs, if any Conſpiracy was hatched againſt Sect. 5. againſt them, without much difficulty they ſuppreſſed it: On the Contrary, ſuch “ A. D. as were Cruel and Bloody, who always put to death thoſe they diſcovered, never “ 395.

wanted ſuch as attempted their Lives. How ridiculous was he who would teach “ Thraſybulus Tyrants how to be ſecure, by ſtriking down with his Rod the moſt Tall and Emi- “ Mileti Tyran- nent of the Stalks of Corn? for never could he ſtrike down ſo many, but more and “ nus a Perian- greater would ſtill remain? In this reſpect the Fear of Tyrants being moſt unhappy, “ dro Corinthi that when they remove all they ſuſpect out of the way, yet they can never arrive to “ Tyranno Con- that Condition as to ſuſpect none at all. ſultus.

45. I cannot, O Emperor, but remember that Advice which you gave to your “ Judges when they went to Sit. One there was that ſaid, That the Safety of the “ Princes was in the firſt place to be regarded: Nay rather, ſaid you, their Fame and “ Reputation. For length of Life is not that a Prince ought to ſeek after, but a certain “ Excellency in Virtue. Otherwiſe Dionyſius and Tiberius had grown old in their Do- “ mination, whereas their Old Age was nothing elſe but a more lengthened Infamy. He “ who is of that Opinion, and eſteems his Fame more than his Safety, he judges them “ more his Enemies who hinder him from Glory and Renown, than thoſe that lay Snares “ for his Body and Life. Therefore I ſhall not urge to you any Saying of Plato, no not “ of Ariſtotle; but it will be ſufficient if you underſtand your own Saying, and conſi- “ der in every Action, whether there be more Honeſty or Advantage in it; whether “ you be acted with Reaſon that's ſincere, and void of diſturbance, or your Mind be “ rather darkned by ſome affection or perturbation: For, Diſturbance of Mind is the “ moſt dangerous of all, that perverts Reaſon in thoſe who have the greateſt Power. There- “ fore did the Perſians fitly call Cyrus a Father, Cambyſes a Lord, and Darius an “ Huchſter: For its Juſtice that makes a Father of a Common-wealth; Anger and “ Fierceneſs a Lord, and Covetouſneſs an Huchſter. However, the Appellation of Fa- “ ther is only Divine, (for Poets call Jupiter the Father of Men) whereas of the other “ two the one is appropriate to Wild Beaſts, and the other to Slaves. But as in the “ Swarms of Bees there is one King, who riſeth of himſelf, and by none other is inſtru- “ cted, about whom all the whole Swarm flutters, and makes a noiſe with Joy, and In- “ circles him: So happens it now and then amonſt Men; but he longeſt continues his “ Rule, when both theſe things meet and unite in him, viz. Beauty of Mind, and Com- “ lineſs of Shape and Body. And he doubtleſs is a great Prince indeed, whoſe Beauty is “ not imperfect or lame, but altogether intire and abſolute. Wherefore, as Alexander “ declareth, that Achilles was happy, becauſe he had Homer to publiſh and blazen out “ his Exploits: So did I think my ſelf fortunate, in that by my Oration I have had op- “ portunity to ſet forth your deſerved Praiſe. Neither let any Man imagine, that this “ proceeds rather out of Flattery than from the force and evidence of Truth: for of “ all thoſe Emperors which hitherto we have either known or heard of, beſides two “ moſt famous of all the reſt, there is none other, truly, which would have animad- “ verted upon ſo great a Crime aud Offence in the ſame way, and by the ſame mea- “ ſure, as you have done.

46. Thus much uttered Themiſtius in his firſt Oration concerning the Good Nature or Humanity of Theodoſius; upon what Occaſion we cannot certainly tell. Some have imagined it a Congratulatory Speech for his Clemency ſhewed to the Antiochians; but that it could not be, as appears from ſome Paſſages, and that in particular, where he ſpeaks concerning two ſorts of faults, whereof the one was the Crime of Treaſon it ſelf, and the other was the Hearing of it, or what we call Miſpriſion of Treaſon, which how could it agree with the Popular Tumult of the Citizens of Antioch? It remains therefore, that with Petavius we conclude it to have been ſome Conſpiracy of certain Senators againſt his Perſon, which he thus readily and freely forgave. But as he did not only do this Act of Clemency, but continued ſtill to ſhew himſelf what the Orator makes him to be; ſo neither could the Orator forbear having the ſame occaſions, but ſtill περὶ τῆς φιληκοΐας τȣ̃ Βασιλέως.

Themiſtius his ſecond Oration in praiſe of Theodoſius.

commend him, for the eaſineſs and agreeableneſs of his Manners; this Emperors merit on the one ſide provoking him, and on the other his own continual Exerciſe in the way of ſpeaking by an Habitual Inclination, prompting him, though now in his Old Age, to keep up that Faculty which in his youth he had attained. Is it poſſible (ſaith he) “ that one who deſigns to be Excellent in Horſemanſhip, and affects the Sirname which “ by Homer is given to Neſtor, (whome he calls an Horſeman, and a Driver of Horſes) that “ he ſhould altogether neglect that very Art, and not exerciſe himſelf in all theſe Cour- “ ſes and Methods which conduce to the perfection of it? Such as are to mount an “ Horſe readily, to ſit him, with as much eaſe to the Horſe as poſſible; eaſily to quit him “ upon occaſion, to curbe him in when there's need for it, and to give him the Reins as “ the Caſe ſhall require, and to cauſe him to take ſuch way as is moſt convenient. In like “ manner Menelaus blames Antiochus in a certain place in Homer, for having in a Chariot Race, which Achilles ordained in honour of Patroclus, out of deſire of winning, never conſidered in what danger he drove, and not reſtraining his Horſes, but putting them on in a ſtrait and precipitous Place. As in Horſemanſhip, the ſame thing is to be obſerved in the Dexterity of Shooting. Will any who has a Deſign to be excellent in that way ſpend his Time and Pains in any thing ſo much as daily to learn how to hit the Mark? Therefore is his Hand even worn with drawing the Bow, and by his Induſtry he arrives, at length, at ſuch Skill, as that of Meriones of Crete is reported to be, who if he miſſed the Pidgeon, yet would be ſure to hit the String.

Sect. 5. A.D. 395.

47. If any deſire to be Skilful in Fencing, and by it to obtain great Praiſe and Renown, if he deſpiſe the knowledge how to manage his Weapon, and is ignorant how to turn his lean Body from one ſide to another; ſhall we ſay that this man hopes for Glory and Commendation from that Art which he never Exerciſed, or give him Praiſe or Honour for it as in a Dream? That I may not inſtance to you in a Pilot, or a Shepherd, or a Phyſitian, and prove to you, that all theſe, if they deſire to be Excellent in their ſeveral ways, muſt alſo be deſirous to be converſant in thoſe Courſes by which the Excellency of their Arts or Profeſſions are attainable; I come to that very Point on which I purpoſe to inſiſt. If therefore there be any one who is ſeated npon an Elevated Throne, adorned with a Purple Robe, and having Dominion in a manner over all Earth and Sea, which he both rules and preſerves, aud upon occaſion pardons; if he have a deſire after Praiſe, which is ſincere and without flattery, doth not his Mind ſeem to acquieſce, and be confident in what is ordained from above? And in that he now paſſeth the ſixth Year of his Reign without the leaſt blot or ſpot upon him, is he not more proof againſt Calumny and Contempt, than againſt the Sword it ſelf? Remember that firſt Meeting you had, and the Bæotian Verſes or Congratulation, upon occaſion of which you met together. Here he ſpends ſome words in reflecting upon ſome Poet or other, who being either a Bæotian by his Country, or making his Commendation in the manner of Pindaricke Odes, with very handſome Expreſſions well put together, yet commended the Emperor for theſe things which are eſteemed by the Vulgar, as great Forces, good Fortune, and Authority. Whereas it is agreeable to the Art of Wiſdom alone to inquire who he is that is truly a King, and what are the Signs and Tokens of his Majeſty: not ſuch as are the Golden Eagle, and the Dragons (in his Banners) ſubtlely Woven: or that with an Arrow or Dart he can hit a Mark; for theſe I ſuppoſe Nero the Miniſtrel, and furious Domitian, might urge in their own behalf; but he is the Man whoſe Mind is lifted upward, and intent upon God the Moderator and Prince of all things; and by him being Governed in all his Affairs, from him receives whatſoever is profitable for the Regiment of an Earthly and Inferior Kingdom. And from him it is, that you (moſt Excellent Emperor) receiving what you have, ſtood in no need, of Archers, or the Scutati, of Armenians or Iberians, or Horſe bearing heavy Armour, for Extinguiſhing that Scythian Flame. For by your Council and Prudence alone that Flame fell and went out of it ſelf. You have not your Eyes fixed on the Earth, neither are you perplexed how to procure Gold or Silver for your Supplies: but how you may heap up vaſt Treaſure of good and famous Deeds, of which none can rob or plunder you.

48. After ſome other words he further tells him, that there was another quite contrary Cauſe of his Delay in ſpeaking than that which he ſuſpected; not a Defect; but a luxuriant Plenty of Subjects upon which he could inſiſt. For being wont, ſaith he, to do many excellent things, not only daily but hourly adding one thing to another, you thence do cauſe that my Speeches come from me very difficultly. You do not undo what you had formerly done, but ſtill weaving more work, and multiplying it upon me; when I purpoſe to commend any famous Action you do, or Saying which you utter, with a ſincere and incorrupt Encomium, preſently many new and freſh preſent themſelves, that put others out of my Head which formerly I had pitch'd on; and when, omitting the former, I intend to ſpeak of what had happened later, ſtill others of freſher date occur, which extrude the former Commendation. The ſame things happen to me as to thoſe Liquoriſh People that are invited to a Feaſt: I taſte and take an Eſſay of every thing; ſo that I fill my Belly with no one Diſh that is ſet before me: Or rather I am in the Condition of Hounds, which if they happen upon one Wild Beaſt alone, do conſtantly ſtick to it and purſue it, till it be taken; but if they rouſe others from ſeveral Parts, chooſe one of theſe, and leave the other to its Eſcape. And truly

Sect. 5. A.D. 395.

truly theſe Ancient Poets or Singers are not at all to be reprehended, if they Extolled Hercules the Son of Jupiter more eaſily in the beginning than in the ſequel and progreſs of his Undertakings. Your Acts are of the ſame Nature; for you increaſe perpetually your Atchievements, ſo that our Muſe wants ſufficient Confidence, to keep pace therewith; her Orations being not light winged, and eaſily moved, but ſlow and leiſurely, looking about upon every thing that's done, and not meerly upon it as done, but with what Will, at what Time, with Whom, and for what Purpoſe. For oftentimes an Action of it ſelf is not ſo conſiderable, but the Will of performing it is Laudable and Excellent. Of this Nature was your firſt Expedition to the Rhine. Every one indeed did not apprehend it; but your Mind in attempting was great and truly Royal; to revenge a Prince taken away before his time, and to preſerve the Remainders of his Family. Whoſoever thinks that of low Concernment, let him conſider, how by that undertaking alone, and the terror thereof, the Inſolence of the Weſt was repreſſed. Even as Achilles in old time, when he abſtained from War, yet by leaping out of his Tent Exclaiming and making a Noiſe, extinguiſhed the Fire that had taken in the Navy of the Greeks, and deterred the Trojans from further proceeding.

He Inſtanceth in his quieting the Weſt.

His leſſening the burthen of Tributes.

49. Theſe things, when I conſider ſeperately and apart, I find it neceſſary to uſe my Notes, by degrees and warily. As when I think upon your leſſening the burthen of Tributes, in that the Timing of it ſeems more worthy of Admiration than the greatneſs of the Thing it ſelf. For, when, as we verily apprehended, there might be reaſon to augment theſe Impoſitions, there being daily need of more ſupply, preſently the Charge abated; and therefore the coming of it ſo unexpectedly, and beyond our hope, was greater than the Kindneſs it ſelf. Formerly Corne was not, without threats, and compulſion, brought hither; but now it flies as upon Wings, nay more ſwiftly, and without any calling for it: Now the Sea it ſelf obeys the Emperor, and even the Winter Navigation with Ships of Burthen is more Commodious and Pacate than that of Summer. The Granaries therefore do not now abound with Filth and Cobwebs, but are full, and to ſpare; and that Ancient Truſt and Security, which formerly had left us, is returned again. So paſs we the Winter, hoping well concerning the Fertility of the Spring. The Prince thinks it not below him to make inſpection into theſe Treaſuries, but permitting thoſe wherein Gold is laid up to be kept by others, doth not ſtick at all, nor think it below his Majeſty, to take an Account himſelf, and view that which is depoſited in the Granaries. Crœſus the King of Lydia indeed, thought it more becoming his Royal Magnificence to view his Vaults filled with Gold, than furniſhed with Corn. And therefore he bragged to Solon the Athenian, not of his heaps of Wheat, but of his Filings of Gold, which were not the Gifts of the Earth, but the unfruitful and barren Wealth of an arrogant River, with which whoſoever is compaſſed about, muſt dye of Hunger, as he did who periſhed in the injoyment of his Wiſh. Therefore would not Solon own Crœſus for the moſt happy of all Mortals: but mentioned the Athenian, and the Young Men of Argos, and any thing ſooner than he would do him. But doubtleſs moſt Bleſſed and Happy would he have pronounced that Emperor, with whoſe allowance ſuch an Army is maintained and kept on foot, as never was before in the Roman Empire, eſpecially upon the River Tigris. After this he ſpeaks concerning his Allowances, and beautifying the City of Conſtantinople, what we have already written concerning that Matter, and then proceeds.

In ſuch an Army kept up as never was in the Roman Empire.

50. And truly, my good Hearers, if this Body of mine could be accomodated to my Will, I ſhould deſire, that my Life might be continued to me, not thereby to injoy any other Pleaſures, (for they are all already, and with reaſon, extinguiſhed in me) but that I might ſee a third City, which our Emperor will accompliſh e're it be long. Neither have I this deſire in me without hope to ſee it accompliſhed. For in him there remains ſo preſent a Remedy for driving away mine Infirmities, that when lately he willed me to apply my ſelf again unto Muſick, there was more Virtue in his words, than in all the Medicines of Hippocrates. Now I proceed with more vigour than formerly, and when I ſpeak can better be heard; neither am I ſo ſtopped up, but I can ſwallow both Meat and Drink: nay, together with this Sedulity and contention of Mind, my Body in ſome meaſure reflouriſheth, is excited, and ſeems to ſhake off Old Age. Wherefore the Caſe being ſo with me, no wonder it is that I ſing not now my laſt Song, (as Swans are wont before their Death, in Honour of that God whoſe Servants and Prophets they are) For the Prince of the Muſes will ſtill afford me ſome better and ſweeter

Sect. 5.

A.D. 395.

occaſion for Melody. Indeed the Medicaments of Colchis deceived the Daughters of Pelias, pretending to make their Old Father Young again. But this our Prince reduceth me to true vigour and ſtrength, not ſo much by his new Building, as for that he himſelf grows and increaſeth daily in a deſire and aptneſs to hear. Therefore doth he excite, provoke and ſtimulate my Mind, neither ſuffers it by heedleſneſs to fall into Slumber or Oſcitancy; but though weary and weakned, as ſome Excellent Soldier, he recalls it, and puts it to Diſcipline, affording Excellent Helps thereunto, and whatſoever Art it ſelf doth require. In that therefore I put my Hands to the Præfectſhip of the City, I neither was led by Ambition nor deſire of Honour; but becauſe I coveted to make it appear, that our Emperor had the ſame Opinion with Divine Plato concerning Man's Felicity. But that neither the Emperors Opinion, nor the Saying of Plato is to be convicted of Error, is rather to be ſhewn by ſome other than by me.

Themiſtius once Præfect of the City.

51. But I ſhall not boaſt much of that Table or Picture, but of another and more perfect, which contains thoſe Pourtraictures in its Power, which the Workers in Ivory or Gold have not framed, but is the Work of the Emperor himſelf, or a Sacred Off-ſpring preſently conſummate from a Sacred Birth; alone deſired by the Wiſhes of all Men, and from his Swadling Clothes called Auguſtus, whoſe Body indeed doth grow, but he cannot encreaſe in Honour: whom he committed into my Hands, when he made preparation for his Expedition into the Weſt, and that in the ſight of the Senate, and all the People; with this Charge, that I ſhould take care of him, and diligently make much of him, I, who could neither move a Target, nor toſs a Pike, neither knew how to make uſe of Bow or Sling, only wore the Pallium, and was even bended together by Weakneſs and Old Age. But as it appears, he did not think that the ſame Diſcipline was proper to a Prince, and a Private Man: that he who was to command at Land and Sea, ſhould be inſtructed the ſame way as an Officer in the Army. Come hither therefore my moſt Dear Son, and ſit on my Knee, that I may inſtruct thee; not as Phœnix did Achilles, ſtopping him with Meat and Drink, but giving thee that Nouriſhment which Philoſophers alone prepare for Young Princes that are under Age, I mean thoſe fruitful Diſciplines, lofty, and full of advantage, the Grace and Ornaments of the Ancient Emperors. Such as the great Cyrus of old was Educated in; the Roman Numa, that famous Marcus, and excellent Titus, whoſe Great and Glorious Saying it was: This Day I have not Reigned; for I have not done any Man good. Receive alſo the Inſtruction of famous Plato, and Divine Ariſtotle, by whom Great Alexander was inſtructed; whom from an obſcure Kingdom they made Lord of all the World. If thou beeſt informed and educated by ſuch Maſters; thou who challengeſt the Name of that God which preſideth over Sciences; then will ſpeedily be accompliſhed the Wiſh of thy Parents, that Thou mayſt prove more Excellent than thy Father; or what is more moderate and facile, Let him follow his Fathers Steps. Then will thy Mother rejoyce to ſee thee not only returning with Spoils from a Battle, but from ſpeaking to the People, and adminiſtring Juſtice, with the Aſſeſſors and Officers of Juſtice incircled about; which Virtue chiefly and beſt of all fits a Palace.

Theodoſius committed the charge of his Son Arcadius unto him.

Arcadius Mercurii ex Arcadia Oriundi.

52, Thus much Themiſtius, in his Second Oration in the Commendation of Theodoſius, which as being more tedious than our preſent Deſign will well ſuffer, I ſhould not have thus tranſcribed, but that producing no Teſtimony of any Chriſtian in behalf of this Emperor, not any of his own Religion, which muſt be in another Place, it ſeems more juſt that the Reader ſhould know what all the Pagans ſay, and withall perceive their ways of Oratory in this Age. Here he hath alſo ſeveral Hiſtorical Hints concerning the inlarging of Conſtantinople, and other Matters, amongſt which that of Theodoſius his recommending his Son to the care of the Orator, at ſuch time as he prepared for his Expedition againſt Maximus. This Honour put upon him, with other Favours, may make ſome imagine that he was bribed to ſpeak as he did, at leaſt a ſence of Gratitude and good Nature might give ſome farther Accent to his Oratorical Straine, in the preſence eſpecially of the Emperor. But he deduces all his Arguments from Matters of Faſt; and from particular Actions, which are only convincing, rightly argues to the Humour and Nature of the Perſon, in ſuch an Aſſembly where the contrary being notoriouſly known, could not but have checked his how ever ready Tongue. But we have ſtill more Teſtimonies from thoſe of the ſame Superſtitious way, as to Religion, and ſuch as were ſo far from being given in his preſence, that it could not be preſumed, that they ſhould ever come to his Knowledge. One of thoſe is afforded him by Symmachus, as zealous for the worſhip of falſe Gods as any of his time, except it was Flavianus, whom, as in the ſeveral Epiſtles he wrote to him, he calls Brother, ſo he ſeems his Elder Brother in this reſpect; for his hatred to Theodoſius drew him ſo far, as to ingage, nay to ſtir up and incourage Eugenius the late Uſurper againſt him, and in that Cauſe he loſt his life at the Alpes, if ſome were to be believed. Yet to this Flavianus, upon the occaſion of the Emperors renouncing every thing given him by Codicils formerly mentioned by us, doth the ſaid Symmachus write after this manner. Whereas I ran through the commendations“ both as to War and Peace, which belong to our Lord Theodoſius, in an“ honourable ſtyle, I confeſs that I rather touched at the Heads thereof, than ſpake“ enough to the particulars. I alſo added his Laws to the good things he hath done in“ reference to Peace, which as I know, they take away admiration from antient ones,“ ſo I was of opinion that they have not left equal glory to thoſe which are to come. But“ this new ſanction of Fide commiſſa and the Profits of Codicils eternally rejected by this“ beſt of Princes, by ſo much luſtre exceeds the light of ſuch as were before, as much“ as it is more auguſt for a Governor, to put a reſtraint upon himſelf than others. And“ I wiſh that private Avarice may underſtand the meaning of the Lawmaker, and may“ frame manners out of his Laws. For I am not ignorant what he would have others“ do of their own accord, who firſt himſelf hath abhorred theſe ſuſpected Advantages.“ Then after ſome reaſons added for his wiſh and his approbation of what Theodoſius had done, he concludes. If the Amendment of the greater part of Perſons be not attained“; in vain hath the Emperor bound himſelf by theſe ſevere ſanctions, Who allwayes hath been good, and of unblameable manners.

Sect.4.

A.D. 395.

And Symmachus.

Lib. 2. Ep. 13.

Qui ſemper bonus & integer moribus fuit.

53. This cannot be ſaid to have been ſpoken in his Preſence, or to gratifie his Ears, but wreſted from the Writer by the great evidence and Force of Truth. So was that which we ſhall ſubjoyn, and wherewith conclude theſe Teſtimonies, which is the Account Aurelius Victor gives us of this Emperor, and not written till after his death. Theodoſius, ſaith he, was born of Honorius, (his Fathers name he miſtakes) and Thermantia;“ by Nation a Spaniard, and deriving his Original from the Emperor Trajan;“ was created Auguſtus, by Gratian at Sirmium, and Reigned ſeaventeen years. It's reported“ that his Parents, being admoniſhed in a Dream, gave him a conſecrated Name;“ ſo as in Latine he might be called A Deo Datus. From this Oracle a Rumour was“ alſo ſpread in Aſia, that one ſhould ſucceed Valens, whoſe Name in Greek began with“ Θ and Ε and Ο and Δ, with which Theodorus being deceived, and uſurping, ſuffered“ the puniſhment of his wicked Ambition. As for Theodoſius, he was an exceeding great“ Propagator and Defender of the Commonwealth. For in ſeveral Battles he defeated“ the Hunns and Goths, which had harraſed the Empire under Valens. With the Perſians“ he made peace at their deſire. He vanquiſhed and ſlew Maximus the Tyrant, who had“ murdered Gratian, and ſeized on Gall, at Aquileia; and put to death his Son Victor,“ whom being yet within Age, he had ſaluted with the Title of Auguſtus. He alſo overcame“ Eugenius, and Arbogaſtes, ten thouſand of their men being killed. For, this Eugenius,“ truſting to the Intereſt of Arbogaſtes, after he had murdered Valentinian at Vienna,“ made himſelf Emperor; but preſently loſt both Life and Empire. Now Theodoſius“ was in Diſpoſition, and alſo in Body like to Trajan, as far as we can judge by the“ Writings of the Antients, and by Pictures. His Gate was upright, his Limbs alike, ſuch“ ſort of Hair, and ſuch a kind of Mouth and Face, ſaving that Trajan by plucking out“ the Hairs, had his Beard thin on his Cheeks, neither had he ſo big Eyes: and I am“ not certain whether he had ſo much Gracefulneſs, ſo much vigor in his looks, or in“ his Gate was ſo Mageſtick. But his mind was altogether the ſame, ſo that nothing“ can be ſaid, which may not ſeem out of Books to be transferred upon the other. A“ Diſpoſition full of Clemency, Mercy, and freeneſs as to Converſation, thinking himſelf“ to differ in Habit only from others: Honourable in his Dealings with all men;“ but laviſh towards good men: affecting thoſe of ſimple or innocent Natures equally,“ as admiring the Learned if they were harmleſs; with a great Mind beſtowing great“ Things; loving thoſe of his Subjects that were but privately known unto him, and“ conferring on them Honours, Money and other Emoluments; eſpecially ſuch as in“ difficult caſes he found to be true unto him.

And Aurelius Victor.

55. But, For thoſe vices wherewith Trajan is aſperſed, viz. vinolence (or being given“ to Wine) and a coveting of Triumphs, he ſo deteſted them, that he made no Wars,“ but found them made to his hands, and prohibited, by a Law, ſervices conducing to wantonneſs,“ and that Minſtrils ſhould be admitted to Feaſts : attributing ſo much to Modeſty“ and Continence, that he forbade the Marriage of Couſin germans, as of Siſters.“ For Learning, if we look at ſuch as arrive at perfection therein, he was but moderately“ ſeen; but very ſagacious, and uſing much diligence to underſtand the Acts“ of“

Sect.5. A.D. 395.

of his Anceſtors, of whom he did not ceaſe to execrate ſuch as he had read to have “ been Proud, Cruel and Enemies to Liberty ; as Cinna, Marius and Sulla, with all “ ſuch as loved to domineer over others ; but eſpecially the Perfidious and Ingrateful. “ Indeed he would be angry at unhandſom things, but would quickly be turned and “ appeaſed, whereby it came to paſs, by little delaying, that ſometimes more ſevere Com- “ mands were mollified. And he had that by the gift of Nature, which Auguſtus learnt “ from his Doctor of Philoſophy, who when he perceived him to be eaſily moved, ad- “ viſed him, when he began to be angry, that he might not determine any harſh “ thing, firſt to repeat the four and twenty Letters of the Greek Alphabet : that that “ concitation which was but momentnay, might fall of its ſelf ; the thoughts being di- “ verted another way. But without doubt, which is a point of rare virtue, After that “ his Royal Power was increaſed with his years, he was better than before, and much more “ after his Victory obtained in the Civil War. For then more ſolicitouſly than ever did “ he take care of Proviſions for his People ; and a great maſs of Gold and Silver pil- “ fred, and ſpent by the Tyrant, he reſtored to many out of his own Treaſury ; where- “ as even good-natured Princes were ſcarcely wont to yield back bare grounds and “ Lands diſpoiled. Now I come to thoſe things of leſſer concernment, and as it's ſaid “ within the Court, which becauſe they are more ſecret, do more attract the Eyes and “ the Ears of men, by Nature curious. His Uncle he reſpected as a Father ; the Chil- “ dren of his deceaſed Brother and Siſter, he held in the ſame place as his own : thoſe “ of his Kindred and Affinity he imbraced with the Affection of a Parent : He would “ entertain Elegantly and Chearfully, but not Profuſely or with much Coſt : would fit his “ Diſcourſe to the Company, their Wayes and Dignities, mixing Gravity with his “ Mirth : he was an Indulgent Father, and a Kind Husband. His exerciſe was neither “ effeminate, nor to tireſomeneſs : when he had leiſure, he choſe rather to recreate “ himſelf with walking ; and by continency of eating, (or a moderate Diet) he pre- “ ſerved his health. Thus he died in peace at Milan, in the fiftieth year of his Age ; “ leaving both the Empires to both (viz. Arcadius and Honorius) in a quiet conditi- “ on. His Body the ſame year was conveyed to Conſtantinople, and there Buried.

56. It's time now to make an end of this Subject, and ſo Reader thou haſt cauſe to think ; but if thy patience be too much tired and preſumed upon, let thine Indignation fall upon his Memory that gave the Occaſion. I ſuppoſe thou wilt eaſily paſs thy ſentence, and there's little need of ſumming up the Evidence. The charge or Accuſation is made by him, whom thou muſt needs, by all that thou readeſt, take for a bitter Adverſary, and Malicious ; neither are any of his Friends produced to ſay any thing in his behalf, except thou wilt look upon thoſe as intereſted Perſons, who were of the ſame inclinations with Zoſimus as to Religion, and ſome of them as zealous as himſelf in that way, and ſuch as could make as little Advantage by that they teſtifie, as he could receive damage by his undertaking. Beſides, moſt were Eye-witneſſes of his Actions, and had them not by report, as he muſt neceſſarily have had, not writing till the later end of the reign of Theodoſius his Grandſon. But the great objections againſt him are, the Effeminateneſs and Luxury of his Life, with the profuſeneſs thence ariſing, and his oppreſſion of the People, by raiſing of money to ſupply theſe diſorderly occaſions, and by reaſon of his making ſo many principal Officers of the Army. Now the Evidence that comes in for his Defence ; firſt makes him an extraordinary good man in general, and, it alſo further ſpeaks directly to the things whereof he is accuſed. A man of ſingular goodneſs of Nature, full of Clemency, Pity, and of wonderful Freedom and Affability thou findeſt him, nay further, Symmachus tells Flavianus, as it fell naturally in his way, and not by any Study or Deſign, that he was always good and unblameable or ſound in his manners. And as for the continuance and extent of this goodneſs Victor witneſſeth that, he was better after that his Power increaſed with his years ; and yet much more ſtill after his victory obtained in the Civil War. Add to theſe what Themiſtius affirms of his keeping ſuch an Army on foot as never had been in the Roman Empire, eſpecially upon the River Tigris. And moreover, recall to mind what he diſcourſeth concerning his Buildings at Conſtantinople, and bringing that City to ſuch extraordinary Perfection and Decorum.

Theodoſius a moſt excellent man.

57. Any indifferent Perſon hearing this ſo ſublime a Character, would eaſily acquit him of ſo ugly a charge, but this we ſhall not do without inſtancing in the particulars themſelves. And firſt for his Luxury and Sloth, his pleaſing his Appetite, and his Belly, and gratifying his Eaſe, and nouriſhing many Miniſters and Inſtruments of his Effeminate life ; thou findeſt the contrary affirmed both by Pacatus and Victor. The former ſpeaks of the retrenching of the expences of the Court, not only by rejecting what was ſuperfluous, but ſcarcely admitting of a neceſſary allowance ; and as to his own Perſon, contenting himſelf with a mean and ſouldierly fare, while his Palace abounded with examples of Pains-taking, Patience and Frugality. But grant it an Oratorical flouriſh that his meals were more ſpare than thoſe of ordinary Tables, and were only ſupplied with Proviſions relating to the place and time; yet when he made his entertainments (for Princes, ſometimes this way muſt ſhew their Magnificence) he did it indeed elegantly and chearfully, but Aurelius affirms without any profuſeneſs or much coſt; for (he gives the reaſon) he therein excelled Trajan that he was not given to Wine, but by a moderate Diet he kept himſelf in health. If theſe two may be believed, he was both very temperate himſelf, and by his example drew others off from their luxurious courſes, to Abſtemiouſneſs and Frugality. For the ſluggiſhneſs wherewith his Enemies charges him, it can be in no other reſpect than that for which Victor extolls him above his Anceſtor Trajan, that he did not himſelf make or give occaſion to Wars, but was provoked or drawn into them by the Aggreſſors. This indeed like a true Chriſtian Prince he was guilty of, never ſeeking occaſions to ſhed mans blood: He was no Pirate (as that Seaman told Alexander) robbing with whole Armies. But did he ever refuſe any enterprize, that might be warranted by that goodneſs of Nature and love to Mankind, which ought to abound in Princes eſpecially, who cannot in any other reſpect be ſo truly ſtiled Gods upon Earth, or thought to reſemble him whoſe vicegerents they are, in whoſe Hands (as the Pagan Orator applauds) their Hearts and Lives do ſtand? He was ready upon any occaſion to vanquiſh the Goth and Hunn, to reſtrain the Saracen and force him to make peace. Remember what his Detractor writes concerning his diſguiſing himſelf, and the entertainment he had in an Inn, where he diſcovered the deſigns of the Invaders. He ſuppreſſed two conſiderable and potent Uſurpers at Home, and brought to reaſon ſuch Barbarians as made any diſturbances. And abroad, beſides the terror which his Armies and Name ſtruck into other Nations, he awed the bold and daring Perſian, ſo as he durſt not ſtir or move; him whom neither Julian could conquer, nor others of his Predeceſſors, keep in order; and though not a Confederate, made him in a manner, as the Orator ſaith, by his Preſents confeſs himſelf a Tributary.

58. For his making ſo many Magiſtri Militum, or great Officers in his Army, he had occaſion enough to do it, if what Themiſtius ſaith be true, that he maintained a greater Army than ever had been in the Empire. The Northern parts required his great care; but the Eaſt, where he had reaſon to apprehend dangers from the great and powerful Perſian Kingdom, now, as it appears, was more induſtriouſly and with more Forces upon Tigris than ever to be ſecured. It was not he that let the Barbarians into the Bowels of the Empire, and firſt received them to Charges and Commands, but now it was done, when they were civilized, had learnt the Roman Diſcipline and way of Fighting, and not only they, but their Countrymen who lived at Home, by that continual entercourſe, which for ſeveral Ages, either in War or Peace they had had with the Romans; there was neceſſity, at leaſt from Rules of Policy, to tame, and by good uſage to transform them, if poſſible, into a Roman intereſt and humour. When Strangers imbody with a Nation, when they marry in that Country, and have Children to ſucceed them as Members and Citizens thereof, it's ſeldom but they acquieſce, grow domeſtick, and even forget the concerns of the Regions they left; which why it took not place in theſe Barbarians who afterward overran the Roman Empire, we may in convenient time Diſcourſe. In a Neighbouring Kingdom there are now more at preſent which bear the Title of Marſhall thereof, than under him, that of Magiſter Militum; though that Kingdom can ſcarcely be eſteemed as a tenth part of that Empire which he the reſt Commanded. To oblige the Princes of ſuch Nations as had been received into the Empire he gave them Commands, yet ſo as to be commanded themſelves if they grew turbulent, and by preferring them and others, if you believe what you read in his behalf, he did not ſo mightily heighten the Charge, and thereby was driven to harraſe and oppreſs his People by unwonted Taxes and Impoſitions. Themiſtius ſpeaks of his releaſing Tribute, and that with ſo much reſpect to time and occaſion, that the circumſtance was more acceptable than the thing it ſelf. Symmachus extolls him for his ſelfdenial in eternally renouncing what Princes had wont to get by Fidei Commiſſa and Codicils, and as he admires his Laws in general, as full of Goodneſs and Clemency, I ſuppoſe, Reader, by what thou haſt found in the Hiſtory of his Government, thou wilt ſcarcely be moved to be of the contrary Opinion.

59. That therefore which Zoſimus termes profuſeneſs, to underſtanding Perſons, ſeems to have been a Crime (with him) of the ſame Nature with that he charges upon Conſtantine, and no other but his Munificence towards Biſhops, Churches and other Perſons and things relating to Chriſtian Religion. That ſeveral miſcariages hapned

But he was Paſſionate.

hapned in his Reign there's little doubt: amongſt a multitude of Officers imployed by him in ſo many Provinces, that many ſhould not be ſwayed by Pride, Paſſion and Self-intereſt is not a thing imaginable, and how he could prevent or redreſs every individual Inconvenience, being neceſſarily to uſe other mens Eyes and Hands, none can deviſe. It was his misfortune to be deceived in men toward his later end, though as to thoſe that ſerved him at his fi[illegible]ntrance Pacatus magnifies both his Fortune and his Choice. And the great miſchief was that it hapned towards his later end, for he might, had he lived, have diſcovered and removed thoſe Perſons, who being intruſted by him with the management of the Affairs of his Sons, gave beginning to thoſe miſeries which afterward fell upon the Empire. And that we may be impartial, he had one Infirmity in his Temper and Humour hinted by Victor, and that, was ſome Haſtineſs and Anger, to which the beſt Natures are often ſubject, which ſometimes when ill men could manage it, might break forth to ſome actions of Severity. But he eaſily cooled of himſelf, if by ill Inſtruments his Heat was not ventilated, and moſt readily cloſed with what tended to appeaſe him: as we ſee in the buſineſs of the Antiochians. Indeed one example there is of his being overcome with his paſſionate humour, which produced an Effect of very ill conſequence. At Theſſalonica the Citizens fell into a tumult about a Chariot Driver, whom being commited to ward for attempting a Womans Chaſtity, they would force out of Priſon, and their Rage flew ſo high as to kill Boterichus the Magiſter Militum in Illyricum. The report hereof caſt the Emperor into ſo violent a Paſſion that, without any Proceſs made againſt the Offenders, he commanded that ſome of them ſhould be ſeized and put to death, which command being executed in an hurry, and when the Town was full of Strangers, ſeaven thouſand are ſaid to have periſhed. This we did not inſert into the Hiſtory of his Reign, becauſe though the thing it ſelf was too Conſiderable, yet the conſequence of it was very Admirable, and relates to Eccleſiaſtical Matters, wherein, God willing, ſhall be diſcovered that Admirable Humility, Meekneſs, Patience and Self-denial of this Prince, when for this his Offence he was ſecluded the Church by Ambroſe the Biſhop of Milan, and not received to Communion again till he had given publick ſatisfaction, and made a Law concerning the deferring the Execution of ſuch Sentences for thirty days. This was the only flaw in his life that can be known, of which yet our Church Hiſtorians only take notice. A wonder it is it ſhould eſcape Zoſimus, who would have doubtleſs gone far out of the way to have hooked it in; ſo that the matter ſeems not of ſuch conſequence as ſome Writers make it. However, take this Perſon according to his general Carriage and Demeanour (which will much more appear in our Eccleſiaſtical Part) he was ſo extraordinary for Goodneſs of Nature and other Qualifications, that he deſerved alſo the Syrname of the Great, which Poſterity thought fit to confer on him.

CHAP.

THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

CHAP. III.

Containing the Decay and Ruin of the Empire in the Weſt.

SECT. I.

The firſt ſtep to the Ruin of the Empire.

From the Death of Theodoſius the Great, to the firſt Invaſion of Italy by the Barbarous Nations.

The ſpace of ſeven years and about ſeven Months.

A. D. 395.

Rufinus left Governor to Arcadius, and Stilicho to Honorius.

Out of Ambition bring all to Ruin.

1. THe worth of a Prince is moſt diſcerned in the want of him, and ſo it happened to the Empire after the death of Theodoſius. It was the great infelicity of it and him, that he left two Sons not capable of themſelves to manage publick Affairs; Arcadius the Elder being but about ſeventeen years of age, and Honorius not eleven: But betwixt them two he divided the Empire before his death; aſſigning to Arcadius the Eaſt, and to Honorius the Weſtern Parts, wherein were comprized the Weſtern Illyricum, with Italy, Gaul, Spain, Britain and Africk. Till they ſhould come to maturity he appointed Rufinus Chief Governor or Aſſiſtant to Arcadius; and to Honorius, Stilicho. Theſe Men having ſuch great Advantages, and puffed up and emboldened therewith; when the Empire, by reaſon of the Barbarians which hovered upon it, was in ſo tickliſh a condition, that it required their care and diligence to ſecure it, thruſt it on, and plunged it, through their Ambition, into greater Inconveniences, and ſuch, as it could never recover it ſelf out of them: for they took advantage at the Youth and Imbecillity of their Maſters, and omitted no ſort of Villany to advance themſelves into their rooms. This mutual heat of Ambition caſt them into ſo violent hatred of each other, that to procure the deſtruction of his fellow, as well the one as the other, confounded all things Divine and Humane. This gave ſuch advantage to the Barbarians received into the Empire, that they, who by fair and prudent management, might have been induced quietly to incorporate with the Romans, were thereby allured to ſet up for themſelves; to become Conquerors inſtead of Subjects; to cantonize the Provinces, and erect Principalities of their own. How theſe miſchiefs began and proceeded Zoſimus declares after this manner.

The manner how declared by Zoſimus.

2. After that the Sovereign Power came into the hands of Arcadius and Honorius, they ſeemed only in Name to be poſſeſſed of it; for in reallity, the whole Power of the Eaſt was in Rufinus, and that of the Weſt was at the pleaſure of Stilicho. They now determined all Suits and Controverſies with great licentiouſneſs; and he went away with the Cauſe who could give moſt Money, or by ſome Relation to the Judge, or indearment with him, could draw him to his Party. Now Lands and Eſtates, of which the owners were thought happily ſiezed, were made over and appropriated to them two: Some by ſuch means bribing them, and thereby evading their Calumnies, with which elſe they would be over-powered; and others freely parting with them, thereby to purchaſe Offices and other Advantages, whereby the Cities were oppreſſed. The Provinces being thus haraſſed on every Rufinus purpoſes to marry the Emperor to his Daughter.

ſide, all the Wealth flowed into their Coffers; and in every place Poverty raged, where lately had been Abundance of all things. The Princes themſelves were not at all ſenſible of theſe things; but whatſoever Rufinus and Stilicho ordained was looked upon no otherwiſe than as unwritten Law. And by this time Rufinus having vaſtly enriched himſelf, began now to dream of procuring no leſs than the Empire, and that by giving in Marriage to the Emperor a Daughter he had that was fit for Matrimony, judging it a very fit Advantage for his purpoſe. This, by ſome of his Creatures, he procured to be moved to Arcadius; and, as he thought, with all ſecrecy imaginable: but by ſome way or other out it came, and began preſently to be the diſcourſe of the people: For from the ſwelling of his Pride and his Arrogance, which daily increaſed, all conjectured what he aimed at; and this increaſed the common Odium againſt him. But as if he intended to cover and conceal his leſſer faults by great Villanies, he attempted another thing in proſecution of his Deſigns. Florentius, who, when that great Julian was Cæſar, exerciſed the Office of Præfectus Prætorio over the Nations inhabiting beyond the Alps; had a Son who was called by the name of Lucian. This Man courted Rufinus as his Patron, and had given him Lands of very great value: Upon which Account Rufinus always acknowledged himſelf obliged to him, and would ſtill commend him before the Emperor Arcadius; who made him thereupon Comes of the Eaſt. Now the Authority of this Magiſtrate is ſuch, that he commands all ſuch as govern the Provinces of thoſe parts, and corrects thoſe that do amiſs.

His Ingratitude and Cruelty towards Lucian.

The Emperor is perſwaded by Eutropius the Eunuch to marry another woman.

3. Lucian carried himſelf ſo virtuouſly toward thoſe that were committed to his charge, and acted with that Juſtice, Temperance and other Qualifications requiſite for fitting him for that Employment, that he became famous; for he was no reſpecter of Perſons, neither concerned himſelf otherwiſe than as the Law directed him: In ſo much that when the Emperor's own Uncle Eucherius required ſomething that was not fit to be granted, he rejected his Propoſal, and thereby ſo moved him, that he went and complained of him to the Emperor, loading him with a grievous Calumny. Arcadius upon this blamed Rufinus for having preferred ſuch a Man to ſo great a place. Whereat he taking occaſion, and, as troubled at the Emperors Reprehenſion, making his purpoſe known to none, with a very few in his Company, went to Antioch; and coming in late at night, apprehended Lucian; and without any Accuſer, called him to his Tryal. He commanded him to be beaten on the Neck with leaden Balls till he expired, and then cauſed him to be put into a Litter, and covered; making all people believe that his life not being taken away, he ſhould find ſome humanity yet at his hands. But the City knowing how the matter went, took it very heavily. Whereupon, to appeaſe the Indignation of the Multitude, he built them a Royal Porticus, than which that City hath not any Building more ſplendid. After this he returned to Conſtantinople, more than ever ſet upon contracting Affinity with the Emperor: But an Accident happened which put him quite beſides his hopes. There were two Sons of Promotus, who in the life time of Theodoſius, were brought up together with his Children; whereof one of them had a Virgin with him of extraordinary beauty; by Philoſtorgius, ſaid to be the Daughter of Baudo, or Bauto, who was Conſul with Arcadius. This Maid, Eutropius, one of the Eunuchs that waited on the Emperor, adviſed him to marry; crying up her handſomeneſs: And when he ſaw him liſten to what he ſaid, he ſhewed him her picture; and thereby exciting his deſire, perſwaded him to take her for his Wife: Rufinus being ignorant of all, and thinking of nothing but that his Daughter ſhould ſhortly be the Imperial Bride, and that he ſhould be made by his Son in Law his Conſort in the Throne, when ſhe was once his fellow in his Bed. The Eunuch perceiving the buſineſs of the Marriage to be as good as done, commanded the people to dance and wear their Garlands, as was wont to be at the Marriages of Princes. And when he had taken a Royal Robe and other Ornaments out of the Palace, and given them to the Emperor's Servants to carry, he went through the City with the people before him. Every one imagined that theſe things were for the Daughter of Rufinus; but coming at length to the houſe of Promotus, there he cauſed them to enter; and by delivering them to the Virgin that was brought up with his Son, preſently declared who it was that muſt be Empreſs. Rufinus being thus fruſtrated when he ſaw another woman married to the Emperor, and that it was too late to recal it; beat his brains to deviſe how he might deſtroy Eutropius. So went the Affairs of Arcadius in the Eaſt.

Stilicho, with better ſucceſs, marries his Daughter to Honorius.

4. Stilicho, who governed all things in the Weſt, had better ſucceſs in the like Attempts; for he married to Honorius, his Daughter which he had by Serena, the Neice of Theodoſius by Honorius his Brother. Beſides now that he was ſtrengthened

Sect. 1.

A. D. 395.

Rufinus plots againſt Arcadius and him.

He ſtirs up Alarich againſt the Emperor.

ed by his Emperor's Affinity, he had in a manner all the Towns of the Romans under his Command: For when Theodoſius, after defeating of Eugenius, was dead in Italy, he, who then was Captain of the whole Army, kept to himſelf the ſtouteſt and moſt valiant of all the Soldiers, and ſent thoſe that were of little account into the Eaſt. Afterward being angry with Rufinus for having equalled his Power in the Eaſt to that of his, he purpoſed to go to Arcadius, and to diſpoſe alſo of his Affairs at his pleaſure; alledging that Theodoſius upon his Death-bed gave him in charge to have an equal care of both his Sons. Rufinus perceiving his Intentions, endeavoured with all his might to hinder the Journey of Stilicho, and yet to leſſen and weaken the Forces of Arcadius as much as poſſible; and bending his Endeavours this way, to bring them about he found out perſons more wicked and fit for his turn than he could have deſired; and by their aſſiſtance became Author of great miſchiefs to the Roman State. There was a certain Grecian, one Muſonius, who aimed at the higheſt degree of Learning; and had three Sons, Muſonius, Antiochus and Axiochus: of theſe Muſonius and Axiochus endeavoured both in Learning and Integrity to excel the Vertues of their Father; but Antiochus his Inclinations ran quite contrary, and became an Inſtrument of diſhoneſty. Rufinus having in his head a deſign to make the Barbarians over-run Greece, preferred him to the Government of it; and withal, delivered the Cuſtody of Thermopylæ to Gerontius, who, he was aſſured, would be his Aſſiſtant againſt the Commonwealth. His eye all this while was upon Alarich, whom he perceived to be ſeditious, and to labour to exempt himſelf from the obligation of all Laws, being diſcontented that he was not preferred to the Command of the Army, but was left only Captain of thoſe Barbarian Forces which Theodoſius had committed to his Conduct at ſuch time as by his Aſſiſtance he ſubverted the Tyranny of Eugenius. To him he ſends Encouragement, with all ſecrecy, to draw out ſuch Barbarians, or other Troops of what Nation ſoever as he could procure, and march boldly at the head of them, with aſſurance to become Maſter of whatever he ſhould approach.

Who, by the Treaſon of Antiochus and Gerontius, invades Greece in a very Hoſtile manner.

Zoſimus his ſtory concerning Athens.

Hanc Zoſimi fabulam vide abundè confutatam a Baronio in Annal. ad hunc Annum.

5. Alarich, in confidence hereof, departs from Thrace, and paſſeth into Macedonia and Theſſaly, deſtroying all things in his way. When he came near to Thermopylæ he diſpatched away Meſſengers to the two lately mentioned Antiochus and Gerontius, to carry the News of his Approach. Gerontius, as he was inſtructed, cauſed his Guards to quit the Straits, and left free paſſage for the Barbarians into Greece; who being once there admitted, fell upon rifling and waſting all the Country: The Cities they raze, they kill all the Males that were come to Puberty, and drive away the Boys and Women, together with the great Booty now in their hands. All Bœotia and other Regions of Greece which they once entred they depopulated, and the Devaſtation was ſtill manifeſt in the days of Zoſimus, Thebes excepted; which eſcaped their fury, partly by reaſon of the ſtrength of its Fortifications, and partly becauſe Alarich, haſtening to the Seige of Athens, would not make a ſtay about that City. And to Athens he came, ſuppoſing he ſhould eaſily become Maſter of it, both for that the place was too large to be well defended; and he thought that being poſſeſſed of the Piræus adjoyning to it, that ſo many Inhabitants would ſoon be pinched with want of Neceſſaries. But the Antiquity of the City (Zoſimus tells us) in ſo impious an Invaſion, implored Divine Aſſiſtance, and was to remain free from Devaſtation: and the Writer thinks himſelf concerned not to paſs by in ſilence the cauſe of its preſervation; being abſolutely divine, and ſuch as ought to excite all its Auditors unto Piety. When Alarich came before the Town with all his Forces, he beheld Minerva, the Defendreſs thereof, taking a view of the Walls in the ſame ſhape as ſhe was ſeen amongſt the Images, viz. armed, and ready to fall on ſuch as ſhe had ſeen approaching. Moreover, he beheld Achilles the Heroe juſt accoutered after the manner wherein Homer repreſents him to the Trojans, when in a rage he fought againſt them to revenge the death of Patroclus. With this Apparition Alarich being frighted, omitted all manner of Hoſtility againſt the City; but ſent and offered Peace to the Inhabitants: who accepting of the Terms, Faith for performance was given and received on both ſides, and Alarich, with a few in his Company, was admitted into the Town. There being received wth all manner of Civility; when he had waſhed, and been entertained by ſome of the chiefeſt Citizens, who alſo preſented him with ſuch Gifts as they thought would pleaſe him, he departed from that City, and quitted all Attica without doing the leaſt damage to it. And thus the City of Athens, which in the time of Valens, when all Greece was ſorely ſhaken with an Earth-quake, alone ſuſtained no loſs at all, now alſo, though in ſo extreme danger, yet eſcaped.

Alarich invades Peloponneſus.

6. But Alarich having quitted Attica without doing the leaſt harm therein, ſo much awed by the Apparitions he there ſaw, invaded Megaris; wherein having taken the firſt Town he met with by Aſſault, he haſted toward Peloponneſus, never being found to make any reſiſtance. And Gerontius giving him free paſſage through the Iſthmus, he might eaſily become Maſter of all the Cities without any pains or Combat; for they were not fortified by any Walls, being thought ſecure enough in the Defence that ſhould be made for them in the Iſthmus. Preſently then was Corinth, with the Neighbouring Towns, taken by Storm; and after it Argos, together with ſuch places as lay betwixt it and Lacedæmon. And Sparta it ſelf fell in alſo to the bargain, being partaker in this Calamity of Greece, for that it was neither fortified by Arms nor Men (as it ought to have been) through the Avarice of the Romans; but expoſed to the Cuſtody of ſuch Magiſtrates as were Traitors, and ready to ſerve the luſts of thoſe that were in power, in all things, though to the Deſtruction of their own Countrey. However, the Calamity of Greece now coming to the ears of Rufinus, increaſed the fury of his Ambition more than ever, which he hoped would better ſucceed while the Empire was thus diſturbed. But Stilicho ſhipped his Men, and reſolved to ſuccour Achaia in this her diſtreſs; and landing in Peloponneſus, put the Barbarians ſo much to it, that they fled into Philoe; where wanting Neceſſaries, he might eaſily have ruined them, but that he gave up himſelf to mimicks, to Wenches, and other ſilly and immodeſt Diverſions which he found in thoſe Parts; affording, in the mean time, to his own Soldiers liberty of conſuming what had been left by the Barbarians, whom he alſo permitted to depart with all their Booty out of Peloponneſus, and to paſs into Epirus, the Cities whereof they haraſſed as they had done formerly thoſe of Greece; which perceiving, he returned again into Italy without having any thing performed but this, that he added, by the Men he brought over with him, greater miſchiefs to thoſe which had been ſuſtained by that miſerable Country.

Stilicho makes a ſilly and fruitleſs journey againſt him.

Being returned into Italy, he ſends an Army into the Eaſt.

7. Being there arrived, he endeavoured to bring about the Deſtruction of Rufinus after this manner. He remonſtrated to Honorius that it was needful to ſend over ſome Forces to his Brother Arcadius, for the Succour and Defeat of thoſe Countries which were ſo miſerably oppreſſed under his Command; and having eaſily obtained Orders to execute what he propoſed, appointed what Men ſhould be ſent under Conduct of Gaines, to whom he opened his mind, as to what he would have put in practice againſt Rufinus. Gaines having got near to Conſtantinople, ſent notice of his Approach to Arcadius, and how he was come to his Relief with an Army now at hand: And when the Emperor expreſſed much ſatisfaction therein, he perſwaded him to come in Perſon to meet the Soldiers; affirming that this Honour was wont to be done to Military Men. Arcadius complying, met them out of the City, and the Soldiers there paid him that reſpect which was due unto him; who alſo made his Return of Civility for their Adoration: But then, the Signal being given by Gaines, when they had encompaſſed Rufinus, they cut him in pieces; one taking off his Right Hand, and another his Left, and another parting his Head from his Shoulders; whereat were given ſuch ſhouts, and Triumphs expreſſed, as had been uſual after Victories. And they ſo contumeliouſly treated his dead Body, that they carried his hands up and down the City, and deſired thoſe they met to give ſomething to that Inſatiable Creature. Thus periſhed Rufinus, as he had juſtly deſerved; who had both been the Author of inſufferable Miſchiefs to private Perſons, and of great Calamities to the Publick State. But Eutropius, who all this while had been aſſiſting to Stilicho in all things he deviſed againſt him, now governed all things in the Court; and moſt of his Eſtate he ſecured to his own uſe, though he granted liberty to all to reaſſume what had been taken from them. His Wife and Daughter, for fear of periſhing with him, had taken Sanctuary in a Church of the Chriſtians: And them he permitted, giving them his Word, to ſail to Jeruſalem; which formerly was the Habitation of the Jews, but from the time of Conſtantine, had by the Chriſtians been much beautified with Buildings.

Which deſtroys Rufinus.

Eutropius governs all in the Eaſt after his death.

What other Hiſtorians write of this Subject.

8. Thus writeth Zoſimus concerning the Ambitious Practices of the two Guardians, intruſted by Theodoſius, preſently after his death: To the main of whoſe ſtory all other Authors agree, though ſome with variation of certain Circumſtances. As to the Invaſion of the Eaſtern parts of Europe by Alarich, they are of accord: But other Hiſtorians make mention of ſome parts of Aſia alſo to have been over run and waſted by that Flood of the Northern Nations which Rufinus let out into the Empire. Socrates and Sozomen, our Eccleſiaſtical Writers, make Lib. 6. c. 1.
mention of Armenia: But Claudian, the Pagan Poet, in the ſecond Book of his In- Lib. 8. c. 1.

A. D. 395.

And Claudian the Poet.

vective againſt Rufinus, reckons up many other Countries; who, though he particularly ſets forth the Enormity of his Acts, yet poſſibly might be true enough in his Geography. Some Barbarians, he ſaith, at his call, by the way of the Danube, ſome by the Caſpian Straits and the Snows of Armenia invaded the Riches of the Eaſt. Hereupon Cappadocia, Lydia, Cilicia and Syria were waſted, and hence came the Lamentations of Aſia. In Europe they over-ran whatſoever lay betwixt the Borders of Dalmatia and Pontus, with the Adriatick Sea: There no Cattel, nor owners of Cattel were to be found; but the Fields like to the Deſerts of Lybia. In particular, Theſſaly, Macedonia, Pannonia, Thrace and Myſia groaned under the burthen of ſo heavy Oppreſſors; in ſo much that the poor Inhabitants, as happens in long and grievous Calamities, were put paſt weeping, the thing being now made ſolemn and of courſe, and the cuſtom depriving them of all ſence of the Evil. Hereupon the Poet falls into a fit of Grief and Lamentation, conſidering how great things have a ſuddain period; how that that Empire, which with ſo much blood was obtained, and with ſo much preſerved, with the labour and ſweat of ſo many Captains, which in ſo many years the Roman Valour and Diligence had laid together, ſhould in a ſhort time be overturned by a lazy Traitor; who, while all hands were at work to defend Conſtantinople from the rage of the approaching flames, beheld, as he ſaith, the Burning and Ruin of the adjacent Country with laughter; and boaſted of his intereſt with the Enemy, whom he imitated in his very habit. The People of the Eaſt, though labouring under theſe miſeries, yet had this miſery more upon them, that they durſt not complain, nor be ſeen to ſhew a Countenance inclining to diſcontent: But if you believe the Poet, who, in his Poems againſt Rufinus, as well as the other written on purpoſe in commendation of Stilicho, ſtill claws this perſon, ſecretly wiſhed for his Coming; as placing their hope and confidence in him alone.

Who ſets forth the great miſchiefs done by the Barbarous Nations.

Eheu quam brevibus pereunt ingentia fatis. Imperium tanto quæſitum ſanguine, tanto Servatum quod mille ducum peperere labores. Quod tantis Romana manus contexuit annis, Proditor unus iners angusto tempore vertit, &c.

And the Preparations of Stilicho againſt them.

9. And as ſoon as the Seaſon of the Year would give him leave, he made effectual Preparations for their relief, and got together both his Weſtern and Eaſtern Troops; ſo many as ſcarcely had been beheld under one Command. There you might have ſeen the Armenians with their wreathed Locks, and their green Coverings made faſt to them by eaſie knots; and the fierce looking Galls, with their yellow hair. Thoſe whom ſwift Rodanus, ſlower Araris, whom the Rhine at their Birth did explore whether they could ſwim; and whom the more ſpeedy Garomne, turned back by the Tide, did water, made there their appearance, and that unanimouſly, laying aſide their former differences; he that had been lately beaten not hating him that had given him the Defeat, nor he that had the better priding himſelf in his ſucceſs: But all together conſpiring to favour and to love their General, though the noiſe of the late Alarms and Fights was ſcarcely ceaſed, and as yet their blood and ſpirits could ſcarcely be cooled. Rufinus was not ſo deaf but he preſently had the noiſe of the Expedition; he grew pale, his confidence failed him: He ſtood doubtful whether he ſhould run away, beg pardon, and ſubmit; or betake himſelf to his Friends, the Enemies of the Commonwealth. His Wealth, his great Buildings and Pomp now ſtanding him in no ſtead, he ſighs, he moans, ſtarts out of his bed in a diſtracted ſleep, and ſuffers Puniſhment in the very fear thereof. At length, from Stupidity he returns to his own natural temper; and in a rage enters the Palace, and gets Audience of Arcadius; to whom he lays open the vaſt Ambition of Stilicho, the danger which threatned him his Miniſter, againſt whom all his Plots were levelled: He deſires, nay, importunes him to divert the Storm; or elſe threatens that he will not fall alone, but that his blood ſhall be mixed with that of another perſon. Herewith he extorts a Meſſage unto Stilicho from the unwilling and diſſatisfied Emperor. Stilicho now imagined he drew near his Enemy, and joyed to think he ſhould ſhortly come to an Engagement. The Armenians he placed on the Left, and to the Galls he aſſigned the Right Wing of the Army: But when he had now reached Theſſaly, and longed to releive the diſtreſſed Countries, a rumour is ſpread through the Ranks of Soldiers of new Orders arrived from the Emperor, which how to receive the General knew not, being ſo much diſordered at ſo unexpected an Accident. At firſt he ſtands aſtoniſhed betwixt ſorrow and anger, admires that a Coward had ſo much power: and then conſiders whether he ſhould proceed notwithſtanding Arcadius his Command to the contrary, or elſe give over his ſo hopeful a deſign. He deſires nothing ſo much as to ſuccour Illyricum; but reverence of Authority and Obedience conquers his Valour: On one ſide, publick Convenience moves him; but on the other, fear of Reprehenſion. Having ſhewn ſome paſſion, and exclaimed that Rufinus ſhould thus procure the Deſtruction of the Empire, he gives Command ——pœnamque luit formidine pœnæ.

Rufinus forces Arcadius to ſend to Stilicho.

Who thereupon retreats.

Sect. 1.

A. D 395.

Command for a Retreat. Hereupon the Poet makes the Soldiers extraordinarily diſcontented, and to fret that the Diſcord of the Romans ſhould thus promote the Intereſt of the Goths, and to offer their Captain to follow whitherſoever he would lead them.

—Semper ne Getis diſcordia noſtra Proderit?

Sends the Eaſtern Troops into their own Countries.

Which coming to Conſtantinople,

10. However, Stilicho being pertinacious in his Reſolution to obey, diſmiſſeth the Troops that were to march Eaſtward, into their own Countries. At firſt they take it ill, as ſlighted by him; but in conſideration of his worth, and that in probability they ſhall be by Rufinus delivered up as a Prey to the Hun or Alan, they vow that where ever they are, he ſhall be their Captain ſtill; though abſent, he ſhall have experience of their being faſt and faithful to him: In concluſion, e'er long he ſhould have a Victim offered him by their hands, a Sacrifice wherewith he ſhould be very long and much pleaſed. Theſe Eaſtern Troops keeping their way, arrived at length at Theſſalonica; where recollecting what they had reſolved, they become more violently inclined to the Proſecution. Here the place and the time both conſpired to their farther Union. Neither of ſuch multitudes was one found to betray the Secret; in ſo much that the Poet either feigns or finds an Object of Admiration that ſuch a matter could be ſuppreſſed in ſilence, ſo great a deſign concealed, and ſo great an Heat ſtifled in Travel by the way; eſpecially in their Cups and Entertainments. But in this ſilence and unheard of reſolution they paſs Hebrus and Rhodope, and through the Mountainous places of Thrace, on as far as the City which in thoſe times bore the name of Hercules. Rufinus by this time had received tidings of their Approach, and thereupon triumphed as one who imagined all things not only ſafe and proſperous about him, but big of Empire and Dominion. And not able to ſuppreſs his joy, he ſummoned together his wicked Counſellors; who looking upon him, and adoring him no otherwiſe than as the Riſing Sun, had promiſes from him of anſwerable Kindneſſes: and now they divide the Countries and Cities amongſt themſelves. But this Army being drawn upon the Plain which lay to the South of Conſtantinople, all the reſt being ſurrounded by the Sea; and leaving but a narrow paſſage, the Emperor firſt came out, and ſaluted them in their ſeveral Squadrons. Him followed Rufinus, who omitted nothing of fair language; but called them by their names, and magnified their Acts, with a Congratulation for their ſafe Return to their Relations. They anſwered him, and by ſeveral diſcourſes drew out the time in length, till they could contract their Ranks, and incircle him; which they did not only by their Companies drawn together, but by their Targets alſo formed to the ſhape of Palliſado.

Kill Rufinus.

11. Rufinus was utterly ignorant of what they deſigned all this while, and plucked the Emperor by his Robe; complaining and chiding that he did not aſcend the Tribunal, and declare him his Partner in the Sovereignty. With that they all drew their Swords, and in a confuſed noiſe demanded of him if he imagined to make them Slaves who had given Laws to ſome, reſtored others to liberty, had twice put an end to Civil Broils, and broken through the Alps themſelves: And they told him plainly, that by ſo many Wars they were ſufficiently taught, not to ſerve a Tyrant. Being now entrapped as ſome wild Beaſt in the Theatre, one from amongſt the Croud runs out upon him; and giving him a blow, tells him that it was Stilicho who ſtruck him by that hand; that Stilicho whom he had boaſted to have driven from thoſe Quarters. This blow being ſtruck, was followed with innumerable others; happy being he which could get a ſtroak, or have any limb or member of him; which they carried aloft, as in ſome ſolemn Triumph, eſpecially his head: and ſuch as bore his hands begged ſomething to be beſtowed on them, and moved his fingers ſo far as to receive it, while in the mean time the multitude from the City glutted their eyes in his blood; and ſuch as had loſt their Relations by his procurement, rejoyced to ſee him brought to the ſame, or had it been more ignoble end. Hereupon the Poet takes occaſion very fitly to admoniſh all perſons in proſperity, not to truſt to Fortune, which ſeems at preſent to ſmile upon them, ſeeing that all things in this World are utterly ſlippery and inconſtant. For that hand which now addreſſed it ſelf to bear a Sceptre, which had been ſo often kiſſed by the ſuppliant Nobility; being torn from the Carkaſe, and both remaining unburied, after death it ſelf now went a ſad way of begging. Let him that carries his head ſo high in his proſperous Eſtate caſt an eye toward it, which formerly ſo great and powerful, was now thrown in the Streets to be trod on by any man. He who built Pyramids, and provided a Monument for his Sepulture which equalled Temples, who thought of nothing but being cloathed with Purple; now became naked, as he was, and a Prey to the Fowls of the Air. He who had in his thoughts poſſeſſed himſelf of the World, now lay wanting a little earth, was buried by parcels with a thin

Sect. 1.

A. D. 395.

Mold; and was often buried, and yet no where. Of the Poet's witty Deſcription of Rufinus his appearance before Minos and Rhadamanthus; how, aſtoniſhed at his Crimes, they would not ſuffer him to remain in the ordinary place of Malefactors, but condemned him to be whipped out of Stix and Erebus, to an empty Dungeon beyond the Darkneſs of the Titans, the utmoſt Tartarian Receſſus's, the Chaos, and the very Foundations of Night; and there to lie and gape as long as the Stars wheel about the Pole, and the Winds beat upon the Sea Shores. We ſhall commend the honeſt Contrivance, not the Hiſtory.

Stilicho quiets the Franks, Suevi and Allemans.

Sigon.

12. Though theſe Poems be out of our Road, yet it cannot be denyed but that for want of more known and certain Paths, it may be convenient ſometimes to turn into them. The main thing wherein he differs from Zoſimus is this, that Stilicho was letted in his Proceeding by the expreſs Command of Arcadius, extorted by Rufinus: and indeed ſtrange it is, that he ſhould only be diverted by Women, and other effeminate Diverſions he met with in the Country. And Claudian makes the Deſtruction of Rufinus to have been deviſed by the Army, without any Plot or Forecaſt of his; wherein poſſibly he uſes Poetick liberty, though much he inſiſts upon that wonder, that an Army in their March and Cups could conceal a matter ſo reſolved amongſt themſelves. However, ſuch was the end of that ill Miniſter, who had for three Years and above, ordered the Affairs of the Eaſtern Empire according to his own Will and Luſt. And now, having been hitherto diverted by the Ambitious practices of him and others, we muſt conſider what farther happened of Concernment in the mean time. We find that Stilicho, before his late mentioned Expedition into the Parts of Greece, marched into Rhetia; and by the terror of his Name and Approach ſo terrified the Kings of the Franks, the Suevi and Allemans, that they begged Peace; though Marcomeres, King of the Franks, made a great ſtir in his Country, but the People drove him into Exile: and when his Brother Summo ſeemed to revenge his Cauſe, he was killed by his Country-men: After a League and Friendſhip was concluded betwixt them and the Romans. All this Year Arcadius had his Reſidence at Conſtantinople, and Honorius at Milan; where they were put upon enacting ſeveral Laws, as the ſtate of the Empire required; at leaſt, as they judged which were next about them.

The Cenſuales inhibit a Complaint to Arcadius.

Who takes order therein.

13. As amongſt Arms, ſo in the midſt of Arbitrarineſs and Tyranny, Laws are wont to be ſilent, ſo we find it to have happened this Year in the Eaſt; there being few found dated from Conſtantinople; eſpecially in reſpect to thoſe enacted in the Weſt by Honorius. But in the Month of May Arcadius was preſented with a Petition from the Cenſuales; who complained, that by a Reſcript obtained by ſtealth, their Office in the Senate-houſe was invaded. We have formerly ſhewn how theſe Cenſuales were employed in the Senate, and how they wrote and recorded the Acts thereof. Now it ſeems that Officer who had the Stile of Princeps Officii, belonging to the Præfect of the City, having alſo to do in the Senate whereof his Maſter was Præſul, interfeered with them, and intruded into ſome work and profit which of Right did belong unto them. For in Anſwer to their Requeſt, ſo Arcadius decides the matter, in an Act of State inſcribed to Theodotus, Præfect of the City; That he will have all Citations of all Cauſes and Perſons, although of Senatorian “ Dignity, to belong to the Princeps. So that all Beginnings and Introductions “ of Cauſes, for which certain Fees were wont to be paid, were to be “ peculiar to him; whoſe employment it was to introduce both ſuch as were “ at Law, and their Advocates, into the Secretarium of the Judge, and into the “ Senate ſuch as had buſineſs to do therein. But all other Acts he will have diſpatched “ by the Cenſuales, neither any prejudice to ariſe to ſuch as had made their “ Applications to them by vertue of the Subreptitious Reſcript; So that all the buſineſs “ belonging to Perſons once cited and introduced ſhall be theirs, who underſtanding “ very well, and dealing in the Cenſus of the Senators, or the value of their “ Eſtates, had alſo ſometimes power to nominate Prætors to this or that Prætorſhip. “
And as they kept and ordered the Albus or Roll of Senators, if any Prætor was miſſing, they celebrated Games for him at his charge. It alſo belonged to them to take care that every one in the City uſed a decent Habit, and befitting his Quality, eſpecially Senators; with other things we have already obſerved. This ſame Month he confirmed a certain Privilege which his Father had granted to the Agentes in rebus, at the Petition of ſome perſons concerned. It was for the erecting of a new degree of Honour and Place amongſt them; which Arcadius ſignifies to Oſias the Magiſter Officiorum, that he will have it joyned to that of the Centenarii, or equalled with it; which, of the five Degrees in the Schola of the Agentes in rebus, was the Second; after the Ducenarii; before the Biarchi, Circitores and Equites.

L. 5. de Principib. Agentium in rebus, Cod. Th. lib. 6. tit. 28. Dat. 12. Kal. Jun. & L. 2. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

And gratifies the Agentes in rebus.

L. 7. de Agentib. in rebus. Cod, Th. lib. 6. tit. 27. Dat. 6. Kal. Jun. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

14. At

Sect. 1.

A. D. 395.

And further regulates their Functions.

14. At the later end of this ſame Month he ſtill concerned himſelf about the Functions of the Agentes in rebus, there being report made of their claſhing with the Magiſtrates of the Provinces in the Management of the Curſus Publicus. He reſolved that in every Province there ſhould be one eſtabliſhed (by the name of “ Curioſus) who ſhould have nothing elſe to do, but attend to the due management “ of that publick Service.“ Having appointed but one Agens in rebus for this work in every Province, he had the more reaſon to confine him to his Employment, two having formerly been appointed to this Service in every Province by Conſtantius his Predeceſſor. But he further prohibits theſe ſingle Agentes or Curioſi to have “ any thing to do with the Governors of the Provinces, or the Provincials ſubject “ to them, or their Acts; ſo as only to take notice who made uſe of the Curſus without “ warrant, or in the uſe of it, exceeded thoſe bounds and limits which were ſet “ them by other Laws. In the next place he forbids that they vex or trouble any Ships “ which by other Injunctions of Princes had been provided, although ſome Veſſels “ upon certain Rivers were deſtinated to the Service of the Curſus. In the next place “ he prohibits that they receive any Complaints from the Provincials concerning any “ Injuries received by them, as formerly had been injoyned concerning the Stationary “ Soldiers; ſo as they ſhall not report theſe Complaints either to the Prince “ himſelf or the Defenſors of the Cities. In the laſt place he declares that they “ ſhall not commit any one to Priſon, which Conſtantius alſo had formerly prohibited; “ Which it was alſo unlawful for the Defenſors themſelves to do, though they might receive Complaints, and hear what might be ſaid on all ſides in reference to ſuch things as were brought before them. But theſe Laws were trifles, and related to things of ſmall conſequence in compariſon of another made this Year by Arcadius, and directed to Rufinus his Præfectus Prætorio, as yet living, concerning the performance of Oaths that had been made in Contracts by ſuch perſons as now were arrived at Age, or five and twenty Years; a Conſtitution ſo famous that many learned Lawyers have exerciſed their Wit and Reading upon it.

L. 8. de Curioſis Cod. Th. lib. 6. tit. 29. Dat. Kal. Jun. Marcello Mag. Offic. & L. ult. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

15. By the ancient Roman Laws during the Commonwealth, the Cenſors had cognizance of Perjury, and in the Conviction and Puniſhment thereof were very diligent; yet did the Puniſhment only extend to Diſgrace and Infamy, the great Revenge being left to God. Under the Emperors, ſometimes perjured perſons were beaten with Staves, otherwhile baniſhed for a time: But theſe were not ſuch as committed the Offence in heat or paſſion, but thoſe who in Judicial Proceedings, as in Inſtruments or Writings, forſwore themſelves. But now Arcadius thought it high time to put ſome ſtop to this Crime, often committed in Contracts and “ Agreements; ſubjecting to ſeveral ſevere Penalties him, who being above twenty “ five Years, ſhould recede from any Bargain and Agreement to which he had “ ſworn. In the firſt place, ſuch ſhould incur Infamy in a legal and political ſenſe, “ not only as a Criminal is wont to do with all good men. In the next place, they “ ſhould forfeit all Right to any Action which afforded cauſe or occaſion to the “ Compact. Beſides this, they ſhould be obnoxious to any Condition or Penalty “ expreſſed in the Gontract. And in the laſt place, if they had gained any thing by “ it, they ſhould be compelled to reſtore it.“ But then, this muſt be underſtood to have happened in Agreements, Sponſions or Stipulations before going to Law, in ſuch caſes wherein an Oath was to be interpoſed. The Party alſo muſt be more than five and twenty, and not preſumed to be of Age by favour and fiction of Law, as ſometimes thoſe are preſumed to be, who have not fully compleated that term. If a Minor, when ſuch had acted contrary to his Oath, he was not to be puniſhed in this kind, yet he was compellable to keep it; which is alſo at this day practiſed in France. Again it is ſuppoſed that the Pact or Agreement was not extorted from the Party by any force of pain or terror, as it was too common in this Age; particularly, in the Dealings of Rufinus himſelf, as we have ſeen, to whom the Law is directed. And the Oath was to have been an Oath indeed, the Name of the Omnipotent God being ſolemnly invocated, or the Contract having been confirmed by ſwearing by the Health of the Princes, at this time a kind of Obteſtation ſtill common. This Oath muſt alſo have been really broken by ſome Contravention, ſome Act and Deed manifeſtly repugnant to the Oath; as if a man appealed contrary to his Oath, or betook himſelf by Petition to the Prince, ſo as by his wilful fact, the ſubſtance, ſolidity and firmneſs of the Act was impaired. For if the payment of Money had been deferred, or a man was, as they ſay, in Mora, he was not thereby ſubject to theſe Penalties; there being ſometimes juſt cauſe for delay, and ſuch as may be pleaded; and this Law, ſuppoſing the ſubſtance of the Pact violated by ſome Action. In the laſt place it is required that the Adverſary of the ſuppoſed perjured

He reſtrains Perjury by ſevere Penalties.

L. 8. de Pactis & Tranſactionibus, Cod. Th. lib. 2. tit. 9. Dat. 5. Idibus Octobris, & L. 4. Cod. Juſt. de Tranſactionibus. vide Gothof. in l.

Sect. 1. D. A. 395.

perjured perſon have himſelf kept firmly to, and obſerved all the Laws and Requiſites of the Compact.

16. As for the reaſon or Hiſtorical occaſion of this Law, ſome conceive it made at the requeſt of Rufinus himſelf, to whom it is directed, and that to confirm thoſe Alienations, which, as we have ſeen, he had extorted from fearful and abuſed perſons. As ſeveral Writers affirm him to have been a Merchant of Laws, and to have made a great advantage of this Traffick, it is not to be doubted but he would make uſe of the Legiſlative Power to confirm his own Tranſactions as well as thoſe of other men: employing his Emiſſaries, as they ſay he did, to eſpy what advantage might be taken, and then terrifying people with fear of Suits and Proſecutions, he wreſted their Eſtates out of their Hands, and by Oath obtain'd confirmation of theſe Contracts; which being made with ſo much injuſtice, no wonder it is that ſo many cautions are mentioned in the Law, and ſo many Bars interpoſed, that the obliged parties might not evade, multiplied cautions being ordinarily ſuſpected as ſigns and concealmentts of fraud. Then the maker of this Law ſeems to flatter the Prince by the manner of confirming the Pacts by the obteſtation of his health, which is a preſumption that ſomething was deſigned for his own ends, eſpecially belabouring himſelf ſo much in the couting of this perjury ſo much dreaded. Indeed this was the time when Rufinus was in the full carieer of his cruel and ambitious practiſes; for this Law is the laſt that is inſcribed to him, neither did he ſurvive the date of it above a Month, ſo that the pretext for it may ſeem ſpecious; but it is frivolous in it ſelf, as alſo another which was made after the death of Rufinus for the confiſcation of his Eſtate: for that alſo ſeems very hard for ſuch as he had ſpoiled of their Goods, and both of them compared together, it may ſeem, that both before and after his death all hope was cut off of any reſtitution to be made to the right owners. If ſo it was, and theſe conjectures were indeed realities, it may be objected, how vain and beſide the purpoſe are theſe innumerable queſtions which are made upon this Law by Alciate, Fachinæus, and others, it being cruel, and adapted to the temper of the times; and Tribonian is reprehended for raſhly putting it into Juſtinian's Code, and making that conſtant and perpetual, which had its riſe from irational prejudice, and was juſtly to ceaſe with the occaſion, or rather never ought to have been. But yet though Rufinus and Arcadius may ſeem to have had theſe aims, yet the Law deſerved to derive its ſeverity even from the temper of the Age, which was ſuch, that as Oaths in Contracts were too ordinarily broken, which made Chryſoſthom now inveigh againſt that uſe of them, ſo was it come to that paſs, that if Bargains were made without them, they were not eſteemed at all obligatory; Upon the word of an honeſt man being in thoſe days of no validity. Therefore ſeeing there was no other means ſo ſtrong to preſerve the faith and compacts of men as the Religion of an Oath, it was neceſſary to keep up and fortifie this Bulwark of humane ſociety with as ſevere Rules and Cautions as the thing might bear, or could rationally be deviſed.

The Hiſtorical occaſion of the Law gueſſed at.

But fit for the Age.

17. But Arcadius amongſt other things provided for by his Laws, would not forget his pleaſures, to which he began to be now too much addicted. As in this Age, ſeveral ornaments were peculiar to the Emperours, and there were other things which it was not lawful for Subjects to make uſe of; ſo were there peculiar Breeds of Horſes, which were neither to be ridden, or drawn by private men. Of theſe, the moſt eminent at this time were known by the names of Hermogeniani, from one Hermogenes, firſt taken notice of to breed them; and of Palmatii, from one Palmatius, who had numbers of this ſort, and bred them at his Town, called Andavilis near to Tyana in Cappadocia, which Country, as is evident from many Writers, was excellent for the breed of Horſes in general, and therefore of more ſorts than theſe two. S. Baſil makes mention of one Palmatius, who was rich this way, and his Eſtate being confiſcated, his Horſes were alſo ſeiſed, and added to the Greges Dominici, or the Emperors Horſes. This Breed excelled in ſwiftneſs, upon which account they were deſtined to the Curule Races, and were ſent from the Eaſt, weſt-ward upon occaſion; and for the improvement of it they were wont to put them to Phrygian Mares. Now that Arcadius might reſerve theſe two for himſelf, for every Hemogenian or Palmatian Horſe or Mare, he requires in way “ of price or puniſhment a pound of Gold, or ſeventy two Aurei, which was an “ exceſſive rate, and juſt the double of what he exacts by this ſame Law for other “ Horſes of the Greges Dominici, which is but ſix Ounces of Gold, or thirty ſix “ Aurei. The Edict is directed to Caſarius the Præfectus Prætorio, whom he thereby commands, with the Title of Sublime Magnificence, by publiſhing Edicts of his own, to give notice and warning both to the leaſt and the greateſt, that if they pay

--Delectus equorum. Quos Phhygiæ matres, Argæaque gramina paſtæ Semine Cappadocum ſacris præſepibus edunt, Primus honos. Claudian in laudib. Serenæ Reginæ, loquens de Stilichone ejus marito, qui fuît comes ſtabuli Imp. vid. av. 190.

L. un. de Greg. Dominico Cod. Th. lib. 10. Tit. 6. Et l. un. Cod. Juſt. Cod. tit. Dat. prid. Kal. Decemb.

He will have none uſe his two Breeds of choiceſt Horſes.

pay not in the Rates lately mentioned, they ſhall be levied out of their Eſtates. For, theſe Monitory Edicts for avoiding Inconveniencies were wont to be made, and publiſhed by the Præfects themſelves.

He reſtrains the pride of ſuch Curiales as had arrived at the degree of Comes.

18. At the latter end of the year complaints were brought by the Governours of Provinces to Arcadius, againſt certain Curiales who had been honoured with the Dignity of Comites. When they had run through all the Functions of their Corporations, or had well diſcharged a meſſage to the Prince, for their pains and fidelity they were often rewarded with the Honour of Comes, ſometime of the firſt, ſecond or third Rank; ſome of them hereupon would be puffed up, eſpecially with this privilege which belonged to their new Degree, that the Judges of Provinces were bound to receive them with a kiſs, and to admit them to ſit upon their Benches. As familiarity breeds contempt, imagining that they were now their Fellows, they behaved themſelves contumaciouſly toward them; and though they were ſtill ſubject to their authority, yet would they not obey their Orders. Upon complaint hereof made, Arcadius in another Edict directed to Cæſarius, declares, that ſuch Curiales as had obtain'd the Honorary Comitiva “ ought to ſtand in awe of thoſe to whoſe Government they are committed; neither “ ought they to think that they have deſerved the Dignity, that they may deſpiſe “ the Precepts of the Judges. If any of them ſhall perſevere in ſuch a fault, he “ will have him undergo a Fine of five pounds of Gold; and beſides, be deprived “ of the honour, which by ſuch folly he had betrayed. This is the laſt of the Laws which were this year enacted by Arcadius in the Eaſt. The Officers of his Brother Honorius in the Weſt, being not ſo much diſtracted, had more leiſure to attend Civil Buſineſs.

L. 150. de Decurionib. Cod. Th. & l. 47. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. dat. 4. kal. Jan.

Honorius makes a Law againſt New-years Gifts.

19. Honorius, at the beginning of the year, when he received New-years Gifts, found ſome inconvenience in the making of thoſe Preſents, which he thought fit to reform. The original of theſe New-years Gifts amongſt the Romans is made by Symmachus almoſt equal to that of their City: for, he writes, that they were firſt offered to King Tatius, being no other than the Branches of a fruitful Tree which grew in the Grove of Strenua (the Goddeſs which made men ſtrenuous or valiant, as S. Auguſtine reports of her, and had a Temple in the City) from which theſe Preſents received the name of Strenæ: they were alſo called Vota, becauſe at this time were Vows and Prayers made, both in the City and Provinces for the health and ſafety of the Emperours; and that by a cuſtom derived as high as from Julius Cæſar, Auguſtus and others; though after Auguſtus his time, other Princes varied herein, ſome admitting of it, ſome not, but it appears that it was in force in the days of Arcadius and Honorius. On New-years day the Præfect of the City, as the Epiſtle of Symmachus, then bearing that Office, makes it evident, in the name of the Senators was now wont to preſent the Prince with ſome pieces of Gold (five Solidi) in way of gratitude and offering for his vigilancy and ſtrenuous demeanour, with their lucky wiſhes for his proſperity. This cuſtom Honorius now thought fit to admit of, but withal to preſcribe and aſſign ſome Bounds to this liberality of his Subjects, by declaring in an Edict directed to Baſilius, Præfect of Rome, That when the happy year is opened by theſe publick “ Vows, for one pound of Gold ſhall ſeventy two Solidi of that they call Obryziacum “, be reckoned or valued; which value had been formerly ordained by Valentinian in the payment of Tributes. What ſhould be meant by this Obryza and Obryziack Gold, and whence the word ſhould receive its derivation ſeveral argue divers ways, but by the Laws and otherwiſe it appears that by Obryzum or Obruſſum was underſtood Gold refined, or frothing, as it were in the fire, and flowering, from which reſemblance it ſeems to have received its Name. Now whereas in the days of Valentinian the Elder, there had been a great change made as to Coin, in the value of the Aurei, which from eighty four in one pound of Gold were brought down to ſeventy two, and as Gothofred is of opinion, ſo as the Aurei did not increaſe in bulk and weight, but only in value, ſo as ſeventy two of theſe eighty four, were to be taken and eſteemed for one pound of Gold, as hereupon the pound decreaſed, ſo Valentinian ordained that the prizes of things ſhould decreaſe. And whereas it became a queſtion, whether the Preſent made by the Senate at the beginning of the New Year ſhould be after the old mode and cuſtom of the City (which allowed more to the weight of Gold than what was uſually aſſigned in the Provinces) or according to the like Ordinance of Valentinian, to encourage the Senate to this liberality which might be a means to preſerve kindneſs betwixt the Prince and Nobility, Honorius declares that he will be ſatisfied with ſeventy two “ for one pound of Gold, provided it be of that called Obryziacum, or the purer ſort. “

Lib. 10. epiſt. 28. vide notas Juretti in ep.

Merito vobis ſolennes pateras cum quinis ſolidis, ut numinibus integritatis offerimus, nec veſter pudor, nec noſter cenſus oneratur.

L. un. de oblatione votorum, Cod. Th. lib. 7. Tit. 24. & l. un. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. dat. non. Mart. vide Gothofr.

Βρύζν Græcis de illis rebus dicitur quæ efferveſcendo ſpumam ejiciunt, qua florem emittunt. at ὀβρύζειν & βρύζειν ſive βρύειν idem.

20. About this time complaint was made by ſome Inhabitants of Campania, that they were oppreſſed by the Collectors of Tribute. For, Campania, as we have ſaid, being a Country lying near to Rome, and ſubject to ſeveral Impoſitions for maintenance of the City, had, however from its fruitfulneſs it was termed Fælix, yet ſeveral barren and unimproved Grounds which were wont to have indulgence or immunity from ſuch Burthens. Yet ſcarcity of Proviſions preſſing the Citizens, the Owners of thoſe Lands were it ſeems called on, and a new Book of Rates had been made, wherein they were alſo Ceſſed to afford a ſhare. Upon complaint hereof made, Inſpectors were ſent down to conſider, and report the matter how it ſtood; and their report ſo far approved the complaint, that Honorius now by an Edict directed to Dexter the Præfect, declares immunity to five hundred twenty“ eight thouſand and forty two Acres, which appeared from the old Records to “ have enjoyed formerly the like privilege. And as ſome indulgent Emperors had done before him, he commands the New Books, called Cenſuales and Polyptici to be burned by this ſame Law, which is rationally thought to have been made in obedience“ to Theodoſius, who, as S. Ambroſe relates, did in his laſt Will and Teſtament“ give order for ſuch Relaxation of Tributes. And whereas under the Tyranny and Rule of Eugenius, being of ſuch continuance, many voluntary Contracts had been made, and other matters had paſſed as in ordinary courſe of Law, Honorius, to prevent confuſion, and unravelling all things in the Countries that had been ſubject to him; thought fit by a Conſtitution inſcribed to Andromachus, Præfect of Rome, to confirm all Acts which had happened voluntarily between “ party and party, without any fraud, force or fear. But with this Proviſo, that in all Inſtruments, the Names of his Conſuls (theſe were Arbogaſtes and Nicomachus“ Flavianus, his two great Friends) ſhould be aboliſhed, that they might “ not receive the reverence uſually made by acclamations when there was occaſion“ to hear their names read or mentioned in Courts. And whereas upon the omiſſions of the names of Conſuls in Deeds or Inſtruments, a valid exception lay againſt them; he declares this ſhall be no Plea in Law, but they ſhall be of force however, though with ſuch omiſſion; the time of Tyranny or Uſurpation being eſteemed as never to have been, and whereof nothing conld be præſcribed.

He gives eaſe from Tribute to ſeveral Lands in Campania.

L.2 de Indulg. Debitorum. cod. th. lib. 11. tit. 28. dat. 9. Cal. Apr Abeſt a cod. Juſt: ut hiſtorica & temporaria Voluntary Acts during the late Uſurpation confirmed.

L. 9. de infirmandis his quæ ſub tyrannis, &c. cod. th. lib. 15. tit. 14. Dat. 11. Cal. Maii. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt. velut temporaria.

21. The publick Acts of Eugenius himſelf were now declared null and void, as was wont to be done in ſuch caſes; and not only his, but ſome of thoſe of Maximus alſo, though dead ſeveral years before; for, ſome time was required for bringing to light ſeveral inconveniences ariſing from what paſſed during this long Uſurpation. He had alienated ſome Lands of perpetual Right, as they called them, belonging to the Res privata, or Patrimony of the Prince, and that by Inſtitution and Decree of the Rationales; whereas theſe Alienations belonged not to them, but to the Ordinary Judges of Provinces, and therefore by an Edict directed to Eulogius now Comes R. P. the Emperour declares that ſuch as had come by ſuch “ Lands in ſuch a manner ſhall be deprived of them. Not only ſuch as had obtained theſe publick Lands were forced to quit them, but thoſe who had ſerved in the late Uſurpation of Eugenius, as Soldiers, or had ſome Offices under him, were as Traytors branded with Infamy. This continued till Honorius began to bethink himſelf of his dying Fathers Commands and Example; who, as he left order in his Will, that indulgence ſhould be ſhewed to his oppreſſed Subjects; ſo while he lived, he manifeſted much clemency to them he had already ſubdued; and made not ſuch advantage of the ſucceſſes of his Arms as he might have done; and dying ſo ſoon after his Victory, time was wanting to him, but not intention, to ſhew much more his Generoſity. Therefore in a ſhort time did Honorius enact a Law, directed to ſeveral perſons, to be publiſhed in their ſeveral Juriſdictions; wherein profeſſing that he ought to follow his Father's pattern, He pronounces pardon to “ all ſuch obnoxious perſons, and declares that he will place his kindneſs upon ſuch “ as could not think of any ſuch Beneficence; ordaining that thoſe who “ fought under the late Tyrant, had diſcharged any Office under him, or been “ promoted to any Honorary Dignity, in what ſtate or quality ſoever, ſhall not ſuſtain“ for ſo doing any Infamy, or be polluted as he terms it, with any ugly name: “ but that they ſhall enjoy whatſoever Dignity they ſtood poſſeſſed of, before the “ time of the foreſaid Tyranny. “

But the publick Acts of Eugenius himſelf declared null.

Perpetui juris ſive Emphiteuticarii.

L. 10. eiuſd. tit: Dat. 6. Cal. Mar. Abeſt a cod. Juſt;

Paſſeth an Act of Indemnity to the Followers of Eugenius.

Fas eſt ſequi nos paternæ diſpoſitionis arbitrium.

L. L. 11. 12. ejuſd. tit. Abſunt a cod. Juſt.

22. In this Act of Grace and Pardon none was ſo much concerned as Flavianus the Præfect, whom, though ſome Writers relate to have died at the Fight when Theodoſius paſſed the Straits, and entred Italy; yet that he ſurvived the Victory, and lived to feel the effects of his clemency, we find in the Epiſtles of his dear Friend Symmachus, who took great pains in his behalf. The perſon he applyed himſelf to Flavianus as deeply concerned therein as any.

Sect. 1.

A. D 395.

Lib 4. ep. 7.

as Mediator, was Stilicho, one who could beſt do his buſineſs, and he did it ſo effectually, that Symmachus gives him thanks for it in ſeveral Letters. In one he mentions how the Father of the Princes, now received into Heaven (Theodoſius) “ had ſhewn before his death ſeveral examples of his clemency; and had reſtored to “ his Flavianus, whom he calls his Son, and ſometimes his Lord (their unity in Paganiſh “ Superſtition, as well as in other reſpects, cauſed this dearneſs) many “ things which by accidents had been taken from him. That one and the chiefeſt Title “ of goodneſs was reſerved for his Heir (Honorius); which at length by his advice “ (meaning Stilicho) he had added unto his Father's Gracious Acts, concluding “ with himſelf, that time, and not any will was wanting to him that was deceaſed. “ But now (he adds) theſe Works of Clemency which by Fate had been interrupted, “ were by his Succeſſor, moſt like to him in this reſpect, brought to perfection: “ that he had conſummated what his Father had begun; as a reward for “ which, he wiſhes him ſuch Adviſers, (Monitores) or Counſellors as Stilicho “ himſelf, and thoſe that are of the ſame humour; thoſe who ſuggeſt honeſt and “ honourable things to Soveraign Princes, being the Inſtruments of a good Age. “ He acknowledges that in Honorius was a wit of a divine fountain, as he words it, “ and a nature prompt to all virtue; yet to uſe the compariſon, the beſt Pilots “ might find aſſiſtance from the hands of the Rowers: he tells him, that he was “ rendred more careful of his fame, both by the truſt he had in the Army, and “ the affection he bore him, as a Relation: and hence it was, that he invented “ for him ways of gaining love; and when he was employed in the greateſt Affairs, “ adviſed him to have an eye to the condition of private men. But ſuch evils “ as are incident to humane life are baniſhed, and in the Senate is nothing ſorrowful “ to be ſeen. To ſome, honour is given; to others it is reſtored. To one Family “ we owe whatſoever we are in particulars. “ What he ſpeaks of here in general, he explains in ſome of his other Letters, wherein he ſignifies he was called to Court by the interpoſition and procurement of Stilicho, which they termed Evocatio; for in thoſe times ſcarcely was it lawful for any to come thither, and leave their Country without leave firſt obtained; it being a ſpecial privilege granted to the Decuriones and the Silentiarii of the Palace, that after they had ſerved their time, they might come when they pleaſed without the ſecurity of an Evocatoria. He writes moreover of his being called to the Dignity of Conſul, and reſtored to the Præfectſhip. But before Honorius had given perfection to what his Father had done, he being incumbred with his ſmall fortune in ſeveral difficulties; by various Letters, written to ſeveral men in place, he laboured to raiſe him Friends: Protadius, he prays to aſſiſt him in the matter of ſome payment due from the Soil, from his Fathers time; alledging he was not able to undergo ſo heavy a Burthen. And to Florentius, whom he ſolicites in the ſame matter, he expreſſeth that having already obtained great things by the lenity of the deceaſed Emperour, that he may ſo ſay, he is yet ſtrangled with this one knot of misfortune, being poor, and his Patrimony exhauſted. Wherefore he tells him, that he, and ſuch as he, ought to prevent his imminent Ruine. Thus ſtickled Symmachus for his Friend Flavianus.

For whom Symmachus much ſtickled.

Interpretatus ſcilicet Divo Principi tempus non animum defuiſſe.

Ep. 5. ejuſd. lib. vide Fureti notas.

Lib. 7. epp. 94, 95, 103.

Lib. 4. ep. 19.

L. 4. ep. 51.

23. At this time great Reports came out of Africk, that the Curiales generally deſerted their ſtations, and conſequently the Honour and Safety of the Cities which conſiſted in their Attendance and Services, much decayed. This drew out an Edict from Honorius to Ennoius the Proconſul of that Province, concerning the “ Nominations to be made of theſe perſons, ſuitable to thoſe of his Predeceſſors “ formerly related. And becauſe to ſhun their Employments they pretended to “ travel, or to ſerve in the Wars; he now decrees, that if in the term of five years “ they do not return, their Eſtates ſhall be ſeiſed to the uſe of the Courts, for the diſcharge of the Duties and Charges from which they ran. Moreover, to gratifie the Africans in a matter wherein cuſtom had engaged their affections, he decrees, “ that thoſe of them called Sacerdotales, which were ordained for celebrating “ of Games, ſhould be reſtored; pretending therein to renew a kindneſs formerly “ granted by his Father. “ Further, becauſe great men were wont to receive theſe Fugitives under their Patronage and Protection, in Italy, as well as other Provinces, he thought fit to ſignifie, a month after, to Dexter the Præfect, “ that whoever ſhould harbour a Curialis, ſhould forfeit the quantity of five pounds “ of Gold, and one pound for harbouring one of theſe they called Collegiati. “ But as complaints were made againſt Curiales their forſaking their Employments, ſo about this time againſt ſome Judges or Governours of Provinces for employing themſelves too much in the hearing of certain petty crimes, which it was below their quality and degree to take notice of, and rather belonged to thoſe inferiour

L. L. 141, 142, 143, 144, 145. de Decurionib. Dat. 17. Cal. Jun.

Curiales in Africk reſtrained from deſerting their ſtations.

L. 146. de Decurionib. dat. 17. Cal. Jun. Abeſt a cod. Juſt.

A. D. 395.

Sect. 1.

And Governors of Provinces from medling in inferior Cauſes.

Magiſtrates they called Irenarchæ or Defenſors, and Aſſertors of the Peace. One Paſiphilus was the Man that moſt bore the blame; and to him Honorius ſent a Præſcript in nature and force of a Law, To reſtrain his Covetous humour, and let “ him know what Cauſes he thought below his Cognizance: Such were thoſe of “ a Slave that is run away; of Theft, whether manifeſt or not manifeſt; the taking “ away of Cattel, Slaves, any Goods by force; ſiezing on things Moveable or “ Immoveable, as on ſome ſmall peice of Ground, Dung, or ſome Cottage. An “ Interdict or Prohibition relating to ſome Momentary Poſſeſſion, which ſometimes “ happened upon ſlight occaſions; the removing of Cattel, and other ſmall matters, “ wherein the Accuſer was not to be forced to any Inſcription; of which we “ have formerly ſpoken. He tells him he will have him Judge of Criminal Cauſes “ only relating to this Inſcription, and of fit moment for his Authority; impoſing “ a Fine of five pounds of Gold upon thoſe his Officials whoſe Employment it was “ to ſtand at the Velum or Curtain, and to introduce Perſons into the Secretarium, “ if they ſuffered any of theſe petty Cauſes to be entred and admitted. “ But Juſtinian afterward approved not hereof, but left the meaneſt Cauſes to the Cognizance of the Preſident of the Province: Upon which account Tribonian omitted to put this whole Law into his Code, though he hath taken three pieces or Sentences out of it. So various are both the Humours and Exigences of times.

Paſiphilo ſuo ſalutem. l. 8. de Juriſdictione, Cod. Th. lib. 2. tit. 1. Dat 5. Id. Jun.

As alſo Military Perſons from medling in Civil Matters.

24. As ſome of the Civil Judges now a days condeſcended, out of a deſire of gain, to intermeddle in things that were below them, ſo there were Military Men who thruſt themſelves into Civil Employments that were out of their Sphear, and above their reach. This tended to the overthrow of Diſcipline, and ſuch perſons by terror of their Arms, might put force and conſtraint upon the Actions of Men; and upon theſe grounds now did Honorius prohibit all thoſe that did Militare (in “ which ſenſe and meaning not only Soldiers in Arms, but Palatine Officers and “ Officials of Judges by the force and extent of the word may be included) to be “ Judges, Advocates or Proctors in Cauſes, though they had Commeatus or Licenſe “ to be abſent from their Colours or proper Employments: And if any ſhould, after “ the term granted in his Licenſe, continue in the Province, he commands that “ by Order of the Governor of that Province he be puniſhed with Regradation, or “ put into a place and ſtation inferior to what he held before; as ſtragglers and idle “ perſons were wont to be puniſhed. But now the time approached when the Senators were to make their Preſents to Honorius, called Aurum Oblatitium, to expreſs their joy for his coming to the Government: For this Gold was given of free Will, not by neceſſity and compulſion, as was that called Glebalis Collatio; nor with others, as that called Aurum Coronarium; but by the Senate alone upon ſuch occaſions, as were the Beginning of a Prince his Reign, his Quinquennalia, or Decennalia, and the obtaining of a Victory. From Symmachus it appears that when this Oblation was to be made, the Præfect of the City was wont to call together the Senators that were in Town, or thoſe that were neareſt to it, to conſult concerning the quantity and manner thereof; and when it was once voted by them, then it became a neceſſary Duty. When it was voted, thereof the Præfect gave account to the Emperor; as Symmachus doth, in an Epiſtle written to Valentinian the younger; wherein he acquaints him that the Senate had exceded the Summs given to his Predeceſſors: for his Father and Unkle for their Decennalia had received leſs, and ſo had his Brother Gratian when he celebrated the third Luſtrum of his Reign: But to him, the Fathers had promiſed one thouſand and ſix hundred pounds of Gold for the honour of his Decennalia, and that to be weighed by the great Weights of the City. Now, to avoid diſtraction in the Payment, Honorius ordains “ that ſuch Senators as lived in the City, though they have Poſſeſſions in “ diſtant Provinces, ſhall pay it where they dwell, their Rents being wont to be “ returned thither by their Officers; but of thoſe that had their Abode in the “ Country, the Cenſuales ſhall receive it; of which there were ſome that were “ employed in the Provinces as well as thoſe in the City (of whom we have ſo often ſpoken) the Employment of whom it was to diſpoſe of the Collection of ſuch Dues as were paid by Senators.

L. 6. de Cognitor. & Procurator. Cod. Th. lib. 2. tit. 12. & l. 7. Cod. Juſt. de Procurat.

L. ult. de Commeatu. Cod. Th. lib 7. tit. 12. Dat. ad Andromach. prid. Non. Jun.

lib. 2. ep. 27. l. 10. ep. 26.

He regulates the Payment of the Aurum Oblatitium.

L. 5. de Senatoribus. & Glebal. &c. Cod. Th. Dat. 18. Cal. Octob.

25. Whatever Honorius received now in way of bounty or otherwiſe, he was deceived much at this time by ſuch as were continually begging of him, there being ſeveral Eſtates fallen to him by the Overthrow of Eugenius and his Party, notwithſtanding the Act of Grace this Year publiſhed. Several Princes ſeveral ways had formerly endeavoured to obviate this Trade of thoſe gaping Courtiers, who, when they begged things of greateſt value, were wont to diſſemble and conceal the greatneſs of them. Some Princes would not hear nor make any Grant till the

Goods

And Grants made of begged Eſtates.

A. D. 395.

L. 2. de Incorporatione. Cod. Th. lib. 10. tit. 9. Dat. 18. Cal. Decemb. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

Goods begged were firſt ſurveyed, and an Inventory made of them; as Valens, Gratian and Theodoſius the Great. But now Honorius for ſome peculiar reaſon “ admitted of their Petitions, poſſibly to make a fuller diſcovery; but yet would “ not have the Grant or Donation to be good till an Inventory was made, and the firſt “ Donation was then confirmed by a new Aſſent to a ſecond Petition. Amongſt moveable things begged, he allows Gold and Silver, which rarely were wont to be “ granted, and his Brother the next Year prohibited to be begged, but only by the “ great Officers: And for Immoveables; Grounds and Houſes in Cities, not thoſe “ in the Countries, which for their Importance were uſually excepted out of Grants. “ The Year was cloſed with the reconciling of ſome Differences in Africk. Formerly to provide City and Country with Neceſſaries, it had been granted that certain Curiales might be made Navicularii, of which now others there, made an Advantage, purchaſing Eſtates obnoxious to that Function, that ſo they might evade the burthens of the Curiæ. Honorius thought it beſt to direct Ennoius the Proconſul (to whom he gives the Title of Sublimitas tua) ſo to diſtinguiſh betwixt ſuch “ Services, that thoſe who had got theſe Lands ſhould be liable to the Function of “ the Navicularii for ſo much as they poſſeſſed, and yet ſtand obnoxious to the burthens of Curiales, it being in the choice and liberty of any one to purchaſe or refuſe “ ſuch Grounds as they knew were liable to Services that were incumbent upon the “ Soil: This he did to preſerve the duties of both Relations. For other matters in “ queſtion, and relating to theſe two Bodies of Navicularii and Curiales, he refers “ them to what had formerly been in ſuch Caſes determined by his Father. “

He reconciles ſome Differences in Africk.

L. 149. de Decurionibus Cod. Th. Dat. 7. Cal. Jan.

L. 25. de Navicularijs Cod. Th. Dat. 7. Cal. Jan.

Eutropius endeavouring to eſtabliſh himſelf.

A. D. 396. Arcadio A. 4. & Honorio. A. 3. Coſſ.

Zoſimus lib. 5. p. 786.

Procures Timaſius to be baniſhed.

26. The Year CCCXCVI. had for Conſuls Arcadius Auguſtus the fourth, and Honorius Auguſtus the third time. Eutropius ſtill domineered at Conſtantinople, and endeavoured to remove all out of the way that bore any ſway at Court, to preſerve himſelf in his power. Upon this account it was that he ſought to intrap Timaſius, who from the days of Valens had born the Dignity of Magiſter Militum, and had ſerved in many Wars. There was one Bargus, a Native of Laodicea in Syria, an inconſiderable Man, who, for ſome Crime cowmitted, fled from Laodicea to Sardis, where he became eminent for his Villanies. This Fellow, Tmiaſius coming to Sardis, finding him facetious and of an inſinuating humour, admitted to be familiar with him, and preſently preferred him to the Command of a Cohort; and not only ſo, but he took him along with him to Conſtantinople. Now this diſpleaſed ſome of the Magiſtrates there, becauſe Bargus, for ſome offences committed, had been baniſhed that City: and Eutropius having found out the Villain, thought him a fit Inſtrument to raiſe an Accuſation againſt Timaſius; and perſwades him to produce ſome counterfeit Writings wherewith to charge him of affecting the Soveraign Power. The Emperor now executes the Office of Judge, himſelf preſiding in Perſon at the Tryal; and Eutropius being his Propoſitus Cubiculi, ſtands at his Elbow, and hath the power of the Sentence in his own hands. But all Men taking it very hainouſly that a Seller of Puddings and ſuch like ſtuff ſhould be the Accuſer of a Perſon of ſuch Dignity, Arcadius quits the Employment, and delegates the matter to Saturninus and Procopius. The former of theſe was an Aged Man, who had diſcharged great Offices; but was given to Flattery: and in the Judicature he exerciſed, was wont to pleaſe thoſe who held greateſt place next to the Prince. Procopius had been Father in Law to Valens, was fierce and intractable, and pretended in ſome matters to a great Affection unto Right and Juſtice: And in this particular he urged it to Saturninus, as a thing unreaſonable, that Bargus, a fellow ſo notorious as he was, ſhould be admitted to accuſe ſo great a Perſon; but eſpecially, he eſteemed it ſhameful and abſurd to the higheſt degree, that one ſo obliged, ſhould endeavour to deſtroy his Benefactor. But for all this liberty he could not prevail, and Saturninus his Sentence took place; which was, that Timaſius ſhould be confined to Oaſis, being conducted thither with a publick Guard. This was a barren place, out of which there could be no eſcape for any that was thither baniſhed, ſo great and ſandy a Deſert did encompaſs it; in which was neither Tree, nor Houſe, nor Way to be ſeen, which the Winds conſtantly filled up with Sand. But Timaſius being thus removed, a rumour was ſpread abroad that he was carryed away by his Son Syagrius, who having eſcaped thoſe that were ſent to look for him, by the aſſiſtance of ſome Robbers, intercepted his Father: Which, whether it was true, or reported only to gratifie Eutropius, no man knew; but certain it is that neither Timaſius nor Syagrius were after that time any more ſeen.

27. Bargus, who had thus delivered Eutropius from all fears of Competition as to Timaſius, received as a Reward a Cohort of Soldiers, and went away deceived with hopes of Greater things. He imagined not that Eutropius, who had ſo dealt with Timaſius, to whom he was ſo much beholden, would treat him after the ſame manner. But when he was on a time gone from home about his Occaſions, ſome there were that perſwaded his Wife, that was fallen out with him, to preſent ſome Papers to the Emperor wherein were many heavy Accuſations; and amongſt the reſt, Bargus was charged with moſt hainous Crimes. Eutropius hearing of it, preſently brought him to his Tryal; and being convicted, puniſhed him as he had deſerved: Which being done, all Men admired the Eye of Adraſtia, and extolled the Praiſes thereof, which cannot poſſibly be deceived by any Malefactor. But Eutropius now drunk with Power, and in his Imagination lifted above the Clouds, had in all Countries his Spies to pry curiouſly into all matters, and into the Eſtate of every Perſon eſpecially; and every way he made his own Markets, and inriched himſelf. His Covetouſneſs and Envy ſetting him againſt every one that was conſiderable in place, provoked him alſo againſt Abundantius, one born in Scythia, within Thrace; who had ſerved in the Wars from the time of Gratian, and under Theodoſius had enjoyed the greateſt Honours, being advanced to the Dignities of Prætor and Conſul; and, as Claudian writes, was his firſt Promoter and Patron. Him he procured the Emperor by writing to deprive of all his Honours and Eſtate, and he was commanded to keep himſelf at Sidon, a Town of Phœnicia; where he ſpent the remainder of his days. Having now none left at Conſtantinople of whom he could be jealous or durſt look upon him, he fixed his thoughts upon Stilicho, who governed all things at his pleaſure in the Weſt, how he might poſſibly prevent his coming to Conſtantinople. He perſwaded his Emperor to call the Senate, and therein to declare him an Enemy to the Empire by publick Decree. Which done, he draws to his Party Gildo, who commanded all that part of Africk that belonged to Carthage; and by that means brought off that Province from its obedience to Honorius, to the Pretenſions and Dominions of Arcadius his Brother.

Sect. 1.

A. D. 396.

The falſe Accuſer juſtly puniſhed.

——Sed vilior ante. Obſcuræ latuit pars ignotiſſima turbæ. Donec Abundanti furiis, qui rebus Eois, Exitium, primoque ſibi produxit ab imis Evectus thalamis ſummos invaſit honores. Quam bene diſpoſitum terris, ut dignus iniqui Fructus conſilii primis auctoribus inſtet! Claudian. lib. 1. *in Eutropium. a v.*152.

Nullius Eutropius, quam qui ſe protulit ante, Direptas poſſedit opes nullumque priorem. Perculit exilio ſolumque hoc rite peregit Auctorem damnare ſuum.

A Law for the Encouragement of the Soldier in Illyricum.

L. 4. *de Militari veſte, Cod. Th. lib.*7. *tit.*6. & l. 3. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. 16. Cal. Febr. Conſtp. ad Martinianum Com. S.L.

28. So did this Covetous and Ambitious Eunuch, and Præpoſitus Cubiculi to Arcadius this Year, demean himſelf, while his Quæſtor was employed in matters of a better nature, for repairing the Civil State by wholſome Laws, which he now entered into a Courſe to deſtroy by way of Arms. And indeed, as if Eutropius had thought of War from the beginning, the firſt Law we meet, of this Year, is for encouragement of the Soldiers in Illiricum: To whom Arcadius commands that by “ the Inhabitants of the two Dioceſſes thereof, Macedonia and Dacia, for every “ Chlamys, or Soldier's Coat, be payd, not two tremiſſes or two thirds of a Soli- “ dus, as formerly had been practiſed; but a full and entire Solidus.” And as if, having removed all Competitors, he cunningly deſigned to oblige his Inferiors, or the Officers belonging to the Court; he ſeems to have put the Emperor upon another courſe of obliging the Generality of them by providing for their Riſe and Preferment. For, this Arcadius now did by publiſhing an Edict directed to ſeveral of the great Miniſters, under the Inſpection of whom theſe Men ſeverally were. Herein he commands that the Primicerii of the Palatines belonging “ to Martinianus the Comes Sacr. Largitionum, ſhall for the time to come continue “ in their Employment but two Years, to give way to others; though for the pre- “ ſent he permits that ſuch as had entred upon the third Year ſhould ſtay it out.” The ſame thing he injoyns Oſius his Magiſter Officiorum concerning the Proximi “ of his Scrinia.” And becauſe it was a cuſtom for the Emperor to make and prefer thoſe they called Agentes in Rebus at the Interceſſion, Petition, and Requeſt of certain Perſons of Place and Quality; He declares to this Oſius who they ſhall be to whom he intends to grant this Boon; and he inſtances in three ſorts of Men, below whom whoſoever were in place, muſt not expect this Privilege, though theſe that were above them are juſtly preſumed to have enjoyed it.

Another in behalf of the Palatines in Arcadius his Court.

L. 14. *de Palatinis, S. L. Cod. Th Dat.*15. Cal. Febr.

L. 6. de Proximis, Comitibus, &c. Cod. Th.

*L.*8. de Agentib. in Rebus, Cod. Th. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

At the Petition and Motion of what Perſons the Agentes in Rebus ſhould be named.

Tribuni Militum Urbaniciarum.

29. The firſt he mentions are the Comites of the ſecond Rank; and therefore, “ as theſe of the firſt are ſuppoſed to have had this liberty, ſo to them of the third it “ muſt needs have been denyed. Of this ſecond Rank or Order were ſome of the “ Comites Rei Militaris, and ſo were the Proximi of the Scrinia and Comites Diſpoſi- “ tionum; who, beſides this Privilege, had alſo Robes allowed them, out of the Sa- “ cræ Largitiones. The ſecond Sort, to whom he allows this Privilege, were his Cu- “ bicularii, or they that waited on his Chamber; being thoſe of the firſt Rank or De- “ gree amongſt them, and that Eutropius their Head did them Service therein there “ is little doubt, they being alſo generally Eunuchs, and the Emperor being uſually “ obnoxious to them. The Third were the Tribunes, called Tribuni Urbaniciani; who, “ after the example of them that Auguſtus inſtituted at Rome, commanded the Sol- “ diers that were appointed to the Cuſtody or Defence of the City, under the Præ- “ fect thereof; whoſe Officials were alſo called Urbaniciani. Now to ſuch of the Agen- “

tes as were called Ducenarii, and were promoted to be Principes, he grants this “ high favour; that if they receded from their Employments, they ſhould have liberty “ to put their Sons or their Brothers into their places. This was an extraordinary “ favour: To which he added afterwards, that thoſe who had been Principes, “ and thereupon enjoyed the Dignity of Conſulares, ſhould take place of one “ that had been Conſularis himſelf if they went out of their Employment before “ him. “ Moreover, to the Scriniarii, or thoſe that ſerved in the three Scrinia (Memoriæ Epiſtolarum & Libellorum, to which the Year following he added the other Scrinium Diſpoſitionum) he confirmed the ſame Privileges as had been granted “ them by Julian and Valentinian the Younger, of entring the Secretaria of Judges “ without any Meſſenger ſent before hand, and ſitting with them; to which he “ adds, that after they have ſerved twenty Years they ſhall be reckoned amongſt “ Exconſulares or Adlecti, have the ſame Honour with them amongſt the Governors “ of Provinces, be free from the Functions or Duties belonging to Senators, “ and be diſcharged of all publick Troubles and Services. “

L.9.eod.tit. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

L.L. 7, 8, 9. de Proximis Comitib.&c.Cod.Th. & L. 3. Cod. Juſt.eod.tit.

30. Preſent Succeſs and Felicity blinds the eyes of Men in ſuch manner, that they cannot read their own Deſtiny, though clearly deſcribed to them in the Examples of others, in the Copies after which they themſelves do write. The Ruin of Rufinus, the Shipwrack of his immenſe Eſtate, ſo cruelly and unjuſtly acquired, could not but be ever in the thoughts of Eutropius; but becauſe he himſelf had been the Inſtrument of his Ruin, he hoped that that hand which pulled down others would be ſtrong enough to ſupport it ſelf. Now did thoſe who had been injured by Rufinus, flock to the place of his ill got Wealth, and would needs be their own Judges what and how much did belong to them; which, as it tended to Confuſion and Breach of the Law, ſo the Emperor's Exchequer was ſure to be injured by it, to which all that Rufinus had poſſeſſed was confiſcate: or elſe Eutropius laying about him, and taking to himſelf what he thought fit, and permitting others to do the like; Arcadius publiſhed an Edict inſcribed to Cæſarius, the Succeſſor of Rufinus in the Præfectſhip of the Eaſt; Prohibiting any one to meddle with the “ Eſtate; but to let it remain as it was, till ſuch time as they could by due Courſe of “ Law make good their Claim, under pain of loſing all they had, and further Puniſhment. “ Some there are, who conſidering the Rapacity and Diſorders of theſe times, think this Law made on purpoſe to ingroſs to the Emperor's uſe the whole Eſtate of Rufinus, and to deprive thoſe that he had injured, of their Right. But another Law followed half a Year after, which makes a ſhew of more Equity than ſo unjuſt a deſign would admit of. For whereas the Wife and Children of Rufinus and of other proſcribed Perſons were great ſufferers after their death, in having their ſhares in their Eſtates pilfered away or confiſcated, Arcadius did them Right in another Conſtitution directed to Cæſarius; Wherein he declares that if “ any perſon ſhall from thenceforth be proſcribed, he himſelf ſhall alone be puniſhed “ for his Crime, and have no Conſort with him in the loſs of his Eſtate. That a “ Wife ſhall not partake in the Lot of her proſcribed Husband; but before his “ Goods be ſiezed, lay hold on and ſecure what belongs to her ſelf: Or if they be “ ſiezed already, recover them in a Legal way. That ſhe ſhall recover her Dower “ or Portion ſhe brought along with her, provided ſhe prove evidently that it was “ payd, no heed being to be given to Writings only, in this caſe. Moreover, if “ her Husband engaged any thing to her before Marriage, and while yet he was “ innocent, ſhe ſhould recover this alſo; though Conſtantine extended a Permiſſion of “ this nature to ſuch things alſo as were given after Marriage: And not only to the “ Wife, but the Man's Brothers, Siſters, Kinſmen and Allies, he indulgeth this favour “; concluding that Every one ought to be in a condition as far from fear and puniſhment “ as he was from the Crime it ſelf.

A Law to reſtrain the undue ſiezing Rufinus his Eſtate.

L. 14. de bonis proſcriptor. God. To. Dat. Idib. Febr.
Abeſt a Cod. Juſt. quià temporalis.

Another to relieve the Wife of Rufinus and the Relations of other condemned Perſons.

L.15.eod.tit.& L.9. in pr. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit: Dat.3.Non.Aug

31. As Arcadius took care for Relief of thoſe Perſons whom Rufinus had involved in his own Ruin; ſo he was conſtrained at this time to provide for their ſecurity, in the Ruin of whom he thought to raiſe his own further Advancement. That the Hunns invaded Armenia as other Barbarous Nations other Provinces, and that by his procurement, as was believed, ſeveral Writers aſſure us; which being a Frontire Province, and therefore of great Concernment for the Empire, it behoved that the Soldiers there employed ſhould not wander from their Colours, but attend the publick Service they had undertaken. But as we have lately ſeen that it was too common for ſome of their Brethren to thruſt themſelves into Civil Employments, ſo they that ſerved in Armenia were accuſtomed to put themſelves into the Services of private Perſons; Which this Emperor, by a Law inſcribed “ to Rhemiſtheus, the Dux of this Country, ſeverely prohibits to be done upon pain “ of “

The Soldiers in Armenia prohibited to put themſelves into the Services of private Perſons.

I. 15. de re militari Cod. Th. Dat. 12. Cal. Mart.

of a Mulct of five pounds of Gold to be incurred by every one that receives“ them: Which ſeverity was afterwards amplified by Juſtinian; who puniſhed“ the Receiver with a Confiſcation of all his Eſtate, and the Soldier with death after“ his having the Military Girdle taken from him; “ ſo neceſſary is the Obſervation of Military Diſcipline for the Preſervation of the State. At the ſame time he was put upon it, as a thing very requiſite, to provide for ſecuring the Eſtates of Pupils or thoſe that were left very young, againſt the Careleſneſs and Fraud of Tutors or Guardians. In order to this he ordains that the Tutor, as ſoon as he“ is aſſigned, ſhall go to the Judge or Governor of the Province, and there make“ an Inventory of his Pupil's Eſtate. This he will have ſolemnly done in the preſence“ of the Primates (of the Decuriones formerly ſpoken of) the Defenſor of the“ City (who was to have an eye to the condition of Children, as well as others, that“ wanted help) and of the Scribes, or Officers whoſe Aid was requiſite for ſuch a“ Work.“ Now, as for the End and Deſign of making this Inventory; by a Senatuſconſultum in Severus his time, and a Decree of his, it had been ordained that Tutors, with the Money they found in the Houſe, and ſuch as they could raiſe by Sale of Moveables, ſhould purchaſe Land if it were to be had: if not, they were to put it out to Intereſt with the beſt Proſpect of Safety they could make.

Novel. 116. de Militis

Arcadius takes care for Orphans.

L. 4. de Adminiſtrat. & periculo Tutor. Cod. Th. lib. 3. tit. 19. Dat. 6. Cal. Mar. l. 24. Cod. Juſt. tunc interpelata eſt.

32. Conſtantine thought fit to reſtrain this liberty allowed them; prohibiting them to ſell Gold, Silver, Gemms, Cloaths, or ſuch things moveable, becauſe the way of putting Money to Intereſt was very uncertain, and often times all that the Children had conſiſting in it, if it miſcarried, they muſt neceſſarily be undone. Arcadius now uſeth a Diſtinction for Accommodation of this matter; ordaining“ that if the Pupil have Lands or Revenues wherewith to maintain him, then ſuch“ Moveables as Gold, Gemms, and other things that would not periſh with keeping“ (for by the Law Guardians were bound to make Money of thoſe that would)“ ſhall not be ſold, but ſafely locked up ſomewhere under the Seals of the Primates,“ Defenſor and Officers, till the Child ſhall arrive at Lawful Age. But if there be“ no Lands, or not Revenue ſufficient for Maintenance of the Pupil, then ſhall they“ be purchaſed with the Money ariſing from the Moveables; which ſhall be put to“ Intereſt if Lands be not to be had. He was of Opinion with Conſtantine, that“ there was great hazard in putting out of Money, and that it had better lie dead“ than miſcarry, beſides the trouble to which the Guardian was to be put, if it were“ placed in ill Hands. But in caſe of neceſſity, if the Child had no Revenue, then“ he thought it as convenient to venture it as to ſpend upon the Stock.“ What he thus ordained was afterward altered by Tribonian in ſome reſpects. Firſt, as to the time of making the Inventory; for Arcadius requires it be as ſoon as the Tutor is aſſigned, or in the ſame moment: Which he changes for a word of more Latitude; ſome being of the Opinion that three Months are allowed for a Tutor, as well as to an Heir, for the making of it. In the next place, he took away the neceſſity of going to theſe Cognitores or Judges; allowing it as ſufficient if the Inventory was made in the preſence of publick Perſons; naming others beſide theſe required by Arcadius. The Seals of theſe Judges, Senators and Officers he required not, neither the Authority of publick Sentence for locking up the Goods. He takes away the the Diſtinction of Arcadius, ordaining that either Land be bought with the Money, or elſe that it be put to Intereſt; and he ſpeaks of ſafe keeping of it, though he will not have it to lye idle. Afterwards, Juſtinian bethinking himſelf, commanded that the Money ſhould not be put to Uſury, without a neceſſity was found for ſo doing.

Pro eodem momento mox.

Novel. 72. c. 6.

33. Such care was taken by Arcadius for ſecuring the Eſtates of Children, when left unto them: But there was further need at this time to prevent Queſtions and Diſputes whether they were left or not, ſuch holes were picked in Teſtaments by thoſe that were concerned or over-buſie. Sometimes a miſtake might happen in a Teſtator or a Scribe, who might call that a Codicil which he meant for a Teſtament; and, to ſpeak truth, moſt Teſtators were ſo timerous at this time, that, deſpairing to obſerve that exact diligence which the Law, as was pretended, did require, that they would call their Wills By ſeveral names, and add Clauſes at the ends of them. Now, theſe Miſtakes, Cautions and Superfluities he declares“ ſhall not at all hinder the effect of the Teſtaments, provided the Solemnities“ thereof be evident; it being a Rule, as well in Teſtaments as in Contracts, that“ ſuperfluous Acts or abundant Cautions do no harm. Moreover, though at the“ beginning of the Teſtament the Teſtator made mention of no Witneſſes at all, or“ ſpake of more or fewer than indeed he made uſe of, or miſtook their Names, ſo“ long as he made uſe of a Lawful number, it ſhould ſuffice; for in this Age the“

He takes away Scrupuloſities in the making of Teſtaments.

L. 3. de Teſtamentis & Codicillis Cod. Th. lib. 4. tit. 4. Dat. 12. Cal. Apr. Prior hujus les. pars conjecta eſt July 17. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. cæteræ a Triboniano reſecatæ.

cuſtom was to preface the Wills with a Declaration what ſort of one they purpoſed to make, and what Witneſſes they intended at the Publication. But then he “ requires the Legal Requiſites about Witneſſes, as that they be five in number; “ that they be called for that purpoſe, and be not ignorant what they come about, “ and the Teſtator ſee them preſent. But he declares that there is no need that “ they know the Contents of the Will; but the Teſtator may declare that Writing “ to contain his laſt Will and Teſtament, and deſire them, as ſuch, to ſet to their “ Hands and Seals. And laſtly, moved by the Opinion of the great Lawyer Scævola, and ſwayed by his Judgment, he thinks it lawful for the Witneſſes to have “ Legacies left them without taking away their Teſtimony, and ſo rendring the “ Will Null, and of none effect. “ As for the five Witneſſes, they were ordained to be ſo many by the ordinary Common Law: When the Will was made, as they ſay, per æs & libram, by way of Sale by Money weighed in a Ballance, there being then preſent, beſides the five Witneſſes, he that held the Balance and he who was ſaid to buy the Eſtate or Family. But elſe, by the Law of the Prætor, when this Solemnity, Per æs & libram, was not in uſe, no fewer than ſeven Witneſſes were to be preſent.

34. Such reaſon did the Romans find to be ſo accurate and careful in the making of Teſtaments, wherein whole Eſtates are wont to be conveyed. It was free for any one to make uſe of whether of theſe Courſes they pleaſed, either of the Æs & libra when Mancipation was made, or of ſeven Witneſſes when it was not; for they were ſtill both in uſe in the time of Arcadius, though afterward, when the Prætorian and Civil Law became united together, the uſe of the Æs & libra by degrees grew obſolete, and the uſe of five Witneſſes came to be generally received. So the Law ſtood as to Teſtaments; but as to Codicils, ſeven Witneſſes were thought fit to continue. Theſe Codicils, as to their firſt Original, were Writings made by the Teſtators for a Supply or Amendment to their Teſtaments; but afterward they were made when new Teſtaments preceded, and when otherwiſe the Party died inteſtate; and in this caſe becuaſe in reallity they had the force of Teſtaments, and operated accordingly; therefore as great a Solemnity was requiſite at the making of them; although, if a Teſtament did precede, then no Heir could be inſtituted by vertue of a Codicil: And afterwards Juſtinian abſolutely forbad that by a Codicil any Heir ſhould be inſtituted. But that we may joyn things of the ſame ſubject which happened ſo near together, and were ordained by the ſame Perſon, Arcadius the following Year, by an Edict ſent to Africanus, the Præfect of Conſtantinople, commanded the old Cuſtom to be obſerved, of opening or publiſhing Teſtaments, after the death of the Teſtators, at the Office of the Cenſuales, “ or before the Maſter of that Society; otherwiſe he would have them void and “ of none effect. “ This was a certain Courſe to prevent Frauds, and here ws the Regiſter wherein were recorded, inſinuated and preſerved not only theſe Publications of Teſtaments, but other things, as Contracts, Donations, and the like.

Codicils what.

Vide Leg. 2. ejuſd.tit. & Gothofr.in l.

*L.*4.ejuſd.tit & *L.*18. Cod.Juſt. eod.tit.

35. But beſides this way of Certainty which the Teſtator might be aſſured of after his death, he might, while he yet lived, uſe greater Caution if he ſo pleaſed. He might publiſh his Will, and have it recorded in the Acts of any Magiſtrate who kept a Court, or had an Office of Record; or in the Conſiſtory of the Prince it ſelf, which was the ſafeſt courſe: Or any one, though he had made his Will elſewhere, might lay it up or depoſite it in any Regiſtry. But Arcadius prohibits any Change to be made from Court to Court, there being other Judges that pretended Privileges at this time to prove Wills, beſides the Defenſores Eccleſiarum, who were Clerks; which was the Cauſe that this Law was afterwards reinforced by Juſtinian, who impoſed a Mulct of fifty pounds of Gold upon any that ſhould offer to prove the Will except the Magiſter Cenſus, beſides a grave Reprehenſion to Clerks for intermedling with ſuch matters; for this he thought fitter to inflict, than that any Man's Will ſhould be ineffectual. As for the Cenſuales, they thought them skilled in matters of Judicature, and therefore fitteſt to manage thoſe matters; whom they forbad to take any thing in way of Fee, if the Inventory of the whole Eſtate exceeded not an hundred Aurei. As for what Arcadius declares in reference to the Legacies left to Witneſſes, though the matter hath been much controverted, and that from two Laws, as Juretus obſerves; yet hath his Opinion rather obtained, eſpecially in ancient times. For that the Legacies were due, was the Opinion of Trebatius in Auguſtus his time: Under Nero it was the practice, as alſo under Trajan. In the Reign of Marcus Antonius, Scævola whom the Emperor here commends, held it for good Law; and a dozen Years before Arcadius publiſhed this Edict, when Symmachus was Præfect of Rome, he hath approved of, and practiſed

*Vide L.*19.Cod. Juſt.eod.tit.

*L.*23. Cod.Juſt. eod.tit. Abſurdum eſt namque, ſi promiſcuis Actibus rerum turbentur officia & aliis creditum alius ſubtrahat: & præcipuè clericis, quibus opprobrium eſt, ſi peritos ſe velint diſceptationum eſſe forenſium.

Whether a Legatee can be a Witneſs.

Ex Leg. 20. D. qui teſtam.facere poſ & *L.*3. de Teſtam.Cod.Juſt

Sect. 1.

A. D. 396.

practiſed it; as he tells the ſtory himſelf in a Relation made by him to Theodoſius concerning the Teſtament and Eſtate of one Aggarius. The Eſtate being granted away, as fallen to the Treaſury, in caſe no Lawful Heir appeared, amongſt other Tricks this Objection was made, that the Witneſſes had a Legacy left them in the Will, and a Reſcript of the Emperor's was alledged to prove that the Teſtimony of a certain Witneſs was rejected, who by his witneſſing would have helped his own Cauſe; as if it was the ſame thing, and a little reſpect ſhewed to the Witneſſes, merely out of Friendſhip, could hinder or aboliſh a Lawful Judgment. If, ſaith he, we ſhould live under ſuch Laws, it would be better and ſafer to have our Enemies for Witneſſes, to whom for their Enmity the Teſtator would be ſure to leave nothing. I am grieved to ſay that the greateſt Legacy amounted but to five Solidi, the reſt being rather remembred than gratified with any Summ of Money. Therefore the Eſtate is very pitiful and inconſiderable, if ſo ſmall a matter can derogate from the Teſtimony; or if it be ample and large, ſo ſmall a Summ given in Legacy ought to be void of ſuſpition: Who is there that doth not ſend for the beſt Friend he hath when he makes his laſt Will and Teſtament? And what wonder is it, if out of reſpect to the Sacred Bond of Friendſhip, he that is ſent for deſerveth ſomething wherewith to remember the Teſtator? I ſpeak not for ſuch a Witneſs to whom a great part of the Eſtate is given; for though his Conſcience may be good, yet he gets his Wealth with little Modeſty. But theſe Legacies (I ſpeak of) were ſmall Pledges left out of love, or elſe for ſhame (for the trouble to which he put them) given by the Teſtator. This Religious or Decent Courſe is not contradicted at all by new Laws; only, ſince the Memory of Man, one Rationalis (to whom the matter of Eſcheats did belong, as we have ſeen) hath appeared and adventured to introduce a new way of Judicature. Hence came the Appeal to be made, wherein he mentions another trick to cheat the Heirs; ſuch ill Inſtruments will there be, even of the beſt Princes and juſteſt Judges.“ But ſuch was the Judgment of Symmachus, whoſe diſtinction betwixt a ſmall Remembrance and a great part of the Eſtate left in a Legacy, is to be taken notice of. In the firſt caſe, it's trifling to diſpute the matter; In the Second, ſome have been of Opinion to admit the Teſtimony in other Parts of the Will, wherein the Witneſs is not concerned.

Symmach. lib. 10. ep. 55.

Barbarous Nations infeſt the Empire.

36. But the Barbarous Nations at this time were ſtill ſo troubleſome as to infeſt ſeveral Countries in the Eaſt. Philoſtorgius wrote of two Armies of the Huns which about this time infeſted the Empire; whereof the one made an Incurſion into Thrace, and the other into Armenia, and others of the Eaſtern Provinces, as Syria and Cilicia. Beſides them, in Lybia of Pentapolis and Egypt, a People called Mazaces; and another known by ſeveral Names, as Auſuriani, Auſoriani, Auſturiani & Saturiani were tumultuous; ſo that the Inhabitants were forced to keep themſelves within the Walls of their Cities, as they were commanded. Now, in times of Invaſions and Irruptions, fenced places being the only Refuge of the poor Inhabitants; Arcadius, by his Edict directed to Cæſarius, gives him in charge, by his Letters, to admoniſh all Governors of Provinces; and let them know, that the Senates and People of all Cities muſt either build new Walls, or well and ſufficiently repair thoſe that were old and decayed. In the firſt place, he would have them conſider how much Money would be neceſſary for theſe Works; that no more than needs, and no leſs than is convenient, be impoſed upon the Provincials: Then, that an Indiction or Tax be made as is equitable, and according to the Lands and Poſſeſſions of the Inhabitants, by the number of Acres.“ As he thus provided for the ſafety of the Provinces; ſo to ſtrengthen himſelf and improve his Eſtate, he thought fit at this time to publiſh an Act of Reſumption, for recalling all theſe Lands which had formerly belonged to his Demain or Res Privata; declaring that no Præſcription ſhould avail the preſent Poſſeſſor of what could not by private Men be poſſeſſed; neither any new Pretence, nor yet any Reſcript of former Princes ſhould be ſufficient to retein that which never ought to have been begged.“ To aſſert his own Authority by another Law, he declared ſhortly after, That a Libel or Petition preſented to the Prince ſhould be taken, and reputed for a Conteſtation of the Suit. But that an Heir could have no benefit thereby, nor any Action, if his Predeceſſor deceaſed, had no Cauſe of Action himſelf; ſo that though in caſe of a Sale there was Cauſe of reſcinding of it, which could not be, except one half of the Worth was not bargained for: Yet if the deceaſed Perſon had neither conteſted the Suit himſelf, nor petitioned the Emperor (which had the force and effect of a Conteſtation) the Heir could have no Cauſe of Action, except it could be proved that the Sale was made out of fear, and by compulſion.

lib. 11. c. 8.

Command given to fortifie Cities.

L. 34. de Operib. publicis Cod. Th. & L. 12. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. 9. Cal. Apr.

He publiſheth an Act of Reſumption.

L. 15. de Jure Fidei Cod. Th. Dat. 5. Cal. Apr. Duobus locis relat. eſt in Cod. Juſt. L. ult. Ne rei dominicæ & L. ult. de fundis & ſaltibus rei dominicæ.

Aſſerts that a Petition preſented to himſelf ſhall be held for a Conteſtation of the Suit.

L. 8. de Diverſis & ſcriptis Cod. Th. lib. 1. tit. 2. & L. 1. quando libellus Principi datus Cod. Juſt. Dat. ad Remigium P. P. Auguſtulem 3. Cal. Apr.

A. D. 396.

It being a Rule recieved by Lawyers, that an Action cannot belong to the Heir, to which the deceaſed Perſon had no Title. But this the Emperor aſſerts, that the Offering of a Petition to himſelf ſhould have the effect of a Conteſtation of a Suit, which no Petition to any Subject could have; no, not to the Præfectus Prætorio, however ſaid to be an Emperor without Purple. This tended to the preſervation, indeed, of Temporary Suits, that there might be no need of beginning again, not thoſe that were to be ended by long Præſcription. But in order to the cutting off Delays in Cauſes, though any Man might renounce the benefit which the Law allows him, if he ſo pleaſeth; and not take advantage of the fatal time, within which his Adverſary was bound to proſecute his Suit, or Appeal: Yet, though both Parties“ conſented, he would not have the Proſecution deferred above two Months; leſt,“ as he ſaith, as often it happens, the Lives of Men be conſumed and ſpun out in“ Conteſts.“

L.un.de dilationibus ex Conſenſu, Cod. Th. lib. 11.tit.33.Dat. 3.Cal.Maii Abeſt a Cod.Juſt.

He commands Priſoners to be brought to their Tryals.

L. 18. de Accuſationibus Cod. Th. Dat.3. Non. Aug.

37. The Inſtruments and Complices of Rufinus having now lain about eight Months in Priſon, Arcadius was ſenſible of their condition as well as other Malefactors; how, many times ſuch keeping is worſe than death it ſelf, and attributing“ this to the lazineſs of Judges, or a pride they had in being thought“ mercyful and unwilling to call them to receive Sentence, commanded Maximus“ the Prefectus Prætorio to admoniſh them, not to defer their Tryals, but bring“ them to the Bar, and there determine of them according to Law.“ But, if he was moued with Commiſeration toward the evil inſtruments of Rufinus, who aſſiſted him in his covetous and cruel Enterprizes, much more was he concerned to repair, as much as in him lay, the Conditions of thoſe whom that wretched Man had unjuſtly oppreſſed. We have ſeen how Tatianns and his Son Procnlus fell as a Sacrifice to his Luſt and Ambition: And not only they, but Lycia, their Country, as acceſſary, he procured alſo to be innodated with Infamy; of which this ſeems to have been the effect, that ſuch as inhabited it loſt their former Honours; to be ſure were made incapable of attaining any for the time to come, and ſo, in a manner, ceaſed to be Roman Citizens: And beſides this, the Province it ſelf loſt its Dignity and Preheminence which it formerly enjoyed amongſt other Provinces of the Dioceſs of Aſia; upon which Inconveniences this Evil followed, that any one might contumeliouſly handle and injure an Inhabitant, as by the ſuppoſed Crime of Tatianus, made altogether an infamous Perſon. But now Arcadius thinks fit“ to reſtore, as well Tatianus as Lycia, to their ancient Fame and Privileges. Him“ he terms Illuſtrious; calls Rufinus by the name of his Enemy, and Teterrimus Judex“; and, for as much as the Baniſhment was but temporary, or Tatianus was“ now dead, the Sentence was fulfilled; and therefore he declares the Countrey“ which he calls his moſt devoted Province, as free and entire as to Fame and Merit,“ as any other. He commands Cæſarius (the Succeſſor of Rufinus, as he of Tatianus)“ to whom he gives the Title of Excellens Eminentia Tua, that by his Edicts“ he make it known to all Men, That none ſhall dare, for the time to come, to injure“ or wound, as he terms it, any Citizen of Lycia with any contumelious Name or Language.“

He reſtores Tatianus and Lycia to their ancient Fame and Privileges.

L. 9. de Indulgentiis criminum. Cod.Th. Dat. prid.Cal. Septemb.Abeſt a Cod. Juſt. ut temporaria & hiſtorica.

The Curiales commanded to reſide.

38. The Curiales abſented themſelves ſo much from their Charges at this time, that Arcadius was ſo much concerned, as to command Eutychianus, who now, after a little time, became Præfect of the Eaſt, to threaten all within his Diſtrict,“ that they ſhould not forſake the Cities, and live in the Country, under pain of“ Confiſcation of that Land or Houſe they were ſo much in love with; terming“ them impious that forſake ſo, the place of their Original.“ At the later end of the Year he thought fit to put ſome reſpect upon Military Men that had deſerved it. He gives way, that they who have diſcharged the Office of Duces be called upon“ to the Expence of the Prætorſhip; but excepts them, who for a long time have undergone“ the labour and danger of War, and ſuch as have deſerved to be preſent“ at the Secrets of his Conſiſtory.“ And well ſuch as had taken pains might be rewarded; for, at this time, amongſt other Extravagancies of the Age, many were promoted to the Title of Dux, who underſtood little or nothing of the Employment; one thing that made way for the Ruin of the Empire. But, in reference to the Expence the Prætors were wont to make in Shows and Paſt-times, this Charge had been not long ſince ſequeſtred from ſuch Theatrical Delights, and been applyed to Theodoſius his Aquaduct. Yet now, part of this Expence Arcadius orders to be“ laid out in the Shews called Ludi Scænici, upon the Days of the Births and Inaugurations“ of himſelf and his Brother Honorius. About this time he thought fit“ to grant to all ſorts of Perſons the uſe of Stools, of ſitting in Theatres, and frequenting“ the Forum, Roſtrum, Senate, Baths, and ſuch publick places, two ſorts“ only“

L.2.Si Curialis relicta civitate &c. Cod.Th.lib. 12.tit.18. & L. un.Cod.Juſt.eod tit.Dat.18.Cal. Jan.

L.28.de Prætoribus Cod.Th. Dat.10.Cal. Jan.

Military Men encouraged.

L.L.29,30.ejuſ. tit.

L.un.de uſu Sellarum Cod.Th. lib.15.tit.13. Dat.8.Cal.Jan. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

The Uſe of Stools and frequenting publick Meetings only denied to Players and Tabernarii.

only excepted, viz. Common Players, who made People Sport for Gain; and “ ſuch as kept the Tabernæ, or Victualling Houſes. For, the firſt ſort, they were always ſo contemned as infamous by the Romans, that they were ordinarily excluded from meeting with the reſt of the People, and ſometimes not permitted to be of any Tribe. As for Tabernarii, that ſort of them was alſo eſteemed amongſt the moſt Vile and Baſe, which kept Bawdy Houſes with their other Trade. All others, thoſe excepted, might come any whether to make uſe of the Sellæ, or Folding Stool; which in thoſe days was wont to be carried after the better Sort by their Servants, that they might reſt themſelves when they ſaw it convenient. All theſe Laws were enacted by Arcadius at Conſtantinople. There is but one of this Year which bears date from another place, and that is from Regium, diſtant twelve Miles from Conſtantinople; and it is the laſt in order of all the reſt, yet hath no Date of any Day, though the Year be expreſſed. But the meaning of it could not but be remembred by the Governors of Provinces; againſt whom Arcadius was now ſo incenſed, for letting the Publick Buildings in Cities fall to decay, That “ he injoyns Cæſarius, that, what Palaces, Prætoriums of Judges, Publick Granaries, “ Stabula, or Houſes for Cattel, were gone to Ruin ſince the firſt Conſulſhip “ of his Father (ſeventeen Years ago) ſhall be repaired by thoſe Governors now, “ and at their Coſt and Charges; who, when they were Judges in the Provinces, “ ought to have been more heedful and diligent in this way. “

Governors of Provinces puniſhed for not repairing publick Buildings.

L. 35. de Operibus publ. Cod. Th. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

39. Honorius made his Abode all this Year at Milan, as appears from his Acts of State; which, though not many in number, yet are diffuſed into ſeveral Months. He had Complaints brought him out of Africk, againſt one Strator, who exerciſing the Office of Peræquator in that Country, it being his Work to regulate all Inequallities in the Cenſus, or Impoſitions, had made ſome Orders which were very burthenſome to his Tenants, who held the Lands called Fundi Emphiteutici; and had turned ſome out of their Poſſeſſions: Whom he commands to be “ reſtored, if they had Eſtates able to manage them; if not, he requires that the “ new Poſſeſſors pay all the Arrears which were behind by reaſon of Strator his fa- “ vour towards them: That the Rents, by a new Peræquator, be improved, if Im- “ proveable; and that the Condition of the new Tenants be throughly examined, “ whether they be able to hold or not. As this Strator he will have turned out, ſo, “ the Good of the Provincials, their Eaſe and Quiet being ſo much concerned in “ this Office, he commands that no fit Perſon, who had been choſen to the Employ- “ ment by the Præfect, be excuſed from the Duty; no, not by vertue of any Reſcript “ obtained for that purpoſe; the Work being incumbent upon any honeſt and able “ Man, whom it was in the Præfectus Prætorio his power to chuſe; to him the care “ of the Tributes belonging. “ And that ſuch as are found either to be negligent in their Office, or partial in the Management of it, may not go unpuniſhed, he further ordains, that ſome, whoſe Names had been preſented unto him, both of theſe called Peræquatores, and of the Diſcuſſores, whoſe work it was to levy the Tri- “ butes when adjuſted; if they ſhall be found therein faulty, firſt forfeit their Ho- “ nour (for they were wont to be rewarded with the Dignity of Comes of the firſt “ Rank) then refund the fourfold of the Sallaries they had received from the Pub- “ lick (for they were allowed alſo Annonæ, or Proviſions) and make ſatisfaction of “ the fourfold proportion to ſuch Provincials as they ſhall have injured or op- “ preſſed. “ Honorius regulates the Office of Peræquator in Africk.

L. 5. de Cenſitorib. Cod. Th. lib. 13. tit. 11. Dat. 16. Cal. Mar. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

L. 6. ejuſd. tit. Dat. 14. Cal. Apr. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

L. 7. ejuſd. tit. Dat. 4. Cal. Apr. & L. 5. Cod. Juſt. ded. tit.

40. Being thus inclined to prevent and remove Oppreſſions, he was going to fall foul upon Florentinus, his Præfect of Rome, at this time. He had, the Year be- “ fore publiſhed an Edict, prohibiting all Illuſtrious Perſons whatſoever to make uſe “ of the Curſus Publicus for their own eaſe, except they were ſent for up to, or ſent “ down from Court; as that which tended much to the burthening of the Country, “ and hindrance of publick Buſineſs. “ But Florentinus, it ſeems, had forgot what was injoyned, and made uſe of two Veredi for his own Occaſions: Which, though not much in it ſelf; yet, being of ill Example, and violating the Imperial Sanctions, he was ſo wiſe as to acknowledge and confeſs to the Emperor, who pardons him “ this Offence; but charges him that no ſuch thing happen for the time to come. “ But this boldneſs was become too ordinary at this time both in the Eaſt and Weſt; for Arcadius, towards the latter end of the Year, found reaſon too to curb the forwardneſs, in this matter, of Simplicius, a Magiſter Militum, in his Diſtrict: To whom he declares, that ſuch Licenſes as are granted either by the Emperor himſelf, “ or the Præfect, ſhall ſuffice all Governors; and that he, for his part, muſt know, “ that by his Laws all liberty, either of granting them to himſelf or others, was de- “ rived. He adds, that Inferior Judges would be more fearful to offend in this “ kind, “

The Curſus Publicus forbidden to be made uſe of but upon publick Service.

L. 54. de Curſu publ. Cod. Th. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

L. 55. ejuſd. tit. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

L. 56. ejuſd. tit. Abeſt. a Cod. Juſt.

Perſons that had Titular Honours commanded to do ſervice.

kind, when they ſhould know that their Superiours were obedient; and if he ſhould offend again,his Offence ſhould be grievouſly puniſhed. “ Honorius farther obſerving ſome inferiour perſons by virtue of Umbratile or titular Honors obtained by Codicils, to be proud, and refuſe thoſe employments which the publick intereſt of the Common-wealth required they ſhould diſcharge, declared to Florentinus, that though ſuch as had obtained Patents for the Honorary Dignity of Exprotector, or Domeſticus, enjoyed that Dignity, they ſhould for all, that if Curiales be ſtill bound to the Curiæ; if of Colleges or Companies, to the Cities; and if Merchants, be obnoxious to the payment called Luſtralis Collatio; neither be free from any Service or Duty whatſoever to which their Birth or Condition made them liable, which he will alſo have obſerved as to their Children, provided that nothing of this extend to ſuch as had obtain'd an honourable miſſion from the ſaid Employments of Domeſtick, or Protector, after that they had ſerved their full time, been wounded, or were hindred from continuing by want of health. “

L.3. de Teſtimoniali. Cod.Th.l. 7.Tit.21. Abeſt a Cod.Juſt.

He regulates the matter of publick Regiſters.

41. The buſineſs of Regiſters being ſo vigorouſly preſſed at this time, or of recording Teſtaments, Donations and other matters dayly incident, it became a queſtion in Spain, what Solemnity was requiſite to it, or who muſt be preſent at the making of theſe publick Acts. To ſatisfie them in this point, to prevent fraud, and to give greater authority to Truth, Honorius writes back his pleaſure to Petronius, the Vicar of that Dioceſs, that he will have preſent the Magiſtrate of the place, the publick Exceptor, or Clerk of the Acts, and the Principales, or prime Decuriones, five in number. By Magiſtrate muſt be underſtood the Duumvir, if it was a City or Town that had ſuch, or the Defenſor plebis that belonged to the place, there always being a ſupply of Exceptors, not only in the Courts of Provincial Magiſtrates, but in each Curia who wrote and regiſtred the Municipal Acts. “ There was an errour uſually committed by Judges in thoſe days, of too eaſily making relation to the Prince himſelf, of matters which occurred in their ordinary courſe of Judicature: and theſe Conſultations indeed kept up the authority and repute of the Emperour, and ſometimes in ſome difficult caſes there was need of making Relation; the Prince having thoſe Lawyers about him, whoſe work it was to cut the hair in ſuch intricate debates. But the ordinary Judges were commonly affrighted with the noiſe of an Appeal, or had not preſence of mind ſufficient, but were diffident in their deciſions, to the great damage of the Parties, by drawing out Suits to ſo extravagant lengths. Therefore Honorius acquaints Meſſala, his Præfect of Italy, that in Civil Cauſes wherein, before Appeal, there is no need of the Prince his Cognizance, all Allegations having been admitted, and conſiderd on both ſides, the Controverſies ought to be determined, and not deferred by a Conſultation. Foraſmuch as it is not to be ſuffered, that becauſe the conſtancy of a weak Judge is ſhaken by the noiſe of an Appeal, therefore the Party his expectation muſt be ſuſpended by the tedious ambiguity of a Conſultation. “

L. 151. de Decurionib. Cod. Th. Dat. Non. Maii. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

He reſtrains Conſultations.

L.'55. de Appellationib. Cod. Th. lib. 11. tit. 30. Dat. 14. Cal. Jun. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt. quam tamen Tribonianus omittere non debuit, ſi Gothofredo fides.

Gives leave to exchange proviſions for Money.

42. It grew towards the middle of Summer; and by this time Honorius might have ſome intelligence concerning Eutropius his tampering with Gildo in Africk, and what followed thereupon. It concerned him to apply himſelf to Military cares, to ſee that he had men in readineſs to defend himſelf, and that thoſe men were well ſupplied with all Neceſſaries. His Brother Arcadius had this year forbidden any money to be taken by Soldiers, but the Species themſelves, under great penalty inflicted on the Governours of Provinces for conniving at it. “ He was not of this opinion, in reference to the circumſtance of his Diſtrict, it being made lawful by former Princes to make an exchange of other things, beſides, that they called Capitum, for Money; but for fear the people ſhould be oppreſſed, he prohibits any more to be exacted than what had once been determined by a Conſtitution of Valentinian the Elder, what ever Letters they might produce from the Præfecti Prætorio, or even the Prince himſelf, wherein no ſet Rate was expreſſed. “ But though other Species might corrupt with Age, and therefore the Soldiers might be put off with unwholſome Proviſion, yet that they termed Capitum (Hay or Straw) was not liable to ſuch inconveniences; and therefore, as Valentinian before him, he allows the Provincials to pay it in kind, yet not to be compelled to convey it to the Soldiers Quarters. “ Beſides, the Provincials being bound to find Braſs amongſt other Materials for furniſhing out the Arms of the Soldiers, that there might be no rigorous exaction neither, in this kind, he ſettles the price of Braſs, ſo as that twenty five pounds of it ſhall be valued at one Solidus, which number of pounds Juſtinian in his time brought down

L. 21. de erogatione militaris Annonæ Cod. Th. Dat. 15. Cal. Maii.

L.22. ejuſd. tit. Dat. 3. Cal. Jun.

L.23. ejuſd. tit. & l. 8. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. 16. Cal. Jul.

Sets the rate of Braſs, which was to be furniſhed for Arms.

down to juſt twenty, ſo much was Braſs riſen then in the Market value.“

A. D. 396

43. But from the Market of Metals it was very convenient that he ſhould betake himſelf to the Market of Bread; for the ſtate of the City of Rome did very much require it. There were, as hath been ſaid, divers Lands which appertained to the Body, or Company of Bakers there; and, that in divers Provinces, from the Revenues of which they received conſiderable Advantages. But by ſome means or other theſe Lands were fallen to little or nothing, and ſo little profit did they make of them, that they were forced to betake themſelves to other ſhifts for a livelyhood, which preſſed ſore upon the people, whoſe Bread they made. To give ſome remedy to this Diſeaſe, Honorius orders Euſebius the Præfectus Prætorio “ of Italy to ſend ſome honeſt and induſtrious man to make an inſpection into “ the ſtate of thoſe Lands, to ſee their value, and then to let them out in perpetual “ Right, or Emphyteuſis, to fit Tenants, (as Grounds reduced to none or little value “ were wont to be) under a certain Rent for the profit and encouragement of “ the ſaid Company.“ This proved very ſeaſonable and convenient, rather than made out of proſpect of what ſhortly after happened. For about November following, when Winter came on, Gildo having ſet up for himſelf in Africk, kept back that ſupply of Corn, which from ancient times was deſtinated to Rome out of that Country; whereupon the City fell into grievous want of Proviſions, now deſtitute of ſo certain a Granary as that had formerly been unto it. Upon the noiſe of the Dearth, Honorius firſt thought that the fault lay in the Navicularii, their abuſing that Indulgence which had formerly been granted them by Conſtantine. He allowed them two years wherein by Acquittances they ſhould prove the due receit and delivery of ſo much Corn as they pretended to import, and this was becauſe of the danger and trouble of Navigation in Winter. Now he concluded with himſelf that they made this advantage of it to keep the Corn, “ and ſell it after ſuch rates as they could get, having time enough to provide “ themſelves of more againſt that term which was appointed them. The two “ years he is ſtill content to allow them for making good their faith, but he “ would have the Corn, or whatever other Species, delivered within one year, “ and an Acquittance taken for the delivery of it, though in two years the account “ might be adjuſted. “ This he thought would conduce to the bringing in of the Corn; but if it was given out to the people by little and little as it came, he concluded it would not go ſo far; and therefore by another Edict ſent to Florentius the Præfect of the City, he commands, that none be diſtributed gratuitouſly, (this being the Annona Civica) till the whole Canon or quantity was imported; threatening his Officials with a Mulct of ten pounds of Gold, in caſe his Rule “ were not obſerved.“ Though as to Florentius himſelf, it appears ſufficiently from a Letter of his Friend Symmachus, that he was much concerned for the ſupply of the City, finding the returns from Africk to be ſo ſmall.

Takes care for improving the Lands of the Bakers.

Gildo uſurping in Africk.

Honorius provides againſt a Dearth in Rome.

L.2.de Conlatione Æris Cod. Th.lib 11.tit. 21. & *l.*1.*Cod. Juſt. de collat. æris Dat.*5.Cal. Jun.

Fundi dotales appellati.

*L.*19. de Piſtorib. Cod.Th. Dat. 7. Id Jul.

*L.*26. *de Navicularis Cod.Th. & l.*2.Cod.Juſt. eod.tit.Dat. 10. Cal.Jan.

*L.*2. *de conditis in publicis Horreis.Cod.Th. lib.*11.tit. 14. *Abeſt. a Cod. Juſt.Lib.*4.ep. 54.

A. D. 397.

Fl. Cæſario & Pontio Attico, Conſ.

44. The Year CCCXCVII had Fl. Cæſarius and Pontius Atticus for Conſuls: Cæſarius and Eutychianus were for this year Præfecti Prætorio in the Eaſt, under Arcadius: under Honorius, Theodorus held the ſame Dignity in Italy, and Vincentius in Gaul. Arcadius made his abode at Conſtantinople the former part of the year, where being ſolely ruled by Eutropius, he had little to do, but aſſent to, and ratifie ſuch Edicts as were brought to him by his Quæſtor. That part of the Empire over which he præſided for the moſt part, made uſe of the Greek Language, and though the Latine Tongue was the Native Speech of Rome, the Miſtreſs of the World, yet in thoſe remote Thracian and Aſian Parts, many there were that did not underſtand it, and therefore when the Judges gave ſentence in it, they often ſpake to the parties in an unknown Tongue. To remove this inconvenience Arcadius ſignifies to Julian the Proconſul of Aſia, That it ſhould be “ free for Judges to pronounce their Sentences as well in the Greek, as in the Latine Language, though as yet, Pleas and Proceedings ſeem to have been ſtill conti- “ nued in the ſame Tongue in which the Laws were written, as here they did in “ England till the time of Edward the Third, in French, to the great diſorder of “ the Natives; but ſuch is the power of Conqueſt both as to Laws and Language amongſt other things; though now and then ſome Sentences even at Rome were given in Greek, where this Tongue was familiarly known. That Eutropius ſhould approve and conſent to this Licenſe, there's no doubt at all: but another Law ſhortly followed, which we know not how it ſuited to his Genius and Deſigns, it ſeeming utterly to thwart that Trade which he ſo vigorouſly drove on at this time, of making Money or his Ends of every Dignity and Office of Worth about the Emperour. Whether he knew not of it, or, which is moſt probable, procured

Arcadius makes it lawful to give ſentence in Aſia in the Greek Tongue.

*L.*12. *de Sententiis & interloc. omnium judicum Cod. Juſt.lib.*7.*tit.*45.*Dat.*5.Id. Jan. vide Annot.

A. D. 397.

A Law againſt indirect ſeeking after Honours.

L. 1. ad Legem Juliam de Ambitu. Cod. Th. lib. 9. tit. 26. Dat. 15. Cal. Mart. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.. Ambire eſt poteſtatem, honores, auro vel donis emere.

or conſented to it, to deceive the world, and curry favour with honeſt Men, but certain it is, that Cæſarius the Præfect was enjoyned, that if any Man was found “ ambitiouſly, or by Money and Bribes to aſpire to any illuſtrious Dignity in the Palace, or to the Honours which were to be conferred by the Prince himſelf upon “ approved perſons, ſuch as he ſhould think fit; of whatſoever Place, Order or “ Dignity ſuch an one was, his Eſtate ſhould forthwith be confiſcated, and he further “ puniſhed by baniſhment or Deportation; Neither was he to believe that this “ crime, though but endeavoured and begun, was leſs than if perfected, ſeeing “ that the Laws puniſh a crime, and the will or deſigning of the crime in equal “ ſort. “

Too frequent during the Commonwealth.

45. This Crime there was need to ſuppreſs in all Ages, and firſt during the Commonwealth. Then did ambitious perſons, when the State grew larger, eſpecially after the Itilians were made free of the City, and ſuch numbers of Men of ſo manifold humours and inclinations came to have voices in the Comitia, throw about their Money, and by ſeveral ways of gratifying the Tribes, purchaſe thoſe Employments which ought gratuitouſly to have been beſtowed upon deſerving Men. This was grown to ſuch an height in the Age wherein Pompey and Cæſar lived, that few Magiſtrates were made otherwiſe, ſo that both of them made uſe of it, eſpecially the latter, and this cauſed ſuch contentions, tumults and fights in the Elections, that there was a neceſſity of altering the Government it ſelf, as we have largely ſhewed in convenient place. Some Laws had been made for prevention of this miſchief, as the Julian, and Calpurnian; whereof this inflicted a forfeiture of Honours, and removed from the Senate all that were convicted of it; but that only deprived them of the Senatorian and other Dignities for five years. As theſe Laws had little effect (as little as weak Medicines againſt turgent and violently fermented humours) ſo when the Power became tranſlated upon a ſingle Perſon, they became utterly forgotten, and out of uſe; this Diſorder being often now as great as ever, though it ran not in ſo publick and noted a ſtrain. For, as the People that had voices in the Comitia, were, during the Republick, to be bribed; ſo now thoſe that were neareſt about the Emperour, or that waited in his Chamber, who had moſt their Eare, were the Men to whom ſuch perſons betook themſelves, and that with ſuch ſucceſs, that though good Princes endeavoured what they could to prevent it, yet they could not, but ſome times (not able to hear and ſee all themſelves) be obnoxious to the inſinuations of ſuch as ſtudied more their own private gain than any thing relating to the publick intereſt. Conſidering, that they could not give audience to every particular Man, nor know the Circumſtances of each perſon themſelves, there was a neceſſity of having matters related to them by thoſe about them, and, as we have lately ſeen, this was allowed in practice, and a reaſonable reward for ſoliciting in the behalf of ſuch as could not propound their own deſires. But they were ſtill wont to exceed theſe Bounds, and for Sums or Lands given to procure Offices and Employments of the higheſt nature ſometimes, even under the beſt Princes. Conſtantine by Laws endeavoured to ſuppreſs this practice to little purpoſe, which continued too much both under him, and his Sons. Julian ſtruck at it with ſome ſucceſs, if you believe Mamertinus his Panygyriſt; but his Reign was ſhort, and we know what would have happened, had he lived. Under Valens the evil was more ſuppreſſed in the Eaſt, but it had too much force again in the days of Theodoſius, whoſe Son Arcadius fell into the hands of two ſuch Villains, that if we credit Claudian the Poet, and the Hiſtorians of theſe times, all Provinces, and all things elſe were ſet to ſale. But how this Law ſhould come to be now enacted by this young Prince, who at this time was led, as Zoſimus phraſeth it, like a Sheep by Eutropius, is the wonder: we cannot think, with Gothofred, it enacted on purpoſe to obviate his practices, for he had all the power in his hands; but rather publiſhed to give ſome ſatisfaction, and to ſtop the mouths of Men. However, he will have the deſign puniſhed, though it had no effect, as if Money were given, though the place not obtain'd; in like manner as the Romans were wont to cenſure deſigned Crimes, not only of Treaſon, but others; provided, they were made evident by ſome overt Act.

As alſo in thoſe days.

46. But, as they that buy will ſell; the under Officers of the Revenue in this general Mart, purchaſing their places, made again their Markets out of the Purſes of the poor Provincials. Such complaint there was now againſt the Exactors or Gatherers of the Tributes, that to remove the Clamour ſomething muſt alſo be publiſhed againſt them. They were ſo bold as to require more than was due, whether in Mony or the quantity of thoſe Species they collected; a grie-

Sect. I.

A. D. 397.

Superexaction of Tributes made Capital.

viance Conſtantine formerly had indeavoured to remove, and ſo had Valentinian of whom Ammianus teſtifies that he was very prone and eaſy to give relief to the Provinces, in the matter of Tributes. Arcadius now found reaſon to Confirm his Law made in this Point, declaring all Superexactions ſhould be Capital, whereas formerly a Reſtitution of foure-fold was thought ſufficient by Valens in the like caſe; which afterward alſo in the room of Death, was reduced by ſome Emperors. This great male-Adminiſtration of Affairs could not but make very ill Blood in the Spectators, and eſpecially thoſe that were of Senatorian Rank, in which was contained the Body of the Nobility. Eutropius therefore now thinking fit, to the rapacious Skin of the Lyon, to ſow that of the Fox; knew it was convenient to pleaſe them of that order; and Arcadius accordingly was moved to ſhow ſome favour to thoſe that had ſerved formerly in the Palace, and after their ſervice finiſhed, had the Dignity of Senators conferred on them, and according to a former Law he mentions, he accordingly excuſes them from the burthens of the Prætorſhip or Celebrating of Games, incumbent on ſuch as were called to that Office, though not from the Duty of the Glebalis Collatio. But theſe deviſes could do nothing to ſtill that Tempeſt which was raiſed by degrees. Arcadius had been in the power of Rufinus firſt, and afterward becauſe he knew not whom to truſt, or what to do better, gave up himſelf into the Hands of Eutropius, and took for Law whatſoever they directed. He being thus ſucceſſively governed as one that had no Soul himſelf, by theſe two Men, the Empire was wonderfully diſturbed, not only by their treaſonable practiſes for attainment of the Empire, but by their horrible Avarice and hoarding up of Wealth (intended as a means and way to it) their turning men out of their juſt Poſſeſſions, imploying Promoters and Informers in every place, diſcarding all faithful and honeſt Officers, and promoting moſt abject and unfit Perſons to Imployment, even Barbarians as well as others, if they brought but Mony, all which are evident from the account given by Claudian, Zoſimus and others concerning theſe Men, and the diſorders which abounded by their procurement. Of which Syneſius in his Oration to Arcadius concerning Empire maketh mention, as forerunners of the ruine of the State, adviſing him to redreſs them. This deplored condition of the Empire cauſed grievous grudges, Heart-burnings and wonderful diſcontents in Men, who ſaw all Offices, both Civil, Military and Palatine ſo beſtowed on Wretches. And many complaints were made not only privately among the Vulgar, but by Biſhops alſo, who openly complained, eſpecially John Chryſoſtome, who fared much the worſe for his liberal Speech. Moreover things grew now to that height, that, out of publick Odium, Factions, Aſſociations or Conſpiracies ſprung up againſt Entropius and his Creatures; at which he allarmed, by the Relation, it ſeems of Eutychianus, who had diſcovered the matter, reſolved to ſecure himſelf in his extravagancy as much and long as poſſible, and thoſe who had been preferred by his means. To this purpoſe he procured ſo ſevere a Law to be made at Ancyra in Bithynia, where Arcadius then lay, as the Subject conſidered, and all Circumſtances, there is not the like to be found in all the Roman Monuments.

L. 1. de ſuperexactionibus. Cod. Th. lib. 11. tit. 7. Dat ad Ceſarium prid. Non. Mart.

The miſerable Condition of the Empire by reaſon of the lewd Actions of Eutropius.

L. 8. de Senatoris. Cod. Th. Dat. 3. Kal. Maj. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

Cauſeth Factions and Aſſociations.

47. Whoſoever ſhall enter into a wicked Faction with Souldiers, or Private Perſon (though Barbarians) or ſhall either initiate others, or be initiated in the Faction, or ſhall deviſe the death of Illuſtrious Perſons, who are preſent at our Councils, and in our Conſiſtory; or of Senators (they alſo are part of our Body) or in concluſion (Cujuſlibet qui nobis militat) of any one that ſerveth us (for the Laws with the ſame ſeverity puniſh a wicked Intention as the Act it ſelf) let him himſelf as guilty of high Treaſon be put to Death, and his eſtate be Confiſcated. As for his Sons to whom, out of our eſpecial Imperial Lenity, we grant their Lives (for ſuch ought to periſh in their Fathers Puniſhment, in whom Examples of a Paternal, that is, of an hereditary Crime may be feared) let them be deprived of all Inheritance and ſucceſſion deſcending from the Mothers or Grandfathers ſide, or that of their neareſt Relations; let them receive no advantage from the Teſtaments of Strangers; let them be perpetual in want, and poor, and their Fathers Infamy always accompany them; let them never be promoted to Honours or Imployment. Laſtly let them be ſuch as being ſordid and baſe by reaſon of perpetual want, Death may be a comfort to them, and Life a Puniſhment. And we command that ſuch be taken notice of and not forgiven, who ſhall ever attempt to Intercede with us in their behalf. For their Daughters, how many ſoever in number they be, we will that ſo much as the Falcidian Law allows of, only come to them, of their Mothers Eſtate,

This procures a ſevere Law againſt them.

L. ult. Ad legem Corneliam de Sicariis Cod. Th. lib. 9. tit 14. & L. 5. Cod. Juſt. ad L. Juliam Majeſtatis. Dat. prid. Non. Septemb. Ancyræ.

whether ſhe died Teſtate or Inteſtate, that they may receive the maintenance“ rather of an Ingrateful Daughter, than any real advantage and name of an“ Heire; For they ought to be more mildly Sentenced, who by reaſon of the“ Infirmity of their Sex, we believe will not be ſo daring. If Emancipation“ ſhall, after the making of this Law, be conferred either upon Sons or Daughters,“ let it be of none effect. Portions to Daughters, Donations and all ſorts of Alienations“ which ſhall appear by Fraud or according to Law, to have been made“ from that time wherein they had thoughts of entering into the ſaid Faction and Society,“ we pronounce to be of no force. Their Wives, their Dowers being recovered,“ if they have received any thing in way of Donation from their Husbands, on“ condition that it be reſerved for their Sons, at ſuch time as the Uſusfructus is“ over, ſhall know that they ſhall leave all to our Exchecker, which by Law“ was due to their Sons; a part being aſſigned of this Eſtate, according to the“ Falcidian to the Daughters, but nothing at all unto the Sons. What we determine“ concerning their Sons, ſhall with the ſame ſeverity be inflicted upon their“ Partiſans or Defenders; ſuch as were conſcious to their Crime, their Miniſters“ and their Sons. Indeed if any of them in the beginning, or when they“ enter into the Faction, ſtirred up by a deſire of true Praiſe, ſhall diſcover the ſaid“ Faction, he ſhall be both rewarded by, and receive Honour, from us. And he“ that ſhall proceed in the Faction, if though late, yet he will reveal their Councils“ that are not known, ſhall only be accounted worthy of Abſolution and Pardon.“

Which afterward became very Famous.

48. This Law, though made upon this occaſion, became in after times very famous. Forty Years after the making of it Theodoſius the younger, thought fit to put it amongſt other Conſtitutions of Chriſtian Princes, of which his Code is Compoſed; and ſo did Juſtinian in the Age following, Tranſlate it into his; moreover in all Books written in the Eaſt concerning Law it's ſtill mentioned. In the Weſtern parts indeed for ſome Ages it was not known; as neither the better part of Theodoſius his Code, nor any of that Body collected by Juſtinian. But as ſoon as Juſtinians Books were diſcovered here, this Conſtitution ſaw the Light, and got not only Interpreters but Imitators, and Tranſcribers both in the Palace and elſewhere, ſo that it began to be produced and fitted to many other Occaſions. Gratian a Munk of Bononia, about the Year MCL compiling a Body of Pontifical Law in Imitation of Juſtinians Books, (which firſt then came abroad in the Weſt) Intituled by him Concordia diſcordantium Canonum, but now called Gratians Decree, and as ſome ſay was approved by Pope Eugenius, amongſt many more conſtitutions of Princes, put this into it, and ſo Cannonized it. And Charles the fourth Emperor inſerted it in his Golden Bull, ſo much celebrated amongſt the Germans about the Year MCCCLVI and applied it to the Electors Eccleſiaſtical and Secular. Some Criticks carp at it as cruel, blaming Juſtinian for Tranſcribing it; and others as earneſtly defend it. No Law hath afforded occaſion of more Controverſies, Deciſions, Reports and Councils, while Lawyers diſpute to what Perſons and Eſtates it's to be extended, in ſo much that not only Gloſſes but Books have been written upon it; and ſuch as profeſſedly write concerning Treaſon, have made it the foundation of their Diſcourſes, though the original Occaſion and hiſtorical Cauſes have been touched by few, and that very lightly, till James Gothofred made it a ſubject of an entire Diſcourſe; the Hiſtory of this time being very ſcant and nothing ſaid of it by thoſe few Writers that are ſtill remaining.

Though the hiſtorical Cauſe was little underſtood.

The Subject of it.

49. However, the Subject of it, is the Contrivance of the Death of ſuch Perſons as were next to the Prince in Government or Dignity, and that by entering into a Faction or Aſſociation, which Arcadius by his Legiſlative Power maketh Treaſon. The deſign of it is to prevent Murther, and this deſigned Murther is declared Treaſon, upon which double account it is inſerted into ſeveral Codes, under ſeveral Titles; as in that of Theodoſius under the Title of Murther, and * joyned to the Cornelian Law de Sicariis; into the other of Juſtinian, under that of Treaſon, and joyned to the Lex Julia Majeſtatis, ſeveral other Conſtitutions being thus inſerted into ſeveral Books, under divers Titles, for the like reaſon. Now there are four ſorts of Treaſons; Crimina Læſæ Majeſtatis. The firſt is,

How many ſorts of Treaſons.

when any beareth an hoſtile Mind againſt his Prince or Country, as to overturn the State, diſturbe either in whole or in part the publique Peace, quiet and ſecurity, by exciting foreign Powers againſt the Common-wealth, or indeavouring their relief in any kind, when in a State of Hoſtility. This is the higheſt Treaſon, called in Latine Perduellio, whereof in the higheſt manner they are guilty, who contrive the Death of the Prince whoſe Perſon ought to be Sacred; cred; or the depriving him of his Crown and Empire. The ſecond ſort is the Crimen læſæ venerationis, when Reverence due to the Prince, and neceſſary for preſerving Government and good Order, is violated by any naughty Fact or word, as by opprobrious Language, breaking his Statues or abuſing his Pictures. The third kind is when the publique Power or Authority is violated, as by reſiſting, abuſing or ſtriking a Judge or Magiſtrate who is doing the buſineſs of the Prince, is in the juſt exerciſe of his Power; or by arrogating to ones ſelf ſomething belonging to Majeſty, as Coyning of Mony and the like; as the defacing of Coyne, is doing Violence to the Soveraignty. The fourth is, when any other Crime, by reaſon of its greatneſs,or ill effects,is, though it be not ſo in its own Nature,declared to be Treaſon or made ſuch,as ſeveral things with us have been made Felony and Treaſon, as the holding of ſuch and ſuch Tenents in Religion in the Reign of Henry the Eight. This Treaſon is precarious, in Latin Majeſtas Precaria, Fictitia, Exemplaris, and Quaſi Perduellio. And ſuch is by this Law, made by Arcadius, the contrivance of the Death of ſuch as were about him, to whom he doth as it were Communicate his Majeſty, as Wives are ſaid to be irradiated by the Beams of the Dignities and Honours of their Husbands.

* De his legibus Valeſius Juriſconſultum agit hoc modo. Legem Corneliam Majeſtatis memorat Cicero in Piſonem. Sed poſtquam Julius Cæſar leges Cornelias émendavit ac ſupplevit, lex Julia Majeſtatis exinde ſemper dicta eſt, ut patet ex Jure civili. Atq; hinc eſt quod Suetonius in Nerone, legem Juliam vocat, quæ eſt Cornelia de Sicariis et veneficis. Nam locuſtæ Excuſanti minus veneni datum ad occultandam fraudis invidiam reſpondet Nero. Sane inquit legem Juliam timeo. In Annot. ad Ammiani Marcellini lib. 19. p. 153. At vero in Codice Theodoſiano Ad legem Corneliam de ſicariis diverſus eſt titulus.

Perſons by and with whom the Factions were Contracted.

50. The Perſons by and with whom theſe Factions were made, were either Souldiers or private Men. By Private in this Age, were meant not only ſuch as were by this word, diſtinguiſhed from the Prince, and from Magiſtrates and Dignified Perſons, but ſuch as were not in military Imployment, being otherwiſe alſo in Latin called Pagans and in Greek Idiotæ. Both theſe ſorts were either Natural Inhabitants or Barbarians, by which are to be underſtood not ſuch as were called out of Barbarous Countries, for carrying on ſome Plot or Deſigne, but ſuch as indeed had filled the Empire ſince the time of Valens, who gave to the Goths Ground to Inhabit in Thrace and other Countries; the main cauſe of all the Calamities wherewith the Empire was at length oppreſſed. Under Theodoſius, when Athanarich was dead, his Souldiers alſo ſubmitted to the Roman Empire, and were made one Body with the Roman Militia, as ſeveral writers teſtifie; ſo that Barbarous Souldiers lay at Conſtantinople, and the Goths were placed particularly in Phrygia: Nay, now they might either be Souldiers or live privately; they bore, as we have ſeen, Offices of Magiſtracy, and were promoted to Dignities, Illuſtrious, Senatorian, Palatine and Provincial. The Perſons whom Arcadius, by denouncing the Pains and Penalties of Treaſon, labours to protect, are alſo of three ſorts; Illuſtrious Conſiſtorians, Senators, and ſuch as did Militare Principi, or ſerve the Emperor. By Illuſtrious Conſiſtorians who are meant, ſufficiently appears by what we have formerly ſaid of theſe great Perſons, as alſo by Senators, who were in higheſt eſteem, during the Reign of the Author of this Law; but whom we are to underſtand by Militantes is more obſcure. Not certainly thoſe that ſerved in the Army,or every Souldier as the Greeks groſly interpret it, as if Arcadius had by this Conſtitution made the Perſon of every ordinary and common Knapſack-carrier, Sacroſanct. Neither can it be only thoſe of the Emperors Guard, or thoſe that watched about his Body, as the Domeſticks and Protectors, as others have miſtaken, though they indeed may more properly be ſaid Militare Principi, and intra Palatium Militare, whom, for their care of his Perſon, Arcadius, in one of his Conſtitutions, calleth Denotiſſimi. Militare, as is moſt evident to all that konw any things of the Laws or Monuments of theſe Ages, ſignifies to ſerve the Emperor in his Palace, though not by the Sword, as well as in the Field; and the Palatine Officers are called Militia as we have ſeen ſufficiently in the Polity of the Empire.

Perſons protected by the Law.

51. For as much then as it cannot be imagined that every common fellow of the Guard, or of the keepers of the Body, whereof there were many, ſhould be ſo valuable, as to have a Ray of Majeſty Communicated to him, and be made Sacroſanct, we cannot but be of Gothofreds opinion, that ſuch are in this Law to be underſtood as Exerciſed Palatine Dignities, as the Comes Domeſticorum, the Caſtrenſis Sacri Palatii, the Primicerius Notariorum, the Magiſtri Scriniorum, the Comites and Tribuni Scholarum, the Tribunus or Comes Sacri Stabuli, and others. For, theſe, in a peculiar manner and by way of Excellency were ſaid Militare Principi, who in conſiderarion of Place and Dignity were joyned with Senators, as by the Laws any may perceive, with whom it is abſurd to imagine that ordinary Soldiers, common Satellites, or ordinary Domeſticks or Protectors ſhould be joyned, and partake with them in ſo vaſt a privilege, as alſo to think, that ſo great a Faction and Couſpiracy ſhould be raiſed againſt ſuch inconſiderable Men, and this made ſuch a crime, that all that were but miniſterial and conſcious to it, muſt be ſo ſe-verely puniſhed. But, not only theſe great Court-Officers are here to be underſtood, but Provincial too, both Civil and Military, who are all ſaid Militare Principi, being all girt with a Girdle; which Cuſtom extending of old to others as well as Soldiers, is now beyond the Seas as ordinary amongſt Lawyers and Phyſicians, who uſe the Caſſock and Girdle in their Employments in Courts of Juſtice, and when bearing any Office in the Schools, as well as Divines. This was agreeable to the Julian Law (to which this Conſtitution is added) which made it Treaſon to compaſs the death of any Roman Magiſtrate, or ſuch as had Command and Power. Theſe being generally the Creatures of Eutropius, or to whom he was obnoxious for receiving their Money, were thus ſecured by the Severities of this Conſtitution; which, we may eaſily enough conclude, was extorted from Arcadius, to protect the Power of the Eunuch and his Dependants, and hide the Crimes of theſe Officers he had preferred.

52. However, this took ſomething off from the Solemnity and Deſignment of the Law, that it was but part of a larger Conſtitution directed to Eutychianus, the Præfectus Prætorio; who had made Relation to the Emperor of what Miſcarriages he found in the Provinces. The foregoing Year Arcadius had thought fit to pro-“ hibit the collecting of what was due from Senators in the Country; or the Glebalis Collatio, by the Curiales; leſt they ſhould oppreſs or offer Injury to Perſons of“ that Order, which at this time they were prone to do: And appointed the Ap-“ paritors of the Governors of the Provinces to the Employment; requiring thoſe“ who were the Defenſores of the Senate to ſee this done accordingly; and that if“ the Curia of the City or Town thought fit to have a Cenſitor or Peræquator ſent“ down, he ſhould have nothing to do, or intermeddle in the matters belonging to“ Senators.“ This was put in practice by Cæſarius; but ſuch was the ſucceſs, that now Eutychianus his Succeſſor made known unto Arcadius, that the Officials, or Apparitors were ſo improper for the Work of Collecting, that in ſome Provinces one half of the Tribute was behind, or never called for. This could not be endured, that ſo conſiderable a part of the Revenue ſhould fail; and therefore Arcadius,“ by this Reſcript, commands, that the Collection be reſtored into the hands of the“ Curiales; but that, what he had declared the Year before concerning Senators,“ ſhould alſo be obſerved.“ This was to prevent all Commixion of the Concerns of Senators and Curiales, leſt the Senatorian Dignity ſhould grow vile and contemptible; for the Curiales being moſt commonly conceited, and ill bred, fancied themſelves almoſt as good Men as the other, they being a ſort of Senators of Cities and Corporations, and their Courts an Image or Reſemblance of the Senate it ſelf. Hereof the Defenſores Senatus were to take care; a ſtrange ſort of Officers. Becauſe the miſerable Plebs, or Common Sort, ſtood in need of their Defenſor to protect them from the Inſolencies and Injuries of the rich Curiales, Muſt the great and mighty Senate at this time ſtand in need of its Defenſors too? But ſo the Caſe required; all ſorts of People being ready to devour one another, and the Curiales being too bold and ſaucy in the Management of theſe Collections; which, yet it was neceſſary, ſhould ſtill continue in their hands. But, conſidering that this Law and the late famous one of Treaſon made up one Conſtitution, we may gather, that the Senators themſelves lay under ſuch prejudices, that they ſtood in need of Defenſors: And Arcadius provided both for their Dignity and Security, as well ſuch as lived in the Provinces, as in the City.

L.L.2,3.de Prædiis Senatorum Cod.Th.lib. 6.tit.3.

The Curiales appointed to collect what was due from Senators as formerly.

L.4.ſeu ult. ejuſ. tit. Dat.prid. Non.Septemb. Ancyræ eod. die quo Lex famoſa de qua nuper egimus.

53. Toward the latter end of the Year we meet with another Edict of Arcadius, to this ſame Præfect Eutichianus; which, at the firſt Entrance upon it, one would imagine to have been ſent to mitigate the Rigour of that ſevere Law of Treaſon; but that the Concluſion, as well as the Title, under which it is ſet, fruſtrate utterly ſuch Expectation. But, though Eutropius would not be ſo plauſible to take off any Proſecution of ſuch as might conſpire againſt him and his Accomplices, yet upon Complaint of how many were accuſed of other Crimes, and their Eſtates thereupon confiſcated and ſiezed by him, he might think fit to put ſome ſtop to the Clamour, by procuring a little Reſtraint to the extravagant Proſecutions in tha tkind. Former Emperors had impoſed the pain of burning alive upon ſuch Slaves as accuſed their Maſters of any Crime, except it was Treaſon: He now changes it from Fire, to the Sword; but commands, that before the Production or Examination“ of Witneſſes, at the beginning of the Accuſation, they be put to death; and not“ only Slaves, but others he calls Familiares; by which are not to be ſuppoſed ſuch“ as in general Terms we call Familiar Friends, as if one Maſter of a Family might“ not accuſe another without this Puniſhment, but thoſe of the Perſon's Family; as“ one brought up or nouriſhed in his Houſe, or his Clients and Dependants.“ Whatever

A Law againſt Slaves accuſing their Maſters.

L.3. Ne præter crimen Majeſtatis, Cod.Th.lib. 9.tit.6.Dat.6. Id.Nov.Conſtp: & L.penult.Cod. Juſt. qui accuſare non poſſunt.

ever the occaſion was, the Law it ſelf is agreeable to Modeſty, good Nature and Gratitude; ſuppoſing that theſe cannot be broken without ſome horrible Malice or Unworthineſs in the Party. Arcadius cloſed this Year with another ſeaſonable and good Edict, to avoid confuſion of Juriſdictions, and haraſſing the People by drawing them from one Tribunal to another; as alſo, to curb the inſolence of Military Men, now grown to a very great exceſs. They had been formerly prohibited to intermeddle in the Deciſion of Civil Controverſies, yet ſome of them had the confidence ſtill to concern themſelves in ſuch Affairs; as we ſee all Courts draw whatſoever Griſt they can to their own Mills. But this was now made to appear a matter of ſo very ill conſequence, That he declares to Arcelaus, the Præfectus Auguſtalis; “that if any ſhall ſo neglect the Order of the Judges, and without the Prince his Reſcript, ſue before any Military Judge, beſides the Penalties formerly inflicted, he ſhall ſuffer Deportation: and moreover, his Advocate (who ought to know and inform his Client of the Juriſdiction and Nature of Courts) incurr a Fine of ten pounds of Gold.“

Military Judges prohibited to meddle in Civil Cauſes

L.9.de Juriſdictione & ubi quis conven. deb. Cod. Juſt. lib.2.tit.1.Dat. 8.Cal.Decemb. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt. ſed ſimilis ibi, puta L.5. eod.tit.

Honorius intent upon the War with Gildo.

54. The mind of Honorius was this Year intent upon Africk, and the Conſequents of the Revolt of that Country; and when he, or his Governor Stilicho, thought how to recover it, a fit Opportunity preſented it ſelf, ſuch as was utterly beyond their expectation. Gildo, the great Rebel, had a Brother called by the name of Mazeſcel, or others, of like ſound unto it; as we have formerly ſeen out of Ammianus Marcellinus. This Mazeſcel, out of a barbarous rage and fury, he would have killed, and laid in wait ſuch as ſhould intrap him; which having diſcovered, he fled into Italy, to the Emperor; whom he informed of the whole ſtate of the Province: And ſhewing him how there could not be any difficulty in making War, offered himſelf to reduce or defeat his Brother if he might be furniſhed with a ſufficient Army. There was ſome reaſon to conſider whether the Barbarian ought to be truſted in ſuch an Enterprize againſt his own Brother; but matters were brought to that paſs in Italy, through the Revolt of Africk, that Gildo hindring all Navigation, the City of Rome was thereby caſt into a very great Scarcity of Proviſions: Whereupon, the ſtate of Affairs was reported to the Senate; which, upon the motion from the Emperor and Stilicho, decreed War againſt Gildo, and to be managed by Mazeſcel. This when Gildo heard, he was more violently enraged; and flew to that height, that he laid hold on, and murdered two of his Brother's Sons, whom he had left behind him in Africk. Honorius continued his Abode at Milan the former part of the Year; yet, though at that diſtance, knowing how the City of Rome laboured under this Defection, he ſet himſelf wholly, in a manner, to provide for the Supply, and other Emoluments of it; wherein its Dignity, Peace and Tranquility were concerned. Leſt any of thoſe Perſons who belonged to ſuch Companies as ſerved the City with Neceſſaries ſhould withdraw themſelves from their Functions, he declared, That all that were obnoxious to the Body of the Snarii, “either in reſpect of their Birth and Original, or holding of Lands belonging to the Body, ſhould continue their Services: And, for the encouragement of all in general, renewed the Privileges formerly granted to all the Corporati; one whereof, at this time of want, was very ſeaſonable, viz. Excuſe or Exemption from any extraordinary Indiction, or Impoſition.“

Zoſimus ubi prius Oroſius, lib.7. c.36. Sigon. de occid. Imp. lib. 10.

Sets himſelf to provide for Rome, which ſuffered much thereby.

Hoc quoque non parva ſas eſt cum laude relinqui. Quod non ante fretis exercitus adſtitit ultor. Ordine quam priſco cenſeret bella Senatus. Neglectum Stilicho per tot jam ſæcula morem. Rettulit, ut ducibus mandarent prælia Patres. Decretoque togæ fœlix legionibus iret. Teſſera, Romuleas leges remeaſſe fatemur. Cum procerum juſſis famulantia cernimus arma. Claudian in pr. Conſ. Stilichonis a v. 324. ad 331. & vide Symmachi, lib. 4. ep. 4.

L. 7. de Snariis Cod.Th. Dat. 15. Cal.Mar.

L.3.de Privilegiis Corporator. urbis Romæ, Cod. Th. lib.14. tit.2.Dat.15. Cal.Apr. pro Mart.

The People run a madding after the faſhions of the Barbarians.

55. But, to augment the miſchief, there were ſome things practiſed in the City at this time which ſober and underſtanding Men did much miſlike, and thereof made Information to the Emperor. The Goths, and other Barbarous Nations having lived ſo long in the Empire, and many fixing in Rome it ſelf, the People became enamoured of their Faſhions and Apparel; thinking their own ancient Wear to be dull and unhandſome, and nothing ſo neat as what the Strangers uſed, how extravagant ſoever it was in it ſelf: An humour preſaging very ill things; nothing being more ominous than that a People ſhall at length truckle to thoſe they ſo admire, being captivated to them in their Fancies and Imaginations before they be Captives as to their Perſons and Eſtates. However, this humour was ſo prevalent in the Eaſt, that, not only the ordinary ſort of People, but the greateſt Miniſters loved to be ſeen in uncouth Garbs; of which Claudian makes Rufinus highly guilty, and it ſeems he gave ſo ill example to Arcadius, his young Maſter, that Syneſius, in his diſcourſe to him concerning Government, doth not omit to tax him, alſo, for this Indecorum. But Honorius, to put ſome ſtop to this ridiculous and mean ſpirit, “now forbad the uſe of thoſe things they called Tzangæ, Tſanchæ or Sanchæ (being Buskins made of Skins) and of Braccæ, within the venerable City, as he terms it, under pain of Confiſcation of Goods, and perpetual Baniſhment.“ Moreover, at this time, though there was ſcarcity of all Proviſions, yet were they at Rome inflamed Honorius makes a Law againſt it.

L.2.de Habitib. quo uti oportet intra urbem. Cod.Th. lib.14. tit.10. P.P.Romæ.

with a madneſs of Building; though the place was already bigger than either was conſiſtent with Health or Accommodations, yet muſt they fill the Campus Martius with Huts and Booths, if they could not be permitted to raiſe greater Structures. This large Plat of Ground, which lay betwixt the City and the Tiber, of which they could not but have received from their Anceſtors by Tradition as well as Writings, how famous it had been upon many Accounts, did they now choak up with Tipling Houſes; as we may preſume, being vitious and luxurious, but abject and mean; addicted to Pleaſures, but ſtrangers to the generous Exerciſes and Divertiſements of their Forefathers. Beſides that, the old Luſtrum was kept in this place; the Comitia alſo, or Aſſemblies of the People: It was the School, the Gymnaſium or Palæſtra of all ſorts of Exerciſes of Arms or Sports; and ſerved the people for walking, and taking of the Air. Some Emperors, upon this account, would not ſuffer any Buildings to be erected upon it, though Trajan built a Theatre and a Porticus; the former of which was demoliſhed by Adrian. Now, Honorius prohibits any Huts or Booths to be there erected, under the ſame Penalty of Confiſcation, and perpetual Exile, as was inflicted by the former Law, though with as little effect, as we ſhall ſee hereafter: “ For this humour of building there, ſo long continued, till the City her ſelf, for Novelty, ſlid down from her ſeven Hills, and here repoſed her ſelf, as more at eaſe. But both theſe Laws were publiſhed at Rome, in the Forum of Trajan; that Forum ſo much frequented, and where Edicts concerning the People were wont to be fixed ſo as to be ſeen by all: that moſt Auguſt Structure, concerning the Magnificence of which, the Reader may remember what Ammianus Marcellinus writes, upon occaſion of Conſtantius his viewing of it.

Another againſt Building in the Campus Martius.

L.un. de Campo Martio urbis Romæ, Cod.Th. lib.14.tit.14. P. P. Roma in foro Trajani.

56. But there were ſo many Barbarians now adays in Rome, ſo many idle Perſons haunting Booths, Victualling Houſes, and places of worſe Character; that the great Dearth conſidered, there was juſt fear leſt the Diſcontent of the Citizens by theſe turbulent Men, might be blown into ſome outragious Acts of Sedition and Mutiny. It was therefore reſolved, not only to prohibit the Barbarous Habits, thereby to take off opportunity of their knowing one another, and to prevent their Meetings by forbidding Booths and Huts; but alſo, To command all Agentes in Rebus, who, as we have ſeen, were wont to be violent and unruly; all Palatine Officials, or thoſe belonging to the two great Treaſurers, that were well skilled in collecting of Arrears, in raiſing Calumnies, and in Rapines; as alſo, others of more inferiour note, if they had no Buſineſs or Employment, to quit the City, under pain of Deportation. “ It was the cuſtom, as we have ſeen, both from Themiſtius and Ammianus, in time of Scarcity to ſend idle and uſeleſs perſons out of the City; that there might be better Supply for ſuch as had moſt Right and Neceſſity there to continue. When this was done, none certainly could better be ſpared than the Gladiators; whoſe Employment it was, by cutting and killing of one another, to give Tragical Divertiſements to the Spectators on bloody Theatres. It ſeems, alſo, that they were comanded to be gone as well as others: And thereupon, as ſome ſhifted and lurked about in the Booths and Huts in the Campus Martius, they betook themſelves to the Services of Senators, and there thought to find ſhelter and protection. For by another part of this Edict, though made a Law by it ſelf, Honorius gives expreſs charge, that if any ſuch ſhall be found out to have ſo done, they be ſent away, and baniſhed into the utmoſt Deſerts. “ To be ſure, theſe Hackſters were, of all others, moſt bold and daring, and the fitteſt Inſtruments for any Tumult. They who value not their own, are ever the Maſters of the Lives of others. If Honorius would not have them in the Services of Noble Men, where they might have ſome Employment, it is not probable he would have them in the City, in their Ludus, or Fencing School, under their Maſter or Laniſta; who could have the leſs Authority and Command over them. So that we cannot but be of the contrary opinion to Gothofred in this matter, and believe them expelled the City by his expreſs Command.

Idle and dangerous perſons commanded to quit the City.

L.un. Quibus Militantibus ad urbem non liceat accedere, Cod.Th.lib.14. tit.11. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt. ut horum temporum propria.

L.3. de Gladiatoribus, Cod.Th. lib.15.tit.12. Abeſt etiam a Cod. Juſt. ut temporaria.

57. But ſtill Honorius, or they about him, ſtood in dread of the Conſequents of that Influence which the Rebellion of Gildo might have upon theſe multitudes of people now in diſtreſs, and living in that vaſt City. The ſureſt way was to bring in, ſufficient Proviſions; but that could not be without Aſſiſtance from Sea: Italy could do nothing toward filling ſo many mouths. He directed a large Edict to the People and Senate, for quieting of their minds, and continuing good Orders amongſt them; wherein, in the firſt place, as not knowing what to do better, he again runs upon the Navicularii; as being, by reaſon of their Employment, fitteſt to bear the burthen and the blame too. What Corn they brought in was in ſuch

Sect. 1.

A. D. 397.

He ſtill uſeth other means for ſupply of Rome with Neceſſaries.

little Quantities and great Intervals, that little good ſtill came of it; and therefore he requires, That the third part of the whole Quantity be imported as ſoon as “ the Seas are open, or in the Months of March and April; and then betakes himſelf to “ the old and uſual Courſe of commanding of the Præfect of Italy to ſee the Fleet “ reinforced, by conſtraining all whatſoever, who, by any way or means, held “ Lands obnoxious to the Function, to do their Duties. But though never ſo much Corn was brought out of Africk, or other places; if it was ſold and parcelled away e'er it came at Rome or in the Granaries, the End and Deſign of it was fruſtrated; and yet ſuch was the practice at this time, to ſell it upon the Shores or Coaſts as it came along, and thereof Honorius was informed; who inflicts the Puniſhment “ of Death both upon Seller and Buyer, beſides the nulling of the Contracts “ ſo made to defraud the Publick. “ Furthermore, when they had ſo diminiſhed the Stores, they were wont to pretend ſeveral things; As that the Corn was putrified, “ and they were forced to caſt it Over-board; that it was dryed and ſhrunk “ below the quantity of an hundredth part, they were allowed upon that Conſideration; “ that it was ſtolen, waſhed away by the Sea; or, in concluſion, that they “ had ſuffered Shipwreck: All which Pretences he will have examined ſtrictly by “ the Præfectus Annonæ and the Vicar of the City; that if, indeed, ſuch adverſe “ Fortune happened, Allowance may be made, or elſe their delay and negligence “ be puniſhed if theſe misfortunes came by their fault. “ But if all the whole Canon “ (as they call it) or quantity was brought in; if the Suſceptors or Receivers of “ it, and the Overſeers of the Granaries played the Knaves, all former labour would be loſt. To prevent which, he further requires, that theſe Officers every Year “ give an Account to the ſaid Vicar and Præfect, of all ſuch quantities as they have “ delivered out, and prove manifeſtly the Delivery before them. If they appeared “ honeſt he will have them continue in their Employment five Years (whereas, one “ was the ordinary term of a Suſceptor) and in caſe of want, ſupply to be made “ out of the Body of the Curiales. “

L.27. de Naviculariis, Cod. Th. lib.13. tit.5. Dat.17. Cal. Maii.

L.3. Quæ res venire non poſſunt, Cod. Juſt. lib.4. tit.40.

L.5. de Naufragiis, Cod. Th. lib. 13. tit.9.

L. 24. de Suſceptoribus Cod. Th.

58. Good reaſon we ſee Honorius hath, to tell the Fathers, as he doth in the beginning of his Oration, that they are certain how great care he takes for the Commodity of them and of the People. But this he further ſhows and aſſures them of, by ordaining, that, In caſe any Tribute of Corn or Oyl, uſually due and payable, “ was remitted or pardoned to any by any Immunity granted by Reſcript of the “ Emperor; ſuch Reſcript and Immunity ſhall be utterly void. And in caſe a Ship “ was conſtrained to put in any where upon the Coaſt of Africk, yet the Lading “ thereof ſhall not be carried to any other place; but tranſmitted to the Sacred City “ alone. “ Thus, by the Commodity which Honorius endeavoured to procure for Senate and People, we ſee the main Chance was provided for, as much as in him lay; or Neceſſaries for the maintenance of their Lives. But he proceeded farther, to take care for their diverſion alſo, by Pleaſures, Delights and Paſtimes; to make their Condition, if it did at all, to pinch the leſs. We find in this part of his Oration, he not only makes mention of Corn (the quantity whereof imported every Year was two hundred thouſand Modii; and great need there was of it, becauſe, what formerly came to Rome out of Egypt, was now ſent to Conſtantinople) but alſo Oyl; of which, moreover, there was a quantity brought yearly out of Africk. This was for Luxury; not to eat, but to make uſe of, in their Gymnaſia, and their Baths, as they had learned from the Greeks. Such as had a mind to pleaſe the People, ſometimes gratified them with a Preſent of this Oyl; as Scipio, Cæſar, and others of the Emperors; by whom it was brought at length to be part of the yearly Canon or Allowance to the City. But he proceeded ſtill further in his deſign of pleaſing Senate and People. Thoſe that were wont to raiſe the Tribute of Senators, or Glebalis Collatio, were the Cenſuales; whom, though he now excuſeth from “ ſo doing, as a work too burthenſome; yet he will have them to diſcuſs the matters “ thereto belonging: And having found out the true ſtate of Collection, “ how much, and wherefore it was to be payed; then to make Breves, and therein “ report what they found. “ Now, the Cenſuales being Officers relating to the Senate it ſelf, this could not but pleaſe the Members of it, that they ſhould be the Men that muſt make an Inſpection into their Eſtates. What is behind of this Edict tends more to the pleaſure and ſatisfaction of the People.

Certum habetis Patres conſcripti quantum curarum impendimus pro veſtris ac populi commodis. Ideoque hac lege ſancimus, &c. L. 3. de Canone frumentario urbis Romæ. Cod. Th. lib.14. tit. 15.

And things of Delight.

L.6. de Senatoribus, Cod. Th.

50. Nothing could pleaſe the People better after their Bellies were fully provided for, than to behold the Circenſian Games. Theſe were celebrated at the Charge of the Prætors; who finding them ſo great a burthen, as we have mentioned, made ſeveral means to evade the Office: and now, amongſt others, when they were to be deſigned to ſome certain ſort of Prætorſhip, a little before, they alienated their E-

Sect. 1.

A. D. 397.

ſtates, that the leſſer burthen may be impoſed upon them. Such Alienations the“ Emperor declares ſhall be void, except the Cauſe was firſt approved, and the“ Contract entred in the Regiſter of the Govornor of the Province.“ And whereas ſome were ſo bold as to ſeek after,and procure the Reſcript of the Emperor,for their excuſe of the Prætorſhip;He alſo declares all ſuch Reſcripts obtained,to be of no Force. The times grew now to ſuch hardſhip, or Men to ſuch uneaſineſs in their Conditions, that none would keep their Stations; but were weary of thoſe places and ways, wherein they were fixed by their Quality and their Originals. Whether it was, that the ſcarcity which was at Rome pinched alſo the Inhabitants of Campania, or it was an Omen of that Ruin and Deſolation which ſhortly after followed all over the Weſt; But Towns now began to be deſerted, even by Artificers; thoſe they called Collegiati, who were Companies that ſerved the Publick, and for that,received Privileges; who, together with the Curiales, made up the whole Corporation.' This drew from the Emperor an Order to Graccus, the Conſularis of“ Campania; Wherein he requires, that all Judges uſe their endeavours to bring“ them back, and all they have; that their bodies may not be in one place, and“ their minds in another. As for their Sons, if they were born of free Women,“ they ought to follow the condition of their Fathers, and be liable to ſuch Services“ as they were: But if they had them by Ancillæ, or Slaves, they were to follow,“ and be reckoned of the ſame ſtate and condition with, their Mothers.“

L.7.de Senatoribus, Cod.Th.

L.31. de Prætoribus, Cod. Th.

Artificers forced back to the places of their Original.

L.1.de Collegiatis, Cod.Th. lib. 14.tit.7.Dat.9. Cal. Jun. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

60. Theſe things tended to quiet the minds of the people;but it was another matter to reduce Gildo, and prevent any further Attempts he might make upon Italy,or other places. For this alſo Honorius made ſo vigorous Preparations, that he called the Juniores into the Field; and commanded Sperechius, his Comes Rei Privatæ,“ that his own Patrimony or Domain ſhould not herein be ſpared, though uſually“ it was; but that in all Provinces it ſhould alſo furniſh them out, and that with all“ convenient ſpeed.“ This, that it might better be able to perform, he commands“ him farther; That none of that Gold or Silver which belonged to it,“ ſhall be drawn off, and applyed to other uſes, as he found it had been practiſed,“ without his leave for ſo doing; that he may have a fuller and clearer Account of“ it.“ If the Emperor's own Lands were ſubjected to this burthen in this caſe of neceſſity, it was not fit that thoſe of the Senators ſhould eſcape, but be made alſo to ſet out Soldiers; the finding of which, as Juretus obſerves, was ſometimes put upon Patrimonies themſelves, or made the burthen of the Soil; and ſometimes impoſed upon Tenants or preſent Poſſeſſors. We find that Honorius, by ſome Edict, required this Duty now from the Eſtates of Senators; and that hereupon the Senate diſpatched away their Legati, or Meſſengers, to him, to pray that they might be diſcharged of the trouble, and pay Money in lieu of the Men. And they returned with their buſineſs done, as Symmachus, in his Epiſtle, tells the Sons of Nichomachus; for, both the Indiction of the Tirones ceaſed, and they were permitted to pay Silver in the Room of them. But, concerning theſe matters, ſaith he, we hope we ſhall receive an Oration or Writing from the Emperor. No ſuch Oration we find, but an Edict directed to Theodorus, the Præfectus Prætorio; wherein he tells him, That he had granted the Petition of the moſt ample Order,“ that Money might be payed inſtead of Soldiers; and they might have their choice“ whether they would furniſh out Men fit for Service, or for every one, pay in Money“ twenty five Solidi, beſides for their finding with Meat and Cloaths. But if“ they had rather pay Gold, they ſhould ſend it preſently into the Exchequer.“ By this we find that Tirones, or new Soldiers were now at a leſſer Rate than formerly, viz. twenty five Solidi, or five pounds of Silver; but that was becauſe Slaves were admitted into the Service. Bnt this Favour granted to the Senate, Honorius thought fit to ſignifie, alſo, to Minervius at the latter end of the Year, his Comes Res Privatæ; to whom he gives order, that his own Poſſeſſions, held in perpetual Right, ſhall contribute toward the finding of Soldiers in the ſame manner.

L.12 de Tironibus, Cod.Th. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

Honorius ſubjects his own Domain to the finding of Soldiers.

L.14. de Jure Fiſci, Cod. Th.

Ep.62.lib.6.& vide Juretum in locum.

Senators permitted to pay Money in lieu of them.

L.13. de Tironibus, Cod.Th.

L.14.de Tironibus,Cod.Th.Dat. prid.Id.Nov.

61. This diſadvantage in the Civil State, ſtill followed Military Preparations; that when an Army was to be raiſed, the Curiales, and Countrymen, and other Officers, that were weary of their Employments, would forſake their Stations, and take ſhelter in a Profeſſion of Arms. To avoid this Extreme on the other hand, the Emperour gave directions to Florentinus, the Præfect of the City, that even ſuch Soldiers as had obtained te be Comites of the firſt Rank ſhould be forced back to their Corporations, if they had obtain'd the Dignity by Codocils, or for Reward, and had not paſſed through the ſeveral Employments of the Camp; but if they had been in long ſervice, he permits them to be free, or in caſe they had obtain'd Curiales forced back from the Camp.

L.2. de Comitibus Rei militaris. Cod. Th.lib. 6.tit.14. Dat. 12.Cal.Jan. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

A. D. 397.

tain'd both the firſt and ſecond degrees of Comites. The ſame thing he enjoyns concerning the Apparitors of Judges, even of the Præfects, whether they had betaken themſelves to the Militia Palatina, or Militaris, as he diſtinguiſheth; commanding that they be ſent back again to the meaneſt Employments wherein they “ had ſerved; and that if they eſcaped, their Sons ſhould be forced to the ſeveral “ Charges of their Eathers. “ As for Curiales, though formerly he had granted them leave to enjoy the honours of Exprotectors, or Domeſticks, provided their Duties in the Corporation were ſupplied; now conſidering of it better, as he ſaith, He declares all ſuch Titular Names null, and void; ſo that they ſhall neither be “ excuſed from ſordid Services, nor from the Plumbatæ, if occaſion require it. “ And what he ſaith here concerning ſuch Honours obtained by them, he extends “ it to all members of Companies, and Centuriones. Moreover, as the Appari- “ tors, ſo all Curiales he will have recalled from both the Militia Palatina and Ar- “ mata, ſo as no preſcription of time ſhall ſerve their turn. “

L.19.de diverſis Officiis Cod. Th.

And deprived of certain Honours.

L.L. 153. 154. 155.156. de Decurionib.Cod. Th.

62. But, as for thoſe who from Curiales had arrived at the Senatorian Dignity, if they had diſcharged and run through all their Charges in the Curia, he per- “ mits them to enjoy their Honour and their eaſe; but ſuch Sons as they had be- “ fore they came to be Senators, he will not have excuſed from being obnoxious to “ the originary and firſt conditions of their Fathers; except their Fathers were il- “ luſtrious perſons, then he declares them exempt; If, as he expreſſeth himſelf, “ by a degenerate lazyneſs and drowſineſs they do not ſhake off their Fathers virtue. So “ far are ſuch from being noble, though puffed up with a conceit of their Nobility. “ But as for them that were Senators, and had not yet run through all the Char- “ ges of the Curia, he gives them leave to perform, what was behind, by their De- “ puties. Such was the Diſtemper of this time, as we may ſee by the Remedies, and very Complicate, wherein a Medicine that ſeemed to cure one Symptom, would exaſperate another. But ſo Honorius, or they about him, dealt with as wary an Hand as he could; and foreſeeing now how the Military Officers might take too much upon them, and determine matters that belonged not to their Cognizance; when they were puffed up with a fancy of what need there was of them, he commands in an Edict directed to Vincentius, Præfect of Gall, that in a criminal cauſe, the accuſer follow the Court of the accuſed Party; that none go “ out of his own Court without leave from the Prince, under pain of the Plain- “ tiff loſing his cauſe, and the Defendant being condemned, whether it was in a Civil or Criminal Matter: under the ſame penalty he enjoyns that none commit “ execution to Military Men; and inflicts death on ſuch Tribunes and Vicars as ſhall “ execute any thing in a Military or prohibited way. “ After this manner was this Year paſſed over.

Except ſuch as had diſcharged all Duties.

L.5.de Juriſdictione Cod. Juſt.lib.3.tit. 13.

A. D. 398.

Honorio Auguſto & Eutychiano Coſſ.

63. The next following, or the CCCXCVIII of our Lord, had for Conſuls Honorius Auguſtus, the fourth time, and Eutychianus: Theodorus was Præfectus Prætorio of Italy: Vincentius ſtill of Gall; Eutychianus of the Eaſt, and Anatolius of Illyricum. Arcadius was this Year, or for the moſt part, reſident at Conſtantinople; and Honorius at Milan, where he took the Enſigns of the Conſulſhip. By this time the great enmity betwixt Stilicho and Eutropius was broken forth into publick and notorious Acts, and in the mouth of every man; yet, though they burned with implacable malice againſt each other, did both of them with all licentiouſneſs, inſult over the miſeries of ſuch as were ſubject to their power: Stilicho having fixed himſelf, as he concluded, by marrying his Daughter Mary to Honorius; and Eutropius leading and governing Arcadius no otherwiſe than like ſome ſilly Sheep. To be ſure, if there were any noble or pleaſant Seat in any Country, it was made over, to one of them two; or if any Gold or Silver, it flew from the right owners into their Coffers, there being a great number of Informers employed, who had in charge to calumniate ever, ſuch kind of Men. Affairs both in Eaſt and Weſt ſtanding in this poſture, all Perſons of Senatorian Rank bore it moſt heavily; eſpecially Gaines, who was impatient that he had otbain'd no Honour befitting a Captain that was now in age; that he could not ſatisfie the Man's mind with any thing he yet could preſent him; he was enraged to find that all Money ran in a ſtream to the Houſe of Eutropius: he communicated his thoughts to Tribigild, a man very ſtout, and prompt for any bold undertaking; who, by the Emperour's order, commanded ſome Troops of Horſe of the Barbarians, that quartered in Phrygia. Being agreed of their proceeding, he pretended he would go into Phrygia to viſit, and make inſpection into the condition of his Men, and ſo parted from Conſtantinople; and leading the Troops he commanded, laid waſte all the Country where he came, killing the Men, Women and Children, and plundering all Stilicho and Eutropius their enmity, and yet agreement in ſpoiling the Provinces evidently appears.

Zoſimus p. 789.

Gaines at it enraged, procures Tribigild to revolt and waſte Aſia.

he could light on, by which means he got together ſo great a company of raſcally and inconſiderable People, that deſtruction ſeemed to threaten all Aſia: Lydia was all full of tumults, and moſt of the Inhabitants betook themſelves to Maritime places whence they paſſed over into the Iſlands or other parts. When this was told the Emperour, he had no ſenſe of the publick calamity, neither could he tell what courſe to take, being an extremely dull Man, but referred the whole management of Affairs to Eutropius.

Arcadius leaves the matter to Eutropius.

Who makes Gaines and Leo Generals.

64. He made choice of Gaines and Leo for Captains to reduce Tribigild into order. Leo he would have go into Aſia to diſperſe theſe Companies of Barbarians which were met confuſedly together; and Gaines march through Thrace, and the Straits of the Helleſpont to curb the inſolence of the Enemy, if he ſhould adventure into thoſe Quarters. As for Leo, he had not the leaſt skill in the Office of a General, nor had any other qualification to warrant his Riſe to ſuch preferment, but only his familiarity with Eutropius, being as Claudian ſets him out, a Dreſſer of Wool. But according as they had inſtructions, both marched away; and Gaines now calling to mind what had been agreed of betwixt him and Tribigild, and that this was a fit time for putting it in practice, ſent to him to draw down his Forces toward the Helleſpont. And had he concealed his deſign againſt the State, and ſilently drawn himſelf with his Barbarians out of Conſtantinople, it would in probability have ſucceeded, all Aſia might have been ſeiſed, and nothing could have hindered but that the whole Eaſt muſt alſo have been loſt: but fortune intending ſtill to preſerve the Roman Princes, Gaines haſted from the City with ſuch heat and fury as was natural to Barbarians, and when he was come to Heraclea, then ſignified to Tribigild what he would have him to do. Tribigild neglected to follow his Orders in marching to the Helleſpont, for fear he ſhould fall among the Forces that lay upon the Coaſt; but having laid waſte all Phrygia without any oppoſition, fell at length upon Piſidia. The News hereof was brought to Gaines, but he made no haſte becauſe of the agreement betwixt him and Tribigild; and as for Leo, he, though the Ajax of Eutropius hovered ſtill about the Helleſpont, not daring to fight with Tribigild, but pretending he was to have an eye eſpecially to that Country, leſt the Enemy ſhould ſuddenly fall into it. Therefore had Tribigild his full ſcope to go any whither, and do what he pleaſed, many Towns he took, and therein put to the Sword as well the Inhabitants as the Soldiers, and not a Barbarian would be on the Roman ſide, but joyned with their own Countrymen againſt the Subjects of the Empire.

Sed poſtquam pulſiſque bonis & fæce retenta, Pejores legit ſocios, dignuſque ſatelles
Hinc Hoſius ſtetit, inde Leo, fiducia crevit Regnandique palam flagravit aperta libido.
Patritius Conſul maculat, quos vendit honores, &c.
Claudian lib. 2. in Eutropium a v. 557. lege vero præcipue a v. 375.
Acer in abſentes linguæ jactator, abundans Corporis, exiguusq; animi doctiſſimus artis.
Quondam lanificæ moderator pectinis unci.
Non alius lanam purgatis ſordibus æque Præbuerit calathis, ſimilis nec pinguia quiſquam Vellera per tenues ferri producere rimas.
Tunc Ajax erat Eutropii.

For all them Tribigild waſtes the Provinces.

65. Gaines now pretending to bear heavily this Devaſtation of the Provinces, yet magnified the Arts and Stratagems of Tribigild, affirming him inſuperable as to Conduct, and that rather by his ſagacity, than force he had done ſuch things. He paſſed into Aſia, but attempted nothing, and ſuffered the Cities and Countries to be waſted, following only the Enemy, and being a Spectator of what he did; indeed expecting that Tribigild would now make for the Eaſt, for which Expedition he ſent him ſome Forces, ſtill covering his Deſigns, and concealing himſelf as much as he could. Had now Tribigild out of Phrygia not gone directly towards Piſidia, but taken the ſtraight courſe into Lydia, nothing could have hindered his being inſtantly Maſter of it, and with it of Ionia, alſo; whence he might eaſily have paſſed over into the Iſlands with as conſiderable a Fleet as he pleaſed, have over-run all the Eaſt, and laid all waſte as far as Ægypt. But making for Pamphilia, which bordered upon Piſidia, he fell into a Country ſtrait and mountainous, and utterly inacceſſible with Horſe. There, though no Army was found to oppoſe him, one Valentine, an Inhabitant of a ſmall Town called Selga, ſituate upon an Hill, a Man meanly skill'd, yet not altogether inexpert in War, got together a number of Slaves and Countrymen, ſuch as he knew to be exerciſed in the continual Combats they had with Robbers in thoſe parts, and placed them upon ſuch Hills as were near to the Paſſage, ſo as they might ſee all that came, though themſelves in the clear day could be ſeen of none. Tribigild being come down to the lower parts of Pamphylia with his Horſe, and being entred the Straits, was put to ſore diſorder by theſe Countrymen, who tumbled down great Stones upon his Men. But to avoid them there was no way; for on one hand there was a deep Lake and Fenny Grounds, and on the other was a narrow aſcent which ſcarcely afforded paſſage to two Men a-breaſt; and from the orbicular ſhape of it, was by the Inhabitants called Cochlea. This paſſage was guarded by one Florentius, who had Men enough to make it good, ſo that the Barbarians, intercepted in theſe Straits, were knocked on the Head with Stones, and there periſhed for the moſt part: ſome of them took the Lake with their Horſes, and there found that which they endeavoured to Gaines under hand aſſiſts him.

Tribigild imprudently marching into Pamphylia, is oppoſed by one Valentine.

Loſeth all his Men except three hundred in the Straits.

eſcape from on dry land. Tribigild with three hundred Men got up into the Cochlea, and corrupted with Money Florentius, to give him paſſage, and ſo eſcaping himſelf with this Company, ſuffered all the reſt to be loſt.

He and they ſhut up betwixt two Rivers.

Gaines, to relieve him, procures Leo and his Forces, whom he had ſent againſt him to be deſtroyed.

66. Imagining now he had eſcaped the ſnares laid for him by Valentine, he fell into a danger full as great as was the former. For, all the Inhabitants of the Country in a manner, being got together, with ſuch weapons as were at hand, ſhut him and his three hundred Companions up betwixt the Rivers Melane and Eurymedon, whereof the one ran by Sida, and the other took its courſe through Aſpendus. Not knowing now what to do, he ſent to make known his condition to Gaines, who was much troubled at theſe accidents; but having not yet unmasked himſelf, he ſent Leo, who was next him, to the aſſiſtance of the Pamphylians, to joyn with Valentine, and hinder Tribigild and his Men from paſſing the Rivers. Leo, though a Sot, and given to all luxury, yet did what was enjoyned, which perplexed Gaines, fearing that Tribigild, in this manner beſet, and having not ſuitable Forces, might utterly miſcarry: he ſent therefore ſome Companies of Barbarians he had with him againſt the Roman Camp, who pillaged the Country, killed all the Soldiers they met, and gave not over till they had deſtroyed Leo and his Forces, and laid almoſt the whole Country waſte. Tribigild by this means got away, and what Gaines deſigned came to paſs, for he having eſcaped out of Pamphylia, did greater miſchief than ever, to the Cities of Phrygia.

Arcadius by his Edicts endeavours to keep his Army together.

L.16. de re militari. Cod. Th. Dat.5.Cal.Febr.

L.17. ejuſd. tit.

67. Arcadius, thus abuſed by the Villanies, and tricks of thoſe about him, ſet himſelf in another way to inforce his Army, and repreſs that Rebellion of Tribigild, of which he hoped, by the valour and conduct of Gaines, to have ſhortly ſome good account. Underſtanding that many Soldiers ſtraggled, and abſented themſelves from their Colours, he ſent to Theophilus, the Vicar of Aſia, expreſs order that he ſhould cauſe ſuch Fugitives to be apprehended, and held in cuſtody till he ſhould have acquainted him, and received directions how further to deal with them: but to be ſure ſuch an one as ſhould be found again to abſent himſelf after he had been once diſcovered to ſtraggle, ſhould forfeit his whole Eſtate. This he ordered toward the end of January, in reſerence to the Soldiers that quartered in the Provinces, and there ſtraggled abroad; there was a great want of ſome courſe for ſtopping ſuch as flocked to Conſtantinople. Four days after, or the firſt of February, he ſigned a Conſtitution directed to Romulianus the Præfect of the City, wherein he enjoyned him, That if any Soldier was ſent by his Com-“pany or his Tribune, to Court, about buſineſs, he ſhould preſently addreſs him-“ſelf to ſome of the illuſtrious Comites, and there diſcover the cauſe of his coming, “that he might receive a ſpeedy diſpatch. By the Law he commands that all Preſentes, or ſuch as were to be in waiting or attendance at Court, and ſuch as be-“longed to other Companies or Legions, that were abſent, or without employ-“ment, or had put themſelves into the Retinues and Services of other perſons, “return to their ſtations.“ This he had reaſon to do, and more ſeverity had been agreeable enough to the diſtemper of this Age, of which the ſtragling and licentious wandering about of Soldiers, is reckoned to have been one very great Symptom. Now, when Armies were abroad, and upon other occaſions, complaints were made concerning Quarters, the Military Men being inſolent in exacting more and better room than the conveniences of their Landlords could afford them: Arcadius being informed hereof by Hoſius the Magiſter Officiorum, for preventing ſuch diſorders, in an Edict directed to him, preſcribed what Rules he would have obſerved.

And to prevent Abuſes as to Quartering.

L.5. de Metalis. Cod. Th. lib.7. tit.8. Dat.8. Id. Feb. & l.2. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

68. In whatſoever City, ſaith he, either we our ſelves ſhall happen to be, or they that ſerve us, all diſhoneſty both of Menſores (or Quartermaſters) and of “ſuch as are entertain'd, being removed, let the Maſter of the Houſe ſecurely and “without fear, have to himſelf two parts thereof, and a third go to the entertain-“ment of his Gueſt, yet ſo as the Maſter himſelf have the firſt choice, his Gueſt the ſecond, and the third part remain to the owner of the Houſe; as equity and “juſtice ordain, that he, who by Inheritance, by Purchaſe, or Building, hath a “Right to the whole, ought to make the the firſt choice himſelf, and enjoy what is “left and refuſed by a Stranger. But as for Ergaſteria, Shops or Ware-Houſes, they “ſhall by no means be ſubject to this Burthen, except in the third part aſſigned “to the Soldier there be want of Stabling, for then the Maſter ſhall be bound to “provide for him out of theſe Ware-Houſes, which uſually had Stables adjoyning “to them, where Pack-Horſes were wont to be kept and fed. But as for per-“ſons illuſtrious by their Quality, they ſhall have half of the Houſe, ſo as either “they or the Maſter ſhall make the partition, and the other chuſe.“ Arcadius was farther now ſo ſenſible of the Incroachments made by the Soldiers upon Grounds and Paſtures with which they had nothing to do; that to reſtrain the liberty they took to themſelves herein, he wrote, alſo, to Simplicius, a Comes utriuſque Militiæ in the Eaſt; commanding him, That he ſhould take care that none of them “ ſhould feed their Horſes in the publick Meadows, and pleaſant Paſtures; which “ long Cuſtom, and the Delicioufneſs of the Grounds, had hitherto fenced from “ ſuch Violations; neither in the Fields which belonged to private Citizens of Antioch, upon pain of a Forſeiture of twelve pounds of Gold, to be payed by ſuch “ Violators and the Officials of the Magiſter Militum, provided that the Curiales “ took care to furniſh the Army with convenient Paſturage.

And eating up of Meadows

L.3. de Paſcuis. Cod.Th. lib. 7. tit.7.& l.2. Cod.Juſt.eod. tit. Dat.5. Id. Mart.

69. In the time of War when Proviſions were to be raiſed for the Army, great complaint was made againſt the Actuaries and the Optiones, whereof the former were the Clerks of the Troops that took the accounts, and the other received the Proviſions from the Suſceptors. To prevent their frauds, Arcadius now gave order to the Præfectus Prætorio, that before the beginning of an Indiction Breives ſhould be ſent from the Magiſtri Militum, in which was to be expreſſed how much the Army ſtood in need of in general, and the ſeveral Numeri in particu- “ lar. Then, when the Tax was laid, ſhould other Breives thereof be diſpatched “ to the Scrinia of the Prince, that by comparing them together, any cheat of “ theſe Officers might be diſcovered, which was to be puniſhed with payment of “ the double of what they ſuperexacted from the Provincials. “ Amongſt other ſorts of Proviſions we ſee that Wine was wont to be furniſhed for the uſe of the Army, and the old was doubtleſs moſt deſired by them. But the Corporation of Epiſane a Town in Syria, not far diſtant from Apamea, petitioned the Emperour, for “ what reaſons is not expreſſed, that in the Month of November the Soldier might “ be ſerved with new Wine; which petition he granted, and gave order to Eutychianus, that he ſhould cauſe this Rule to be obſerved in his Diſtrict. “ By new Wine is uſually meant that of the preſent year, or laſt Vintage: and by old, that of the year foregoing; but yet both old and new are to be underſtood according to the nature of the Wine, and the Cuſtom of the place. For ſome requires a longer time to ferment and ripen, as the Falernum was not fit to be drunk till the tenth, and the Surrentinum before the twenty fifth year. Others work ſpeedily, and are quickly ready; as this ſeems to have been about Epiſane.

As alſo ſuper-exaction of Proviſions.

L.24. de Erogatione Militaris Annonæ. Cod.Th. & l.9. Cod.Juſt. eod. tit. Dat.8. Cal. Apr.

Gives leave that new Wine be given to the Soldiers in November.

L.25. ejuſd.tit. Cod.Th. Dat.10. Cal.Jun. L. 10. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. hinc interpolata eſt, reſecto & amputato capite hiſtorico ex quo tamen ratio & ſic ut dicam imago legis, & anima cognoſcitur. Gothofred.

70. But at Conſtantinople all were in an hurry and tumult, becauſe of the motions and attempts of Tribigild; and all perſons deſired to flock thither, where each one could meet with thoſe of his own party, and moſt news was to be heard. The Actuaries or Clerks of the Army were obſerved to loiter there eſpecially, and it was diſcovered that there was more than ordinary kindneſs and familiarity betwixt them and the Numerarii belonging to the Præfect of the City. The importance of this underſtanding betwixt them was too conſiderable; for the Numerarii dealing in Accounts, and making thoſe Breives which concerned the uſe of the Army, and the work of the Actuaries being ſuch, as we lately ſaid, they had opportunity by laying their Heads together to raiſe more than was needful for the ſervice of the Soldiers, and put the advantage into their own Purſes. For this reaſon it was, that now Arcadius being at Nice, gave in charge to Severus the Præfect of the City to “ ſee, that no Communion or Society (which tended to the deſtruction of all) ſhould be betwixt theſe Men. And that the Actuarii within fifty days (a ſufficient time to diſpatch the buſineſs they came about) ſhould depart this City, or if they were there found after the expiring of this term, they ſhould incur a forfeiture of five and twenty pounds of Gold. But ſuch a reſtleſs humour, or a deſire of lawleſs liberty, had now poſſeſſed the minds of all ſorts of Men, that the Fabricenſes alſo, or thoſe that wrought in the publick Forges made bold to change the Air and their Employments, which cauſed the Emperour, at the ſuggeſtion of Hoſius, we may believe, the Magiſter Officiorum, to whom the Conſtitution is directed, to give command, that as Tirones or new raiſed Soldiers were marked in the hand that they might be known, as alſo were the Aquarii, or ſuch as belonged to the Aquæducts; ſo ſuch as ſerved in the Forges ſhould be branded in the “ Arm, not as a ſign of crime or ſervitude, but that they might alſo upon occaſion “ be diſcovered when they ran away from their work. And ſuch as ſhould “ harbour the Fugitives he will have condemned to the ſervice; to be ſure “ the children of the Fabricenſes themſelves, who were Conditionales, or ſubject to “ the Condition, State and Service of their Fathers. “ Thus Arcadius employed all the Civil Power he had for carrying on the War, while in the mean time he was gulled by all about him, and each ſtrove how he might make his Markets out of that publick calamity which impended.

Labours to prevent a Conſpiracy betwixt the Actuarii and Numerarii.

L:15. de Numerariis, Cod.Th. Dat.4. Cal.Jul. Ne diutius ad cunctorum perniciem, Actuarii Numerariorum Conſortiis adjuventur, &c. l.6. Cod. Juſt. eod.tit.

Commands the Fabricenſes to be branded in the Arm, to prevent their running from their Employments.

L.4. de Fabricenſibus, Cod.Th. 10. tit.22. & l. 3. Cod.Juſt. eod. tit. Dat.18. Cal. Jan.

Sect. 1.

A. D. 398.

Lib. 7. c. 36.

71. Now, Spring drawing on apace, great expectation there was how Maſcezil behaved himſelf in Africk, and how matters would go betwixt the two Brothers; and they received an account of the diſpatching of the War ſooner by far than was expected. Oroſius tells us, that Maſcezil, knowing, by the example of Theodoſius, how powerful Prayer made in the Name of Chriſt, though in moſt deſperate Affairs, is wont to be; went to the Iſland Capraria, at this time famous for the Monks that inhabited it; ſome of whom he prevailed with to go along with him: And continuing day and night with them in Exerciſes of Prayer, Faſting and Singing, obtained a Victory without War, and ſatisfaction for the injury offered him, without Slaughter. By a River called Ardalio, running betwixt the two Cities, Thebaſte und Metrideca, he pitched his Camp; wherein, it's ſaid, he had not above five thouſand Men. The Enemy was no leſs than ſeventy thouſand ſtrong: And there were ſome Straits of a Valley which Maſcezil thought he needs muſt paſs: which, when he conſidered of, our Writer tells you, that St. Ambroſe, the Biſhop of Milan, lately deceaſed, appeared to him in a dream; and making a ſign with his hand, ſtruck his ſtaff to the ground three times, and ſaid Hic, Hic, Hic: By which he prudently conjectured the Victory was foretold; by the word, the place to be ſignified; and by the day, the number.

Gildo defeated, and put to death, as Oroſius hath written.

72. Accordingly, he ſtayed that time; and on the third day, having ſpent the preceding night in prayer, and other Chriſtian Duties, he led out his Men againſt the ſtragling and diſorderly Enemy. To thoſe he firſt met he ſpake kindly, and perſwaded them by fair means: but one that carried an Enſign oppoſed him, and exhorted his Friends to begin the Battel. He perceiving this, gave him a ſtroke upon the Arm with his Sword; and the Wound ſo weakened the part, that the Man was forced to let fall his Colours. Thoſe Troops that were behind, ſeeing this, took it no otherwiſe than as a token of Submiſſion; and imagining that thoſe before them had yielded, ſtruck their Standards alſo, and came in to Maſcezil. Hereat the Barbarians, of whom Gildo had brought a great multitude into the Field, being diſcouraged, and having none to lead them, fled ſeveral ways. Gildo got to the Sea, took Ship, and ſet Sail; but was recalled into Africk, and there periſhed by ſtrangling, after a few days. We ſhould, Oroſius adds, be in danger of being thought to lye impudently, if we ſhould make relation of ſo great miracles, if there were not Witneſſes ſufficient, who beheld them with their own eyes. There was no Treachery or Ambuſh; but yet, ſeaventy thouſand Men were overcome, in a manner, without fighting: He that was overcome fled for ſome time, that he who had the better, might not find whereon to vent his preſent Anger. He is tranſported into another place, that he might not know his Brother was ſlain; by whoſe death he received ſatisfaction. Maſcezil himſelf, bing puffed up with his ſucceſs, and forſaking now the company of Holy Men; with whom formerly aſſiſted in his Fight, he had overcome; adventured, even, to violate, and put out of the Church ſome that there had taken Sanctuary. But Puniſhment overtook the Sacrilegious Perſon: for he alone, after ſome time, was puniſhed, they being ſtill alive, looking on and inſulting, whom he had drawn out to Execution; and in himſelf alone he experienced, that Divine Juſtice watcheth ſtill on both ſides: He being aſſiſted when there he had his truſt; and at length ſlain, when he came to deſpiſe what before he had truſted.

Congreſſum proſagum captum vox nunciat una, Rumoremque ſui prævenit laureâ belli.

What is to be learnt of this War from Claudian his Poem concerning it.

Quem veniens indixit hiems, ver perculit hoſtem.

73. The end of Gildo was brought about juſt after, or much according to this manner; ſo ſoon, and with ſo little ado, as filled all Men with admiration, as we may perceive by Claudian, in his Poem concerning this War; who falls into a kind of extaſie in his thoughts concerning it. Had the ſecond Book of this Poem been preſerved, we had had much more light concerning the management of the Affair: for, though his expreſſions be Poetical, and many Fictions he hath, and figurative ſpeeches; yet not ſo as, ordinarily, to intrench upon the very ſubſtance of the Actions which he introduceth whole, though cloathed in his witty dreſſes. From him we learn, that this War began in Autumn, or toward the beginning of Winter; and in Spring, was finiſhed. How, in all this time, Rome was miſerably oppreſſed for want of Proviſions; which, by his Poetick power, transforming into a Woman, as is uſual with Men of his Art, and their Brethren, the Painters; He carries her up to Jupiter, and there makes her tell a very ſad tale of her Calamities. And to Hiſtory is very agreeable her very Caſe, as ſhe ſtates it, that ſhe had, ſince the time of Cæſar, been, for her merits, rewarded with both Egypt and Libya; that, by her Summer Fleets, both her Warlike Senate, and her Ruling People might be nouriſhed; a Courſe wherein ſhe could not but be ſecurely provided for, the one conſtantly ſupplying the accidental defects of the other. But after ter that another Rome was riſen up, a Rome equal to her ſelf, and that the Eaſt had obtained for it ſelf Gowns as good as hers, the Egyptian Fields paſſed over in Dower to the new Miſtreſs; and Libya was only left her to truſt to, though that Country was in no certain condition to ſupply her . and yet was ſhe now deprived by Gildo of that alſo. That herein Rome was no Lyer, the Laws made ſince the erecting of Conſtantinople, and other Monuments, ſufficiently ſatisfie us. But we cannot be ſo much aſſured of what he brings in Africa uttering, in grievous Lamentation concerning the Slavery that ſhe underwent; whether ſhe was not a little ſick of the diſeaſe called Fides Punica, or being tranſported by her paſſion, ſhe was failed alſo by her memory.

Cum ſubiit par Roma mihi, diviſaque ſumpſit Æquales Aurora togas Ægyptia rura In partem ceſſere novam. Spes unica nobis Reſtabat Libyæ, quæ vix ægreque fovebat. Solo ducta Noto nunquam ſecura futuri. Semper inops ventique fidem poſcebat & anni. Hanc quoque nunc Gildon rapuit ſub fine cadentis Autumni.

74. We ſhould chuſe rather to tax our other Intelligence, of Ignorance in this point, having ſuch ſlender Accounts of matters from the Hiſtorians that are remaining, but that we are reſtrained by a ſurer Monument. Libya complains, that twice ſix Winters had that Yoke of Gildo layen on her Neck: that he had grown old in her Calamities; and now challenged that as a Kingdom which he had poſſeſſed ſo many Years, though ſhe wiſhes ſhe could call it a Kingdom, being whatever lay betwixt Atlas and Nile, Prætorium and Ganges; indeed and truth, a third part of the World was become the Field or Poſſeſſion of one Robber. The Reader is to remember that this was Gildo, the Son of Nubel, the petty King of Mauritania, and brother of Firmus, who was driven into a Revolt from the Romans in the Reign of Valentinian, by his Courtiers; and afterwards into ſuch Straits by the Arms of Theodoſius the General, that he hanged himſelf. Ammianus Marcellinus, after the Revolt of Firmus, mentions Gildo as continuiug in fidelity to the Romans, but it is with an As yet; ſo that he knew that afterwards he alſo failed in his fidelity, though his Hiſtory extended not ſo far as to the time of his Defection: Wherein, elſe, we had had an account of it. But here lies the difficulty: Claudian ſpeaks of Libya being under his Yoak twelve Years; whereas there is extant an Edict directed to him by the Title of Magiſter utriuſque Militiæ throughout Africk, dated on the nine and twentieth of December, when Theodoſius the third time, and Abundantius were Conſuls; which was not much above four Years before this his Defeat. This ſhews him then to have been intruſted as a Magiſter Militum, and not to have revolted; at leaſt, not then to have been in the State and Condition of War. Baronius makes an attempt of bringing in the Revolt and Uſurpation of Firmus, and joyning it in the number of Years mentioned by Claudian. But the Uſurpation of Firmus fell out in the Year CCCLXXII, or twenty ſix Years before the Defeat of Gildo, above double to the number found in Claudian; ſo that Ammianus and this Poet compared together, and all things conſidered, Gildo ſeems to have been on and off, fickle, inconſtant, treacherous upon any occaſion; and fawning again when there was danger of being called to Account, as anon will be more apparent.

——jam ſolis habenæ. Bis ſenas torquent hyemes cervicibus ex quo Hæret triſte jugum noſtris jam luctibus ille Conſenuit, regnumque ſibi tot vindicat annos. Atque utinam regnum!

L. ult. ad Legem Juliam de Adulteris, Cod. Th. lib. 9. tit. 7. Dat 3. Cal. Jan. A. D. 393.

75. That Theodoſius, when he made preparations for the War againſt Eugenius, ſent to Gildo for Aſſiſtance; and was denied both it, and obedience from the Moor; is evident enough from Claudian alſo, in his Poem concerning the ſixth Conſulſhip of Honorius; where he compares Gildo and Alarich together in their diſobedience to that Emperor, whom he ſaith, they often deſpiſed with a prophane mind. This was but the Year after the date of the Edict inſcribed to him as Magiſter Militum; ſo that he ſeems, as is ſaid, to have played faſt and looſe; and one while to have pretended Obedience and Friendſhip, and then, again, declined his Duty, as Alarich did; and that often, as the Poet expreſſeth it by the word Sæpe. Hereat Eutropius took advantage, and thought to gain him off from the Party of Honorius, and joyn him to himſelf for carrying on ſuch deſigns as he had in his head; to which, an Acknowledgment of Arcadius as his Prince and Sovereign was added as a Cover, which Gildo was glad to pretend, as that which might give him ſome advantage againſt Honorius and Stilicho, to whom he lay next Neighbour, and with the Intereſts of whom he moſt claſhed; thoſe that then ruled the Eaſtern parts being more at a diſtance, and therefore, not ſo much to be feared by him. It's true, he uſurped, or owned not Theodoſius, as the Poet here hints; and therefore, what Zoſimus writes concerning Eutropius his ſending to him, and drawing him off to the Party of Arcadius, could not give the firſt beginning to his Revolt. But whereas Baronius contends, that at this time there was no miſunderſtanding betwixt the two Brothers, Arcadius and Honorius, occaſioned by the loſs of Africk, he ſeems not to have conſidered what Claudian ſaith, as well in one place as in another: For nothing is more palpable or evident than that difference was ariſen betwixt them upon this Account. In the very entrance into his Poem concerning this War, in his Exultation ——duo namque fuere. Europæ Libyæq; hoſtes. Mauruſius Atlas Gildonis furias, Alaricum Barbara Peuce Nutrierat, qui ſæpe ſuum ſprevere profana Mente patrem: Toracum venientem finibus alter Hebri clauſit aquis, alter præcepta vocantis Reſpuit auxiliiſque ad proxima bella negatis. Abjurata palam Libyæ poſſiderat arva.

Sect. 1.

D. A. 398.

tion for peace reſtored, and Africk joyned again to the Empire, he puts this as a principal matter, that Full Concord of the Brothers now returned. But in the Body of his Work after that he hath brought Rome and Africa before Jupiter, and there made them to pour out their complaints, he fains the reſult of the Dictate of him and his Council to have been this, that the two Theodoſii, Father and Son, whom he terms Divorum Proceres ſhould be ſent to their Children, the one to one of the Emperours, the other to the other, to carry the ſecret Admonitions of Jove, and his Orders to the Brothers, and make a League or Agreement betwixt their two Kingdoms.

Concordia Fratrum plena redit.

Qui Jovis arcanos monitus, mandataque ferrent Fratribus, & geminis ſanciret fœdera regnis.

76. The Grandfather is by the Poet carried into Italy, but the Father himſelf unto Arcadius, with whom at the very firſt, when ſighing would give him leave, he falls into a grievous expoſtulation. Are matters come unto this paſs? Is there Diſcord riſen betwixt Brothers by the intervention or means of a Moor, and the united World and Courts of Brethren now diſagree? Is the ſafety and preſervation of Gildo a fit prize for ſo great fury? A Man indeed remarkable for his Morals, and to be defended at any rate, in reſpect to whoſe merits a Brother is to part with his fraternal kindneſs! But ſee a little of him in me thy Father. The Civil War grew on apace, and the Roman Empire ſtood in a doubtful poſture. What King was there then, though at never ſuch a diſtance, in Armenia, or upon the Banks of Mæotis, who gave me not aſſiſtance in the Expedition? The Goths and Geloni ſent me their Aids. He alone ſent me not one Ship, not one Soldier, but ſate ſtill in a fluctuating humour. Had he gone off to the adverſe Party, I ſhould better have born it: but he ſtood, as it were, in the Watch-tower of Fate, and expected to which ſide the Balance would encline; was an obſerver of Event alone, and reſolved to give up himſelf to the Conquerour. Truly had not I been taken away by death, I ſhould have followed the example of Tullus (Sufetius he means, of whom the Story is ordinary in Livy, and others) and have cauſed him to have been pulled in pieces with Horſes; Hitherto he pretended an obſervance of thy Brother's Commands, and now he tramples upon them: and doſt thou offer, after having thy Father and Brother ſo uſed by him, to truſt thy ſelf with ſuch a Monſter? But he largely rewards thee for it, and hath brought over many Cities into thy lot. Therefore muſt Right be bought and ſold? ſhall Treachery be acceptable, if introduced by reward? Then after ſome things ſaid againſt Gildo for his inconſtancy and perfidiouſneſs, he puts Arcadius in mind how odious Treachery was to the ancient Romans: how Fabricius would not make uſe of that Treaſon of the Servant againſt his Maſter, and how Camillus reſtored the Boys to the beſieged City. “

Hoc erat? in fratres medio diſcordia Mauro Naſcitur? & Mundus germanaque diſſidet Aula? Gildoniſque ſalus tanti ſit palma furoris? Scilicet egregius morum, magnoque tuendus, Et cujus meritis pietas a fratre recedat, &c.

Solus at hic, non puppe data, non milite miſſo. Subſedit fluitante fide, &c.

77. He proceeds to tell him that what others refuſed to admit of againſt an Enemy, he, to the great infamy of the Age, cloſed with againſt his own Brother: that Gildo now conferred the Government of the South on whom he pleaſed; which way ſoever his inconſtant and tottering fancy moved, thither went Lybia; and Africk was become the gift of a Moor. At length he deſires him to avoid the treachery and perfidious deſigns of that people, and not engage in a War againſt his Brother, an Action which might become only Thebes and Mycenæ, and a crime fit for the Moors to commit. That he ſhould have a reſpect to the merits of Stilicho, who had done ſo great things for both the Brothers, and now was Father-in-law to Honorius; as alſo to Serena his Wife, their near Kinſwoman. At parting he deſires only that he would withdraw his hand from Gildo, and ſuffer him to fall, for he knew Stilicho would do his buſineſs. To this, Arcadius anſwered, that he ſhould be obeyed, that none was dearer to him than Stilicho; that the Rogue in Africk ſhould periſh for him, and the Country return ſafer than formerly to his Brother. “ A wonder now it is, that Baronius ſhould ſay, that no difference is found to have been betwixt Arcadius and Honorius, about taking away the Province of Africk: the greater wonder, becauſe he cites Claudian, and gives credit to him in other matters, as are not near ſo evident as that for which we now contend. It is no way probable, that the Poet would counterfeit ſo material a thing, a matter of ſuch conſequence as this, take ſo much pains, and uſe ſo many words about it. But it is ſuperfluous to ſay any more; had we alleged but only what he ſaith at the entrance into his Poem, that the Concord of the Brothers now returned, it had been enough. The ſtrength of Gildo conſidered, and what help he might have received by the means of Eutropius, Providence ordered it well for Honorius, that an opportunity was preſented of ſetting one Brother againſt another, and revenging his Treachery upon him, in the ſame way as he had dealt betwixt the two Emperours. Thus by his death was Africk delivered from great oppreſſion (he being a moſt tyrannical and wicked man, as Claudian ſets him out) and that Country returned into obedience to the Empire, together with the Dominion of Gildo, which was ſo large, that it alone became the charge of a Comes, who in the Notitia of the Empire is called Comes Gildoniaci Patrimonii. His Perſon fell not into the hands of his Proſecutors, though his Eſtate did. For Zoſimus writes, that leſt he ſhould come alive into their power, he hanged himſelf.

Ne conſanguineis certetur cominus armis.

——Redeat jam tutior Africa fratri.

78. Now, as it always happened after the ſuppreſſion of a Tyrant, followed a proſecution of his Friends and Abettors; and this continued a long time, he having, by keeping the power ſo many years, eſtabliſhed an intereſt very conſiderable. And to be ſure, upon ſuch occaſions there wanted not thoſe, who would accuſe, right or wrong, hoping to ingratiate themſelves, by laying the charge of Treaſon to thoſe perſons after whoſe Eſtates they gaped; and a ſenſe of this oppreſſion after ſuch Conqueſts, drew out ſeveral Laws from Princes for ſuppreſſion of this ſort of Cattel. Honorius was now very early put in mind to do the like. For we find an Edict directed toward the beginning of March to Victurus, the Proconſul of Africk, wherein he declares, that he will not ſuffer innocent perſons to be ruined by the Accuſations of crafty Men, under a ſhew of falſe Crimination: and if “ ſuch ſhould attempt any ſuch matter, they muſt know that they ſhall feel the ſeverity “ of the Laws for ſuch offences, whereby being made infamous, they were “ alſo to be driven into baniſhment.“ This haſte was made to obviate the practiſes of Informers; for it muſt have been preſently after the Defeat of Gildo, being ſo early in the year. As hereby Honorius could not but pleaſe all honeſt Men, both in Africk, and other places; ſo we know not how grateful he was to the Spaniards, in reference to a thing he now did, relating unto their Country. That payment called Glebalis Collatio, and belonging to Senators, though uſually payed, had been remitted, it ſeems, to ſome in Spain, and probably by Theodoſius their Countryman, out of kindneſs to their Nation, and reſpect to the circumſtances of certain perſons, who by reaſon of Poverty, or ſome Employment, as Pagan Prieſthood in the Cities, might pretend to excuſe or favour. One of this number was Eventius, a Senator, but poor, being the Prieſt of the Province, and poſſibly under other qualifications; and now the Glebalis Collatio was demanded for ſuch Lands as he ſtood poſſeſſed of. He denyed payment, alleging and pleading privilege from the Immunities granted to the Prieſts of Spain in general, and the particular qualifications of his own perſon: upon his Refuſal the Officers betook themſelves to Felix the Præfectus Prætorio of Gall, to whoſe Government, Spain, as a Dioceſs, was at this time ſubject, and he approving of Eventius his excuſe, declared him free from the Tax. But the matter reſted not here, but was reported to the Emperour; who taking it into conſideration, by a Reſcript directed to Felix, declared firſt that this Impoſition “ was a Burthen of the Soil, and not any perſonal charge, and therefore upon neceſſity they muſt be liable to it that received the Revenue of the Lands. This conſidered, “ he ordains that Spain, and conſequently Eventius, ſhould only enjoy that privilege of Exemption for the preſent time; but for the future, in payment of “ dues, be bound to the cuſtoms of other Provinces. “

Honorius after his Defeat publiſheth a Law againſt falſe Accuſers.

L. ult. de Calumniatorib. Cod. Th. lib. 9. tit. 39. Dat. 3 Id. Mart. Med.

Vide Symmachi lib. 4. ep. 62.

L. 10. de Senatorib. Cod. Th. Dat. 4. Cal. Apr. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt. ut hiſtorica.

79. The Sea being now open, and all Impediments removed for bringing Proviſions to Rome, Honorius publiſhed a Conſtitution for the good Improvement of this Advantage; Corn and conſequently Bread being now cheaper, he commanded that one Loafe of that called Panis Oſtienſis (from Oſtia, the Port where the Corn was landed, and Store-houſes were made to receive it) and Panis Fiſcalis (from the Fiſcal Canon or Store, out of which it was made) ſhould be ſould but for one Nummus or a braſs Denarius; a thing of ſo ſmall value, that ſix thouſand of them made but one Solidus. But the Bread was but Courſe, though not of the very courſeſt ſort; however the Emperour commands that none dare to obtain a Reſcript for the increaſing the Price, impoſing a Fine of two pounds of Gold upon him that ſhall attempt it by petition. In like manner he “ charges Theodorus the Præfect, to whom this Conſtitution is directed, That a “ Mulct of five pounds of Gold be inflicted upon ſuch Knaves as ſhould impudently “ deſire, that Water ſhould be granted them for their Gardens, or other private “ uſes, out of that whereby the Mills were driven at Rome, and Proviſion made “ for the maintenance of the People; as alſo the ſame Fine to be impoſed upon the “ Præfectus Annonæ and his Officials, if they ſhould ſuffer it to be done. And in “ the laſt place, he wills, that in the ſame manner ſuch be puniſhed as ſhall uſurp the “ Right and Uſe of any Granaries or Cellars within Rome, or at the Port, belonging to the Company of Bakers, in order to publick ſervice. “ For all theſe things were

The Sea being now open, Honorius improves that opportunity for ſupply of Rome.

L. un. de pretio panis Oſtienſis, Cod. lib. 14. tit. 19. Dat. prid. Id. Apr. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

Improborum petitione, qui impudentius auſi ſunt poſtulare, &c. l. 4. de Canone frumentario urbis Romæ, Cod. Th. lib. 14. tit. 15. Abeſt. a Cod. Juſt.

Sect. I.

A. D. 398.

were in their hands and management for the making of Bread, as well the Mills as other Inſtruments. And thus much he ordained for their Encouragement. But whereas it was uſual for Judges, in way of puniſhment, to condemn Criminal Perſons to the ſervice and drudgery of the Bake-houſe; ſome perſons at this time (Eccleſiaſticks or others) out of a ſort of pity, made it their buſineſs to procure Reſcripts for fetching them thence, to the hindrance of ſo neceſſary a Service. Of this he takes notice alſo to Theodorus; And, upon his head that ſhould go about “ to obtain ſuch Warrants; as alſo, ſuch Judge and his Officers as ſhould approve “ of it, he ſets the like Fine of five pounds of Gold.

L. 20. de Piſtoribus, &c. Cod. Th. Dat. 7. Cal. Maii.

80. But with the Judges or Governors of Provinces he found great fault at the Cloſe of the Year; their Ambition being ſo great, that no Laws could put a ſtop unto it. We have heard how often they had been prohibited from making new Works, and raiſing new Structures, whereon to tranſmit their Names to Poſterity: yet they could not forbear, but ſome of them buſied themſelves ſo far therein at this time, that it drew forth from him another Edict, wherein he commands Theodorus, that, Without leave obtained from the Prince, none dare to do it: “ And as for the Ornaments of Cities conſiſting in Iron, Marble, and other Materi- “ als, that they remove them not from one place to another without the conſent of “ him their Præfect, under the penalty of three pounds of Gold; which Fine he al- “ ſo impoſeth upon any Corporation that ſhall not defend themſelves, but ſuffer “ their Town to be deprived of its Ornaments. But as for the publick Granaries “ and Stables, or Harbours for Cattel, if the Judges of Provinces will attend the “ building of them, he commends their induſtry therein. “ But thoſe were Works far below their conſideration; eſpecially their quality, not becoming the induſtry of ſuch Perſons as built noble and large Structures: and not only ſo, but had Statues of Braſs, Silver or Marble erected to their Memories. This was done by the Decuriones of ſome Cities, to flatter them; for ſuch intelligence Honorius received: and in this ſame Conſtitution commands Theodorus, That ſuch Judge as had re- “ ceived them without the Emperor's Approbation, be detected. For his puniſh- “ ment, he will have him forfeit fourfold of what he had got in that Dignity he had “ polluted, together with his extorted and preſumed Titles; and withall, incurr “ Infamy, or loſs of Reputation. In concluſion, he declares that they ſhall not fail “ of loſing their Fame alſo, who, out of flattery or fear, had done that which was “ unlawful. “

He curbs the pride of the Governors of Provinces.

L. 37. de Operib. publ. Cod. Th. & L. 13. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

L. 1. de Statuis, Cod. Juſt. lib. 1. tit. 24. Dat. 12. Cal. Jan.

Fl. Mallius Theodorus Conſul alone.

A. D. 399.

Fl. Mallio Theodoro, Conſ.

81. The Faſti and Monuments of the following Year, or the CCCXCIX. of our Lord, preſent us with the name of but one Conſul. This was Fl. Mallius Theodorus, a Perſon very eminent in thoſe days, as well for his great Learning, Eloquence and Excellency of his manners, as the greatneſs of his Quality and Fortune. Of this, St. Auguſtine gives large teſtimony; who might be thought to favour him as a Chriſtian, had not Claudian the Poet written a moſt elegant and learned Panegyrick upon the occaſion of this Conſulſhip; wherein he extraordinarily extols him for ſeveral things, and his Vertue in general. And with Vertue he begins, which he ſets forth with her excellent qualities. That ſhe is a price unto her ſelf, without any external Reward; being alone altogether ſecure, and unconcerned as to Fortune: That ſhe is not puffed up with Honour or Preferments, neither covets to be rendred famous by Applauſe of the Vulgar; being deſirous of no external aſſiſtance, nor ſtanding in any need of Praiſe; as abundantly ſatisfied with her own Riches, and being not to be moved by any Accidents; looking at a diſtance, and as from an high Tower, upon the Affairs of mortal Men. Yet is ſhe ſought after and courted by Honour, though unwilling; as appeared in the Conſul that was fetched from the Plough, and in him (Theodorus:) whom being intent upon the ſearch of the Myſteries of Nature and of the World, now Emerite, and removed from Judicature, the ſame Authority and Dignity did embrace, with an Addition of the Conſular Ornaments. To make this out in elegant words, he tells him how his firſt and ruder Years did indeed mold and faſhion him to ſuch a poſture as fitted him for the Curule life; and that the old Men, out of the admiration of his Prudence and Eloquence, though they be wont to deſpiſe Youth, gave place unto him. Now did he betake himſelf to the Forum, and there defended accuſed perſons (the cuſtome of the young Noble Men of Rome, to fit themſelves for great Employments) where the Bench was amazed at his Language. After this, part of Libya approved of his Adminiſtration of Juſtice; ſo that, it ſeems, he was made Proconſul, or Vicar of Africk; then was Macedonia and the Walls of Pella committed to his charge; which thereupon conceived as great joy, as when Philip their King fought his proſperous Battels, or when they heard the News of the Fall of Porus.

Claudian the Poet, his moſt elegant and learned Panegyrick upon that Subject.

De Conſulatu Fl. Mallii Theodori.

Ipſa quidem virtus pretium ſibi, ſolaque latè.

Fortunæ ſecura nitet nec faſcibus ullis Erigitur. &c.

Sets forth his Employments.

by which we may underſtand, that he was made Præfectus Prætorio of Illyricum. Now would not the Court any longer permit that the Cities ſhould have him all to themſelves; but reſolved to make him her own, that he might give forth Edicts to Nations, and to Petitioners, Anſwers. He tells him, the Oracles of the Emperor increaſed by his Eloquence; neither did ever Roman Majeſty ſpeak more gracefully, than by his mouth.

82. Hereby muſt be meant, that he was Quæſtor; whoſe work it was to compoſe Edicts and Anſwers, and to be the mouth of the Emperor to the people. But from this Employment, he was raiſed to be Comes Sacrarum Largitionum, as appears from what he ſings concerning Sacred Riches, Tributes and Gold, both of Mines and Rivers, being committed to his charge. And now, as a Mariner who had been uſed to the Oar, when having obtained ſufficient skill, is removed to be Pilot; to command the whole Veſſel, and give directions to all that are in it: So was he removed, to govern both the Spaniſh and German Ocean; and Brittain alſo, ſeparated from the reſt of the World; being obeyed by ſlow Arar, fierce Rhodanus, and rich Iberus: So that he obtained the Dignity of Præfectus Prætorio of Gall. Having run through all theſe Honours and Employments in one Age, in a ſwift courſe, and while as yet but a young Man; being arrived at the pitch of Glory, he now deſired eaſe and the ſhade: where he gave himſelf wholly to the ſtudy of all the parts of Philoſophy; which the Poet runs through in a learned, though Poetical ſtile. He tells him, that with Roman flowers he irradiated the obſcure Acts of the Greeks; having tranſlated, as he hints, the Dialogues of the School of Socrates, and the Works of other great Philoſophers. Now he thought himſelf fully at eaſe; having taken up his Station, and caſt Anchor, and fully pleaſed himſelf therein; and Books followed Books, which would live for Ages after his Deceaſe: When Juſtice out of Heaven beheld him loitering, and her Laws greatly wanting ſuch a Judge; which ſight not enduring, ſhe forſook her place amongſt the Stars, and came down to Liguria; where entring his Houſe, ſhe found him drawing the lines of a Celeſtial Sphere in duſt, as the Ancients were wont to practice their Mathematicks. With many good words and commendations ſhe ſet upon him to perſwade him, that the Glory of his time already paſſed, might not ſuffice; foraſmuch as no time ought to preſcribe how much, or how long, Mankind was to be taken care of; and Prudence is not contained in any bounds. She demands, if he think it more worth his while to dwell upon abſtruſe Notions? Whether the Precepts of his Plato more profitted Athens? or the Actions of him who deſtroyed the Eaſtern Fleets, carried the City in Boats, and delivered it from being burnt by the Mede? meaning Themiſtocles. She ſhewed how much Lycurgus profitted Sparta by his ſevere Ordinances; whereas the Doctrines of Pythagoras, and his Years of Silence, could give no relief to Tarentum.

——— Hiſpana tibi Germanaque Tethys. Paruit,& noſtro diducta Britannia mumdo. Diverſoque tuas coluerunt gurgite voces Lentus Arar, Rhodanuſque ferox, & dives Iberus, a v. 50:

His Studies and Retirement.

83. Telling him, that now Clemency and Piety, Peace and Fidelity, were with her ſelf reſolved to come and live in the Cities, ſhe deſires him to return with them; which he, not able to deny (as to Juſtice it was not juſt) though ſufficiently ſenſible of the Ruſt which through diſuſe he had contracted, ſhe delivers into his hands four Reins of Government. Of theſe, one belonged to Padus and Tyber of Italy, gliſtering with her thick ſet Towns; the other curbed the Libyans and Carthaginians; the third extended to the Illyrick World; and the laſt reſtrained Sardinia, Cirnon (or Corſica) and three ſquare Sicania (or Sicily) with the Coaſts of the Tyrrhenian and Ionian Seas. This ſhews that he was Præfectus Prætorio of Italy, to which Africk and the Iſlands were joyned; and of the Weſtern Illyricum. After this, the Poet falls into a great Commendation of him, for the goodneſs and juſtice of his Government; wherein he paints out the perfect Portraiture of a juſt Judge in all his Lineaments, and admires him for his Eloquence, and his Books written concerning The Original of the World, and the Parts or Faculties of the Soul; which, to our great loſs, have miſcarried; and wherein, he ſaith, he expreſſed his own manners and diſpoſition. After all this, he ſubjoyns, that the Emperor deferred not that Reward which was due to his Merits, and wherewith learned and good Men were wont to be adorned; but gave him that Habit which joyned the Court of Juſtice and the Palace, the Prince and his Nobles together, and made him his Succeſſor in the Conſulſhip; which he had now born the fourth time. At this Solemnity (as there was wont to be exhibited a Shew of the Circenſian Games) Urania, by whoſe Inſtructions he had made his Spheres, ſummoned in all the other Muſes to give their Aſſiſtance, in procuring what was wont to be ſeen in theſe Spectacula, after that, firſt, Helicon, and the other Rivers, had ſignified their joy; he, by pouring out a larger Stream, and they, by ſending forth plenty of Flowers. It's convenient

His returning again to the Management of State Affairs.

His Juſtice and Learning.

to take notice that he mentions in thoſe Shows, the running of Horſes, Wreſtlings, Stage-plays, Combatings with wild Beaſts, Mimicks, and all ſorts of Muſick and Voices; amongſt which, Organs moved by Water, Dancing upon Ropes, flying in the Air, and other Feats of Activity, Sights of Fire, and of Boats ſwimming on the Theatre. Barthius, one of thoſe Learned Men, who, by their Notes and Commentaries have explained this Poet, obſerves, that amongſt theſe, he makes no mention of the Gladiators, becauſe Conſtantine, he ſaith, had formerly taken them away. But he was miſtaken, Conſtantine indeed prohibited them in the Eaſt; but at Rome they were ſtill in faſhion, and not prohibited fully, till five years after by Honorius. Indeed all good Men were troubled they ſhould be continued: and the Chriſtian Biſhops made often great complaints of it; and this Theodorus being a conſcientious Chriſtian, the reaſon is rather thence to be fetched, why at his Shows they were not exhibited. His Virtues and Learning were ſo great as to move Claudian, though a Pagan, to write ſuch a Panegyrick, as in the opinion of the ſaid Barthius, is a moſt Learned, moſt Eloquent, and tantùm non, a Divine Book; pointing to a great part of the Myſteries of humane Wiſdom, which, if one would interpret, as it deſerves, it were neceſſary to ſearch into all the Archives and Treaſures both of Greece and Latium. Indeed, it deſerves the peruſal of all that are concerned in ſuch matters; and ſome reſpect to it, as well as to the Man, hath made us more tedious, than we intend to be hereafter upon any ſuch Concerns.

In the Shews he exhibited were no Gladiators.

84. But the Poet in his Exultation upon the promotion of Theodorus, applauds the Fate of Virtue, Wit, Induſtry and Deſert, that anſwerable Returns were made unto them; that the Curule Chair was not violated; that no filthy Names polluted the Faſti; that this Honour was granted to valiant Men, being ſuch as belonged to the Fathers alone, and would never bring any ſhame to Rome; whereby he ſeems to tax what was done this year by Arcadius in the Eaſt, and thoſe about him. For he that was deſigned there Conſul for this year was verily no other than Eutropius the Eunuch, who was far from pleading merit; was neither valiant, nor could be a Father, and therefore by him the Curule Chair was violated, the Regiſters polluted, and ſhame redounded, if not to Rome, to Conſtantinople; as the ſame Poet with elegancy ſufficient, ſets it forth in other Poems, he wrote againſt this vile Man. He obtained the Honour of Conſul, and further than that, of Patritian, or the Father of the Prince, which was no wonder, conſidering the power he was arrived at; it had been a greater wonder, had he continued in ſo extravagant a power. As his Ambition raiſed him, ſo it pulled him down, and gave him not much time to enjoy his Conſulſhip, but brought on ſpeedily his Deſtruction; of which, becauſe Gaines was the Procurer, we ſhall begin with the matters of that Traitor, where we left them, and ſhew out of Zoſimus how one Vermine, as frequently it happens, devoureth another.

Eutropius deſigned Conſul with him in the Eaſt.

Creſcite virtutes fæcundaque floreat ætas Ingeniis patuit campus certuſque merenti Stat favor. Non hic violata Curulis, Turpia non Latios inceſtant nomina faſtos, Fortibus hæc conceſſa viris, ſoliſque gerenda Patribus, & Romæ nunquam latura pudorem. a v. 261. ad v. 270.

85. Gaines wonderfully cried up the Atchievments of Tribigild to the Emperour, and affrighted ſorely the Senate and all the Courtiers, affirming he would march to the Helleſpont, and put in danger the preſent poſture of Affairs, if the Prince would not have a reſpect to his Propoſals. This he did cunningly, that Arcadius might not diſcover his intentions, and that by ſuch things as ſhould be granted to Tribigild, he might have greater advantage to put them in execution. For it did not ſo much grieve him, that he himſelf was, as he thought, deſpiſed; as it enraged him to ſee Eutropius now preferred to the higheſt pitch of Dignity and Power, having obtained to be Conſul, and to be honoured with the Title of Patritian. Theſe were the true motives to Gaines to attempt an alteration, and being now prepared for it, he reſolved in the firſt place to compaſs the death of Eutropius. While he yet lay in Phrygia, he ſent to the Emperour, to let him know, that by reaſon of the great Conduct and Experience of Tribigild, he was utterly at a loſs; that there was no withſtanding of him; but that Aſia muſt neceſſarily be loſt, except he would condeſcend to what he deſired, whereof this was the main, that Eutropius, as the grand Author of all miſchiefs, might be given up into his hands, to do with him as he ſhould think convenient. Hereupon Arcadius ſent for Eutropius, and abrogated his Power and Dignity, whereupon he ſpeedily betook himſelf to a Church of the Chriſtians, which from him had received the privilege of an Aſylum. But Gaines being very urgent, and ſaying, that Tribigild would not remit any thing of his Indignation, except Eutropius was made away, contrary to the Law which gives to Churches the Right of Sanctuaries, they took him thence by force, and baniſhed him into Cyprus, where he was kept by a ſtrict Guard. But ſtill Gaines being importunate and urging the Emperour to put him to death, at length, they that were next about him, eluding by a quirk that Oath they had Gaines thereat inraged, reſolves to compaſs his Death, and ſends to Arcadius to let him know that Tribigild could not be maſtered, if he was not given up into his hands.

Ἔχουσαν ἐξ ἐκείνου τὸ ἄσυλον.

Baronius male legit, quæ ab illo tempore jus Aſyli conſecuta retinet.

Sect. 1.

He is put to death, and how, according to Zoſimus.

given him, when they took him out of the Church,ſent for him back from Cyprus; and as if they had only ſworn, that they would not kill him while he remained at Conſtantinople, removed him to Chalcedon, and there cauſed him to be ſlain. Thus was Eutropius, after an unwonted manner, treated by fortune in both ſorts. For ſhe promoted him to an higher pitch than ever any Eunuch had attain'd; and then brought about his Deſtruction, for the hatred which thoſe that were Enemies to the Commonwealth ſaid they bore unto him. Thus Zoſimus.

How far his Relation is true.

L.3. de his qui ad Eccleſias confugiunt,Cod. Th.lib.9.tit.45.

86. The ſubſtance of this Story is true, but according to his manner, he fails in conſiderable Circumſtances. After his being depoſed from his Dignities, he did indeed betake himſelf to a Church, as to a Sanctuary; but the Church had no ſuch Right or Privilege of an Aſylum from him, who was ſo far from procuring this privilege to Churches, that the year before, he procured Arcadius to make a Law againſt it. The Church to which he fled, was that of John Chryſoſthom, now Biſhop of that See, who protected the miſerable Man as he lay embracing the Altar; and would not ſuffer him to be taken thence, till he had obtain'd an Oath from the Emperour, that he ſhould not be given up into the hands of Gaines to be put to death. Both Emperour, Soldiers and People ſufficiently now convinced of his extravagant courſes, were glad to be rid of him; but when Arcadius heard he had taken Sanctuary in the Church, he reſtrained himſelf and the Soldiers too, from medling with him. But the People, to which the Church was open, being more heady and unruly, and moved with an hatred to his perſon, was not ſo to be governed; but their golden-mouthed Biſhop was forced to mount the Pulpit, and charm them with his powerful Rhetorick. Some have charged him with impudence and unmanlyneſs in inſulting over a Man in miſery; but the Oration he made,is ſtill extant, and ſo may ſpeak for him and it ſelf.

John Chryſoſthom the Biſhop his Oration.

87. It begins indeed with an high upbraiding of him for his former courſe of life. If ever before, now may we ſay, Vanity of vanities, all is vanity. What's “ now become of the great pomp and ſplendour of the Conſulſhip? Where are “ now the illuſtrious Faſces? where are the Applauſes,Banquetings and Merriments? “ The noiſe of the City? Thoſe high Acclamations and Flatteries of the Spectators “ of the Circenſian Games? Thoſe Garlands and Muſick? All theſe are paſt and gone. “ A violent Tempeſt hath blown down the leaves, ſpoiled the Tree, ſo as it dangerouſly totters; and ſo great a ſtorm continues ſtill upon it, that having weak- “ ened ſorely its roots, it threatens to lay it along on the ground. Going on in this “ manner, he thence demonſtrates to his Auditors, that they ſhould all, in all pla “ ces, upon all occaſions, and at all times ſing this Song one to another, Vanity “ of vanities: that they ſhould write it on their Walls, in their Cloaths, in the “ Forum, in their Houſes, in the Ways, in their Windows and Doors, and eſpeci- “ ally in their Conſciences. He then demands of Eutropius, whether he did not “ tell him, that Power and Wealth were uncertain things: but he would not hear “ nor believe him; as neither when he told him, that he was a better Friend to him “ than all his Flatterers; that the wounds of a Friend were rather to be endured “ than the kiſſes of an Enemy; this he would not endure then to hear, but ſevere- “ ly checked him for his faithful admonition. Formerly he ranted againſt Church- “ es, and was all for the Theatres. Now the Theatres upon which he had ſpent his “ Treaſure, were earneſt to cut his Throat: and the Church and Church-men, “ whom he deſpiſed, were become his Safeguard and Protection. He adds, that “ this he ſaid, not to inſult over a proſtrate and miſerable man, but for the Inſtru- “ ction and ſecurity of others; not to make his wound bleed afreſh, but to keep o- “ thers invulnerable and in good health, by putting them in mind of the mutability “ of humane Affairs; which cannot be compared with any thing that can ſuffici- “ ently expreſs their inconſtancy, not Smoak, nor Hay, nor Dreams, nor the fine “ flouriſhing Flowers of the Spring. This ſufficiently appears,ſaith he,in this Man;for “ who than him,was more eminently dignified? Did not all Men fear and reverence “ him? but now he is become more wretched than thoſe in the Goal, more miſer- “ able than Slaves, and more neceſſitous than Beggars that ſtarve for hunger; ha- “ ving ever before his eyes, Swords ready brandiſhed againſt him; ſeeing nothing “ but Precipes and Executioners; and intent only on the way that leads to deſerved “ puniſhment, having no Friend that will own him in his extreme diſtreſs. What “ need words when your eyes convince you: for the Emperour having ſent his Of- “ ficers to bring him by force out of Sanctuary, what thing can be more pale than “ he? a dead Man hath as much colour in his Cheeks; his Teeth chatter in his Head; “ a trembling hath invaded his whole Body; his voice is interrupted with ſobbing, “ and he ſtammers in his ſpeech. In ſumm, he is in ſuch a plight and condi- “ tion, as when the Soul is altogether overcome with fear. “

88. This “

Sect. 1.

A. D 399.

88. This I ſay again, I ſpeak, not to upbraid him in his misfortune, or to inſult upon him in his miſery; but that I may ſoften your minds into Compaſſion, to ſtir you up to Commiſeration, and to perſwade you to be ſatisfied with his preſent Puniſhment: Becauſe, amongſt our people, there are many ſo inhumane, as to traduce us for receiving him; deſiring to ſoften the hardneſs of their hearts, I make ſuch a repreſentation of his miſeries. And, I beſeech you, what is that that ſo ſticks with you, that cannot be paſſed over? You will ſay, that he is now fled to a Church, who, without intermiſſion, was an Enemy to Churches. The more God is to be praiſed, who hath ſuffered him to be reduced to ſuch neceſſity, that he might perceive both the Power and the Clemency of the Church: its Power, in that ſuch an alteration is brought about in that Enmity that he exerciſed againſt it; and its Clemency, in that it covers and protects its Enemy, as with a Shield ſtretched over him; defends him with its Wings, and forgetting former injuries, opens its boſom to receive him. This is more glorious than any Trophy, more famous than Victory; this ſhames both Pagans and Jews. To oppoſe it ſelf againſt the anger of the Emperor, and the intollerable rage, fury and hatred of the People, is the Ornament of the Altar. You will ſay, an Ornament indeed to the Altar, to be embraced by a notoriouſly wicked, covetous and rapacious Man. But, take heed what you ſay; for an Harlot touched the feet of Chriſt, an inceſtuous and impure Woman; and yet this was no fault of his, but redounded to His great praiſe, and the admiration of him: His Purity was not concerned for her Impurity; but He purified her thereby. Neither muſt you talk of Injuries; we are the Servants of Him that was crucified for us: who ſaid, Forgive them, for they know not what they do. Indeed, as you may object, by written Laws he took away Refuge and Sanctuary from this place: But now he hath learnt by experience, what it was he did; And by his own deed, hath firſt abrogated his Law, being become the Spectacle of the whole World: and though he be ſilent, yet he ſufficiently inſtructs all others; and bids them beware by his Example. In this reſpect the Altar is become more illuſtrious, and obtains greater Veneration, in that it holds a chained Lyon: As the Emperor ſeems not ſo glorious when he ſits upon his Throne, clad in Purple, and adorned with his Diadem; as when Barbarians lie at his feet, and with their hands bound behind them. “

89. That I came not prepared to ſpeak theſe things, you, by your haſte and concourſe, ſufficiently witneſs. This indeed, you eſteem a brave ſight, and you account it a merry meeting; neither do I perceive the Aſſembly to be leſs than it was in the late Feaſt of Eaſter. You are ſo excited by the ſilence of this Man; which, at preſent, is more ſhrill than any Trumpet. Virgins have left their Cloſets; Women their Work-houſes; and there are no Men to be found in the Forum. You all come to behold, repreſented, the defects of Humane Natre; the momentary mutability of Worldly Affairs diſcovered, and the Luſture of States-men transformed; which yeſterday, and the day before, were very glorious. Such Proſperity as ariſeth from the Ruin and Oppreſſion of other Men, is now demonſtrated to be more deformed, than the Wrincles of an old Woman; an alteration of Affairs, like ſome Sponge, wiping away that Paint wherewith it was covered. Let ſuch as are rich come to this Show, and from it they ſhall receive great profit; ſeeing him, who lately made all the World ſhake with one nod, fallen from ſo high a pitch of greatneſs; ſhrunk ſo much with fear; more fearful now than any Frog or Hare; ſticking to a Pillar without binding; and, inſtead of a Chain, tyed by apprehenſion of danger, grieving and trembling; they will put down their loftineſs; and conſidering what ought to be conſidered in Humane Life, depart inſtructed in this point, according to what the Scriptures teach us; that All Fleſh is Graſs, and all the Glory of Man as the Flower of Hay: The Hay is withered, and the Flower hath faded. On the other ſide, if a poor Man come to be a Spectator; he will not be diſpleaſed with himſelf, nor deplore his own condition; but thank his Poverty, which is to him in ſtead of a Sanctuary, of a moſt calm and quiet Haven, and as a moſt fortified Caſtle: and all laid together, if he might have his wiſh, he will chuſe rather to be content with his preſent condition, than, having, for a while, enjoyed the Eſtates of all other Men, preſently fall into danger of his own life. “

90. Have I, then mollified your minds? Have I appeaſed your anger, and extinguiſhed your Inhumanity? Have I wrought in you any Commiſeration? I believe I have; as I gather from your Countenances and Tears. Seeing, then, the Soil of your hearts is turned into fat and fertile ground, proceed to bring forth fruit

Sect. 1. A. D. 399.

Fruit of Mercy, and the Blades of Commiſeration: and let us fall down on our “ knees to the Emperor; or rather, deprecate our moſt Cracious God, that he “ may ſoften his Rage; and vouchſafe to give him a tender heart, that we may ful- “ ly prevail with him. And, ſince the day that this Man fled hither, there is no “ little alteration: For, after the Emperor knew that he had here taken Sanctuary, “ the Soldiers flocking together, and in a rage againſt his Crimes, demanding him “ to be given up to Puniſhment, he made a long Speech to them, to mitigate their “ diſpleaſure; telling them, that they ſhould not altogether look at his Faults, but “ have ſome reſpect to his good Deeds withall, and conſider who it is that ſhould “ reward him for them; and if any thing hath happened through frailty, pardon “ that alſo. But they ſtill urged, and were unquiet; crying out, that he ought to “ be puniſhed for the injury he had done to his Majeſty; ſome ſentencing him to Ba- “ niſhment, and others condemning him to death, with ſhaking of their Spears (as “ uſually in a Tumult) at which he brake into tears: and ſtriking them with a ſence “ and reverence of the moſt holy Table, at length, with much ado, he appeaſed “ them. And let us, I pray now, contribute what we may toward ſo good a “ Work. For how can any of you be excuſed, if the Emperor, on his part, par- “ doning ſo great Offences, you, having no ſuch Provocation, ſtill perſiſt in your “ Rage. How can any of you, after this Aſſembly is diſſolved, either handle the “ Sacraments, or pray this Prayer, Forgive us our treſpaſſes, as we forgive them “ that treſpaſs againſt us. Perhaps he hath done you great miſchief or injury, and “ we ſhall not deny it: But this is not a time to judge, but to have mercy; not to “ require ſatisfaction, but to have pity and compaſſion; not to examine, but to for- “ give; not to vote or cenſure, but to abſolve. Let none of you then be angry and “ incenſed againſt this Man; but rather implore the Mercy of our merciful God, “ that his life may be ſaved, and that he may be delivered from this imminent dan- “ ger, for the correction of his manners. And let us joyntly become Petitioners “ to the Emperor, in behalf of the Church and the Altar, to deſire, that one Man “ may be freely granted to it: which, if we do obtain, we ſhall both do that which “ is acceptable to him; and God himſelf will approve of what we do, and reward “ us for it. To whom he makes, like a good Chriſtian, a ſolemn Addreſs upon this “ Account, and ſo concludes. “

His Eloquence failed not of Effect.

91. To this purpoſe ſpake the Biſhop; and his Eloquence failed not of its Succeſs, being duly regulated by the methods of Prudence. Had he gone about to excuſe him, he had the more enraged the multitude: but owning his fault, and laying open the ſadneſs of his condition, by diſcourſing Chriſtianly and politickly concerning the inconſtancy of all worldly Affairs, he accompliſhed what he deſigned. For, the Emperor, the Soldiers, and all the People remitted much of their former Indignation; and they were contented that he ſhould live, and feel the effects of the Sanctuary. But, whereas the Biſhop, in all his diſcourſe makes no mention of Gaines; but only of an Affront or Injury Eutropius put upon the Emperor, as a cauſe of his Calamity: We muſt tell another ſtory from Philoſtorgius, as Nicephorus from him; which being known in the City, and in every Man's mouth, it was more prudent in him to touch at it, than to diſcover the weakneſs of the State, by laying before the people the power of Gaines. The Eunuch, grown to ſuch an height as to make him uneaſie to all perſons, was now ſo beſotted with pride and folly, as to offer ſeveral Affronts to the Empreſs; imagining (poſſibly) he might be the more bold, becauſe ſhe had been preferred to that Dignity by his procurement. Amongſt other extravagancies, he threatned, that in a little time he would cauſe her to be taken out of the Palace, and ſent home. She, exceedingly enraged hereat, took up her two little Daughters (Pulcheria and Arcadia) in her Arms, and went to her Husband, crying, and bewailing her condition; and bidding him to look upon their Children, ſhe fell into a great paſſion of weeping, and otherwiſe behaved her ſelf as a Woman would do to move compaſſion. Arcadius was extreamly moved, and ſo far concerned for her and his Daughters, that he ſhewed himſelf an Emperor indeed; for he deprived Eutropius of his Wealth and Dignities, and baniſhed him into the Iſland of Cyprus. Not long after, being accuſed, that when he entred the Conſulſhip, he had made uſe of ſome Beaſts or Horſes, as ſaith Philoſtorgius, which the Emperor alone might uſe, though Nicephorus turns it into Ornaments; he was fetched thence, and brought to Pantychium; where he was heard and tryed before Aurelianus the Præfect, and other Illuſtrious Perſons: by whom being found guilty of hainous Crimes, he was put to death.

Lib. 11. c. 6.

Eutropius had affronted the Empreſs, according to Philoſtorgius.

92. What ever the particular was wherein he had injured or vexed the Emperor, an Act of State, or an Edict, paſſed for his Depoſing, Baniſhment and Forfeiture

Sect. 1.

A. D. 399.

of his Goods ; ſtill to be ſeen in Theodoſius his Code. Herein Arcadius ſignifies to Aurelianus; That he had confiſcated all the Eſtate of Eutropius, who of late was the “ Præpoſitus Sacri Cubiculi ; the Conſulſhip and the Splendor thereof being vindicated “ from naſty filth, from the Commemoration of his Name, and the dirtineſs “ of it ; ſo that all his Acts being reſcinded, all times to come may be ſilent concerning “ him ; and that, ſaith he, the blot and blemiſh of our preſent Age may not “ appear. Neither let him mourn, who by his Valour or his Wounds, propagates “ the Roman Borders, or defends them by the Equity of Law, that the Divine “ Reward of the Conſulſhip hath been defiled by the Contagion of a dirty Prodigy. “ Let Eutropius know, alſo, that he is ſpoiled of the Dignity of Patritian, and all other “ inferior Honours, which he hath polluted with the Wickedneſs of his Manners. “ We command that all Statues, Images ; as well of Braſs, as Marble ; as “ well painted, as wrought out of any ſubſtantial matter ; be utterly defaced, aboliſhed “ and removed out of all Cities, both private and common ; leſt the eyes of “ any be polluted by ſuch a Mark of this our Age. And let him, with a ſufficient “ Guard, be carried into the Iſland of Cyprus : to which your Highneſs may take “ notice he is baniſhed ; that being there carefully watched and kept cloſe, he may “ not, by his madneſs, confound all things. “ Such is the Edict, according to the Stile of this Age, which ſets Eutropius out as a filthy Monſter. To it Claudian ſeems to have reſpect in his Preface to his Second Book againſt this Eunuch ; when he ſaith, that his Madneſs fell by the Wound of a little Paper ; that the cruel Work of Mars was diſpatched by one Letter. And as it's little to be doubted but that he ſaw and peruſed the Edict : So his Poems againſt Eutropius are but an elegant Comment upon a harſh and rugged Text ; ſo lively are his Repreſentations of his Wickedneſs, and the diſgrace that redounded to the Empire, and the Conſulſhip, by his being preferred to ſo high a Dignity. All along he makes it no other than a Prodigy, or ſome Portentous thing, to have an Eunuch (an old Woman he terms him) to be ſeen in the Trabea, or Conſular Ornaments ; and inſiſts upon the polluting of the Faſti by his Name. In ſumm, he urges his Adminiſtration and Preferment as the Violation of all Order, Fitneſs and Decorum.

L. 17. de Pœnis, Cod. Th. Dat. 16. Cal. Febr. at apparet prope paſchale tempus confugium Eutropii ad eccleſiam contigiſſe, ut recte innuit Baronius.

An Edict for his Depoſing and Baniſhment.

Conciditexiguæ dementia vulnere chartæ. Confecit ſævum litera martis opus.

——trabeata per urbes Oſtentatur anus titulusque effeminat annum.

93. Eutropius was now gone, but not all the effects of his Male-Adminiſtration. Thoſe of his Creatures were grown to a ſtrange height ; and expecting Protection from him, they were very eaſie to grant it to their Inferiors, when their own intereſt and advantage provoked them to it. Several Laws had been formerly made againſt the receiving of Husband-men, and ſuch like, into the Patronage of the Great ones ; for the many Inconveniences that happened thereby, and defrauding, eſpecially, of the Treaſury. But, ſo ſawcy were they, as ſtill to proceed ; which conſtrained Arcadius, within leſs than four Months, to publiſh two ſevere Laws againſt this practice, which was moſt common in Egypt, of all other Countries. By the firſt of theſe he impoſeth a Fine of forty pounds of Gold upon any that “ ſhould continue thus to protect a Country-man, or his Ground, be he of what “ Quality or Condition ſoever ; whether a Magiſter Militum, a Comes (of the Eaſt, “ of Egypt, or of Iſauria) a Proconſul (as of Aſia) a Vicar (of Aſia, Pontica, or “ Thrace) Auguſtalis (Præfectus of Egypt) a Tribune or a Curialis ; by inſtancing of “ which ſeverally, he gives us a Notitia of the Dignities throughout the Præfectſhip “ of the Eaſt. But he, not only, increaſeth the penalty formerly impoſed, from “ twenty five, to forty pounds of Gold, upon him that receives any into his Patronage “ ; but impoſeth the double, or eighty, upon ſuch as ſeek for ſuch Patronage “ and Protection, to defraud the Treaſury of Tribute. “ This he injoyned to Eutychianus the Præfect ; but toward the latter end of February, and toward the end of May following, he was forced to renew his Commands to him ; whereby he ſignifies, that, To all former Laws againſt this Crime, he thought fit to add greater “ puniſhment : That if any ſhall be found to grant Protection to Husband-men, or “ ſuch Country-men as poſſeſſed their own Lands, he ſhould forfeit his Eſtate ; and “ ſuch Husband-men, their Grounds, as ſhall ſeek after ſuch Protections. “ But this miſchief not only tended to the impoveriſhing the Emperor, but to the ſtarving, alſo, of Conſtantinople. For, though there was a Body, or Company of the Navicularii, which of courſe, and at ſolemn times, brought Corn and Proviſions out of Egypt ; yet, upon occaſion, when any neceſſity urged, or the number of the Navicularii was found inſufficient, the Ships alſo of private Men were preſſed to the Service, for tranſporting of the Annona ; ſo as none could be excuſed. However, ſome endeavoured to excuſe themſelves, by wearing, as it were, the Liveries of ſome great Men ; and under their Name, and by their Intereſts, to protect their Veſſels. Arcadius, to give a ſtop to this Courſe, ſo diſadvantageous to the City, Arcadius prohibits great Men their protecting Husband-men.

L. 4. de Patrociniis vicorum, Cod. Th. lib. 11. tit. 24. Dat. 6. Id. Mart.

L. 5. ejuſd. tit. Dat. 8. Cal. Jun.

And Mariners in Egypt.

gave order to Eutychianus by another Law, which with the former, concerning Husbandmen made up one Conſtitution, that Proclamation ſhould be made thorough Egypt, that every one that went about ſo to excuſe Ships in their“ Names or by their Patronage from the publique ſervice, ſhould incur a mulct of“ twenty Pounds of Gold, and the owner of them forfeit their Veſſels if they ad-“ mitted of ſuch protection.“

L. 1. De Navibus non excuſandis Cod. Th. Lib. 13. tit. 7.

Unjuſt Accuſations now alſo reſtrained.

L. 12. De Pœnis Cod. Th. Dat. 8. Kal. Aug.

94. As formerly upon the Death of Rufinus and Confiſcating his Eſtate, followed an unjuſt proſecution of his Relations and Friends, which drew out an Edict from Arcadius for their juſt defence; ſo now the Informers being at worke, and ſeveral unjuſtly troubled about that they could not help, as to Eutropius; he directed another Law of the ſame Nature to Eutychianus, whereby he ordains that there the Puniſhment lie where the Fault is placed; that Kindred and known Familiars be protected from Calumny, being ſuch as their Society did not render Guilty of the Crime, for as much as neither Affinity nor Friendſhip are any Crimes in themſelves. He reſolves that Offences ſhall reach their Authors only, and Feare ſhall proceed no farther than the Offence, which he commands him to intimate to all the Judges. There might be more need for this Law, becauſe the Macedonians were wont to put to Death alſo the Kindred of thoſe that were condemned for Treaſon, which though not ordinarily practiſed amongſt the Romans, yet under cruel Princes, the Friends of thoſe that ſuffered upon that Account, were wont alſo to be Sacrificed to their fury; which Practice Arcadius by this conſtitution now obviates amongſt the Greeks and Aſiaticks; though by this Law he doth not repeale that ſevere one made by procurement of Eutropius, whereby the Sons of thoſe there made Traitors might be freed from the Pain contained in it; for amongſt Propinqui or Kindred, Sons are not to be reckoned, but Brothers Siſters and other Relations. As to Eutropius, Claudian makes mention of his Siſter; and as a Friend or Confident he ſpeaks of Leo, but eſpecially of Hoſius the next in place and Dignity to him in his greatneſs, Unlike in his firſt condition, Eutropius being a Pandor, often Sould; and he a Cook in Spain, but both Slaves, the Backs of them both having been torn with Laſhes, and altogether like in their Acts and Tricks to abuſe mankind. However by the Favour and Procurement it ſeems of his Brother Slave; he arrived at the Dignity of Comes Sacrarum Largitionum, and afterwards was promoted to be Magiſter Officiorum, The ſecond in place and Dignity to Eutropius.

Lib. 2. in Eutrop. ——Sed prima poteſtas Eutropium præfert Hoſio ſubnixa ſecundo Dulcior hic ſane Cunctis, prudenſq; movendi Juris, & admoto qui temperet omnia fumo Fervidus, accenſam ſed qui bene decoquat iram.

Conſidunt apices gemini ditionis Eoæ, Hic coquus hic leno, defoſſi verbere terga. Servitio non arte pares, hic ſæpius emptus. Alter ad Hiſpanos nutritus verna penates av. 346. adv. 354.

95. What became of Hoſius we further know not, but though he fell from his Honours, as is very probable, Arcadius took care for the advancing of others this Summer, to a greater degree of Eminency. There were, as we have ſhown before, two ſorts of Conſiſtorian Comites in the Court. The one was Illuſtrious, conſiſting of the great Officers, as the two Comites of the ſeveral Treaſuries; and the other but of the Degree of Spectabilis being Comites of the firſt Rank, but called Conſiſtoriani only, becauſe they were admitted into the Conſiſtory to be preſent at the Debates, and hear the Anſwers of the Emperors, without having the Priviledge of being Councellors, as the Illuſtrious Perſons were. At this time there were two of theſe for whom the Emperor had ſo much Kindneſs, by name Comaſius and Clearchus, that by an Edict ſent to Severinus the Prefect of Conſtantinople, he gave them and their Fellows the Priviledge of being equal in Dignity to Proconſulares, or thoſe that had been Proconſuls, ſo as to take place next them above all others. Their place therefore was to be, betwixt the Proconſulares and the Comites of the Eaſt or Egypt; and they injoyed other Immunities. As when they hired the Lands or Houſes belonging to the Domaine of the Prince, they were not obliged to find Sureties; they were excuſed from ſordid Imployments; from the finding of Souldiers and Horſes; from the Burthen of the Prætorſhip, and from the Metatus or Quarters. Towards the end of the Year, the Emperor received an account from Conſtantius his Comes Rei Privatæ, of many Idle Perſons that belonged to his Office, and what Retrenchment was fit to be made; and accordingly ordered by a Reſcript, that all ſuch being diſcarded as were uſeleſs, there“ ſhould be of theſe Palatines two hundred and twenty four of thoſe that they called“ Statuti or in Ordinary Attendance, and ſix hundred and ten Supernumeraries, to“ be diſpoſed into the ſeveral Scrinia. And he requires that none be admitted for“ the Future, till he have ſhown his Original, and then be approved by himſelf.“

The lower ſort of Conſiſtorians obtain new Honour.

Comaſii nos et Clearchi virorum Spectabilum dignitas admonuit &c.

L. un. de Comitibus Conſiſtorianis. Cod. Th. Lib. 6. tit. 12. & L. 1. Cod. Juſt. eod tit hinc interpolata. Dat. 7. Cal. Octobr.

The Officers belonging to the ſecond great Treaſuror retrenched.

L. 15. De Palatinis S. L. & R. P. Cod. Th. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

96. Honorius, who, as Claudian in ſeveral places hints, had during the War with Gildo, and ſtopping up the Sea, procured Corn and Proviſions out of Gall, now that all was clear, for rhe better ſupply of Rome betoook himſelf again to reinforce the ordinary courſe of ſupplying the City. He diſcovered two ſorts of Cheating practiſed in the Sale of the Lands belonging to the Navicularii and obnoxious

Sect. I.

A. D. 399.

noxious to that Burthen; wherefore one was that they were often bought with this condition, that the Seller, though unable, ſhould undergo the charge of the Function; and the other, that on the contrary the Purchaſer was often too poor to undertake the Charge. Now all ſuch Contracts betwixt ſuch Parties, by a conſtitution directed to Meſſala the Præfectus Prætorio he declared to be null, requiring“ a fit and ſufficient purchaſer in ſuch Alienations, or the Function to be“ required at his Hands who pretended to Sell, that ſo no damage might accrue“ to the publicke. And becauſe it was diſcovered that they had a trick of building“ their Veſſels too little, ſo that they were not capacious enough to bring over the whole quantity of Corn, he commands Meſſala that this Cheat be alſo for“ the time to come, prevented.“ He mentions not of what capacity a Veſſel was to be of; But ordinarily it was required that each ſhould be able to contain tenn Thouſand Modii a Modius being the third part of an Amphora. Proviſions being now plentiful in Rome and Italy, many Perſons might well thence be incouraged to frequent and inhabit the Countries thereabout. And now, at this time Honorius in another Edict, informs us that out of many Nations, People came into the Empire, following (as he too truly expreſſeth it) the Roman Felicity, to whom were granted Lands to Till and Inhabit, called Terræ Læticæ, from thoſe Strangers who, of what Nation or People ſoever they were, had the Name of Læti; as Læti Alamanni, Læti Franci, Læti Batavi. Lands being given them to Inhabit with certain Securities and Conditions; ſome of them were too Covetous, and got into their Hands a greater ſhare than belonged to them, as indeed they and theirs got all at laſt; ſome by Reſcripts ſurreptitiouſly procured, and ſome by Colluſion with the Principals or Defenſors. To redreſs this Inconvenience, he now ordered Meſſala to take care that none ſhould obtain any of theſe Lands without Warrant from himſelf, and that an inſpector ſhould be ſent to rectify what had been extravagantly done in this matter. But whereas the Emperor ſaith theſe Nations followed the Roman Felicity, the Event ſhortly after ſhewed, that whatever Felicity they ſought for, they brought none along with them; but, multiplying ſo much, and ſiding with their Countrymen that invaded, Ruine and Deſtruction to the Empire.

Honorius ſtill indeavours that Rome may not want Proviſions.

L. 8. De prædiis Naviculariorum. Cod. Th. & L. ult. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. 14. Cal. Mart.

L. 28. De Naviculariis Cod. Th.

Qaoniam ex multis Gentibus ſequentes Romanam fælicitatem, ſe ad noſtrum Imperium Contulerunt, quibus terræ Læticæ adminiſtrandæ ſunt. &c. L. 9. De Cenſitoribus Cod. Th. Dat. Non. Apr. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

Strangers reſtrained from indirectly getting Lands.

97. At this time heavy Complaints were brought of the High-ways being out of Repair, in Italy or other places belonging to the Prefectſhip of Meſſala; and it was alledged that this proceded from the Privileges granted to Illuſtrious Perſons, whereby they were excuſed from mending ſuch as lay next their Grounds, as alſo were the Houſes of the Prince or thoſe belonging to his Domaine. To“ remove ſuch Scandal as aroſe to his Government from thoſe Immenſe delays as“ he acknowledges them, Honorius now took off all ſuch Priviledges both from the“ great Men, and alſo from his own Houſes, yet confirming all other Immunities“ granted either to Illuſtrious Perſons or his own Patrimony.“ Till about the beginning of June he had his abode at Milan, but then removed, and for that and the two following Months he lay at Brixia, Padua and Altinum as appears by the Dates of other Laws. This Summer in his Progreſs he met with greivous Murmurings againſt the Judges, for their denying Juſtice, and eſpecially in refuſing to admit Appeals; and as this Greivance was too frequent in Italy, ſo rather more in Africke, where we find things much out of Order after the ſuppreſſion of Gildo, during whoſe Tyrannical Government, in that Countrey matters could not but be driven out of their wonted Courſes and Methods. Excited, as he ſaith, by the Complaints of many, by one Edict at the beginning of Jnne he ſignifies that all Perſons ſhall have free liberty to appeal from Sentences of injurious and ſuſpected Judges, inflicting either Pains of Death or Detriment of Fortunes, and impoſeth a Mulct of twenty Pounds of Gold upon ſuch Judge as ſhall refuſe to admit it; withal Fining his Office, or thoſe of his Court, in twenty five, if they did not pertinaciouſly, as he words it, Contradict what he did, and ſhow him what was Law. This Edict concerned the whole Diſtrict of the Præfectus Prætorio to whom it was directed. But ſix Days after“ he found reaſon to inforce it by another ſent to Simplicius the Preſident of the“ Province of Tripolis, increaſing the Fine both upon Judge and Officers to thirty“ Pounds of Gold; which ſhews how contumacious the Governors of that“ Country were in this concern.“ But whereas he is ſo ſevere againſt the Officers of the Court, it is to be known that they were perpetual, whereas the Judges themſelves were temporary, and therefore they had reaſon to know and underſtand the Forms and Methods of proceeding; as in all Courts, Actuaries and Regiſtres have.

Care taken for Highways ſcandalouſly gone to Decay.

L. 4. De Itinere muniendo Cod. Th. Lib. 15. tit. 2. Dat. 3 Cal. Maj. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

Againſt unjuſt Judges.

Multorum querelis excitati, hac lege ſancimus &c. L. 58. De Appelationib. Cod. Th. & L. 39. Cod. Juſt. eod tit. Dat. 7. Id. Jun.

L. 59. ejuſd. tit. Dat. prid. Id. Jun. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

The Provincialls of Africk vexed by the Saturiani and Subafrenſes.

98. The Provincials of Africk were further ſo unhappy at this time, that while they were oppreſſed by the Injuſtice of their Magiſtrates, they were harraſed from abroad by the continual Incurſions of thoſe Robbers called Saturiani and Subafrenſes. Theſe Saturiani we mentioned before, and the Depredations they made in Lybia; which they left not off, though repreſſed and forced to betake themſelves often to lurking Holes and Places of Retirement. With them now were joyned the Subafrenſes, poſſibly the ſame with the Mazices another People of Africk, next Neighbour to them, and joyning to the Roman Pale, which they conſpired to vex and harraſe with their frequent inroads; as the Saturiani a People lying betwixt Libya Syreniaca and thoſe properly called Afri, and by inverſion of the former Letters called Auſturiani or Auxuriani, were wont to do in the Days of Julian, Valentinian and Valens. So violent were their Attempts now, that Honorius was obliged to provide againſt them by Inſtructions given to Meſſala the Prefect; wherein having firſt declared that he had proſecuted, with his Arms, their Conſpiracy as far as was convenient; he obſerved, that to avoid the Danger of being taken and Puniſhed, they betook themſelves to ſeveral lurking Holes. Now to ſtop theſe Holes he reſolves that ſuch as harbour or conceal the Saturiani, ſhall forfeite the Grounds where they are Concealed, except immediately “ after the publiſhing of this Edict, they give them up to be proceeded againſt “ according to the Laws. In like manner ſhall he be puniſhed that gives any “ harbour to any of the Subafrenſes who had joyned themſelves with them in “ their Conſpiracy, or ſhall remove them out of the way; and in caſe ſuch Offender “ have no Eſtate to looſe, he ſhall forfeite his Life, as the Rule hath been, “ that he that hath no Money muſt ſuffer in his Body. He threatens ſuch as ſhall “ know of, but not diſcover ſuch a diſobedient Perſon and make known where “ the Robbers Lye. And becauſe thoſe Theives had ſeiſed and held in their own “ Power, certain Grounds and Territories, he commands that a diligent Inſpector “ be ſent down, to offer theſe waſted Grounds to the former Poſſeſſors, to be “ again cultivated and inhabited as formerly, if they will accept of them: if not, “ then to deliver them up to others, provided that the Tributes be ſecured. “

Such as receive them ordered to be proſecuted.

L. Un. de Saturianis & Subafrenſibus. Cod. Th. lib. 7. tit. 19. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

Qui non habet in ære luat in Corpore.

99. Whether it proceeded from the Pride and Injuſtice of Magiſtrates, or theſe frequent Robberies, or ſome other cauſe, but great were the Complaints now again of the Curiales running away and forſaking their Stations in this ſame Diſtrict of Meſſala. And now their Cuſtome was, to betake themſelves to ſome Imployment in ſome Foreign Province, where they might not be found out, thinking thereby to evade the uſual Burthens; but Honorius gives him orders to “ Cite them to come in, within a Year, which time he thinks it reaſonable to al- “ low; and if within that time they do not appear, then their Eſtates to be ſe- “ cured for the uſe of the Corporations. Others to avoid the Burthen which they thought appropiate to the ſoil, clandeſtinly ſold their Lands; but theſe furtive Contracts, he declares alſo Null, and will have the Buyer to forfeit what “ he Payes for the Purchaſe. “ But to give theſe men ſome ſort of Incouragement for their better ſupporting theſe Charges to which they were thus fixed, it was ſeaſonable withal to afford them ſome protection from the Inſolence of Governers of Provinces and the Officers of the Revenue, which in all times, notwithſtanding there were frequent Laws made againſt it, were wont to be ſevere upon them. To this purpoſe he gives in Charge to Meſſala by another Branch of this “ Conſtitution, that thoſe among them called Principales be not ſubjected to Exa- “ mination by Torture or the Plumbatæ, but be ſecured by their Merits and the “ Offices they have born, from ſuch Puniſhment; as the reſt of the Curiales be “ protected by their Innocence. And whereas the Provincial Judges had often no Conſcience in impoſing Mulcts and ſetling Fines upon the Heads of thoſe who were under their Juriſdiction, the Emperor reſolved to put a reſtraint upon them as to this matter.

Fugitive Curiales cited to return within a Year.

L. 161. De Decurionib. Cod. Th. Dat. 12. Cal. Septemb.

L. 8. De Contrahenda emptione. Cod. Th. lib. 3. tit. 1. & L. 17. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

Thoſe that ſtaied incouraged.

L. 6. De Queſtionibus. Cod. Th. lib. 9. tit. 35. & L. 17. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

L. ult. de modo mulctarum Cod. Juſt. lib. 1. tit. 54.

100. Honorius came little at Rome, and ſome have imagined, out of averſion to place or Perſons; but however he might perſonally ſtand affected to it, his Imperial Authority much exerted its Power in order to the Maintenance of its Inhabitants. Now again in Autumne it ſtood in need of his Aſſiſtance as to that particular, many Cheats having been diſcovered in withdrawing off that ſupply of Corn and Proviſions which were wont to be brought to the City. Some for their eaſe or advantage, that were to bring in one ſort of Species, would import another, as Oyl for Wheat, or Mony in lieu thereof, which might more eaſily be imbezilled and converted to other uſes than Corn it ſelf could. But they would procure the Reſcript of the Prince for ſo doing, which he now ſo deteſts that Honorius came not at Rome yet he was ever and anon providing for its Inhabitants.

A. D. 399

that he declares to Meſſala againſt this Practice, and makes ſuch Reſcripts null“ and invalid, as had already been procured; puniſhing thoſe that ſhould attempt“ any ſuch thing to the defrauding of the City, in the double value of the“ thing.“ But what hope was there that private Perſons ſhould be free from ſuch Faults, when the Officers and Magiſtrates themſelves were guilty of greater; who were now ſo bold as to make uſe of theſe Proviſions for their Families, and Rob the publique Granaries for ſupply of themſelves and their Officers? Againſt“ ſuch as had done it already, whether the Vicar or other Magiſtrates of Provinces,“ he ſhows himſelf ſo far incenſed, that he requires Fourfold from them,“ whereof half from the Judges and half from his Office; and if any ſuch Offence“ be diſcovered for the time to come, he Inflicts Deportation on the Magiſtrate,“ and no leſs then Death upon the Primates of their Offices.“ And as before in reference to the changing of Proviſions; ſo now he further declares in order to payment of Tributes or the Species Annonariæ uſually paid, that the“ obtaining of a Reſcript ſhall operate nothing againſt the Compulſors, that exacted“ the Payment contrary to the antient Uſe and Cuſtome of the Place.“ Diſcovering alſo how the Compulſors themſelves and Exactors, or thoſe that Exacted the Tributes, followed the Example of the Officers in Rome; he wrote to Apollodorus the Proconſul there, that although by the Law he might require Fourfold,“ yet if they would bring in the Annonæ Fiſcales or Cellarienſes, after the“ publication of his pleaſure, he would take no farther Advantage, if they did it“ within three Months; elſe they ſhould pay the double. And he requires under“ the ſame Penalty, the Officers of the ſame Judges to bring them in, that“ were Offenders; allowing them an Action againſt ſuch as fled.

L. 5. De Canone frumentario urbis Romæ Cod. Th. & L. 3. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. prid. Non. Septemb.

L. 6. Ejuſd. tit. Cod. Th. & L. ead. Cod. Juſt. Dat. 4. Cal. Octob.

As alſo for relief of the Provincials.

L. 15. De Exactionibus Cod. Th. lib. 11. tit. 7. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

L. 16. De Jure Fiſci. Cod. Th. Dat. 12. Cal. Sept. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt. ut hiſtorica & temporaria.

101. So many Complaints crouded in on all Hands, the diſorders of this Age Uſhering in the Ruine of the Empire, that Honorius might well be wearied with their number. Benignus at this time was Vicar of Rome, having formerly governed Sardinia, and ſent in to him an Account of miſdemeanors committed where he ws concerned. One was, that the Curiales forſook the Cities, and ſheltered themſelves in the Body of the very Centenarii or ſuch as dealt in Timber. He bids him fetch them thence with all convenient haſte, and taxes him and other“ Judges for their remiſneſs and troubling him upon all Occaſions. For, ſaith“ he, there being ſo many Laws in force againſt ſuch as receive or harbour“ Fugitives, it would be more fit for the Judges to put them in Execution, than“ to make relation of them to the Prince.“ Another thing, was of the great Robberies committed in the Province of Valeria and Picenum; for the prevention“ whereof, he prohibits the uſe of Horſes to all Herdſmen throughout theſe Countries;“ and if their Lords or their Procurators connive at their former Practice,“ he will have them puniſhed with no leſs than Baniſhment.“ This Province of Valeria not heard of, till about this time, took it's Name, it's probable, from the Via Valeria or the Way ſo called; as did Æmilia and Flaminia. It was under the Adminiſtration of the Vicar of Rome, as other Provinces were that were not of the Number of the Urbicarian, of which this could not be, as Gothofred concludes, becauſe when theſe Provinces were ſo named, the Province Valeria was no where to be found, except it was in Utopia. However Picenum and it, it ſeems, abounded in Robbers, and ſuch as kept Cattel were ſuſpected to drive that Trade, for which, Horſes were thought to be very Convenient. It may ſeem ſtrange to ſome in this Country, where we inhabit, why Horſes ſhould be thus prohibited to be uſed, they being ſo neceſſary an Help to humane Life, as here in England we daily experience. But though in this his Purgatory. this noble Beaſt be ſo unworthily treated, he finds more eaſe and reſpect in the Southern Countries, where uſually we ſee that Aſſes are bred up in great Numbers, which ordinarily bear the Burthens and do the druggery.

He is tired out with Complaints.

Commands Judges to put the Laws in Execution.

L. 162. De Decurionib. Cod. Th. Dat Cal. Decemb. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt. Executiones præſtare Judices Conveniat non referre.

Forbids the uſe of Horſes to Herdſmen in Valeria and Picenum.

L. Ult. Quibus equorum uſus &c. Cod. Th. lib. 9. tit. 30. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt. ut temporaria.

102. However this operated againſt that evil of Robbing, which it was deſigned to prevent, the Emperor at the latter end of the Year called ſome in Africk to account for ſome kind of Robbery that could not be prevented. During thoſe twelve Years, or that long time that Gildo domineered in Africk, he held in his Hands many Lands and Poſſeſſions, the Farmers of which truſting to and bearing themſelves high upon his greatneſs, would not pay thoſe Tributes which were due for them, and by his Power were born out in their Contumacy. But now their ſupport being gone, as juſt it was, the Emperor commands that whatever“ was behind ſhould be paid, and nothing abated, but for what they could“ ſhow diſcharges.“ The Law is directed to one Peregrinus by the Title of Comes, and Procurator Divinæ domus, or of the Emperors Patrimony, who at this time

L. 15. De. Bonis Proſcriptorum Cod. Th. Dat. Cal. Decemb. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

Perſons in Arreare during the uſurpation of Gildo, called to account.

UMI

Sect. 1.

A. D. 399.

amongſt other things in Africk relating thereunto, managed alſo the late Eſtate of Gildo, which great in it ſelf, and greater by acceſſion of Lands belonging to his Followers, became afterward, as we ſaid, ſo conſiderable as to have a Comes of its own, who had his Office to himſelf, his Procurators, Præpoſiti and Rationales through divers Provinces of that Dioceſs, even as had the Comes Rei Privatæ. But as Honorius by vindication of his Tributes from theſe Farmers juſtly provided for his Revenue; ſo for the leſſening of his Charge, as his Brother about this very time, he made a Retrenchment of the Attendants upon the two great Officers of his Receits. Many Perſons belonging to ſeveral Bodies, to the Curiæ, or Courts of Corporations, and to the Officers of the Governors of Provinces, had crept into the Number of theſe Palatine Attendants. He orders therefore Meſſala " to cauſe them to be drawn back to their ſeveral Charges, allowing to Longianus " the Comes Sacrarum Largitionum five Hundred and forty ſix; and to the Comes " Rei Privatæ three Hundred, his Office conſiſting but of four, whereas that " of the other had ten Scrinia belonging to him. Thoſe that were over and " above theſe Numbers, he commands to be inrolled, with their Names and Coun- " tries added, that ſo they may, with the more eaſe be known and demand- " ed back to their ſeveral Charges, if the Parties concerned can challenge them; " and the reſt taken for Supernumeraries to ſucceed if fit, into ſuch places as ſhall " happen to be void. Withal he inflicts a ſevere Puniſhment upon the Adjutors " of the Palatine Office; if they ſuffer any more to be admitted (as out of Cove- " tuouſneſs they were wont to do) even no leſs than Baniſhment and the Con- " fiſcation of their whole Eſtates; for their work it was to look to the " Regiſtres, or the Books of Entries. Such as are not fit for Imployment, he " commands with Paſſeports from the Judges, to be ſent forthwith into their " ſeveral Countries. "

Officers belonging to the two great Treaſurers retrenched.

L. 16. de Palatinis S.L. & R. P. Dat ad Meſſalam 10. Cal. Jan. & L. 17. ejuſd. tit. Dat ad Longianum Com. S. L. Ab ſunt a Cod. Th. inter ſe coaſſandæ et ſi ad diverſos Magiſtatus datæ pro ratione ſubrictæ materiæ.

Stilicho at length Conſul.

103. Being now arrived at the CCCC Year of our Lord, and inquiring for Conſuls, at length we finde one whom we have had cauſe long to look for; viz. Stilicho, the Comes and Magiſter Utriuſq; Militiæ, as the Inſcriptions of the Laws ſtile him, the Father in Law of Honorius, and the great Director of the Weſt. Why he ſhould not all this while have been adorned with the greateſt Dignity of which a Subject was capable, might well be the wonderment of all Perſons that conſidered the great Power he was in; and his great admirer, or Flatterer, Claudian, makes all the World aſtoniſhed at it, and ſo ſollicitous it ſhould be done, that he ingeniouſly, after his Poetick manner, makes ſeveral of the Provinces undertake a Journey to their Lady and Miſtreſs Rome, and with her expoſtulate, that their Expectations had been ſo long delayed. They all lay open to her his Merits. * Spain acknowledges he had done for her whatever ſhe had deſired, only envied her his own Honours. She complains that as he deſpiſed the Conſulſhip in the time of Theodoſius his (Adoptive) Father in Law, he now denies to accept it from his Son in Law Honorius. Yet wiſhes he would receive the Faſces, if not from the World as it's General, yet from the Court as it's Kinſman. For her part, whatever he thinks, ſhe judges it a matter of no ſmall concernment, that he had been ſo kind and faithful to her Iberian Offspring, or the Nephews of Theodoſius the elder; that the Purple was ſtill an Honour to the Spaniſh Nation; that he would make the Emperor fruitful by the Iſſue of his Daughter Mary (wherein the Prophet failed, for ſhe died childleſs) and gave hope that he ſhould be a Grandfather to future Princes. Thus ſpake Spain which he introduceth cloathed with golden Tagus and having her Haire tied up with the Leaves of Olives. The next he preſents is Gall with a Yellow Viſage and her Haire combed back behind her Ears, adorned with a comely Chain or Bracelet and carying two Gæſa (a ſort of Weapon uſed by the antient Galls) in her Hand, * She briskly demands why he, who alone had for her ſubdued the Germans and Francks, was not yet to be read of in the Conſular Faſti? how it came to paſs that that Book ſhould be ignorant of ſo great a Name, which ought to have been reiterated in it? And asks of her, if the Glory of quieting the Parts about the Rhine were ſo inconſiderable a thing? * The next to her that appears is our Britain, covered as he ſets her out, with the Skin of ſome Caledonian Monſter or ſtrange Beaſt, having her Cheeks painted with a Sword, and the Traine of her Robe of a Sea Colour, reſembling the Tide of the Ocean.

A wonderment why not before.

104. She declares how Stilicho had preſerved her when ſhe was about to periſh by the neighbouring Nations. When the Scot put all Jerne, or Ireland, into diſturbance, and the Sea fomed again with theſe Robbers. From his care ſaith ſhe it proceeds that I now ſtand in no fear of the Scotiſh Armies; that I tremble not at

 Cuncta mihi ſemper Stilicho quæcunq; popoſci Conceſſit tantumq; ſuos invidit honores.*

 Qui mihi Germanos Solus Francoſq; ſubegit Cur nondum legitur faſtis?*

 Inde Caledonio velata Britannia monſtro Ferro picta genas cujus veſtigia verrit Cærulus, Oceaniq; æſtum mentitur, amictus.*

Me quoq; viciniis pereuntem gentibus inquit Munivit Stilicho, totam cum Scotus Iernen Movit & infeſto ſpumavit remige Tethys. Illius effectum curis ne te la timerem Scotica, ne Pictum tremerem, ne littore toto Proſpicerem dubiis venturum Saxona ventis. vide Claud. in pr. Conſ. Stilichonis a v. 228. ad v. 269.

at the thought of a Pict; and not any more, upon Sea Sands, behold the Saxon approaching me with doubtful, or uncertain winds. The next is Africk, appearing with her Hair ſtately dreſſed with Ears of Corn and Ivory. She hoped, that Gildo being once killed, there could have been noe delay uſed as to the Conſulſhip: this ſhe adds. Doth he now alſo refuſe, and ſticks he at joyning the Faſces with ſo great a Triumph? He, who has made me forget the dreadful name of the Moors? Laſt of all, Italy pouring out Wine from a large Branch, and bearing Vines circled about with Ivy, makes this demand, that, if all they were inflamed with a deſire that Stilicho ſhould be Conſul, they that could only be pleaſed with the fame thereof, than with how much ardour had ſhe reaſon to be incited to enjoy his preſence it ſelf, to bring him to mount the Tribunal, and to open a new and lucky year. The effect of their ſpeeches was, you muſt think, that they prevailed with Rome to go her ſelf unto him, and for them all to perſwade him to accept of the Ornaments. Her Arguments to induce him, were, that there was now no fear of the North; and that the Southern Climate was in great ſilence and repoſe; that the Moor was fallen; Germany had yielded; and a general peace (in the Weſt) had faſt ſhut up Janus; and ſhe deſires him to tell her, whether he thought her not worthy of ſuch a Conſul; or eſteemed that Title mean and low, wherewith the very Emperours thought themſelves to be graced? She confeſſes, that by a Prodigy lately riſen in the Eaſtern Parts, meaning the Conſulſhip of Eutropius, he might be ſomething affrighted; but the rumour thereof, by his good conduct, ſcarcely ever arrived at her ears, and was unknown to Italy; but if diſgrace thence did ariſe to the Faſces, ſhe preſſeth it as more needful, that he by accepting the Title ſhould obliterate the diſgrace, and reſtore it to its wonted Honour; which he, and none but he could do.

Quænam cauſa moræ? quo me cunctabere curſus Ingenio? nullus Boreæ metus omnis & Auſtri Ora ſilet, cecidit Maurus, Germania ceſſit. Et Janum pax alta ligat. a. v. 284.

——Nullo ſarciri Conſule damnum Excepto Stilichone poteſt, benè præſcia tempus Mens tua diſtulerat, titulo tunc creſcere poſſes, Nunc per te titulus, Conſul ſuccurre gravatis Conſulibus.

—Inſtituit ſublimem Brutus honorem, Aſſeruit Stilicho. plus eſt ſervaſſe repertum Quam quæſiſſe novum. Vide a. v. 315. ad v. 327.

105. No doubt ſhe prevailed: But by this Poetical Flattery we are ſufficiently informed, that Stilicho all this while had refuſed the Conſulſhip, which he might eaſily have attain'd, and that now his modeſty being overcom, he pretended to accept of it, becauſe all places under his care were in quiet and repoſe. Hereby he might be thought to have been ſo generouſly modeſt, as having the care of the Provinces upon him, to have been averſe to this Honour, while they laboured under Calamities, to have ſympathized with them, and not to have added the Conſular Triumph, but to a complete and univerſal Victory, which the Poet inſinuates to have happened at this time. But to leave him a little at Rome (whither he went to take Ornaments) exceedingly admired, and careſſed by the Senate and People in all reſpects wherein they could ſhew their zeal; at Conſtantinople we find Aurelianus joyned with him in the Conſulſhip. And what ever repoſe and quiet the Weſtern Empire was in at the preſent, to be ſure matters went far otherwiſe in the Eaſt, by means of Gaines and his Goths. For he who now appeared to all Men to deſign Innovations, yet thought he was not diſcovered, and having Tribigild at his diſpoſal, which his power and authority effected for him, he made peace with the Emperour in his name; and faith being given and received on both ſides, he returned by the way of Phrygia and Lydia. Tribigild followed him at his back, leading his Men through the upper Lydia, ſo as he never came in view of Sardis, the Metropolis of the Country. But afterwards they joynod at Thyatira; and then Tribigild repented, that he had not deſtroyed Sardis, a City which being deſtitute of all defence, might moſt eaſily be taken: he reſolved then with Gaines to go back, and to become Maſter of it; and this deſign they had executed, but that ſo great Rains had lately fallen, that great innundations happened, and the Rivers were ſo ſwoln and troubleſome, that it hindered their Expedition. Hereupon they parted aſunder, Gaines taking his way for Bithynia, and Tribigild toward the Helleſpont; and what ever was in their way they yielded up to be rifled by the Barbarians. The one being come as far as Chalcedon, and the other ſeiſing upon the Country near Lampſacus; Conſtantinople, and not it alone, but the Roman Empire, ſeemed to be in manifeſt danger. Gaines was now become ſo inſolent, that he required that the Emperour himſelf ſhould give him a meeting, refuſing of a Treaty with any elſe.

Aurelianus joyned in the Conſulſhip with him.

A. D. 400. Stilichone & Aureliano Coſſ.

Zoſimus, lib. 5. p. 794.

Gaines and Tribigild both waſte the Provinces.

106. Arcadius did not refuſe him, and they met in a place before Chalcedon, ſacred to the memory of Euphemia, the Chriſtian Martyr, where it was agreed, that Gaines and Tribigild ſhould paſs out of Aſia into Europe, and that the moſt eminent Men that were in the State ſhould be given up into their Hands to be put to death. Theſe were Aurelianus, the Conſul of this Year, Saturninus, a Man of Conſular Dignity, and John, who was Secretary unto the Emperour, and as our Writer tells you, as moſt reported, was the true Father of his Son. To this tyrannical

After a ſawcy Conference had with the Emperour.

Gaines comes to Conſtantinople.

Which he endeavours to take by force.

rannical Demand Arcadius aſſented, and they were accordingly delivered up into his Hands, whom, having received, he cauſed the Sword only to touch their Skins, and ſatisfied himſelf with driving them into Baniſhment. And he paſſed over into Europe, and commanding Tribigild to follow him, left Aſia, to take a little Breath. He himſelf making his Abode at Conſtantinople, diſperſed thence the Soldiers that formerly lay in Garriſon; ſo that he left the City naked, even of the Palatine Guards. His Followers, the Barbarians, he had ordered, that when they ſaw the City clear of them, they ſhould upon a ſignal given, ſeiſe upon it, and deliver all in it into his power; whereupon he left the Town, pretending he was unhealthy, and that he muſt betake himſelf into a place and condition free from care and trouble; and leaving there his Soldiers, he removed about forty Furlongs from the City, whence he expected to hear of ſome Commotions very ſhortly, that he might invade it. Neither had his Deſign failed him, but that driven headlong by a barbarous fury, he anticipated his time. Without any ſignal given, he brought his Men to the Walls; at the ſight whereof the Watch being affrighted, gave notice to the Inhabitants, and ſuch Lamentations and Tumults followed as are wont to be in ſtormed Towns, till they united themſelves, and joyntly ſet upon the Barbarians that were in the City; whom having diſpatched with Swords and Stones, and any thing elſe that came to hands, they retired to the Walls, and thence with ſuch miſſile Weapons as they had, ſo diſtreſſed Gaines and his Men, as to hinder them from breaking into the City.

Fruſtrated of that, and of ſpoiling Thrace, he reſolves to return into Aſia.

Fraintus made General againſt him.

107. The City being, after this manner, ſecured, the Inhabitants intercepted more than ſeven thouſand of the Barbarians, who return'd to a Church of the Chriſtians, not far from the Palace, as to a Sanctuary; but there the Emperour commanded them to be put to death, thinking it not fit they ſhould eſcape the puniſhment they had deſerved, by any privilege thereof. Such order he gave, but none there was that durſt adventure to fall upon them, or draw them out, fearing they would make head againſt them, and defend themſelves. Thereupon it was reſolved, that the Roof which lay above the Altar ſhould be uncovered, that the Soldiers might thence caſt fire down upon them; and deſtroy them by that means; and by that means they did indeed deſtroy them, but to ſuch as were zealous Chriſtians, a great piacular crime ſeemed to be perpetrated in the midſt of the City. However, Gaines being defeated in his purpoſe, now raiſed open War againſt the State; and falling down into the Country of Thrace, found the Towns both fenced with Walls, and defended by the Magiſtrates and Inhabitants, who being ſufficiently taught experience by former incurſions, had put themſelves into a poſture; and now made Sallies out againſt him, having firſt got all things that were of any value within their Walls, whether Fruits, Cattel, or other ſorts of Proviſions; ſo that finding there nothing but Graſs, he reſolved to leave Thrace, to march into the Cherroneſus, and through the Straits of the Helleſpont to return into Aſia. While he was in hand with his fruſtrated deſigns, the Emperour and Senate made choice of one Fraintus to manage the War againſt him, a Barbarian alſo by birth, but in other reſpects a Greek; not only in his Diſpoſition and Manners, but alſo in his Choice, Affections and Religion. To him, who was already famous for many Commands, and had freed all the Eaſt as far as from Cilicia to Phænice and Paleſtine, from Thieves and Robbers, they committed the Army; which having received, he oppoſed himſelf to Gaines to hinder his paſſage over into Aſia.

108. Gaines perceiving he was matcht, exerciſed his Men, and prepared them for a Battel, and Fraintus in the mean time was not idle; but reſtoring the ancient Diſcipline of the Camp, ſo inured his Soldiers to labour and diligence, that they were vexed that the Enemy deferred the Engagement. Their General neither omitted, by night nor by day, to view and obſerve his own Troops, and diſcover as much as he could of the Enemies condition, and he was not negligent as to matters relating to the Fleet. For he had a number of Ships ſufficient for a Fight by Sea, conſiſting of theſe they called Liburnæ (or Pinnaces) from a certain Town in Italy, where thoſe of that faſhion were firſt built. Theſe Veſſels were full as ſwift as the Gallies of fifty Oars, but not to be compared with Triremes. But Gaines, having broken through the long Wall, placed his Barbarians upon the Shore of Thrace; which is higher than the reſt, and confronts theſe places that from Parius, extend themſelves to Lampſacus as far as Abydus, where the Sea is contracted within the Straits. The Roman General paſſing with his Ships to and fro about theſe places both night and day, obſerved the Motions of the Barbarians. But Gaines being diſtreſſed for want of Forage, was impatient of any farther ſtay, and cutting down Wood in the Cherroneſus, fitted the Planks ſo accurately compacted together, that they were in condition to tranſport both Men and Horſe, which he put aboard theſe Veſſels, and at a convenient time committed them to the water; for they could neither bear any Oars, nor admit of the skill and induſtry of Pilots, being framed tumultuouſly, and after a barbarous manner. However, Gaines beheld them from the Strand, and imagined the Romans would not be able now to grapple with him, of which their General was no whit ignorant; yet conjecturing what his device would come to, commanded his Ships to put off a little from the Shore. But when he beheld the Veſſels of the Barbarians carried down by the Stream, he ſet upon the firſt that came in order, and falling foul on her with the Beak of his Pinnace, which was covered and armed with Braſs, after having plyed with Darts thoſe that ſhe carried, eaſily ſunk her; which his Fellows beholding, imitated their Captain; ſo that ſuch as took the Sea, being ſwallowed up of the Waves, ſcarcely any of them eſcaped with his life. Gaines ſorely diſtreſſed with his heavy loſs of ſo many Men, and not knowing what courſe to take, removed out of the Cherroneſus, and paſſed farther into Thrace. Fraiutus thought not fit to purſue him at this time, but kept his Army where he then was, contenting himſelf with the Victory that Fortune had given him.

Who defeats him at Sea.

Gaines reſolves to return into his own Country.

But is killed by the Huns, according to Zoſimus.

109. Fraiutus was hereupon accuſed, that he did not proſecute his Enemy as he might have done, but ſuffered both him and the Barbarians that were with him to eſcape, being his Countrymen, and deſcended with him from the ſame Original. Hereupon he went to Court, and what was his defence? Zoſimus tells you no more than this, that thither he went, as not conſcious of any ſuch crime, but carried himſelf high, and as one that had obtain'd ſo great a Victory, which he openly aſcribed to thoſe Gods which he worſhiped. For he was not aſhamed to confeſs in the hearing of the Emperour, that he worſhiped and ſerved the Gods, according to the cuſtom of his Country, and could not perſwade himſelf in this point to follow the opinion of the vulgar. The Emperour however received him, and deſigned him Conſul for the following year. As for Gaines, he having loſt a great part of his Army, as was ſaid, haſted with the remainder unto Iſter, and finding Thrace to be depopulated by former Irruptions, whatever he could meet with remaining, he made prey of it. But fearing he might be purſued by ſome other Roman Army, which might eaſily overpower that ſmall Force of Barbarians that was left unto him, and ſuſpecting ſuch Romans as followed him (for of theſe ſome there were) he cauſed them all to be maſſacred, when they ſuſpected no ſuch thing; and with his Countrymen paſſed the Iſter with purpoſe to return to his own Abode, and there to paſs the remainder of his life. But while he thought of it, and was about ſo to do, Uldes (or Huldin) at that time Prince of the Huns, thinking it not ſafe to permit him, having an Army of his own Country Men, to take up and fix upon any Territory beyond that River, and judging he ſhould do a thing very acceptable to the Roman Emperour, if he drave him thence; prepared himſelf to give him Battel, and gathering together his Forces, ſet them in order againſt his Army. Gaines conſidering that he could not now return to the Romans, nor by any other courſe eſcape the violence which Uldes was reſolved to offer to him, went and gave Battel to the Huns. And they had ſeveral Conflicts, the Soldiers of Gaines valiantly demeaning themſelves; but at length, after a great ſlaughter of many others, though he fought with great courage and reſolution, he himſelf was alſo ſlain. Uldes the Prince of the Huns ſent his Head to Arcadius, and for ſo doing, was both courted by Preſents, and received into a League and Society with the Romans.

The Narration of Zoſimus to be ſupplied and corrected by other Writers.

110. Such is the account Zoſimus gives us of this Affair, which is true, as to the Subſtance; but the Circumſtances thereof, as of all his other Relations, are either defective, or big of the prejudice wherewith he was acted, and hurried from that grave indifference and temper, which ought to be in all Hiſtorians. If John at this time when he was delivered up into the Hands of Gaines, was generally thought the Father of Arcadius his Son, the People muſt have been good Prophets that could tell he would have a Son ſo long before; for he was not born till the next year, in the Month of April. That John and his two Companions generouſly offered themſelves to become a Sacrifice for their Country, and divert the fury of that bloody Barbarian, is atteſted by other Writers, and ſome other paſſages are related to have happened at Conſtantinople, during the Abode of Gaines there. The Man was a Chriſtian, but an Arian in his opinion; and for himſelf and ſuch like, he deſired of the Emperour that a Church might be aſſigned in the City. The Emperour taking time to adviſe, made the thing known to John Chryſoſtom, the Biſhop, Theodorit. lib. 5. c. 32.

Biſhop, and uſed theſe arguments to move him to conſent that he might have a Church; that he was very powerful, and aimed at the Soveraignty, and there was a kind of neceſſity of pleaſing his fierce and barbarous humour. The Biſhop ſaid it was not fit to admit Blaſphemers to the liberty of prophaning a Church where the Son of God was worſhiped, deſired him not to be afraid of Gaines, but to call them two together, and let them debate the matter in his preſence; for he hoped to pacifie him, and to perſwade him not demand that which ought not to be granted. The next day he got them together, and Gaines began to move Arcadius to the performance of his promiſe: John told him the Church was open, and if he pleaſed, he might therein do his Devotions. He replied, that he was of another Sect; and deſired, that he might have another Church alone to himſelf, and thoſe of his own opinion; urging, that he had well deſerved it by his manly Services, performed for the Romans in the Field. The Biſhop told him plainly, that his Rewards already exceeded his Merits; for he had the Honour of being a General, and enjoyed the Conſular Dignity: That he ought as well to conſider what he had formerly been, as what he was at preſent; to reflect upon his former Poverty, and compare it with his preſent Abundance; and the Cloaths he formerly had worn, with the habit which now he uſed. He perſwaded him well to weigh theſe things in his mind, and not be ingrateful towards them that had ſo preferred him. With theſe and other words his Mouth was ſtopped, and he had no more to ſay.

John Chryſoſtom the Biſhop, plainly tells Gaines, his Reward exceeded his Merit.

111. For others write, that he upbraided him with the Breach of his Oath made to the Emperour's Father, whereby he engaged to be true to the Roman Intereſt, to him, and his Sons; and to be obedient to the Laws, which now he went about to break. He ſhewed him, that an Edict had been made by Theodoſius, whereby Schiſmaticks were prohibited to hold any Meetings within the City: and he uſed many perſwaſions to Arcadius, to maintain what his Father therein had done. But however this ſtopped his mouth for the preſent, and the Biſhop got the better as to the Church; Gaines conſulted how to break his Oath, and deſtroy the City: at what time a Comet of a great Magnitude appeared over it, and ſeemed to predict the danger it was in, by its unuſual Magnitude, ſtreaming forth almoſt to the ground, and making ſuch a terrible ſight as formerly was thought not to have been ſeen. He firſt attempted to ſeiſe upon the Wealth of the Bankers, and thence raiſe a great Sum of Money; but his Deſign was ſome way diſcovered; and they hid their Gold, and no longer expoſed it to view upon their Tables: whereupon he ſent a Party of Barbarians by night to fire the Palace. They, when they came thither, were ſtruck with ſuch a fear, that they returned without any performance, affirming they had ſeen a vaſt number of armed Men, terrible to behold, for the vaſtneſs of their Bodies, and they concluded it was an Army verily brought into the City. But he knowing there was no ſuch Army to be come by, gave them no credit; and the next night after ſent others, who relating the ſame thing, he went himſelf, and was a Spectator of the ſight; at which he concluded, that there was indeed a number of Men which guarded the Court in the night time, and in the day concealed themſelves. He counterfeited himſelf to be vexed by a Spirit, and as intending therein to pray, ſeiſed on a Church built by the late Theodoſius to the Honour of John Baptiſt, in the Hebdomus, ſeven Miles from the City. Of the Barbarians, ſome continued in Conſtantinople, others went out with him, and privily conveyed out their Weapons in Waggons wont to be uſed by Women, which, when the Watch diſcovered, they endeavoured to hinder; but the Barbarians fell on them, and put them to the Sword. Immediately the whole City was in an uproar, death ſeeming now to ſtand at every Man's Door; yet it continued ſafe, the Gates being once ſhut, and well fortified. The Emperour in the nick of time proclaimed Gaines Traitor, and commanded, that the Barbarians which were left within the Walls ſhould be ſlain. The Soldiers accordingly fell to work with them, aud killed moſt; and they burnt the Church of the Goths, wherein they that were aſſembled periſhed by fire, the Gates being ſo faſt ſhut upon them, that they had no way to eſcape.

Sozomen lib. 8. c. 4.

And hinders his having a Church for him and his Arians.

He attempts to ſeiſe on Conſtantinople in vain.

112. Gaines hearing that his Complices, he had left behind him in the City, were put to the Sword; and perceiving, that his treacherous Deſign was come to nothing, left his hypocritical Prayers, and got him to the Coaſts of Thrace, where he filled the Country with Fire and Slaughters. One writes now, that Chryſoſtom, the Biſhop, was prevailed with to go and perſwade him to deſiſt from theſe bloody courſes; and how Gaines met him at a good diſtance, notwithſtanding their former diſagreement, kiſſed his hands, and made his Children embrace his Knees; but Theodoret. l. 5. c. 33.

but what became of this Meſſage, he ſaith not. Whether he was ſent at this very time or not, it is evident enough, that he took ſome Journey to procure, if he could, the relief of the oppreſſed, and poſſibly the releaſe of Aurelian, the Conſul, and Saturninus from Baniſhment; for ſo much he expreſſeth himſelf in a certain Homily, the Title whereof is, The Homily of S. John Chryſoſtom, when Saturninus and Aurelianus were driven into exile, and Gaines had left the City. Therein he tells his Auditory, That he had been ſilent a long time, but not through idleneſs, or any fault of his own; but he had been abroad, compoſing Tumults, and laying ſuch Storms as had riſen; and endeavouring to bring into the Haven ſuch as were cruelly toſſed, and endangered by Tempeſts. This being done, he was now returned to them who continued in ſafe harbour, or ran their courſe in great tranquility. To them he went to lay the Storm; and he was now return'd, that they at home might have no ſuch Tempeſt ariſe. “ However, Gaines being come into the Cherroneſus, as Socrates writes, reſolved to paſs thence over to Lampſacus, to reduce the Eaſtern Parts under his power. But the Emperour having ſent away Forces to oppoſe him both by Sea and by Land, a miraculous thing happened by God's providence. For, the Barbarians, wanting Ships, made uſe of Boats they made for the purpoſe; and in them they attempted to paſs over, juſt as the Roman Fleet happened to come by. The wind blew very hard, and the Romans eaſily paſſed over; but the greateſt part of the Barbarians was drowned, together with their Horſes, being grievouſly diſtreſſed by the Tempeſt; and ſome of the Romans alſo, miſcarried. As for Gaines, he took another courſe through Thrace, and falling amongſt other Forces of the Romans, periſhed with thoſe Barbarians that were with him. Theſe things Socrates having related, refers us to certain Authors, which I wiſh it were as eaſie now to find, as it was to him to mention. He bids us, if we would know accurately the Hiſtory of this War, to read the Poem called Gainas of Euſebius Scholaſticus; who at the ſame time was the Scholar of Troilus, the Shophiſt; and being an eye-witneſs, deſcribed it in four Books, written in Heroick Verſe: a Poem which was in great eſteem, the matter being ſo freſh in memory. After him Ammonius the Poet treated of the ſame Argument in Verſe; and in the eleventh Conſulſhip of Theodoſius junior, which he bore together with Fauſtus, recited it in the preſence of the Emperour, with great applauſe.

Lib.6.c.5.

Books written of this are now loſt.

113. But ſuch is the account we have of this matter from ſuch Writers, as the injury of time hath left unto us. To be ſure, ſo great a Diſturbance there was this year at Conſtantinople, and in the Eaſt, that we find but two Conſtitutions of Arcadius directed to his Officers, whereof the one was at the beginning, and the other at the end of it. The former was a Reſcript directed to Æmilianus the Magiſter Officiorum, who had moved him in behalf of the Fabricenſes, or them that forged Arms at Antioch. He tells him, that following his ſuggeſtion, he “ had commanded that all trouble ſhould be removed from their Houſes; that he had written his Sacred Letters concerning this matter to the Illuſtrious, the Comes, and Magiſter Militum through the Eaſt; that the Houſes of the Fabricenſes of Antioch ſhould be excuſed from lodging any perſons, except he and his Court happened to be there, and not only theirs, but ſuch as belonged to the Forges of the other Cities, by which we are to underſtand thoſe of Damaſcus in Phœnicia, of Ædeſſa in Oſroena, and of Irenopolis in Cilicia, which the Notitia Imperii ſets under the Diſpoſition of the Magiſter Officiorum. “ The other Conſtitution is directed to Cæſarius the Præfectus Prætorio of the Eaſt; and it is concerning the Adſeſſors, or Aſſiſtants of Judges. For ſuch the Judges or Governours of Provinces were wont to have by them, ever ſince the days of Auguſtus, who thought fit, that they, being often no Lawyers themſelves, ſhould have thoſe that were learned in the Laws, to aſſiſt and inform them in their buſineſs. Now, as none could ordinarily, and without the eſpecial licenſe of the Prince, be Governours or Judges in his own Province, for fear of ſeditious practiſes, as ſometimes it happened; or for that they might be overſwayed in Judicature by the paſſions of Hatred or Affection: ſo Peſceninus Niger formerly ordained, that none ſhould be an Adſeſſor in his own Province, and that for the ſame reaſon. But it happening ſometimes, that the Governours being ſent in haſte to the exerciſe of their Juriſdictions, could not procure Lawyers out of another Province, or from Berytus, which in the Eaſt was the famous Nurſery of them; therefore Arcadius, it being indifferently permitted before, gives them leave to have Aſſeſſors of the ſame Province, but only for the firſt four Months; which time he thinks ſufficient, wherein to provide themſelves elſewhere.

Arcadius excuſes the Houſes of the Fabricenſes from Quarter.

L.8.de Metallis. Cod.Th.Dat. 11. Cal.Feb. Conſtp. & l.4. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. mirè hinc interpolata.

Gives leave, that Perſons of the ſame Province may be Aſſeſſors four Months.

L.1.de Aſſeſſoribus domeſtic. & Cancellar. Cod. Th lib. 1. tit.12. Dat.6. Id.Decemb. Abeſt á Cod. Juſt.

Sect. 1.

A. D. 400.

114. The Quæſtor of Honorius in the Weſt had better leiſure to employ his Pen. Though all things were in repoſe, as Claudian tells us, for the Honour of the Conſul Stilicho, (which others think they have cauſe not fully to believe, the Barbarous Nations beginning this very year to draw down into the Weſtern Provinces) yet however the late difficulties and fears for the future, required ſuch care and circumſpection, that the Roads and other places throughout the Provinces, were conſtantly full of perſons of employment and quality, who were ſent to provide againſt any Diſaſters that might befal them. Hereupon, as we have already ſeen in the Eaſt, complaints were made about their too free and bold taking up of Quarters, or Lodgings; and the firſt Law made by Honorius this Year, at leaſt now extant, was made upon complaint of the Ordinary Judges of the Provinces (as Preſidents) that they were juſtled out of their Prætoria or publick Houſes, by greater Miniſters; as the Illuſtrious, or others, who had occaſion to travel their ways. This grievance was eſpecially in Gall, to the Præfect whereof, the Emperour now wrote, commanding him to give notice to all “ ſuch Miniſters, that they abſtained from the Prætoria of the Ordinary Judges, “ when they themſelves there reſided:“ otherwiſe permitting publick perſons to make uſe of theſe Houſes which were deſtinated to publick ſervice; for in the Summer time they were in their Circuits or Viſitations; and poſſibly in one Country there might be ſeveral of theſe Prætoria. To be ſure, the Houſes belonging to the Emperour's Domain, were ſecured from the Metatus, or liberty of Quarter; and, as thoſe he formerly poſſeſſed, ſo by the ſame reaſon, ſuch as of new, fell, or accrued to him by reaſon of forfeiture for Treaſon, or other reſpects. Yet was he forced by an Edict ſent to Pompeianus, the Proconſul of Africk, to protect the Lands which had belonged to Gildo and his Complices, and were lately confiſcate and fallen into his hands, by impoſing a Fine of five pounds of Gold upon him that “ ſhould enter upon them with purpoſe to ſtay, or make any Abode therein. “

Honorius preſerves the Prætoria for the Governors of Provinces.

L.6.de Metatis, Cod.Th. Dat.16. Cal.Febr. & L.3 Cod.Juſt. eod. tit.

And his own Lands from being entred.

L.7.Cod.Th. ejuſd. tit. Dat.6. Id.Jun. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

115. The condition of the times, wherein there was always cauſe to fear Incurſions from the Barbarous Nations, required, that the Armies ſhould be reinforced, and kept in as good Diſcipline as might be. For this purpoſe Stilicho procured a Reſcript to be directed to himſelf for reſtraining the liberty now taken of obtaining the privilege of a Veterane Soldier, by thoſe who had no right nor title. Honorius, in his Reſcript, declares, That moſt Veteranes were ſo made, by vertue of “ Teſtimonials fraudulently got; having, indeed, never been Soldiers: and ſome, “ when but newly entred, in the flower of their Age, went away from their Co- “ lours. To redreſs this miſchief, he commands, that every Lætus Alamannus “ (of which we lately ſpoke) wandring Sarmatian, Son of a Veterane Soldier, or “ obnoxious to ſome Body or Society that belongs to the Legions; be drawn out of “ his Retirement, and imbodied in the Army, notwithſtanding any Teſtimonial ob- “ tained from the Protectors, or perſons of any other Dignity. Moreover, that “ ſuch as had received any Miſſion, or been diſcharged from Service, be drawn “ back again to the Camp; and no excuſe be allowed, except it be of Old Age, In- “ firmity of Body, or Wounds. And, becauſe many were found, either before “ their entring into Military Service, or afterwards, before it was duly finiſhed; “ to lie hid under pretence of pious Religion, and to defend themſelves; not ſo “ much by obſervation of Religious Worſhip, as the love of Idleneſs and Sottiſh- “ neſs, covered under the name of Clerks, and buſied in the unlucky Obſequies of “ the Dead: He will have none to enjoy any benefit of ſuch excuſe, except any be “ ſo broken with Age, weak in his Members, or ſmall and deformed in his Sta- “ ture; that he be unworthy the Society of Valiant Men. But he owns at laſt, “ that one, having paſſed through all the Duties belonging to the Decuriones, the “ Primpilarii, Collegiati, and other Companies, may be excuſed from the Militia “ of the Camp. “ There was another Cuſtom in the Armies at this time; which, however formerly allowed of, was found to tend to the Diſcouragement of good Soldiers, if to no other worſe effect: and that was, of changing or transferring Men, from one Numerus, or Regiment, to another. To obviate this, Stilicho procured another Reſcript, directed to him as Magiſter Militum in Gall; wherein the Emperor declares, That he will not have theſe Tranſlations made, contrary to the “ publick Utility. He will have, therefore, all Comites and Duces, that have any “ Military Commands, to take notice, that it ſhall be unlawful, not only to make “ ſuch Tranſlation from the Comitatenſes and Palatini, to other Numeri; but alſo, “ from thoſe called Pſeudo-Comitatenſes, the Ripavienſes, Caſtriciani, or the reſt: giving this reaſon; Becauſe the Augmentation of Honour ought not to proceed from “ Ambition, but from Labour and Diligence. If any tranſgreſs this Command, for “ every Soldier, he ſhall pay a pound of Gold. “

L.12. de Veteranis, Cod.Th. Dat.3.Cal.Febr.

He takes care for reinforcing the Army.

De Lætis conſule Gothofr. nihil.

L.ult. de re militari, Cod.Th. & L.14. Cod. Juſt.eod.tit. Dat.14.Cal. Apr.

116. The

Sect. I.

A. D. 400.

Protectors ſent into the Provinces to bring back Straglers to their Colours.

116. The former Law of Honorius did ſo little good for the bringing back of Straglers to their Colours, that the Protectors were forced to be ſent down into Gall, to make Inquiſition after the Sons of Veteranes; thoſe they called Vagi, or Wanderers, from one Seat where they were obnoxious to the Militia, to another; and thoſe, who, by reaſon of their Original, were tied to the Service. This we find by another Edict, directed, this Summer, to Vincentius, the Præfect of Gall; whereby the Emperor takes care, that thoſe Protectors, or Inſpectors, be intent upon the buſineſs, about which they were ſent; and offer no injury to the Poſſeſſors of the Lands." But, not only did Soldiers now ſtray from their Stations; but ſo great were the Tumults, Fears and Diſorders of theſe times, that the Inhabitants, and ſuch as were imbodied into Cities, Towns and Boroughs, ran away from their Houſes and Charges; to the great diſparagement, and loſs of the places where they once lived. Some betook themſelves to a Country Life; living ſecretly, and out of the way, in the Services, and Tillage of Great Men: Others were content to become a ſort of Villains; and to marry the Slaves of thoſe, in whoſe Grounds they could hide themſelves: And ſome wandered up and down, they knew not well whither. What the reaſon of this great and extravagant diſorder ſhould be in particular, we cannot well gueſs: Some attribute it to the Injuſtice and Oppreſſion of Lords and Corporations; who treated theſe men ſo ill, as to force them to run away. But, when ever the Ruin of a Nation draws near, Vice abounds, and the minds of Men are poſſeſſed with Giddineſs and Extravagancy; betraying it ſelf, ſometimes in one Symptome, otherwhiles in another. The Emperor, informed hereof, took notice of what tended to the diſgrace of the Government, in a large Conſtitution, directed, alſo, to Vincentius, the Præfect of Gall; whereby he commands, That where ever they can be found; ſuch perſons be brought back, without the admiſſion of any excuſe. As for their Sons that were born before forty Years, he will not have them medled with: But ſuch as they had begot within that time, ſhall be divided betwixt the Lords, whoſe She-Slaves or Villains they had married, and the Bodies or Companies (called Collegia) which they had deſerted; and to which, now, they were to be drawn back."

L.10. de Deſertoribus, Cod. Th. Dat.16. Cal. Jun.

Inhabitants of Towns alſo recalled.

L.L. 1,2,3. De his qui conditionem propriam reliquerunt. Cod. Th. lib.12. tit.18. Dat.3. Cal. Jul. Abſunt a Cod. Juſt.

117. Where the publick Benefit was concerned, he would allow of no ſuch Preſcription; but thought fit to admit of ſome temper in matters relating to himſelf or private Men: So that if any pretended to be a Villain, or perpetual Servant; had been in the nature of a Curialis, a Collegiate, or Burgarius, for thirty years; though the Domain of the Prince, or any private Perſon, challenged him, their Claim ſhould be extinguiſhed. And becauſe often it happened that the Members of Bodies or Companies ran away by Connivence of the Chief Officers, he ſtrictly charges the Primates and Defenſores to look that none eſcape; impoſing Baniſhment upon ſuch as ſhould, out of favour, connive at ſuch Eſcapes." Further, to put a ſtop to the boldneſs of Villains in running from their Lords; he ordains, That ſuch Lords as were Bonæ fidei poſſeſſores, ſhould have the benefit of the Interdictum Utrubi, for reſtoring ſuch a Fugitive immediately into his poſſeſſion, and the Title to be proved afterwards; as was uſually, in caſe of Forcible Entries, or things taken away by violence." At this time one Mæcilianus arrived at Court; being ſent on a Meſſage out of Africk, to procure a Redreſs of certain Grievances. What they were we may well underſtand from the Conſtitution of Redreſs it ſelf, which he carried back to Pompeianus the Proconſul; divided now according to the ſeveral matters, into ſeveral Laws, and under divers Titles. One thing he had in Commiſſion to complain of, was, That the Sons of Pagan Prieſts were compelled to ſucceed their Fathers in that troubleſome and ſuperſtitious Employment; which the Emperor, in his Anſwer, judges unreaſonable, and prohibits. He complained alſo of the great oppreſſion of the poor Provincials in reference to Tributes; which happened through the iniquity of the Officers partly, and partly through the Inequallity of the Diſtribution; the richer Men going ſcotfree, when the Poor were haraſſed with Payments. Particularly, there were very wealthy perſons, that had vaſt Summs of Money at Intereſt, and great Incomes thereby, and paid nothing for them: In Anſwer to which, Honorius returns, That it is fit that all Negotiators or Traffickers pay that Contribution called Luſtralis Penſio, or Collatio; and not only thoſe who exerciſe Commerce in Cities and Territories, but thoſe alſo, who have daily Incomes by the way of Uſury. Eſteeming that with Money to be as much Traffick and Commerce, even as the ordinary way of Merchandizes."

L. un. Utrumvi, Cod. Th. lib.4. tit.23. & L.14. de Agricolis, &c. Cod. Juſt.

Mæcilianus brings ſeveral Complaints out of Africk.

L.166. de Decurionibus, Cod. Th. Dat. prid. Cal. Jul. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

Which Honorius endeavours to ſatisfie.

Verum etiam qui ſtudentes fœnori, creſcentis in dies ſingulos pecuniæ acceſſione lætantur. L.18. de Luſtrali collatione, Cod. Th.

118. Another thing, as to the inequality of burthens was complained of: Which was, that the Veterane, or Emerite Soldiers, coming into poſſeſſion of Lands that were Sect. I.

A. D 400.

were ſubject and liable to the Cenſus, pretended an Immunity due to them; and avoided the Charge. This he alſo diſapproves of; and commands, that they be compelled to make due Payment as ſoon as they come to ſuch Lands. But the Provincials were miſerably abuſed by the Suſceptors, Tabularii and Compulſors, Officers employed in the receiving and exacting of the Revenue; who, being in Africk, removed from the Emperor's eye, beyond the Seas, took the greater liberty to play the Knaves. They had got a trick, not to accept of the Apochæ, or Acquittances, which had been given at the payment of the Tax: And that they might the better bear down thoſe that produced them, were wont to ſend ſuch as wrote them out of the way. For Redreſs of this, the Emperor commands, That the Clerks that write “ the Apochæ, or Diſcharges, be not changed for one Year; that ſo they may be “ ready to own their Hands; except they be found to be faulty. Then, he will “ have every four Months Breives to be ſent, with the Acquittances, to the Tabularii; “ that they may be compared together, to ſee whether the Receits do anſwer “ the Tax-Books, aud the ſame Payment may not be exacted twice. And, in caſe “ any Suſceptor, or Tabularius, be convicted of Fraud by any Poſſeſſor of Lands; he “ forbids that he be ever again admitted to the Employment, though he produce a “ Reſcript clandeſtinely obtained. In like manner, if a Compulſor be found to oppreſs “ the people, by compelling them to pay more than their due; he commands, “ that the ſeverity of the Laws be executed upon him: But this not having the due “ effect, twelve Years after he ordained by another Law, on purpoſe directed to “ the Proconſul, that this ſort of Officer ſhould be quite baniſhed out of the Provinces “ of Africk. “ Anaſtaſius the Emperor, afterward, ſo far admitted of Compulſors, as to have them execute their Office, not upon the Provincials, but the Judges themſelves, and their Officers: but Juſtinian, at length, took them quite away. As to Honorius, he further ordained, That none of the Numerarii, Tabularii, Actuaries, “ or ſuch as were employed in gathering the Revenue, ſhould be admitted “ the ſecond time to be Principals of the Office, under pain of Deportation; leſt “ they ſhould too much improve their Skill and Experience for their own Advantages. “

L.28. de Annona & Tributis, Cod.Th.

Officers in the Collection of the Revenue, reſtrained from oppreſſing the people.

L.27. de Suſceptoribus, &c. Cod.Th.

L.L.3,4.de Concuſſion. Advocatorum, &c. Cod. Th.lib.8.tit.10.

L.2.Ad Legem Juliam de Ambitu, Cod.Th.lib. 9.tit.26.

119. He continued at Milan till toward Auguſt, and then took a Progreſs to Ravenna, Brixia and Aquileia; wherein he ſpent ſome three Months. At Ravenna he granted out an Edict of Indulgence, whereby ſhould be ſet at liberty all per- “ ſons that were baniſhed, condemned to the Iſlands, or to the Mines; ſo as they “ might freely return to their own homes, Contumacious Perſons excepted, who “ had not obeyed the Sentences of the Judges, but refuſed to go to the places to “ which they were confined. Thus kind was he to theſe Criminals, whether out “ of reſpect to filling his Army, or the Companies of Cities and Corporations, by “ his Edict directed to Romulus as Præfectus Prætorio. “ From Brixia he ſent Directions to Flavianus, the Præfect of Rome, concerning Appeals in Criminal Cauſes from the Vicar of the City; That in matters of Conſequence, they ſhould be as “ formerly, to the Prince himſelf; but in ſmaller, or rather, pretended Crimes, “ to the Præfect. “ Lying at Aquileia, he determined a matter of Precedence; of which there was a kind of doubt and controverſie betwixt thoſe who had executed the Office of Conſularis, and the Comites, which belonged to the Tributes and Treaſuries throughout the Dioceſſes of Italy and Gall: For every Dioceſs had a Comes Largitionum of their own; and they were all ſubject, and to anſwer to the great Treaſurer, the Illuſtrious Comes Sacrarum Largitionum, they themſelves being but of the Degree of Perfectiſſimus. In like manner, as there were the Special Comites Largitionum; ſo there were Special, or Under Comites Rei Privatæ. Now, the Emperor determines the point in favour of the Conſulares; giving them prece- “ dence before all ſuch Comites Italicianorum, and Gallicianorum, as he calls them; “ and with good reaſon alledged: For, ſaith he, its no ſmall Title of Merits, to rule “ and govern Provinces. “ Ordinary Power, with Juriſdiction, though the Province ſubject, of leſſer extent, was more honourable than an Undercharge about the Revenue, though diffuſed to a larger Compaſs. But now we are ſpeaking of the Revenue, a conſiderable Accident happened as to it, about this very time. Formerly the Houſes and Grounds lying in Cities were not ordinarily, nor in courſe, ſubject to any Tax or Collation. But now, urged by the neceſſity of Affairs, Honorius thought fit to ſubject them to an extraordinary Impoſition; but with a diſtinction betwixt thoſe that were but of little Income, and them that were of larger Rent. The later, he commands, ſhall pay one Years value in three; and the other to go ſcotfree, being free from all Tax and Incumbrance.

An Act of Indulgence to Priſoners.

L.10.de Indulg. criminum, Cod. Th.Dat.8.Id. Aug. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt. ut temporaria.

L.61. de Appellationibus, Cod. Th.Dat.14.Cal. Septemb. Abeſt a Cod.Juſt.

Ab his ſunt diverſi Præfecti vel Præpoſiti Theſaurorum de quibus Notitia Imperii agit.

Precedence determined betwixt Conſulares and Treaſurers of Dioceſſes.

L. un. de Conſularibus & Præſidibus. Cod.Th. lib.4.tit.19. Dat.3. Cal.Oct. ad Meſſalam, P.P. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

Houſes and Grounds in Cities ſubjected to Taxes.

Unius Anni, hoc eſt tertiæ Indictionis.

And with good reaſon.

120. And great reaſon and equity there was for this: that, in the diſtreſs of the State eſpecially, and the dangers of the Commonwealth, wherein they were as much concerned as any, the Poſſeſſions of Cities ſhould contribute toward the publick Charge as well as the others lying in the Country; they bringing in as much profit, and being managed with leſs Charge. Such were the Horrea, or Store-houſes, wherein the Romans were wont to lay up their Merchandiſe; as Corn, Wine, and other Proviſions; and let them out to great advantage. And ſo they did their private Baths; their Shops, in which was great Trade driven; their dwelling Houſes; their Cænacula, or Buildings, raiſed on purpoſe for Entertainment; and their Salt-pits. All theſe he ſubjects to this Payment in all Cities, Rome excepted; " which terming by the Title of Urbs Æternabilis, he confeſſeth, that the reverence " of her Majeſty doth excuſe. Neither will he have the Mancipes of the Baths or " Salt-pits, which ſerved for the uſe of the Roman People, ſubject to this Payment; " as being obnoxious to the finding of Wood, and other Dues: Nor ſuch as farmed " Salt-pits; who were bound to pay, after the uſual manner, other Taxes for " what they held." From what he ordains concerning the third Year, it is probable that the Leaſes of private Houſes, as well as of publick, were, in this Age, uſually let for no more than three Years: But, the great Expenſe of War, and providing againſt the continually feared Inroads of the Barbarous Nations, put Honorius upon more than ordinary Courſes of raiſing Money; and alſo, upon quickening the Payment of it: in which ſome were ſo backward, that they would neglect to pay their Tributes for above a Twelve-month together. He ordered at the latter end of the Year, Salvinus, his Comes Rei Privatæ, to exact what was due from rich Men, and ſuch as were able to pay: and beſides that, fourfold of the Value, as " a Mulct. The meaner ſort, having ſome excuſe for their Poverty, he ſubjects " not to the ſame Cenſure; though he ſaith, they deſerved to pay one half for their " backwardneſs." The Curſus Publicus being again out of order, by ſeveral Laws he now endeavoured to reform it. Some without Licence would make uſe of it, whom, " he commands the ordinary Judge, to fine a pound of Gold for every Paraveredus " and Parangaria ſo uſed; threatning the Curators, or Defenſors, and the Principals of " Cities, if ſuch were not apprehended, and ſent to the Judges; who, if they neglected to proſecute them, they and their Offices ſhould incurr forfeiture of the " double value." Proviſions for Cattel were ſo dear, that ſuch Beaſts as ſerved in " the Curſus were almoſt ſtarved; and the Country-man, that found them not in Specie, but in Money, was much oppreſſed in the Contribution. This Inconvenience he alſo commanded Meſſala to redreſs."

Rome yet excepted.

L. 3. de Collatione donatarum, Cod. Th. lib. 11. tit. 20. Dat. 3. Non. Octobr. ad Hadrianum, P.P.

L. 27. de Annonis & Tributis, Cod. Th. Dat. Id. Nov. Rav.

The Curſus Publicus regulated.

L. 59. de Curſu publico, Cod Th. Dat. ad Meſſalam. P.P. 15. Cal. Dec. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

L. 60. ejuſd. tit. & L. 18. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit.

121. Vicars of Dioceſſes had been prohibited by ſeveral Laws to take upon them to grant Licenſes for the uſe of the Curſus, except the Neceſſities of the State required it. But now, Macrobius, the Vicar of Spain, made bold to break the Rule; and for that, had a Mulct impoſed upon him for his Temerity: Which, that others might avoid, the Emperor commands Vincentius, the Præfectus Prætorio of Gall, " and Succeſſor of Theodorus, to give warning to all the Vicars of his Diſtrict." And now, being ſtill called upon to reform the Officers of the Revenue, who had leaſt need to vex and haraſs the poor Provincials at this time, which required more than ordinary Supplies; as he had ordered Meſſala, to ſee that the Mancipes which belonged to the Curſus Publicus, ſhould not vex them, by exacting more Money than was needful, under pretence, that Provender was dearer than before: So he gave him Command to control the Diſcuſſors and Apparitors in a courſe they took, to make prey of them, by requiring a ſight of ſuch Acquittances as they had loſt, or at preſent could not be found; and for want of producing them, come upon them again; and make them pay the Summ the ſecond time: a thing ſometimes done alſo by the Governors of Provinces; who pretended ignorance of what was paid during the Adminiſtration of their Predeceſſors. Now, for as much as when an Acquittance was received, it was to be brought to the Tabularius; who was to enter it into the Books of Accounts, and to croſs the Books of the Taxes; Honorius declares, That if it appear from the Books that the Money was ſo paid, it ſhall be " enough, though the Acquittance it ſelf cannot be produced." Another Greivance was, that ſuch of the Decuriones, or of other Bodies, as hired publick Grounds or Houſes, having formerly belonged to the Temples; or which appertained to the Res Privata of the Prince, or to the Commonwealth; and held them by perpetual Right; were turned out of them by the Officers. He commands, That they " be ſuffered, quietly to poſſeſs and enjoy them, without admitting of new Tenants; " under pain of the Palatine Offices, admitting of ſuch Alterations, incurring a " Fine of ten pounds of Gold." But the Provincials were injurious and troubleſome, one to another. When a Man was ſued for any Lands or Poſſeſſions, he would pretend, L. 61. ejuſd. tit. Cod. Th. Dat. 5. Id. Dec. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt. ut temporaria.

L. 2. de Diſcuſſoribus, Cod. Th. lib. 11 tit. 26. & L. 2. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. 5. Cal. Dec.

L. 5. de Locatione Fund. juris Emphit. Cod. Th. Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

A. D.
400.

L.un.de His qui potent nom. in lite prætend. Cod.Th. lib.2. tit: 14. & L.un. Cod. Juſt. eod.tit.

tend, that thoſe Lands belonged to ſome great Perſon ; and ſet up the Title, or Name of this Perſon upon them (as the cuſtom was, for the Owner to have his Title upon his Lands or Houſes ;) thereby to terrifie the Plaintiff, and affright him with thoughts of going to Suit with ſo great an Adverſary. This the Emperor ſo far diſtates, as to inflict Infamy upon any perſon, allowing his Title, or Name, ſo " to be uſed : And beſides a Forfeiture of the thing, commands him that doth it, to " be beaten with the Plumbatæ, or Plummets, wherewith Malefactors were wont " to be chaſtiſed. "

A. D.
401.

Vincentio & Fravitta, Conſ.

Begging of Gaines his Eſtate reſtrained.

L.17.de Bonis Proſcriptorum, Cod.Th.Dat.14. Cal.Febr.

122. The Year CCCCI, of our Lord, had Vincentius and Fravitta for Conſuls. Fravitta, or Fraiutus, was made Conſul for the good Service he performed againſt Gaines : Who, being declared a publick Enemy, his Eſtate, and thoſe of his partakers, were confiſcated, according to the Cuſtom in ſuch Caſes. And now flocked Petitioners and Beggars, as faſt as Crows about a Carcaſe ; to repreſs the Voracity of whom, Arcadius publiſhed an Edict, directed to Studius, his Comes Rei Privatæ ; whereby he abſolutely prohibited the begging of any Eſtates con- " fiſcated, within two Years from the Confiſcation, or the Deportation of the Par- " ty. One reaſon for this he gives, that he may have time to conſider ; and poſſibly " (as his Nature, he ſaith, is) to mollifie the hard fortune of the condemned perſon " by his Imperial Humanity. Another, that within that term, ſuch Eſtates would " ſeem rather to belong to other Men than to the Prince, the memory of their for- " mer Owners being ſtill freſh ; ſo that he ſhould ſeem to give away what was " ſcarcely his own : an Argument drawn from Modeſty, as the other from Huma- " nity. If any be ſo bold as to ask any Eſtates before two Years be expired, he de- " clares, ſuch Petition ſhall make the thing ungrantable to that perſon. " Whatever delight this brought to diſtreſſed perſons, great joy happened at Court in the beginning of April, or the fourth before the Ides thereof, when the Empreſs was brought to Bed of a Son ; whom they named after his Grandfather, Theodoſius. The ſame Year there happened not much of Action, either in the Eaſtern or Weſtern Parts ; though Alarich, having all this while layen in the Bowels of the Empire, haraſſed Epirus and Pannonia at his pleaſure ; and now, had a longing deſire to be in Italy. As Arcadius was not much moleſted by fears of Hoſtility, ſo as to diſturb him in the pleaſure he took in his young Son ; ſo, neither did his Quæſtor hinder much his Diverſion, by requiring Audience in teference to the ſigning of Edicts or Laws. For we find but two more made by him this Year : whereof, one concerning Immunity from Burthens, granted by him, to ſuch as had been Proximi in the Scrinia, or Comites Depoſitionum ; and now were admitted to be Senators : Whereas the Charges of the Senators were many and great ; as the Glebalis Collatio, and other Voluntary Payments upon extraordinary occaſion ; as, after Victory, the Deſtruction of a Tyrant, the Celebration of the Quinquennalia, of Decennalia of Princes, or the like : He gives Order to Clearchus, the Præfect of Conſtantinople, " That theſe, his Senators Allecti, be freed from all Obligations to them ; and only " pay the ſeven Solidi yearly ; which were required of the poorer ſort of Senators, " at this time ; though afterward, wholly remitted.

Proximi, and others that were made Senators freed from Burthens.

L.12.de Proximis,&c.Cod.Th. Dat.prid.Id. Septemb.

123. Honorius was alſo ſo much at leiſure from War, as to make preparations for it ; which he had reaſon to apprehend. As his Brother at Conſtantinople, he continued at Milan till the latter end of the Year ; and then went to Altinum. At Milan he was put in mind of the ſtate and condition of Africk ; which, as it had been aſſaulted by Tyrants and Rovers, upon the Borders ; ſo ſtill preſented matter to verrifie the old Proverb, That it always affoarded ſome new thing ; ſome Monſter, ſomething of Diſturbance and Innovation. For repreſſing theſe Diſorders, and maintaining their own Quiet and Repoſe, the Provincials were wont to ſupply the Government, as with other things, with Horſes, or Money paid in lieu thereof. It being now again queſtioned, at what Rate an Horſe ſhould be ſet ; Honorius, by his Reſcript directed to Pompeianus, the Proconſul, ſets the price at twenty Solidi ; " out of which, ſeven he will have allowed to the Soldiers, for finding themſelves " Horſes ; this being an extraordinary Impoſition. And for the ordinary way of " Contribution, he afterwards gave order, that payment ſhould be made according " to the Wealth of the Provinces, or the goodneſs of the Horſes : And that the Co- " mites Stabuli ſhould receive two Solidi for their Fees, and, as had been deſired by " Gaudentius, the Comes of Africk, the Soldiers ſeven Solidi for their Horſes. " There was now diſcovered a Cheat, in that Country frequently committed by the Suſceptors, or Receivers of the Annona, or Proviſions : who were wont to give theſe Proviſions, or Money, before-hand, as was pretended, to the Soldiers, and take their Acquittances : Whereby it came to paſs, that the Soldier, hving ſpent all together,

Africa ſemper aliquid apportat novi.

Honorius ſets the Rate of Horſes in Africk.

L.L.2,3. de Equorum Collatione,Cod.Th. lib.11.tit.17. Abſunt a Cod. Juſt.

Removes a Cheat of the Suſcepters.

A. D. 401.

Sect. 1. gether, and lived unfrugally for ſome time ; then fell in want, and deſerted the Service ; and that in the Provinces of Numidia and Mauritania, which were upon the Borders, and required the care and diligence of Military Men in an eſpecial manner. To the maintenance of theſe Provinces, they of Africa Proconſularis were wont to contribute : And therefore, the Emperor commands Pompeianus, That “ within his Juriſdiction, no ſuch Money be given before-hand ; nor any allowed, “ but what appeared from the Books of Accounts. And all ſuch Acquittances received “ from the Soldiers, he declares, for the time to come, ſhall be null and “ void. “ And becauſe the Governors of Provinces were often negligent of collecting the Revenue, which was part of their Charge, under the Præfects : By a particular Law he now enacted, That ſuch as were found ſo to be, ſhould return “ all the Profits and Advantages they had received, during their Adminiſtration “ “

L.28. de Suſceptoribus, Cod.Th. Dat.4.Cal.Mar. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

Quickens the Magiſtrates in raiſing the Revenue.

L.11. de Annonis & Tributis, Cod. Juſt.Dat.3. (potius,13.) Cal. Mart.

124. The Tabularii, or thoſe that kept the Books of Tributes, of old, were publick Slaves ; which Cuſtom being grown obſolete, the Slaves, or Villains, (Coloni) of private perſons, were often, now a days, employed in the Accounts. This was thought very indecent, and againſt the Commonwealth ; and as ſuch, Honorius prohibits it ; whether theſe Tabularii be made for an whole Province, or a “ particular City : So as, whatever Lord, for the time to come, ſhall, knowingly, “ allow his Slave, or Colonus, to be thus employed, ſhall be anſwerable for all the “ Accounts managed by him ; and ſuch Slave or Villain ſhall be confiſcated, or fall “ to the Exchequer. As for what was paſt, he doth not require that the Lords “ ſhould give an Account ; but yet, produce them, and have them forth-coming ; “ that they may be ſubject to Examination by Torture. “ But, the effect of the care which was taken for Africk was, or, as it ſeemed, would be, this ; that heavy Complaints ſtill came over, of the burthens ſuſtained by the Inhabitants ; who, in particular, alledged, that they had paid more than was neceſſary in a late extraordinary Tax, for defraying the publick Charge. Once more, to redreſs, or prevent, their Grievances, Honorius commands Pompeianus, That if there be any Overplus, it “ be allowed at the next ordinary Payment that is to be made. “ And, to quiet their minds, he wrote to the Provincials of the Proconſular Province themſelves ; as alſo, to thoſe of Numidia, Byzacena and Tripolis ; aſſuring them, that he had with care “ and circumſpection determined, that nothing more, in an extraordinary way, “ ſhould be put upon them, but what the mere Neceſſities of the Army required : “ And if any thing more ſhould happen, it ſhould be allowed in the next Indiction. “ And as for the finding of Horſes ; they of Numidia ſhould pay, inſtead of twenty, “ but eighten Solidi for every Horſe that was extraordinarily raiſed for the Curators, “ or ſuch as had care of the Borders : and the Byzaceni and Tripolitani only fifteen ; “ for thoſe of Numidia were moſt excellent. Further, whereas they were much vexed, upon ſuch occaſions, by thoſe called Opinatores ; who were Soldiers ſent to exact ſuch extraordinary Tributes as were behind, as the Optiones exacted from the Suſceptors the ordinary or Canonical Payments ; he declares, that they ſhall “ call, and be urgent upon, the Judges and their Officers ; ſo as the Tax be raiſed “ within the ſpace of a Year. In the laſt place, He acknowledges he had found “ that many had oppreſſed them, by preſſing Carriage-Beaſts for Paraveredi and “ Parengariæ : But, to prevent it, he ordains, that none, for the future, preſume “ to uſe ſuch liberty, but in publick Neceſſities ; and when they are furniſhed with “ ſufficient Licence for ſo doing. “

L.ult. de Tabulariis, Cod.Th. & L.3. Cod. Juſt. eod.tit. Dat.8. Cal. Apr.

Does his utmoſt to ſatisfie his Subjects of Africk.

L.1. de Indictionibus, Cod. Th. lib.11.tit.5. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

L.29. de Annona & Tributis, Cod.Th.Dat.pr. Cal.Apr. Abeſt a Cod.Juſt.

L.26. de erogatione militaris Annonæ, Cod.Th. & L.11. Cod. Juſt.eod.tit. vide L.16. de Exactionibus, Cod Th.

L.63. de Curſu publico, Cod.Th. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

125. With ſuch difficulty of Affairs were the Provinces preſſed at this time, that when there was moſt need of Contributions, there was greateſt want of Money. And this cauſed the Emperor to publiſh, not an Order for an extraordinary Tax, but an Act of Grace, or Indulgence, for what was ſtill due of the uſual and ordinary Payment, out of the Diſtrict of Andromachus, to whom the Edict is directed ; who, by corruption of the Text, is called Præfect of the City ; but muſt have been Præfectus Prætorio, and probably, of Gall. To him Honorius declares, That he “ remits whatever Payments belonged, either to the Præfects, or to the Comes Largitionum, “ till the Year wherein he himſelf was Conſul, or the fifteenth Indiction ; “ which was the CCCLXXXVI Year of our Lord. And, to this purpoſe “ he commands, that the memory of all ſuch Debts, till that time, be utterly aboliſhed “ ; whether remaining in the papers of the Tabularii of the Cities (who kept “ the Books of Arrears, as well as of the Payments due ; and publiſhed them every “ four Months, for the Information of the Exactors ; who could not, without their “ ſignification, come upon any that had not paid) or of the Offices of the Judges ; “ or of the Palatine Offices belonging to the Higheſt Treaſurer, by whom the ſaid “ Breives “

He is conſtrained to remit Arrears

L.3. de Indulgentiis debitorum, Cod.Th.lib. 11.tit.28. Dat. 7.Cal.Jul. Abeſt a Cod.Juſt. ut temporaria.

A. D. 401.

Breives were made authentick; or in the hands of the Diſcuſſores, who were ſent " to leavy the Arrears. All theſe Accounts he commands to be burnt. From the " Year of his firſt Conſulſhip, till the Conſulſhip of Olybrius and Probinus; or that " wherein his Father died, and he came to be Emperor indeed, his pleaſure is, " that the Exaction of all Dues be ſuſpended, till ſuch time as the ordinary Judges " can give an Account in Writing; as well of the condition of the Debtors, as of " the Summ due; that thereupon he may conſider, who, by reaſon of their Indigence, " are fit to be indulged, and who are able to pay their full Dues; which " might ſufficiently appear from the Books of the Minuſcularii, who were the Under-Collectors; " and of the Curiales themſelves. But, from the Conſulſhip of Olybrius " and Probinus, or the Ninth Indiction, to the Date of this Law, he will " have the Collection of all Dues to be haſtened; certain Farmers of the Revenue, " and others, excepted. Theſe are ſuch as hired the Cuſtoms of the Havens and " Ports; the Publicans, or Telonarii, who received Toll in Markets; the Præpoſiti " Theſaurorum, of which, there were four in Gall; the Præpoſiti of the Baphia, of " which, the Notitia Imperii mentions nine in the Weſt; being Work-houſes deſtinated " to the dying of Purple, and two of them in Gall: the Procurators of the " Gynæcia, of which we have already ſpoken; whereof, were ſixteen in the Weſt; " and of theſe, ſix in Gall: And the Procuratores Monetariorum, or of the Mints; " of which, the Notitia mentions ſix in the Weſt, and three of them in Gall. To " theſe, with others, whom the Palatine Officers, or thoſe belonging to the Treaſurer, " kept in their Books (as the Præpoſiti of the Argentarii, or Silver-Smiths) he " gives Plenary Indulgence; ſo as if they themſelves at this time be deceaſed, yet " their Heirs ſhall not be moleſted for their pretended Debts.

126. Honorius being ſo liberal to remit theſe Arrears, had the more reaſon to take all Legal Advantages for his own Supply. There was one Marcharidus, who had been Proſcribed; probably, for having been one of the Satellites of Gildo, and had left his Goods in the hands of divers perſons; who concealed them. The Emperor wrote to Bathanarius, the Comes of Africk; That ſeeing it had appeared " upon Torture, that there were ſuch concealed Goods; if any Concealer would " within two Months time produce them, he ſhould be pardoned for what was paſt; " otherwiſe, his Eſtate be confiſcated, and he himſelf undergo the pain of Deportation. " To prevent the imbezilling of what belonged to his Domain, he now prohibited " any Palatine Officer belonging to the Comes Rei Privatæ, either by himſelf " or any other perſon, to farm, or hire, any Poſſeſſions appertaining to it: as by another " Conſtitution, directed alſo to Neſtorius, who now bare that Office; It is " forbidden, that they buy any thing belonging to the Domain; as Gold, Silver, " Slaves, or the like. " And, that the Revenue might come in in convenient time, toward the latter end of the Year, he thought fit to quicken up the Vicars of Dioceſſes; on whom (under the Præfects) as he ſaith, lay the care of levying the whole Collation; and tranſmitting the Proviſions, either to the publick Granaries, or where the Soldiers had want of them. He commands, That they preſs the Governors " of Provinces to the Diſcharge of their Duties; that every Month they " take diligent account, what, or how much, hath been brought in, or tranſmitted: " And, that they animadvert upon ſuch Governors as are found to be negligent " of their duty. " And, this he ſeems to have enacted, with deſign to reinforce the Authority of Vicars; againſt whom the ordinary Judges ſpurned at this time, and contemned them. Juſtinian, yet afterward, did not think fit that they ſhould have ſuch an hand over them; and therefore, this Conſtitution is not put into his Code.

On the other he takes care for the preſerving and paying the publick Revenue.

L. 18. de Bonis Proſcriptorum, Cod. Th. Dat. 3. Id. Jul. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

L. 6. de Locat. fund. Juris Emphit. Cod. Th. Dat. 6. Cal. Aug. & L. un. quibus ad Conduct. &c. Cod. Juſt.

L. un de Officio vicarii, Cod. Th. lib. 1. tit. 6. Dat. 3. Cal. Octobr. Altino.

A. D. 402.

Arcadio, & Honorio, A. A. 4. Conſ.

127. For the Year CCCCII the two Emperors, Arcadius and Honorius, now, the fourth time, were Conſuls. Arcadius continued at Conſtantinople, and Honorius at Ravenna; which, now, began to be an Imperial Seat; he having, in a manner, left Milan, and here fixed his Abode. And, now, the Laws we meet with, preſentus with the Names of three Emperors: for, in the beginning of this Year, and of January, did Arcadius give the Stile and Dignity of Auguſtus to his young Son, Theodoſius; born, as we ſaid, the fore-going Year. The times, now, began to be very ill; Clouds to gather, and Tempeſts to hover over the Weſtern Parts; and, amongſt Arms, Laws were put to ſilence, to ſuch a meaſure, that we meet with but two made this Year; or one by each of the Brothers. But, having now got another Colleague, we muſt take notice, that before his promotion, were ſeveral others made by them, now extant: ſome without Date, or Conſulſhip; and others without the Names of the Perſons, to whom they were ſent: Of which,

Arcadius gives the Title of Emperor to his young Son Theodoſius.

Sect. 1.

A. D. 402.

The Coloni in thoſe days, of the ſame condition with our Villains once in England.

L.2. de Apparitoribus Proconſulis, Cod. Juſt. lib.12.tit.56.

L.9.de Cohortalibus, Cod. Juſt. lib.12.tit.38.

L.24. de Excuſat.Tutor.Cod. Juſt.lib.5.tit. 62.

Coloni etiam Vicani dicuntur, in L. 2. de Colonis Illyricanis, Cod. Juſt. lib.11.tit.52. Vicanus & Villanus idem.

L.2. In quibus cauſis Coloni Cenſiti Dominos accuſare poſſint, Cod. Juſt.lib.11 tit.49.

L.3. Qui militare poſſint, Cod Juſt.lib.12.tit. 34.

it will be convenient, only to mention ſuch as are moſt remarkable, and beſt fit our purpoſe. One of theſe allows to Dominator, the Proconſul of Africk, no fewer “ than four hundred Apparitors; by which we may ſee the Greatneſs and Splendor “ of that Command. Another, one hundred Cohortales to the Preſidents of Illyricum. “ By another, the Navicularii are excuſed from all Tutorſhips, or the Office “ of Guardians; except it be of thoſe of their own Body.“ Another of their Laws gives us to underſtand the condition of the Coloni Cenſiti, or Husband-men, paying Rent to their Lords; that they were no better than our Villains, once here in England; who had their Name from the Villa, or Village, which they tilled; as the Coloni alſo theirs, from the tilling of theſe Grounds or Villages. They declare by that Law, that, as thoſe Coloni are Free Men in reference to others, to “ whom they owe no Tribute as Subjects: ſo, by reaſon of their obnoxiouſneſs to “ their Lords, they ſeem to be bound by a kind of Slavery. The effect thereof was “ this; That they forbid that ſuch Coloni be allowed to ſue their Lords; they, and “ all they have belonging unto them, ſo, as to be alienated and ſold when they pleaſe. “ It had often been formerly reſolved, that ſuch an one, without conſent of his “ Lord, could not alienate his very Peculium: and the Laws gave them power of “ acquiring, but not of alienating any Goods. Seeing then, they were not Sui Juris, “ and acquired what they got for their Maſters; Arcadius thinks it unreaſonable “ in this Edict, directed to Nebridius, that they ſhould be permitted to ſue their “ Perſons; yet, if they were over-burthened in their Payments, they had liberty “ to complain. And, in Criminal Cauſes, they might accuſe them, and vindicate “ themſelves; the Publick it ſelf being concerned in ſuch matters. But ſuch Fugitives “ they were at this time, that ſeveral Laws were made for returning them “ to their owners. And the Magiſtri Militum were forbidden, as well to recieve “ them into the Army, when Volunteers; as to compel them to the Military Service. “

Arcadius reforms the Abuſe in the Bread given to Conſtantinople.

L.L. 13,14. de Annonis Civicis, &c. Cod. Th. Abſ. a Cod. Juſt.

128. Arcadius derived an hereditary kindneſs for the City of Conſtantinople, from his Father. That Annona, or Proviſion of Bread which had been firſt given by Conſtantine, Theodoſius enlarged, when he raiſed more Buildings, and increaſed the number of Houſes; as we have ſeen from Themiſtius. The deſign of them both was, to encourage Inhabitants, and promote the enlargement of it: Yet, as Corruptions ſtill will be breaking in, upon the moſt laudable Conſtitutions; this Bread was transferred upon other perſons than Houſe-keepers: which Inconvenience had been ſeen by Arcadius ſix Years before: And he gave order to Africanus, the Præfect, to ſee, that all that had no Houſes ſhould be deprived of it, except they “ would build within ſix Months. Yet, ſtill, for all this, other ſorts of perſons “ drew it to themſelves; which now cauſed the Emperor to appropriate to himſelf “ the granting of an Intereſt in this Proviſion: And he commands Clearchus, the “ preſent Præfect, that none be ſuffered to enjoy this privilege, but ſuch as ſhall obtain “ it from himſelf immediately; or elſe, by Grant from the Præfect of the City, “ confirmed by his Imperial Authority.“ But we are interrupted. All the diſcourſe at Conſtantinople now was, of Alarich, the Goth, his quitting of the more Eaſtern Provinces, and drawing down toward the Weſt. He had, now, for a long time, harraſed the Countries of Epirus and Pannonia, with other Regions: and his Succeſs ſo animated him, that, thinking no Enterprize too great for him to undertake, he thought of no leſs than invading Italy; nay, of ſetting upon, and captivating the Lady and Miſtreſs of the World her ſelf. He told his Men, that it would become them, rather to get Kingdoms of their own, than to ſerve in the Dominions of others. That Italy was near at hand, a Country, not only, full of Wealth and Spoil; but very fit alſo, wherein to ſettle and inhabit. That he was reſolved to invade it now that it was not at all fortified, or prepared againſt ſuch an Attempt; and not thence to depart, till he had taken and rifled Rome: where innumerable Riches, raked out of the whole World, had, throughout ſo many Ages, been hoarded up. They, with a great noiſe, teſtified their Applauſe to what he ſaid; and encouraged him to undertake the Expedition: Which, that he might with more Courage do, they choſe him, not only their General, but their King; and prepared for the intended March.

Alarich reſolved to march for Italy.

129. He reſolved to let Summer be paſt before he would ſet forward, that he might make War in Italy in Winter time; the rigour of which he & his Goths could well endure, as born in cold and remote parts: But he thought it would go very hard with the Italians, if forced to be in the Field, and endure the Hardſhips of War in that Seaſon. Having got together a ſufficient Army, conſiſting of Goths, Huns, Alans, and other Barbarous Nations, he quitted the lower Pannonia, and marched ſtrait into the upper Province, as far as Noricum, and the Alpes; which he eaſily made himſelf Maſter of; for, thence he drove Ætius, who commanded thoſe Paſſages: And underſtanding that Honorius, the Emperor, was in Liguria, he paſſed through the Foreſt of Tridentum, or Trent; and toward the end of Auguſt, arrived in Venetia: Directing his Courſe toward Addua, he eaſily ſubdued the Cities of that Quarter. Having paſſed the River by a Bridge, with which he left a ſufficient Power of Men to guard it, he marched for Liguria; and haſted to the River Padus, to come as ſpeedily as might be, to Haſta; where he heard that Honorius, at preſent, lay.

He makes for the place where he heard Honorius lay.

SECT. II.

The Second Step to the Ruin of the Empire.

From the firſt Invaſion of Italy, By the Goths; to the firſt taking of Rome by that Barbarous People.

Containing the ſpace of eight Years.

Upon the Rumor the people ſiezed with Conſternation.

THE Rumour of the Invaſion of Italy, though but yet deſigned, being ſpred abroad; incredible it is, with what Conſternation, the minds of all Men there, were ſiezed; as not accuſtomed to ſuch Attempts. And, as fear is always ingenious, if not to invent, yet to patronize all pretended Omens; all ſtrange things that of late time had happened, were very ſadly rehearſed in diſcourſe, by one Neighbour to another. One talked of ſeveral Monſters newly produced to the view and admiration of the World: and, according to his Ethnick Religion, diſcourſed of the Thunders lately heard, of what the Sibylline Propheſies foretold to happen about this time; and what ill luck the Birds by their inauſpicate Voices and Geſtures, did portend. Others, more Philoſophically, argued the Empire to be in extreme danger, from the frequent paſſions of the Moon; which the Vulgar believed to proceed from other Cauſes, than the interpoſition of the Earth betwixt her and the Sun. They related, what ſtrange Hailſtones, of an unuſual bigneſs they had ſeen: told how Bees, at an unſeaſonable time, attempted to ſwarm; and called to mind, how a Comet of extraordinary bigneſs and ſhape had lately appeared. But, above all, the ſtrange ſight of two Wolves moſt affected them: which, when the Emperor was riding abroad, preſented themſelves to his view, and had the courage to ſet upon the Company. Being received upon the points of Spears and Swords, they were eaſily diſpatched; but when their bellies were opened, there appeared two hands of a Man; in one a Right, and in the other a Left; bloody, and with the fingers ſtretched out. This Prodigy they concluded, did threaten Rome, the Founder whereof was nouriſhed by a Shee Wolf, though the Poet applies it to the Victory afterward obtained. They now began, he ſaith, to reckon and caſt up the Age of the City; and they cut off part of the time, and anticipated the term of twelve hundred Years predicted by the Augurs. This, indeed, was but the MCLV year of the City; but the term now began to approach; and we ſhall find, that the gueſs happened to be very unlucky. But, whereas Claudian ſpeaks, amongſt other ill-boding things, of frequent Eclipſes of the Moon; this Luminary, indeed, this year, was twice eclipſed, viz. on the firſt day of June, and on the twenty ſixth of November following.

Vide Claudian de Bello Getico, a v.227.

Sed malus Interpres rerum metus omne trahebat Augurium pejore via, truncataque membra Nutricemque lupam, Romæ regnoque minari. a v.262. Territat aſſiduus lunæ labor.

The People of Rhætia revolt.

2. To the terrors that aroſe from ſuch like things, this real diſadvantage was added; that the people inhabiting Rhætia, now, either excited by the Goths, or led thereto by their own inclination and hopes, revolted. Stilicho, to obviate all theſe miſchiefs,

Sect. 2.

A. D. 402.

miſchiefs, had cauſed the Cities to be well fortified with Walls; Eſpecially Rome, of which, is ſtill extant an old Inſcription, in a Stone, erected to the memory of Arcadius and Honorius, For repairing the Walls, Gates and Towers of the Eternal City, with the Exportation of an Immenſe Quantity of Rubbiſh; from the Suggeſtion of the moſt Famous and Illuſtrious Stilicho, Miles & Magiſter utriuſque Militiæ: This was done by the care of A. Macrobius Longinianus, Præfect of the City. Stilicho alſo took care for reducing the Rhætians. But, when Alarich was once entred Italy, Rome ſeemed to the Inhabitants to be already taken: the noiſe and terror flew as far as from Gades, to Brittain; and theſe, though moſt remote, ſeemed to tremble. The very Itch of Covetouſneſs now ſeemed to abate, when the greater care of the very life and ſubſiſtence it ſelf, was now moſt prevalent. They carried their Wealth Aboard: The Caves in the remoteſt Rocks ſeemed, now, the beſt places of Retirement. Sicily, and other Iſlands, they thought of; but Sicily was thought to be too near at hand: and, as the Poet expreſſeth it, it wiſhed it ſelf, if Nature would bear it, more remote; and removed as far as into the Ionian Sea. In ſumm, ſuch as lived in the more remote parts of Italy, thought of flying into Sicily, Sardinia, Corſica, or other places of Retirement, which the Mediterranean afforded: And ſuch as dwelt in Venetia, and near to the Adriatick; if neceſſity ſhould compel them, reſolved to evade the Storm, by betaking themſelves into the little Iſlands of that Gulf. And the very Court of Honorius was in no leſs fear and deſparation, when they perceived, that to them the Barbarian directed his Courſe; urging and contending, that the ſafeſt place they could fly to, was Gall. Indeed, the Event was anſwerable fully, to the horrour that ſiezed on their minds: for, though the Barbarian, at his Entrance, received ſome Rebuke; yet Italy, which for ſo many Ages had been in Repoſe, and a Terror to all other Countries, from this time, forward, became the Subject of all ſorts of Calamities, and never was at quiet; but, for very many years, afforded Examples of ſtrange and frequent Revolutions, of the Viciſſitude and Inconſtancy of Humane Affairs.

Upon the Entrance of Alarich into Italy.

They of Rome give all for loſt.

Vide apud Baronium ad hunc An. n. 50.

Famaque nigrantes ſuccincta pavoribus alas
Secum cuncta trahens, a Gadibus uſque Britannum.
Terruit Oceanum & noſtro procul axe remotam Inſolito belli tremefecit murmure Thulen.
a v. 201.
Ipſa etiam diſſiſa brevi Trinacria Ponto
Si rerum natura ſinat diſcedere longe Optat & Ionium refugo laxare Peloro.

3. The only man that gave any hopes of Comfort, and proved another Stator to the Romans, was Stilicho: who, if you believe Claudian, alſo proved both Prophet and Captain, as to their preſervation from this one ſhock, ſo much apprehended. He ſhewed them, by the example of governing a Ship in a Tempeſt, that it was not now time to complain; and, like Women, make a noiſe; with which the Wind and Seas would not at all be appeaſed: but every one was to lay his hand to the Sails, to contribute to the well ſteering and guiding of the Ship, and the emptying out of thoſe Waves it had received thorough Leaks. He told them, there was no ſuch cauſe for deſpair, if, while the Roman Forces were employed in Rhætia, the Goths had perfidiouſly broken into the Country; having learnt their way over the Alpes in the late Rebellious times; wherein, indeed, Alarich ſerved Theodoſius with a Band of his Men, againſt Eugenius: And, as the Poet truly obſerves, the diſcord of the Romans, gave occaſion to the War with the Barbarians. He further encouraged them, by the Fortune and Succeſs, which ever had followed Italy, againſt the Attempts of Foreigners; and convinced them, that he, in the capacity he ſtood, of Father, and Father in Law, had as fair a ſtake to loſe as any of them: And, perceiving it was ſo by the Emperor his continuing with them, as it were an Hoſtage of Fate, they were the more ſatisfied. For, Stilicho, leaving Honorius and his Courtiers, inſtructed how beſt to make their Defence, took his way for Rhætia; and paſſing, by Boat, the Lake Larius, in the hardeſt Winter went over the Mountains, covered with Snow and Ice: and eaſily, by the awe of his Preſence and Voice, reduced the Revolters to their former Obedience: who, at the ſight of him, were no otherwiſe affected, than a company of Servants are wont to be at their Maſter's returning: Who, imagining him dead, or at a diſtance, were up in all ſorts of Jollity and Divertiſements, and throwing the Houſe out at the Windows. He convinced them what folly it was to take advantage at the War now made by the Goths; as if Rome had not both Power, and Encouragement enough from former Experience, to ſuppreſs two Enemies at the ſame time. And, he inſtanced in King Philip; who, out of vain hope, fell out with the Romans, at ſuch time as they were deeply engaged with Hannibal; and paid dearly for this Experience, that Powerful Princes and States are not to be irritated and provoked, though they be in preſent trouble.

Stilicho appeaſes them.

Solus erat Stilicho qui deſperantibus Augur Sponderet meliore manu: dubiæque ſalutis Dux idem vateſque fuit, &c. a v. 267. De Bello Getico.
Non ſi perfidia nacti penetrabile tempus
Irrupere Getæ, noſtras dum Rhætia vires Occupat, atque alio deſudant marte cohortes, Idcirco ſpes omnis abit, &c.
——aditaſque ſequendos
Barbarico Romana dedit diſcordia bello.

4. Having eaſily brought them off by ſuch perſwaſions, he then ſet himſelf to the raiſing of a convenient Army; which, ſome ſay, amounted to about thirty five thouſand Men. This number ſeemed to him ſufficient, as being much of the ſame opinion with Alexander; who, when he might have raiſed out of Macedonia, Illyri-

Sect. 2.

A. D. 402.

cum and Greece, vaſt Forces; never cared for more than forty thouſand: eſteeming a greater number not eaſie to be managed. Thoſe Companies that had lately defended Rhætia, preſently came to him; and that Legion was ſent for, which guarded the Roman Borders here in Brittain, againſt the fierce Scots and Picts; to which, afterward, were joyned the Troops that guarded the Limits, againſt the yellow Sicambri, as he terms them; againſt the Chatti and Cheruſci. All theſe left their Stations, and the Rhine now naked, and void of all Defence, to be guarded by the terrour of the Roman Name alone. And, the Poet makes it a thing incredible, almoſt, to Poſterity; that Germany, in former times, having ſuch fierce and terrible people, which ſcarcely could be kept in Awe and Order by the Emperors themſelves in Perſon, though applying their whole Force and Induſtry; ſhould now be ſo tame and gentle under the Government of Stilicho, as not to make a ſtep over the Limit, whence the Garriſon-Soldiers, who ſerved in the Prætenturæ, were removed. But Stilicho, with his new Army, returning into Liguria; a new vigour, and freſh Colour, returned alſo into the Members and Cities of Italy. Honorius, in the mean time, while he ſo behaved himſelf in Rhætia; ſet himſelf alſo, as well as he could, to make proviſion againſt this furious Invaſion of Alarich: and that was, “by impoſing upon ſuch Honorati as had obtained their Honours by Privileges, Favour, or Interpoſition of other Men, the finding of Juniores, Tirones, or new Soldiers. From this Indiction, or Impoſition, he excepts ſuch Perſons as had obtained Honour by their own Labour and Induſtry in diſcharging Offices; not by the way of Codicils and Indulgence.”

Venit & extremis Legio prætenta Britannis Qui Scoto dat fræna truci ferroque notatas Perlegit exangues Picto moriente figuras. a v. 416.

Ullanè Poſteritas credat? Germania quondam Illa ferox populis, &c.

L. 15. de Tironibus, Cod. Th. Dat. 3. Id. Decemb. Rav.

Young Theodoſius Conſul.

A. D. 403.

Theodoſio A. & Rumorido, Conſ.

5. The year CCCCIII had Theodoſius Auguſtus and Rumoridus for Conſuls. Of the Eaſt and Arcadius we hear nothing further this year, than of his adorning his young Son with the Conſulſhip. He was now at eaſe, the great Tempeſt of the Barbarous Nations being diverted upon Italy, and the Weſtern Provinces; and yet, though he was at leiſure enough to make Laws, there is not one extant that appears to be his; all of them that the Code now exhibits, bearing Date from Ravenna, except one from Milan; for, to Ravenna, as we formerly ſaid, Honorius now tranſlated his Imperial Seat. Yet, when Stilicho returned out of Rhætia, he is ſaid to have been beſieged in Haſta, by Alarich; and to that place, probable it is, that he betook himſelf for ſome time, the Scituation and Strength of it inviting him; although the Law, lately mentioned, about the raiſing of Soldiers, at the beginning of December, bears date from Ravenna alſo. However, from ſuch Intelligence as we have, this we gather; that Stilicho, knowing what danger he was in, haſted to his relief with all diligence, at ſuch time as Alarich, in the ſeverity of Winter, threatned him with a Siege; hoping, by terrour thereof, to wreſt ſome unequal Conditions out of him. But Honorius took Courage, in hopes of Relief, and the coming of his Father in Law: who, when he arrived, found that he was excluded from coming at him by the Enemy; who had ſiezed on the Paſſage and the Bridge, that lay over Addua, a great River, which, riſing out of the Lake Larius, pours it ſelf, at length, into Padus. There was no delay to be uſed in ſo deſperate a condition as now the Emperor was; And, yet, Stilicho had no great Force with him, for haſte, having left his Army, and adventured back with a few Attendants. But, he brake through the middle of the Enemy; making way with his Sword, and carried on by the inſtigation of his pious Valour, he eſcaped beyond all hope, and got ſafe to the place which he deſigned. The very day of his Arrival, uncertain by whoſe report, a rumour was ſpread abroad in Rome that he was returned; and great joy therefore was expreſſed by the Citizens; though it could not be greater, than what the Court had reaſon to conceive. On the other ſide, Alarich, with his Goths, were moved by the contrary paſſion; perceiving ſuch an Army to be at his back. He imagined himſelf caught, as it were, in a Net; he began to repent that he had ſet his foot on Italian Ground: and the great Ambition he had of ſeeing and taking Rome, as forſaken by hope, now alſo grew feeble in him. He called a Council of War, conſiſting of ancient and experienced Officers: and the Long-haired Fathers aſſembled, the Pelled Court (or wearing Skins) now ſat; comely by the number of their Skars; the Spear governs their trembling ſteps; and old Age, not yet diſarmed, in ſtead of a Staff, leans upon long Weapons. Thus the Poet expreſſeth the cuſtom of theſe Barbarous People, of wearing Swords, or ſuch like Arms, in Sheaths or Scabberds; ſo as they might uſe them as Staves, or otherwiſe, for Defence; a thing, alſo, uſually practiſed in theſe days, with us.

Stilicho relieves Honorius beſieged by Alarich.

——mediumque per hoſtem Flammatus virtute pia, propriæque ſalutis Immemor, & ſtricto proſternens obvia ferro, Barbara fulmineo ſecuit tentoria curſu. Claud. in 6. Conſ. Honorii, a v. 466.

Crinigeri ſedere Patres pellita Getarum Curia, quos plagis decorat numeroſa cicatrix Et tremulos regit haſta gradus & nititur altis. Pro baculo contis non exarmata Senectus.

6. The Poet now introduceth an old Man of the Company, ſpeaking great things in behalf of Rome; and telling him, how, for thirty years, from the time they

Sect. 2.

A. D. 403.

they paſſed Iſter, they had had ſeveral Difficulties wherewith to incounter, but never were they ſo diſtreſſed as at this time; and he adviſeth him to leave off the Enterpriſe and not entertain ſo arrogant thoughts, as to imagine that Rome could be ſubdued, againſt which whoſoever made War, came always off on the looſing hand. In concluſion he bids him take heed of Stilicho, who ever had the fortune to ſuppreſs Injuſtice, who as he well knew, had made great ſlaughter of their men in Arcadia, made the Rivers of Greece hot with their Blood, and had deſtroyed Alarich, but that the Treachery and Favour of the Eaſtern Empire protected him, under the umbrage and pretext of Laws. With this free diſcourſe of the old Man he was utterly inraged, and in a fury told him that he might thank his decrepit Age that he went unpuniſhed. Should he, who put to flight ſo many Emperors, as the River Hebrus could witneſs, now run away at his perſwaſion? He? before whom Mountains debaſed themſelves, and Rivers were dried up. By his Gothick Gods and the Ghoſts of his Parents he ſwore, that he would not turn his Back, but would either be a Conqueror and Reign in this Country, or elſe lay his Bones in it. He had overran ſo many Countries, had broken through the Alpes and fetched Water from Padus in his victorius Helmet, and now what was remaining but that he ſhould take Rome alſo? He ſaid their Nation had been ſtrong enough, even before it truſted to Armes. But now that Illyricum was in his Power, and the Inhabitants had choſen him their General; ſuch a number of Weapons, Swords and Helmets, he had obtained by the Sweat of the Thracians, having legally converted the Income of Iron, received formerly by the Romans, to his own uſe. They whom he continually, for ſeveral Years, harraſed, and were given up to ſerve him, with Sighs had delivered up their Arms; and their Steel being wrought with Art and Labour, now was forged and faſhioned to harm themſelves by the lamenting Smith. Together with theſe things he bade them conſider how the Gods themſelves adviſed him to the Enterpriſe, not by any Dreams or Augury, but by a plain Audible Voice uttered from a Grove, which bad him be gon without delay; for this Year he ſhould break through the Alpes, and pierce as far as Rome it ſelf.

7. Being incouraged by predictions, away he marched, and came to a River called Urbs, where, by the event, he was taught what Ambiguity there was in ſuch ſayings. And Stilicho was not far behind, animating his Soldiers as he went. He deſired them now to be revenged for the violating of Italy, for their Emperors being beſieged (which he termed wickedneſs) and to aboliſh the diſgrace which the paſſing of the Alpes had procured. This was the Enemy whom they had ſo often defeated in Greece, who had been protected by Civil diſcord and hatred, and not by any Power of his own; though he was fallacious and made nothing of breaking his Word, or Perjury. He bad them believe that now all the Nations which either direful Britain, Iſter or the Rhine nouriſhed, ſtood at gaze; that they ſhould therefore by one Fight obtain ſo many Victories, and gain ſo many Battells, repair the Roman Glory and underprop the Empire now in a ſinking Condition, as with their Shoulders. They were not now in Thrace, nor waged War in the remote parts of Greece, but the War was brought into their own Bowels, nay into the Heart it ſelf; he prayed them therefore to protect Father Tiber with their Targets. This Claudian poetically; but, from whoſe Poetry much may be learned concerning this War, of which we have ſo little account from others. It's certain that Stilicho purſuing Alarich in this manner, they met and ingaged near a place called Pollentia ſome ſeven Miles diſtant from Haſta. From Oroſius it appears that one Saul a Pagan and Barbarian had the chief Command, who concluding that the Goths (who were Chriſtians though Arians, whatever Claudian as a Poet and a Pagan ſings of their Gods) would not fight on Eaſter Day, out of reſpect to their Religion, choſe that very day to fall upon them. They being thus compelled to fly to their Arms, Fought with greater Animoſity, and received him with ſuch reſolution, that him they ſlew and put his Men to the Rout. Claudian makes mention of an Alan by Nation, one moſt eminent amongſt that People which now ſerved in this Expedition, to whom Nature had given great Courage, though but ſmall Limbs, and a terrible Look, whoſe Face was all furrowed with Wounds. He by orders received from Stilicho, came in all haſte with his Horſe, and loſt his Life in Italy. He terms him happy, worthy of the Elyſian Fields, and to be Celebrated in Verſe; who, though by his death burnt with a deſire to purge his ſuſpected Fidelity, and with his Blood waſhed off that undeſerved Stain, the Sword it ſelf being Judge.

Credite nunc omnes quas dira Britannia gentes, Quas Iſter quas Rhenus alit, pendere paratas In ſpeculis, uno tot prælia Vincite bello. a v. 558. Lib. de Bello Getic.

A Fight at Haſta not far from Pollentia.

Taceo de Alarico rege cum Gothis ſuis ſæpe victo ſæpe concluſo ſemperq; dimiſſo. Taceo de infelicibus illis apud Polentiam geſtis, quum barbaro et Pagano duci, hoc eſt Sauli, ſumma belli commiſſa eſt; cujus improbitate reverendiſſimi dies et ſanctum Paſcha violatum eſt. Cedentiq; hoſti propter religionem ut pugnaret extortum eſt. lib. 7. c. 37.

8. With

Sect. 2.

A.D. 403.

8. With his Death, the Horſe he commanded was ſo diſordered, that they turned Tail and ran away; and the whole Wing might have miſcarried, had not Stilicho come ſeaſonably in with the Legions. He cauſed the Horſe to rally, and the Fight was renewed with great Animoſity and Violence on both ſides. A bloodyer Battel had not been fought for many Years, the Soldier being ſo thirſty after Blood, if we believe Claudian, that he diſpiſed that great Wealth which he found in the Enemies Camp; ſo intent was he upon the purſuite. But here were recovered many Captives, and the Poet tells us that the Purple Robes of Valens were found amongſt their Treaſure, with abundance of Plate which the Goths had plundered in their Ranſacking of the rich Cities of Greece. For after a grievous Conteſt they gave Ground, and being utterly routed, great ſlaughter was made of them though they diſperſed themſelves many Waies; and this one Day, as the Poet ſings, made amends for what Miſchief the Romans had endured for thirty Years. Stilicho might have intercepted the Flight of the Goths, and as the Fame went, have deſtroyed Alarich: but whether he ſuffered him to live and be reſerved, for ſome uſe he intended to make of him afterwards; or for that he would not make them deſperate, he ſuffered them to eſcape, and making an Agreement with them, commanded they ſhould depart Italy. Alarich obeyed ſo far as to draw off his Men, now reduced to the half of their former number, toward Verona, but it ſeems would ſtir no farther, but brake the Agreement, (by which he was, as ſome ſay, to retire into Gall,) and perfidiouſly made preparations for another Fight. Stilicho was not at great diſtance, being now more willing to engage than formerly, becauſe the Enemy was drawn off farther from Rome, and the River Padus was betwixt them. And engage they did in another bloody Battel, wherein the Romans had as great advantage as before they had had either at Pollentia or Haſta. Alarich narrowly eſcaped by the ſwiftneſs of his Horſe, and with the remainder of his Army fled to the Mountains, which he attempted to paſs for Rhætia or Gall. But, Stilicho there oppoſed himſelf, and kept him in; ſo long, till he and his Goths were ſo much diſtreſſed that after many opprobrius Words, moſt of his Men forſook him, ſome making their eſcape, and others going over to the Romans. He perceiving himſelf thus forſaken, before it ſhould be too late, withdrew himſelf from the Hill and retired beyond the Alpes, notwithſtanding Stilicho was ſtill at his Heels as Claudian Writes; who though he flatters him as his great Patron, yet was ſenſible enough of the Suſpition he lay under, of willfully letting Alarich eſcape. The greateſt account we have of this firſt Invaſion is from him; Zoſimus, ſo careful an Hiſtorian he was, not making the leaſt mention of it.

Stilicho gets a notable Victory.

A ſecond as conſiderable as that.

Altius haud unquam toto deſcendimus enſe In jugulum Scythiæ, tanta nec clade ſuperbum Contudimus Tanain nec cornua fregimus Iſtri. a v.601.

——unoq; die Romana rependit Quicquid ter denis alies amiſimus annis. a v. 633.

Conceſſaq; ſibi (rerum ſic admonet uſus) Luce tot amiſſis ſociis atq; omnibus una Direptis opibus Latio diſcedere juſſus, Hoſtis. &c. de 6 Conſ. Honorii a v. 128.

Tu quoq; non parvum Getico, Verona triumpho Adjungis Cumulum: nec plus Pollentia rebus Contulit Auſoniis aut Mœnia vindicis Aſtæ. Hic rurſus dum pacta movet, damniſq; coactus Extremo mutare parat præſentia caſu Nil ſibi perjurum ſenſit prodeſſe furorem. a v.202.

9. That Alarich his men ſhould forſake him in ſo deſperate a Condition as his Affaires ſtood in, is no wonder, if we conſider the humour of the Emperors Soldiers themſelves during the trouble and danger of the War. They ordinarily ran from their Colours, and though they were on the winning ſide, yet were ſtill deſerting the Service. Which cauſed Honorius by ſeveral Laws directed to Hadrian the Præctus Prætorio of Italy, to provide againſt ſo pernicious a Practice. Toward the end of February he gave directions how ſuch Deſertors ſhould be pro-“ ceeded againſt. Being apprehended, he would have them carried before the or“ dinary Judge of the Province, who muſt hear and examine the matter, and if“ he find the Party guilty, commit him to Priſon; then ſend up the Examination“ and Confeſſion to the Præfefeus Prætorio, that the Magiſtri Militum, the prop-“ er Judges of Soldiers might determine what ſhould be agreeable to Juſtice. In“ caſe any be diſcovered and make reſiſtance, he orders, that as Rebells, they may“ be killed: he commands the ordinary Judge that in his Examination he inquire“ ſtrictly into the Paſſeports or Letters of Miſſion, which they often forged; and“ that the Laws againſt Concealers, or ſuch as harbor theſe Fugitives, be put in“ Execution.“ But ſo ſlow, it ſeems, the Judges were in executing the Laws; or ſo little effect came of it, that the Emperor thought fit five Months after, to revive a Law made by his Father ten Years before, againſt theſe Concealers, where-“ by the Grounds of ſuch as harboured Deſertors ſhould be Confiſcated, if the“ Lords knew of their lurking therein; if they were ignorant of it, then their“ Baliffes or Officers ſhould be ſeverely puniſhed; which he extends alſo to his“ own Servants belonging to his Domaine.“ Yet ſtill was the Diſeaſe ſo infectious that theſe Remedies would do no good; which put the Emperor upon farther Applications. Some ſix Weeks after, he gave leave to all the Provincials to“ riſe up and ſieſe upon theſe Runaways, and if they made reſiſtance, to kill them,“ no otherwiſe than as publique Thieves and Robbers. But he exempts from“ their

Honorius makes Laws againſt Deſertors.

L.11. De Deſertor. & Occultatorib. eorum. Cod. Th. lib.7. tit. 18. Dat.6. Cal. Mart. Rav.

L.12. Ejuſ tit. Dat.8. Cal. Aug. Rav.

L.L 13. 14. Ejuſd. tit. Dat.6. Non. Octob.

A. D. 403.

their Power ſuch Soldiers as were newly raiſed, in caſe they made any eſcape.“ For the courſe was, that if a Tiro or newly raiſed Soldier ran away within a Year, he that ſent him ſhould pay the value in Mony; and now if ſuch were killed by the Provincials, they that found them ſhould endure the loſs; and beſides, theſe young men could not ſo properly be ſaid yet to have deſerted the Service, as not to have come up to it. In Concluſion he will have the Primates of all Cities, Villages, and Caſtles, to know, that Concealers ought to be proceeded againſt according to“ the Laws made by his Father.

Prohibits Bakers to marry with other Perſons.

L.21.De Piſtorib.Cod. Th.Dat. 8.Id.Mart. Rav. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

10. What reaſon or occaſion was given for making theſe Laws, is more evident, than that which moved Honorius, this Year to direct another to Vitalis the Prefectus Annonæ concerning the marriages of Bakers. By this he ordains that it“ ſhall be unlawful for any Baker and his Children to marry with any private“ Perſons, and particularly with Players, or the Aurigæ or Chariot drivers in the“ Circenſian Games; although the Bakers themſelves ſhould conſent, nay though“ ſome Reſcript might be ſurreptitiouſly obtained. If any ſhould tranſgreſs this“ Order, he commands that he be whipped, and after that undergo the Pain of“ Deportation; and if the Office of the Prefect be not vigilant to prevent it, for“ every Family, it ſhall incur a Fine of ten Pounds of Gold. And all that marry“ the Daughters of Bakers ſhall immediatly be appropiated to that Body. By pri-“ vate Perſons are meant, all that were not of that Corporation, and of theſe, the Stage Players and Chariot-drivers are particularly excepted, who either lived near to the Bakers in the ſame Region of the City; or elſe by their Arts had ſuch peculiar ways of Wooing and Mariage, as was not conſiſtent with the publique ſafety. To be ſure the Chariot-drivers were in a very ill Name, being ſuſpected as guilty of dangerous contrivances for bringing about their ends, and particularly of Magick, as we have ſeen heretofore. This Law concerned the Bakers, the Players and the Chariot-drivers of Rome, who this Year had the more to do, by reaſon of Honorius his going thither in Perſon after the Defeat of Alarich and his Goths. The Senate and People were inflamed with a deſire of ſeeing him; and had often requeſted that he would do them the Honour; but either for that he did not like the place, or for other reaſons, he had refuſed. After the Defeate of Gildo they expected in vain that he would have entred Rome in Triumph, but now that ſo great a Victory was obtained over the Goths, he could not reſiſt their Importunity, but conſent to give them the ſatisfaction of once more beholding ſuch a ſolemnity. And from Ravenna he departed toward the latter end of the Year, and by the way of the Adriatick Shore took his Journey toward the City by Fanum Fortunæ, Metaurus, Petra Pertuſa, Jovis Delubrum, the River Clitumnus (famous for a brood of white Horſes, which were much made uſe of in Triumphs and publique Entries) and Narnia (ſo named form the River Nar which ran below it into Tiber) a City placed upon the Mountains on the Via Flaminia, where, the report was, that the fall of Rain was wont to raiſe a Duſt. At his Entry into Rome he was received with triumphal Arches, a proſpect of new Walls, and elegant Turretts. But whereas at ſuch triumphal Solemnities, it was the cuſtome for the Senate and thoſe of Patritian Blood to greet the Emperor and walk before his Chariot, he forbad any ſuch Ceremony to be uſed towards him.

Acrior interea viſendi Principis ardor Accendit cum plebe patres et ſæpe negatum Flagitat adventum. Claud.

He enters Rome in Triumph.

Romanos vetuit currum præcedere Patres.

And his ſixth Conſulſhip.

A. D. 404.

Honorio A.6. & Ariſtæneto Coſſ.

11. So we are brought by Honorius to Rome, and to his ſixth Conſulſhip, which here he entred, having Ariſtænetus for his Colleague, in the CCCCIV Year of our Lord. The People were overjoyed to behold him, and eſpecially upon ſuch an occaſion. Being elevated alſo by the late Victory over Alarich, they bethought themſelves of their old Sæcular Games, which had been neglected ſince the Days of Conſtantine; and the Pagans by their Importunity prevailed that now they might be Celebrated, though it was not at the due time. For theſe Games were, as we have formerly ſhown, to be Celebrated at every hundred and tenth Year. It's true, Domitian broke the Rule, and anticipated in ſix Years; for he Celebrated them in the eight hundred forty firſt Year of the City, whereas he ought to have deferred them to the forty ſeventh. But Severus ſet them right again, Celebrating them not till the nine hundred fifty ſeventh Year of the City, or of our Lord the CCIV: from which, two hundred intervened to the ſixth Conſulſhip of Honorius, and ſo thoſe Sæcular Games which ſhould not have been obſerved but every hundred and tenth Year, were confounded with the Centenaries; but glad were the ſuperſtitious Romans to have them any time or way. For Honorius, it's ſaid, would not permit any Pagan Rites to be obſerved, only the Games wont to be had in the Theatre and in the Cirque, to which Claudian adds the

He permits the Sæcular Games to be Celebrated.

Ludi ἑκάτονκαιδεκατεῖς non cum centenariis confundendi. Unde Iacob. Cappellum ad h. An.

Sect. 2.

A. D. 404.

the Exerciſe of the Military Men in the Campus Martius. Nay it's believed that this very Year he took away the cruel Combates of the Gladiators, with which all good natured Perſons could not but be offended. He continued at Rome, till Auguſt at leaſt, as appears from five Conſtitutions which bare Date from this City, and this Conſulſhip, being directed to Hadrian the Pæfectus Prætorio. One of theſe relates to War, though in time of Peace, declaring that no Perſon or Perſons whatever“ ſhall be excuſed from Contributing to the Baking of the Buccellatum or Bisket for“ Soldiers, and the removal of the military Annona, or Proviſions, from place to place“ as occaſion ſhall Serve; no not the Domaine or Patrimony of the Emperor him-“ ſelf. If the Baily or Officer of any Lord neglected to do this Duty, he muſt be“ grievouſly puniſhed, and the Lord himſelf, if knowing, pay the fourefold of what“ is due from his Land.“ For this was the Burthen of the Soile, and paid in Mony by the Provincials; the Bread it ſelf or Bisket, being Baked by ſeveral Bodies of Bakers deſtinated to this Work in the Provinces, who had their own Præpoſiti or Overſeers.

He will have none excuſed from certain ſervices due to the Army.

L. 2. De excoctione & tranſlatione Annonarum Cod. Th. lib. 7. tit. 5. & L. 2. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. 8. Cal. Apr. Romæ.

12. We do not find that by any Law Enacted now, he ſought to reward or gratify the People of Rome, except it was by one made in favour of the Decuriæ or Bodies, as we have ſaid, of Scribes of ſeveral ſorts, as Librarii, Fiſcales and Cenſuales. It's directed to Exſuperentius, Julius and the reſt of the Decuriales or Judg-“ es, (being the chiefeſt in the Offices) and confirms to them the Privileges for-“ merly granted them either by his Father or the former Princes; ſo as no ordi-“ nary Judges or Governors of Provinces, to whom he will have notice be given“ and who were wont to infringe them, ſhall offer them any corporal Injuries, by“ ſubjecting them to queſtions by Torture, or hinder them of their juſt Profits and“ Emoluments.“ In the mean time, while there was nothing but Joy and Triumphs at Rome; the City of Conſtantinople was in far different humour, by reaſon of a Picque which Eudoxia the Empreſs, had to John Chryſoſtome the Biſhop. He had inveighed againſt a Statue erected on a column of Porphyry near the Church of St. Sophia, to her memory; with which ſhe was ſo netled, that for this and other provocations ſhe pretended, ſhe ſo far incenſed her Husband, that ſeveral Biſhops were ſent for to Conſtantinople, and amongſt others, Theophilus of Alexandria, on purpoſe to depoſe him, which they did accordingly, and having put one Arſacius into his place, he was baniſhed to Cucuſus. The People, whom, as Zoſimus tells us, he had a wonderful Art in pleaſing, fell into great tumults; and on the other ſide Arcadius obnoxious to his Wife (a proud, high Woman) and if you will believe that Writer, wonderful dull and ſilly, forbade their meetings. After the baniſhment of the Biſhop, a great Fire happened in the City, which his Enemies attributed to the Contrivance of his Party; and they to that of thoſe that ejected him; and many Examinations were had hereupon, and ſeveral Perſons tortured, for Finding out, or elſe concealing the Truth. For this purpoſe ſeveral Edicts we find this Year made, which with the occaſion of them, being of Eccleſiaſtical Concernment, we muſt refer to that Hiſtory. Of one we ſhall only take notice, which was made upon this occaſion; that thoſe that they called Fabricenſes, or belonged to the publique forgers, were entertained by the Lords of Grounds, to be their Bailies, or to hire, or till their Lands. This tending to a double Miſcheif, in that the publique work of making Armes was thereby neglected, and the materials of Iron and other Mettalls ſtolne and diverted to private uſes, he tells Anthemius the Magiſter Officiorum, that ſuch Entertainer for the future ſhall looſe ſuch ground, as is intruſted with ſuch a Fabricenſis, which ſhall be confiſcate, and the Party ſo entertained, incur a Mulct of two pounds of Gold.

Favours the Decuriæ of Rome.

L. 4. De Decuriis urbis Romæ. Cod. Th. & L. 2. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. 8. Id. Jul.

John Chryſoſtome Baniſhed.

L. 5. De Fabricen. lib. 9. Cod. Th. lib. 10. tit. 22. Dat. 3. Cal. Aug. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

A. D. 405.

Stilichone 2, & Anthemio Coſſ.

13. The Year CCCCV of our Lord had Stilicho the ſecond time and Anthemius for Conſuls. Honorius was now returned to Ravenna, where he was given to underſtand that notwithſtanding all the order and courſe that had been taken for confiſcating the Eſtate and Patrimony of Gildo and his Aſſociates for ſeaven Years; yet ſeveral of their Poſſeſſions were ſtill held and concealed by private Men to the diſgrace as well as the loſs of the Government. To give all the remedy he could, he iſſued out an order to Urſicinus, his Comes S. L. requiring all diligence to be uſed for diſcovering and Confiſcating the remainder, and for both an incouragement and terror to Concealers, ordered that whoſoever would come in“ and confeſs, ſhould only pay the profits they had received, without incurring any“ Mulct or Puniſhment; but if they came not before the firſt of October following, they“ ſhould forfeit the double value both of what they poſſeſſed and alſo of the Fruits“ or Proffits redounding from it. By this and other Laws it appears how bold ſome Perſons were in theſe Days, upon the ſuppreſſion of a Tyrant or publique Enemy, Honorius indeavours to recover the Eſtate of Gildo.

L. 19. De bonis Proſcrip Cod. Th. Dat. 12. Cal. Maj.

Sect. 2.

A. D. 406.

my; either to conceal their Goods or Lands, or to ſeize on them, as by publick Authority; which was conſtrained, afterward, to force them to ſhew their Titles. But, in ſuch diſorder did Africk ſtill continue, that, to redreſs the Inconveniences thereof, the Emperor, in whoſe Diſtrict it lay, was well nigh put to as much trouble, as for all the other Provinces belonging to him. Yet, had the Proconſul thereof power of Appeal from other ordinary Judges; and to determine of matters, Vice Sacra, as they termed it, ſince the beginning of the Reign of Conſtantine; though, before, as well he, as the reſt, were appealed from, to the Præfect of the City. Honorius, now, to ſave himſelf the trouble, as well as Appellants, the Labour and Charge; declared to Diotimus, the preſent Proconſul, That he would “have this cuſtom obſerved, which now he terms ancient: Adding withal, that he ſhould receive Appeals from the Gentiles, or their Commanders; who, being raiſed out of Barbarous Nations, watched at the Limits of the Empire; which was a ſingular Prerogative.“

He reſtores Appeals to the Proconſul of Africk.

L.6a.de Appellat.&c.Cod.Th. Dat.11.Cal. Rav. Abeſt à Cod.Juſt.

14. Arcadius this year, from Conſtantinople, took a Progreſs into Bithynia and Galacia. At Nice, in Bithynia, we find him at the beginning of June; by the date of a Law, which there he made concerning Uſury. It muſt be known, that, by vertue of ſome Conſtitution, not now extant, in thoſe days it had been unlawful for Senators to put Money to Intereſt. And indeed, during the Roman Commonwealth, as Gothofred obſerves, by how much perſons were elevated above the ordinary condition, and more able to tyrannize over their Debtors; by ſo much the more were they reſtrained, in the Exerciſe of Uſury, by the Laws: yet, to evade theſe Laws, when it was unlawful for Senators to take Intereſt, they would receive Gifts or Rewards; which poſſibly, might amount to as much as the Intereſt it ſelf. And therefore, Alexander Severus, permitting a third part to be taken by other perſons, allowed Senators to receive one half of the third part, or two in the hundred. But afterwards, again, it became unlawful to them to receive any at all; until, at laſt, it ſeemed unreaſonable, that young Senators, or thoſe that were not of Age, ſhould be reſtrained from ſo doing; both becauſe their young years were wont to be favoured, and they could not make uſe of any power to terrifie and oppreſs their Debtors. Therefore did Arcadius, ſeven years and an half ago, declare to Eutychianus, then Præfect, That Intereſt, which was ſtipulated and contracted for, ſhould be paid them, as “well as the Principal. And now, this Year, he thought fit to take off the Reſtraint laid upon all Senators, ſo far, as, by an Edict inſcribed to Optatus, the Præfect of Conſtantinople, he gave leave to them to receive the half of the hundred by the Month; or, as we ſay, ſix in the hundred.“ For, as we have formerly ſhewn, the Romans paid Intereſt every Month; and the hundredth part, or one in the hundred: ſo that, at that rate, one hundred of our pounds muſt have brought in one pound every Month, or twelve by the Year. This was ordinarily allowed by the Roman Laws to other perſons, whatever ſome particular Prince might do. But Arcadius thought fit to limit Senators to one half.

Arcadius allows moderate Intereſt to Senators.

L L.3,4.de uſuris, Cod.Th lib. 2.tit.33. Dat. prid.Id.Jun. Abeſt à Cod.Juſt.

15. From Nice, he removed to Ancyra, in Galacia: where we find him in the beginning of July. In his Progreſs, he took notice how his Houſes or Palaces in the Country were abuſed, by the frequent uſe which the ordinary Judges of Provinces, and others, made of them in their Travels and Removals. To ſignifie his diſpleaſure hereat, he commanded Anthemius, now Præfectus Prætorio, That “none ſhould have leave to continue within his Palaces in any City and Manſion; but that the Governors of Provinces, and Vicars of Dioceſſes, ſhould take care, that none uſurped that liberty in their Journeys; as alſo, that they fell not to decay, for want of Repairs. Theſe things, if they did not obſerve, the Vicars ſhould incurr a Mulct of thirty; and the Conſulares and Preſidents, of twenty pounds of Gold; and their Offices forfeit as much: Neither ſhould the Curiales (who were alſo to look to the Palaces) go unpuniſhed. Such as were ſo bold, as to make uſe of the Houſes; if they were of Quality, and had Eſtates, were to be fined in twenty five pounds of Gold: If they had mean Fortunes; then, to be baniſhed. And, if they themſelves came not there; to be ſure, their Horſes were not to come near his Stables.“ Thus we ſee, that throughout the Provinces, both in Cities and Manſions, the Emperors had Palaces; and that, upon the Roman High Ways, for their convenience of viſiting the ſeveral Countries. In the Eaſtern Empire, where this Law was made; beſides thoſe of Conſtantinople, there was that of Antioch; and one at Daphne, in that pleaſant Wood; beſides another at Heraclea, in Thrace. In the Weſt; the Emperor had one here at York, of which, Hiſtory makes mention; where was alſo, a Prætorium, and a Temple of Bellona. There Forbids his Palaces to be taken up.

L.1. Ne quis in Palatiis maneat.Cod.Th.lib.7. tit.10. Dat.6. Id.Jul.

Vide Gothſ.Com. in h. l.

was one at Milan, another at Narbon, and a third at Triers; beſides one at Pætobio, in Noricum. This Law is directed to Anthemius; who, from Magiſter Officiorum was advanced, this Year, both to be Conſul and Præfectus Prætorio; in which Office he continued many Years: a Man generally beloved for his Abilities, and great Services performed to the State; as we may ſee hereafter.

*Vide Proſopographiam. Cod. Theod. a p.*800.

Great Diſorders in his Court, according to Zoſimus.

16. But, about this time, Zoſimus informeth us; that in the Court of Arcadius, Calumniators abounded more than ever; ſtill hanging upon the Palatine Eunuchs: and if any rich Man was dead, they ſpake of his Eſtate, as if he had left no Children. Then were the Reſcripts of the Emperor iſſued forth; whereby the Patrimony of Titius was aſſigned to Sempronius; and Inheritances were paſſed over to ſuch as begged them, while the Children ſtood by, and, with Groans, invoked the Ghoſts of their Parents. In concluſion, nothing was tranſacted, that did not fill all places with Lamentations, and brought not ſome miſchief to the Inhabitants. For, the Prince himſelf was extreamly ſilly; his Wife inſolent above Nature, and expoſed to the Avarice of the Eunuchs, and of her Women, who governed her; ſo that all Men were rendred miſerable, by the Courſes they took: and, to modeſt and civil perſons, nothing, than death, was more deſirable. And, as if this had not been enough, another danger now threatned Conſtantinople, greater than all others, upon this occaſion. John being returned out of Baniſhment, and, in his Sermons, ſtirring up the people againſt the Empreſs; when he ſaw that he was deprived of his Biſhoprick, and expelled the City; took Ship, and went his way. Thoſe of his Party having this in their deſign, that none other ſhould be Biſhop; reſolved, ſtraight to burn the City. They ſet fire to the Church in the night, by the darkneſs whereof they eſcaped undiſcovered; and, in the morning, preſented the Citizens with a diſmal ſight: For, all the Church was burnt; and, together with it, the adjoyning Buildings, as the Wind ſtood. The Fire ſeized alſo on the Houſe where the Senate was wont to be aſſembled; a magnificent and elegant piece of Architecture, placed before the Palace. For, it was adorned with Majeſtick Statues; and ſuch coloured Marbles, as, our Writer ſaith, in his time, were not to be found. And, it was reported (he adds) that thoſe Images which were dedicated to the Muſes at Helicon; and, in the days of Conſtantine, ſuffered the force of that Sacrilege which was committed againſt all things; being here erected, periſhed in the flames: a thing portending that Ignorance, which was to invade all ſorts of Men. But, a miracle, you muſt know, happened at this time, which, he thinks, is by no means to be paſſed over in ſilence. The Temple of the Senate, had before the Gates, the Images of Jupiter and Minerva, ſtanding upon Baſes of Stone, as they did in the time of the Writer: the one being reported to repreſent Jupiter of Dodona; and the other, the ſame with that which was conſecrated at Lindus. Now, though all the Temple was conſumed, the Lead melted, and the Stones and Rubbiſh fell down upon theſe Statues; yet, when no other was expected, but that they had run alſo the ſame fortune; the Rubbiſh being removed, they were found ſafe and ſound: which made the more polite ſort to conceive hope, that theſe Gods would protect the City. But, let this happen, ſaith he, as it pleaſeth the Divinity.

A Fire in Conſtantinople.

Incendium aliquod ad An. proxime ſequentem, 8. Scil. Cal. Nov. refert Chron. Alexandr vide Chron. Hiſt Cod. Th. ad illum An. At aliud videtur Incendinm in ſeditione excitatum & Anno præterito accidiſſe.

The Iſauri make Depredations.

17. Now, all men bewailing the caſe of the City; and finding no other cauſe for it, than the ſhadow of the Aſs, as the Proverb was; they, about the Emperor, began to think of making up the Breach. But their thoughts were diverted by ill News; that a great multitude of the Iſauri, inhabiting the inacceſſible places of the Mountain Taurus, above Pamphylia and Cilicia; being divided into ſeveral Troops of Rovers, had fallen down upon the neighbouring Country. They could not attack the fortified Towns, but they over-ran the Villages that had no Walls: And their Acceſs was the eaſier, becauſe this Region, during the late Motions of Tribigild, had been taken by the Enemy. To oppoſe them, was ſent one Arbazacius, with hopes that he would relieve Pamphilia: and he found them retired again into the Mountains, whither he purſued them; burnt many of their Villages, and killed no ſmall number of them; and might have quite ſubdued them, and provided entirely for the ſecurity of their Neighbours, had he not given himſelf up to filthy delights aud pleaſures, whereby he remitted much of his Vigour; and putting out his hands to lay hold on Money, preferred Riches before the publick Good. For this Prevarication, being ſent for to Court, he expected no other than to be called to Account: but, by giving the Empreſs part of what he had got from the Iſauri, he eſcaped all queſtions; and ſpent the reſt in the delights of the City. As for the Iſauri, they now robbed clandeſtinely; not daring openly to fall upon the adjacent Countries. Thus writeth Zoſimus, concerning the Miſgovernment at Conſtantinople,

Sect. 2.

A. D. 405.

in thoſe days, and the ill effects thereof. Concerning what he ſaith of Calumniators, and begging of Eſtates, we find a Law, made this Year, about the ſame Subject; but, with deſign to oppoſe the practice, which, poſſibly, now was grown ſo high and intollerable, that the Peace might have been endangered, if ſome ſtop had not been put unto it. But, hereby confirming a Sanction of the famous Prince Conſtantine, as he calls him, He forbids that any Accuſers be heard, or that any beg ſuch Poſſeſſions as now are in private hands; and belonged, either to the Patrimony, to the Commonwealth, or to the Temples: and this, under pain of being puniſhed as Sacrilegious Perſons." From the time of Conſtantine, theſe ſeveral ſorts of Lands had been given and ſold by Princes, and ſeized alſo ſometimes without publick Authority.

L.24.de Petitionibus,Cod.Th. Dat.8.Id.Nov. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

How Natural Children to be provided for.

18. There was a Controverſie at this time concerning the Proviſion that was to be made for Baſtards or Natural Children; ſome leaving them ſo much, that having Legitimate Sons or Daughters beſides, they carried away from them, often, a great part of their Inheritance. To give Rule herein, he ordained, by a Reſcript directed to Anthemius, the Præfect; that, He who had a Mother, or Legitimate Children or Grand-children, one or more, ſhould not leave above a twelfth part of his Eſtate to his Natural Children, and their Mother; or half ſo much to his Concubine, by which he had no Children." The Præfecti Prætorio having ſo much buſineſs, in theſe times, upon their hands, beſides the ordinary Governors of Provinces, were wont to aſſign Judges and Arbitrators, for hearing certain Cauſes, and taking up ſome Differences; from which Judges and Arbitrators, Appeal lay again to them the Præfects. But, it was queſtioned, what time ſhould be allowed, both for the interpoſing, and repairing thereof? In Anſwer to which, Arcadius now told Anthemius, herein concerned; that, If theſe Judges were preſent in the City, or ſome Neighbouring Province; that then the Parties ſhould have two months to proſecute, and thirty days to repair their Appeals: But if they were in remote Provinces, ſix months ſhould be allowed for the one, and three for the other; as the cuſtom was, of Appeals from the Governors of Provinces.

L.2.de Naturalibus liberis, &c.Cod.Juſt. Dat.Id.Nov.

How Appeals from Arbitrators to be managed.

L.63.de Appellation.&c.Cod. Th.Dat.14. Cal. Jan. Abeſt a Cod.Juſt.

A. D. 406.

Arcadio A.6 & Probo Conſ.

19. The year following, or the CCCCVI of our Lord, had Arcadius Auguſtus the ſixth time, and Anicius Probus, for Conſuls. Longinianus, this year, was Præfectus Prætorio of Italy; to whom, ſome Edicts we find directed, under this Title; though he had, ſome years before, been Comes S. Largitionum; as appears, both from the Code of Theodoſius, and the Epiſtles written to him from Symmachus. The firſt thing we meet with, given him in charge, after his Promotion, was, to remove an Abuſe in Shipping; which Arcadius, ſix years before, had endeavoured to reform in Egypt. For Honorius tells him, that Many perſons in theſe days, thought to defend their Veſſels by the Names and Titles of divers Perſons: To obviate which Fraud, he commands; that, If any, to avoid the publick Neceſſity, ſhall preſume to affix ſuch a Title; the Ship, or Veſſel on which it is affixed, ſhall be confiſcated. For, as he doth not hinder, he ſaith, private perſons from having Veſſels; ſo he will not permit any fraudulent practices: For as much as it is fitting, that, if Neceſſity urge, all, in common, contribute to the publick Utility; and, to the Tranſportation (of Corn and Proviſion he means) without any Privilege of Dignity. In concluſion, he gives order, that, if this Abuſe be not removed in thirty days, all ſuch Ships ſhall be taken from their Owners." Though the City of Rome ſtood in as much need as Conſtantinople, to have a certain method of bringing Proviſions; yet, Honorius was more mild than his Brother, upon the like occaſion; in, not only granting the ſpace of thirty days, to retract what had been done amiſs; but, in not inflicting puniſhment upon ſuch Noble Men as granted ſuch Protections; by giving leave to make uſe of their Names in diſcourſe, or affixing them on the Ships themſelves: for, in old time, it was the cuſtom to fix theſe Titles, not only, to Poſſeſſions on Lands; but alſo, to thoſe that floated on the Water; beſides the Sign, or ordinary Badge, which, ſometimes was Caſtor and Pollux; as we learn from that wherein St. Paul ſailed. But, this Emperor had made ſo many ſevere Laws, concerning this matter, againſt the Navicularii, and others; that, as to this point, he might be excuſed, or for other reaſons, well known to thoſe upon the place. This was dated from Ravenna, where Honorius made his Abode this year; and whence, about a month after, he gave freſh Orders to the ſame Longinianus, to call to Account the Collectors of the Revenue; againſt whom he had received Information, that ſeveral who had been employed in the Provinces for the laſt five years, had nothing at all contributed,

Honorius removes Abuſes in Shipping.

Multi naves ſuas diverſorum nominibus & titulis tuentur, &c. L.2.de Navibus non excuſ. Cod.Th.lib.13. tit.7. & L.1. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat.3. Id.Jan.Rav.

In the Collectors of the Revenue.

L. 1. de Cenſitoribus,Cod.Th. Dat.5. Id. Febr. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

Sect. 2.

A. D. 406.

in their places, to the publick Good. He commands, that, ſuch as he found up-“ on Examination, to have been negligent, he ſhould deprive of the Commiſſions, “ or Codicils; and force them to reſtore the double of the Profits they had recei-“ ved, though they had the Title of Comites: And if they were known to have in-“ jured the Provincials, to cauſe them to make reſtitution of four fold. “

L.15. de Deſertoribus,&c. Cod Th.& L.ult. Cod Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. 9. Cal. Apr.

lib.5.p.803.

Radagaiſus prepares to invade Italy.

Stilicho defeats him.

20. He further enjoyned his Præfect, to execute ſeverity upon ſuch as, forſa-“ king their Colours, betook themſelves to Robbing and Depredations; a thing “ too uſual in Italy; eſpecially, in the Regions thereof that lay near the Mountains. “ But, though they had not changed their Employments, but only forſaken their Camp, and withdrawn themſelves from the Military Service; he had had reaſon enough to execute upon them, all the Severity, that by Law, could be inflicted: for, about this very time, ſuch an Inundation of Barbarous people happened in the Weſt, as threatned the utter deſtruction, both of Italy, and the neighbouring Provinces. One Rhodogaiſus, as Zoſimus calls him; as others, Radagaiſus; allured, it ſeems, by the Wealth and Fertility of the Country; with a Body of four hundred thouſand Men, collected out of the Celtick and German Nations, that lived beyond the Rhine; as alſo, others, inhabiting beyond the Danube, or Iſter, prepared himſelf to invade Italy. At the report thereof, all men were wonderfully ſeized with fear; all the Cities deſpaired of preſervation; and Rome it ſelf was diſturbed, as now in extreme danger- But Stilicho, taking with him all the Forces that lay about Ticinum, in Liguria, conſiſting in thirty Numeri, or Regiments; and adding to them all the Aſſiſtance he could compaſs from the Alans and Huns; not expecting the Enemies coming, with his whole Army paſſed the Iſter: and ſetting upon the Barbarians, when they expected no ſuch matter, cut them all in pieces; in ſo much, that none eſcaped, ſome very few excepted; whom he liſted amongſt the Roman Troops. Elevated, as with reaſon, by this Victory, he returned with his Victorious Army; crowned, as one may ſay, by all perſons; as having, beyond all hope, delivered Italy from ſuch imminent dangers. This Account Zoſimus gives us of this Adventure of Rhadagaiſus; concerning which, we muſt ſtill be conſtrained to ſay what we have ſo often demonſtrated concerning his Intelligence or Veracity. Indeed, he is not very ſtrait laced in mincing the greatneſs of the Victory. For, he reports the Army of Radagaiſus to have conſiſted of four hundred thouſand Men; whereas Oroſius ſpeaks but of two hundred thouſand, at moſt; and St. Auguſtine, of much above one hundred thouſand.

Upon Rumour of his coming, Honorius invites Slaves to take Arms.

L.16. de Tironibus, Cod. Th. Dat. 15. Cal. Maii.

And encourages free perſons.

21. But, whereas he talks of Stilicho his paſſing the Iſter, and defeating the Barbarians beyond that River; the whole and entire conſent of all Authors, who lived and wrote in thoſe times, convict him of falſhood; and abundantly ſatisfie us, that Radagaiſus invaded Italy. Oroſius calls him a Scythian, and a Pagan; and St. Auguſtine, King of the Goths: they that lived beyond Iſter, whether Goths or others, paſſing, in thoſe days, by the general Name of Scythians. He perceiving Alarich, after his Defeat, to be received into Confederacy with the Romans; and to be averſe to War, as reſpected and honoured by them; excited the Nations beyond the two Rivers, being their antient Enemies, to take Arms, to fall into ſo rich and fertile a Region, and revenge upon it the Slaughter lately made of their Country-men; not doubting, but they ſhould be in a capacity, both to take, and plunder Rome. The rumour of this deſign coming into Italy, Honorius, at Ravenna, took ſuch order for defence, as ſo ſuddain warning would admit. He hired great numbers of Alans and Huns; and publiſhed an Edict, or Proclamation, “ whereby he invited, even Slaves, to take Arms, though generally eſteemed unfit “ for Warfare, with promiſe of Liberty, as had ſometimes been practiſed in great “ Neceſſities, and pinching Diſtreſſes of the Commonwealth. In ſuch caſes he “ hints, that a reſpect is to be had to Force and Strength, as well as to the perſons “ of thoſe that fight. And, further to encourage them, he promiſes them pay, or “ a Reward of two Solidi; which they called by the name of a Pulveraticum in thoſe “ days, as that which was given to Slaves, and other perſons, for the Sweat and “ Duſt which they endured. Of all Slaves, he ſignifies, that he chiefly deſires “ thoſe that belonged to Soldiers, as having moſt reaſon to underſtand what “ belonged to Arms: And, next to them, ſuch as ſerved the Confederate Na-“ tions; or the Dedititii, or thoſe that had forſaken their own Country, and “ took the Pay of the Romans, giving up themſelves to the Intereſt of the Empire. “ So careful he was to ſupply the Army by the liſting of Slaves; believing, as he ſaith, that free Perſons would be ſufficiently incited to oppoſe the Enemy, by the love they bore to their Country. But, for all this belief, two days after, to make the buſineſs more ſure, he thought fit to invite them alſo into the Field; propoſing a " Reward of ten Solidi a man, of which, they ſhould receive three for Advance. "

22. In the mean time, Radagaiſus was on his way; having, in Spring, removed out of Pannonia, to the Julian Alpes: whence, having beaten off the Guards, he paſſed over into Venetia; and leaving Aquileia, Concordia, and other Cities, took the moſt direct way he could toward Rome, which he moſt coveted to be Maſter of. And he proceeded without oppoſition, Stilicho not oppoſing himſelf againſt him; diſcouraged, it ſeems, by his Multitudes, wherewith he filled all the Countries of Venetia and Æmilia. Being a Pagan, and Idolater, as the cuſtom was of theſe Barbarous Nations, he had devoted the blood of all Romans to his Gods. And when he drew near the City, there was a Concourſe of all Pagans, who believed him to be powerful; not only, by reaſon of ſo numerous Forces, but by the protection of their Gods: And Rome they gave for loſt, as having deſerted them and their Worſhip. However, great Complaints thereof they made, and a great ſtir about reſtoring their Superſtition. The whole City was filled with Blaſphemies; and the Name of Chriſt was repreſented as a Plague, and the cauſe of the preſent Calamities. But, Stilicho, when the Barbarian was come into Etruria, a Region full of Mountains and narrow Valleys, then thought fit to ſet upon him. And Florence made ſo ſtout reſiſtance, that while he toiled himſelf about the taking of that City, Stilicho had the better opportunity to attack him; which he did with ſuch ſucceſs, by the Aſſiſtance of Uldin and Sarus, who commanded the Confederate Huns and Goths; that of his Army, an hundred thouſand were cut off, without any loſs to the Romans. With the Remainders he drew off to the Mountains of Fæſulæ: where, having ſeated himſelf upon a narrow Aſcent, though thereby he ſecured his Men from the Aſſaults of the Purſuers, yet he expoſed them to all the Inconveniences of a barren place, and that beſieged. For, Stilicho begirt him; and neither ſuffered any man to come out for Forage, nor any thing to be conveyed in to them. In which condition, finding himſelf ſo entangled, that he could neither fight, nor procure any Proviſions, he fairly ran away from his men; but, fell into the hands of the Romans: by whom being put in cuſtody, in a little time, he was ſlain, together with his Sons. The Barbarians, after the flight of their Leader, overcome with hunger, yielded themſelves; and were ſold by Troops, for an Aureus a whole Company: but, having contracted a Diſeaſe, by long faſting, and ill Diet afterwards, within a few days they all died. Thus was Italy relieved, and Rome preſerved, by the induſtry of Stilicho; to whom the Citizens were ſo grateful, as to erect to his Memory a Statue of Braſs and Silver, at the Roſtra, through the procurement of Fl. Piſidius Romulus, their Præfect.

L. 17. ejuſd. tit. Dat. 13. Cal. Maii, Abſ. a Cod Juſt. ut temporariæ.

Oroſius, lib. 7. c. 37.

A Statue erected to Stilicho at Rome.

23. Arcadius, all this year, continued his Abode at Conſtantinople; where he took pains to compoſe another ſort of War amongſt his own people. Having no occaſion to make uſe of their Swords, they employed their Pens one againſt another; and came to that height of Libelling, that he was conſtrained to make a very ſevere Law againſt that practice. By this Law directed to Anthemius, with the Titles of Præfectus Prætorio, and Patritian; He makes it capital to all that caſt at their E- " nemies ſuch poiſoned Darts: To them alſo, that read, and do not tear or burn, " ſuch Libels: And, further than this, that do not diſcover the Author thereof, if " known unto them. " This was very ſharp; but the ſtate of the times, it ſeems required it; although, by what we have ſaid already, it may be ſuſpected, that the diſorders of the Court, and badneſs of Officers, gave occaſion to theſe Libels: and, perhaps Arcadius might have taken a more effectual Courſe, by reforming thoſe Abuſes, which gave too much advantage to ſuch as were prone to traduce men that were in place and power. They were now buſie in building at Conſtantinople, and making up that Breach which had been cauſed by the late Fire. The Cirque had much ſuffered in it; eſpecially, the Porticus, which to it belonged. When the Ground was to be cleared, and the old Wall taken down; it happened, that the Images of the Emperor, or ſome of his Predeceſſors, were to be removed; yet, this would not Æmilius, the Præfect, adventure to do, till he had firſt conſulted Arcadius: for, in thoſe days, great reſpect, nay, Adulation was paid to the Images of Princes: which, to violate; and with ſome reaſon, if maliciouſly, was High Treaſon. And great ſtir had happened about John, the Biſhop, his inveighing againſt the Statue of Eudoxia, the Empreſs; of whoſe Party, that he might not be thought to be, he would not offer as much as to take down an Image, without leave obtained. But Arcadius, by a Reſcript which he directed to him, for an Anſwer to his Information, tells him; That, when the caſe requires, that any Porticus, or other Houſe, is to " be "

Arcadius makes a ſevere Law againſt ſcandalous Libels.

L. ult. de Famoſis Libellis. Cod. Th. Dat. 4. Cal. Maii, Abeſt à Cod. Juſt.

Conſtantinople repaired.

L. 44. de Operib. publ. Cod. Th. & L. 16. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. Dat. 5. Cal. Juli.

A. D 406.

be repaired, it may be free to remove any Image of himſelf, or his Predeceſſors, “ without conſulting him; ſo it be done with reverence, and the Statue again replaced, “ as it was before, after the finiſhing of the Work. “ Further, to promote the rebuilding of the publick places, and to prevent Fires for the time to come; He prohibited Out-ſhots and Terraces; commanded the Stairs, leading to the Porticus, “ to be made larger, and of Stone; that no private Buildings ſhould lean upon “ the publick, but be diſtant from them fifteen Feet; upon pain of having them “ demoliſhed, if any ſhould afterward be found to have raiſed them within that “ compaſs. “

L.L.45,46. ejuſd.tit.

24. At the end of the year, complaint was brought, that the Country, in ſeveral places was oppreſſed; by reaſon, that the Farmers, and Managers of the Land belonging to the Emperors Daughters, pleaded privilege more than they ought to do, from ſeveral burthens; which therefore, lay heavier upon the backs of their Neighbours. For, we muſt know that, not only the Domain, or Patrimony of the Prince himſelf; but alſo, the Houſes and Lands belonging to his Children, ordinarily excuſed their Occupiers from Taxes and Tributes; and, under pretence hereof many eſcaped ſcotfree, who ought to have contributed their Shares to the publick Service. To avoid this Inconvenience, he commands Anthemius; that in “ all Provinces, where his moſt Noble Daughters have Houſes or Eſtates; the “ number, or quantity, of their Lands ſhall be entred and regiſtred before the Governors, “ in the preſence of the Cenſuales and principal Decuriones; who, at their “ peril, are to ſee to the equal diſtribution of the Tax: and ſhall receive Breives, or “ Terriers of theſe Lands: and, by comparing them with their Books of Taxes, “ make a Judgment, what, and what not, are to be excuſed. “ By this Law we ſee “ what Immunities the Imperial Families enjoyed; which they in France, draw into example; even, as to the Officers belonging to that King's Children, and the Queen Mother, or Dowager there:

A Grievance ariſing from the Eſtates of the Emperor's Daughters, removed.

L.un.de Privilegiis Domus Auguſtæ, Cod.Th.l. 10.tit.25. Dat. Cal.Decemb. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

A. D. 407. Honorio, 7. & Thodoſio, 2.A.A.Conſ.

25. In the year CCCCVII, Honorius Auguſtus the ſeventh, and Theodoſius Auguſtus the ſecond time, bore the Title of Conſuls. Arcadius had his Reſidence this year at Conſtantinople; and Honorius was at Rome. Enquiring now, for Materials to compoſe our Intelligence, and taking a ſurvey of the Provinces; we find a ſort of Inmates in Gall; ſome that made bold to enter, without asking leave of the right Inhabitants. One Godigiſil, King of the Vandals, who inhabited the part of Scythia, lying upon the Lake of Mæotis, being provoked by the Example of Radagaiſus; when he knew that he gave Honorius enough to do in Italy, reſolved to invade Gall; which he thought more eaſily to ſubdue than that, becauſe of the awe and encouragement of the Emperor's preſence in it. Departing out of Scythia, with his Vandals and Alans; out of Sarmatia he took ſome of the Quadi, and other Vandals, which had there been placed by Conſtantine: Then, paſſing the Danube, he entred Germany; and thence, either by fear, or hope of Booty, excited ſeveral people to joyn with him; as, the Marcomans, Heruli, Turcilingi, Suevi, Alemans, Saxons and Burgundians: With whom he haſted to the Rhine. There the Franks made ſome oppoſition; either out of a ſence of the Faith they had given to Stilicho, by vertue of a late League and Alliance; or, for that they were unwilling, that the Province, of which they hoped to be Maſters themſelves, ſhould be over-run by ſo numerous an Enemy. But they, being overpowred by numbers, were forced to forbear: And ſo Godigiſil, with his Vandals, paſſed over into Gall, the laſt day of the laſt year; or, on the Eeve of that New Tears Day, wherein Honorius the ſeventh, and his Nephew Theodoſius the ſecond time, took the Enſigns of the Conſulſhip. They preſently fell upon the adjoyning Countries, and miſerably waſted them; viz. Germania Prima, and Belgica Secunda; and, notwithſtanding whatever the Officers of Honorius could attempt, proceeded in their barbarous fury. Magontiacum, or Mentz, they raſed; many thouſands of the Inhabitants being murdered in the Church: And Rheimes, Amiens, Tournay, and other Cities, fared very little better; being rifled, and other ways uſed, at pleaſure. Oroſius writes, that theſe Nations of Alans, Suevi and Vandals, with many others, being excited by Stilicho, defeated the Franks, paſſed the Rhine, invaded Gall; and, with a direct and violent Courſe, pierced as far as the Pyrenæans: By which being ſtopped in their Carier, they poured themſelves back upon the Neighbouring Provinces.

Godigiſil invades Gall.

Proſper.vide Sigonium, ad h. An.

Lib.7.c.40.

26. While they in this manner raged up and down the Provinces of Gall, In Britain, he adds, one Gratian, a Municeps of the Country, was made Tyrant of the Iſland; and ſhortly after ſlain. In his room one Conſtantine from the meaneſt eſt Employment in the Army was placed; being choſen meerly for the hope of his name, without the leaſt merit; who preſently after his uſurpation paſſed over into Gall. The truth is, the Roman Empire now decaying, and Barbarous Nations roving every where up and down throughout the Continent; the Armies in this Iſland fearing, for all the water that flowed betwixt them, that the flame of their Neighbours burning Houſe might reach over, and take hold of their Habitations; that they might have ſome General, or Sovereign Commander, if need were, to repel the Barbarians, betook themſelves to the election of Emperours. Firſt, they placed one Mark in the Imperial Seat; and him for a time they obeyed, as in thoſe parts having the chief Command. But afterward having made him away, becauſe he did not in his conduct of Affairs, anſwer their expectations; they ſet up one Gratian, a Countryman of their own; they crowned him, inveſted him with an Imperial Robe; and dutifully attended upon him as their Prince: yet upon a diſlike, at the end of four Months, they deprived him alſo of this his Empire; took away his life, and made over the Soveraignty to one Conſtantine, a Soldier of the meaneſt condition, only becauſe his name imported, as they thought, proſperity and all good ſucceſs. For they conceived hope, that he by that fortunate name would conſtantly and fortunately govern the Empire, and overcome all its Enemies, as Conſtantine the Great had done, who in Britain had been advanced to the Imperial Dignity. This Conſtantine paſſing over into Gall, carried over with him the Flower of the Britiſh Youth, and ſo utterly exhauſted that remainder of Military Force which had been left by Maximus, in the Iſland; which now enervated of its ſtrength, fell into ſuch inconveniences, as in a ſmall time procured the Deſtruction of the Inhabitants it then nouriſhed; which it changed for other Lords.

Zoſimus lib.6. ad initium, p. 824.

Conſtantine ſet up for Emperour here in Britain.

27. Conſtantine putting to Sea from Britain, made Juſtinian and Nevigaſtus Commanders over the Celtick Soldiers; and taking eaſily the City of Bologne, as eaſily induced the Roman Forces in all Countries, to joyn with him. In the mean time the Vandals, at a farther diſtance, waſted the parts that lay upon the Rhine; the violence of whom Limenius the Præfectus Prætorio, and Cariobandes the Magiſter Militum not able to ſuſtain, at leaſt ſo they imagining, fled into Italy, and found Honorius at Rome, whither Stilicho alſo about this time went to conſult him. For, as Zoſimus tells the Story, Stilicho having found that the Miniſters of Arcadius were his great Enemies, and bent to do him miſchief, purpoſed to ſend Alarich into the Bowels of that part of the Empire, and draw over to Honorius the Cities of Illyricum. For this purpoſe he made an agreement with Alarich, who expected when notice ſhould be given him to make it good; but Stilicho was diverted by the invaſion that Radagaiſus made into Italy. Having defeated the Barbarians, he returned with great reputation to Ravenna, the Metropolis of Flaminia, this Writer tells us, an ancient City and Colony of the Theſſalians, being called Rhene, becauſe flown about with water, and not becauſe it was built by Remus the Brother of Romulus; for affirming which, he taxeth Olympiodorus the Theban, a Pagan Hiſtorian alſo of this time, who began his Hiſtory with this very Conſulſhip, and extended it to the CCCCXXIV Year of our Lord. At Ravenna, Stilicho was ready in a ſhort time with an Army to invade Illyricum; and, by the aſſiſtance of Alarich, to take Cities from the Dominion of Arcadius, and annex them to that of Honorius; when the Deſign was thwarted by two Impediments. For News was brought that Alarich was dead; and Letters arrived from Rome, ſent from Honorius; whereby he was informed concerning the uſurpation of Conſtantine in Britain, and his paſſing over into the parts of Gall. The rumour of Alarich his death was counted to be very uncertain; and the report of ſuch as came afterward, and told how things ſtood, confirmed it ſo to be. But that concerning the promotion of Conſtantine found credit, and obliged Stilicho to defer his Expedition into Illyricum; and go to Rome to adviſe what was beſt to be done.

His uſurpation diverts Stilicho from Illyricum.

28. To what War or Expedition ſoever it related, the Honorati were lately commanded to furniſh out Soldiers; and amongſt the reſt, the Tribunes and Officers of the Army, though through their own merit and induſtry they had obtain'd their preferments, were called on as well as the reſt. This ſeeming unreaſonable, " Honorius directed his Edict to Stilicho, by the Title of Comes and Magiſter Militum; " whereby he required, that a Diſtinction ſhould be made betwixt ſuch as had ſo riſen by their merits, and ſuch as had obtain'd the titular Honours of Tribunes and Præfects by way of Codicils or Letters; " allowing the former ſort the " privilege of being exempt from finding Tirones, as well in reference to the Tax " lately "

The Honorati commanded to furniſh out Soldiers.

L.18.de Tironib.Cod.Th.& l.ult.de veteranis Cod.Th. Dat. 11.Cal. Apr.

Sect. 2.

A. D.
407.

lately made, as ſuch occaſions for the time to come ; with this further order, “ that the Comites or Duces Militum ſhould take nothing of them at their promotions ; “ it being otherwiſe a part of the profit of great Officers to receive Fees “ from ſuch as were advanced in the Army.“ This could not but be ſeaſonable to encourage Military Men at this time, when there was need of them ; as alſo, perhaps it was to gratifie the Decuriæ of Rome, by confirming whatever privileges had been formerly granted them from himſelf, or his Predeceſſors, by a Reſcript inſcribed to Curtius the Præfectus Prætorio of Italy. But as he had reaſon to encourage deſerving perſons, there was as great reaſon he ſhould not be too laviſh in a time of ſo great expence ; much leſs be impoſed upon, and cheated in his Largeſſes. Former Princes had ordained, that all Petitions ſhould be void, which were put up for any abatement of Taxes, or other immunities relating to the Revenue, except they were drawn and ordered by the Palatine Officers belonging to the Comes S. L. or High Treaſurer. The reaſon was, becauſe theſe Officers having the management of ſuch matters in their hands could inſtruct the Emperour, and inform, if any fraud concerning number of Acres, or other things, was obtruded upon him. To add further vigour to theſe Laws ; whereas the puniſhment formerly of ſuch Petitioners as did not have recourſe to theſe Officers, and frame their buſineſs after this method ; was loſs of the threefold of the worth of what they petitioned for, he finds reaſon to change it from three to four.

L.5.de Decuriis Cod.Th.Dat.7. Id.Apr. Abeſt a Cod.Juſt.

L.4.de Immunitate conceſſa. Cod. Th.lib.11. tit.12. Prælata literis viri illuſtris. Com. S.L.3. Id: Jun. Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

29. Arcadius in the Eaſt had no ſuch occaſion to oblige his Military Men ; or to look to the exactneſs of his Incomes ; the Weſtern Provinces being now become the Seats of War ; and Italy it ſelf the great Cockpit whither the Gameſters for the moſt part, directed their courſes, to contend for the Maſtery. But he was pleaſed to be kind to thoſe about him, or that ſerved him in his Palace ; in that, whereas ten years ago he had given immunity from the Prætorſhip, or exhibiting of Games, to ſuch as after having laudably ſerved their time in the Army, had been raiſed to the Dignity of Duces Rei Militaris, he now thought fit to grant the “ ſame Immunity to his Proximi of the Scrinia, if they had already diſcharged “ their Employments.“ And he found reaſon to vindicate the Rights and Privileges of the Cohortales, or ſuch as ſerved the Governours of the Provinces ; finding much about the ſame time, that it was the practice of ſome Curiales or others, to pretend to be of their number, though they were never entred in their Roll, nor, by any duty they performed, had any right to their Privileges and Allowances. By theſe tricks ſometimes they ſtepped into theſe preferments, which were only belonging to them that vnderwent the burthen ; and the publick ſervice was ill diſcharged, theſe perſons not being obnoxious to examination by torture, as the Cohortales were, being meerly Conditionales, or obnoxious to this kind of cenſure, as were amongſt them the Chartularii, Tabularii and Exceptors. To prevent this, he forbids, that any be admitted, for the time to come, to execute “ matters belonging to theſe Men, if they were not firſt matriculated, or entred in “ the Roll ; but for ſuch as at preſent did it, he commands that they be detained : “ Nay, though by any Reſcript directed to any of the inferior Judges, they were “ diſcharged from the obligation, he orders, that they be drawn back ; ſuch only “ being to be excuſed, as were freed by any Order ſent to the Præfectus Prætorio himſelf “ ; whoſe Prerogative, as in other things, ſo in this was the more remarkable.“ At the latter end of the Year he found reaſon to abate the rigour of the Law made two years before againſt the Ordinary Judges (Conſulares and Preſidents) their making uſe of his Palaces. They had indeed Prætoria, or Houſes deſtined peculiarly to their ſervice ; but they were ordinarily built in Cities or Towns that ſtood upon the publick Roman way. But they had often occaſion to travel through the Countries and Villages where none of theſe ways lay, neither had they any Prætoria near. This put them to great inconveniences for want of Accommodation : and to redreſs them, Arcadius now tells Anthemius the Præfect, that in ſuch places “ they ſhall have liberty, notwithſtanding the late Law, to make ſome ſtay in his Palaces, as their buſineſs requires.

Arcadius kind to thoſe about him.

L.13.de Proximis, &c. Cod. Th.Dat.3.Cal. Febr.Abeſt a Cod. Juſt.

L. 20.de Cohortalib.Cod.Th.& l.40.Cod.Juſt. eod.tit.Dat.16. Cal.Apr.

L.2. Ne quis in Palatiis maneat Cod.Th.lib.7. tit.10.Dat. 8. Cal.Dec. Abeſt a Cod.Juſt.

30. Baſſus and Philippus were Conſuls for the Year that next followed, or the CCCCVIII of our Lord, which was the laſt of Arcadius the Emperour, who died, as they ſay, that ſpeak moſt probably, on the firſt of May. By his Wife Eudoxia, the Daughter of Bauto the Frank, as Philoſtorgius writes, and who died ſome two years before him, he left five Children, which were his Son Theodoſius, and four Daughters, Pulcheria, Flaccilla, Arcadia and Marina. He died in the flower of his Age, whereof he had not yet completed the thirty firſt year ; having reigned Arcadius the Emperour dies.

A. D.
408.
Baſſo & Philippo Coſſ.

reigned together with his Father twelve, and after his death thirteen, three Months, and fifteen days. Leaving his Son ſo exceeding young, and believing his Brother Honorius to bear him no great kindneſs; for fear he ſhould be wronged, he left him to the Tuition and Protection of Iſdegerdes, the King of Perſia, with whom he had entred into a ſtrict League and Alliance for an hundred years. He undertook it ſincerely, and diſcharged it as faithfully, ſending in his room to Conſtantinople one Antiochus, a moſt prudent Man, whom ſome will have to have been ſent alſo Ambaſſadour to Honorius, to procure peace and good underſtanding betwixt him and his Nephew. Some write alſo, that Honorius, moved with commiſeration toward the Child, determined to haſten to Conſtantinople, there to take order for his ſafety and authority; but was hindered by the uſurpation of Conſtantine: and afterward having intention to ſend Stilicho, the diſcovery of his treaſonable Deſigns, prevented that. But however Antiochus managed matters in the room of Iſdegerdes: the great Pillar of the Eaſtern Empire, doubtleſs, was Anthemius, the Præfectus Prætorio, who, as Socrates tells us, was the main Man that ſtood by the young Emperour in his Government. He writes, that he compaſſed Conſtantinople with a ſtrong Wall; that he ſeemed, and was in reality, one of the wiſeſt of that Age: that he never enterpriſed any thing without good adviſement, conferring ſtill with ſome of his Friends, concerning the buſineſs he went about; but above all others, made uſe of the advice of Troilus the Sophiſt, a Man very wiſe alſo, and of great experience. But Pulcheria, the eldeſt Siſter of the Emperour, though at her Father's death ſaid to be not ten years old, yet growing up to riper years, ſuſtained a great ſhare of the care and troubles of the Empire, of whoſe prudence, piety, and other virtues, very much is ſaid.

How he left his Son.

Lib.7.c.1.

31. There are ſome Laws extant, bearing date from Conſtantinople before the death of Arcadius, and yet having not his name prefixed; but only thoſe of his Brother and Son. Either in the Date or Inſcription, there is ſome errour; but however, they were made either not long before, or not long after his death. One of them is to provide for the Neceſſities of Illyricum, as it terms them, in order to which it requires, that no privilege be pretended to excuſe any perſon “ from the building of Walls, and the finding and conveyance of Proviſions. “ This muſt have relation to the attempts made by Stilicho this year, againſt the Cities of Illyricum, of which we ſhall ſhortly hear more from Zoſimus, who would have us believe, that his aim was only to increaſe the Dominions of his Maſter Honorius; whereas other Writers make it a deſign, of conferring the Empire upon Eucherius his Son. This Edict is inſcribed to Herculius the Præfectus Prætorio of Illyricum, whoſe Diſtrict was now in danger. And about the ſame time, that of Anthemius the Præfect of the Eaſt, was not in good repoſe. For, now did the Iſauri, thoſe ancient Thieves (the place of whoſe Habitation being ſo convenient for harbouring of Robbers, required as much Guard upon it, as did a Limit or Border of the Empire) renew their Depredations upon the Neighbouring Countries. Toward the end of April, a Reſcript was directed to Anthemius, whereby he was injoyned to give notice to the Judges of the Provinces, (as of Iſauria, Pamphylia, “ Cilicia, Lycaonia, and Piſidia) that they ſhould not forbear the examination by “ torture, of theſe Thieves, not on any day in Lent, no not of Eaſter; that the diſ- “ covery of their wicked deſigns, might not be deferred; it being eaſie to be hoped “ that God Almighty would not be angry for doing that, by which the ſafety and “ preſervation of many perſons would be procured. “

Some Laws uncertain in their Date made before Arcadius his Death.

L.ult.de equorum Conlatione, Cod. Th. lib. 11. tit. 17. & L. 1. de quibus muneribus &c. Cod. Juſt. Dat. 3. Id. Apr.

L.ult.de quæſtionib. Cod. Th. & L. 10. de feriis, Cod. Juſt. Dat. 5. Cal. Maii.

32. Whether theſe Laws were made before or after the death of Arcadius is uncertain; but he being gone, certain it is, that Anthemius and Troilus applied themſelves to the management of publick Affairs, and reforming ſuch things as had been out of order, during his Government. One of theſe, the neglecting or diſcouraging of Meſſages from the Provinces, ſeems to have been; though Syneſius in his Epiſtle to him concerning ſuch grievances as preſſed moſt upon the Empire, deſired him to be free and eaſie in admitting the complaints of the People. That they deſired his Son ſhould ſo be, now appears from an Edict directed to Anthemius this Year; whereby he is commanded to receive, all ſuch complaints and requeſts; “ to enter them in his Office, and then make report to the Emperour of what is “ worthy his conſideration, who promiſeth all neceſſary remedies for the eaſe of “ thoſe that were aggrieved. “ One complaint there was, that the Agentes in Rebus, and the Palatine Officers, belonging to both the High Treaſurers, who were wont to be ſent into the Provinces, to urge the collection of Tributes, were found to exact or gather the Money themſelves; which becauſe of their inſolence and avarice Anthemius and Troilus ſet themſelves to the reforming of matters.

L.14.de Legatis,&c.Cod. Th. Dat.14.Cal. Octobr. Abeſt à Cod.Juſt.

Receive all complaints and repreſs the Officers belonging to the Treaſury.

Sect. 2.

A. D. 408.

rice much to the diſturbance and oppreſſion of the People; eſpecially of the Province of Achaia: Anthemius is ordered to take care, that for the time to come, “ this be no more practiſed; but that theſe Men only urge the Governours of Pro- “ vinces, by often repairing to them, and their Officers, to the Collection. If a- “ ny Governour, either to be rid of their importunity, or for any other reaſon, “ permit them to levy the Tributes, the Law impoſes a Mulct of twenty pounds of Gold, both upon him, and upon his Office.

L.17. de Exactionibus, Cod. Th.& L.2. de Canone largitionalium titulorum. Cod. Juſt. Dat. 7. Id. Decemb.

33. Honorius this year, for ſome time, was at Rome; whence afterward he removed to Bononia and Ticinum; and, at length, by Milan, to Ravenna. While at Rome he took care to gratifie the Citizens by providing better for their ſuſtenance, and confirming the Privileges granted to their ſeveral Bodies. Obſerving alſo that Judges were often drawn aſide by the awe of the Honorati, or great perſons; who, when they had cauſes to be tried, would come into Court, and ſit with the Judges; he now prohibited, that they ſhould be admitted to ſit with them, “ when the merits of their cauſes were diſpatching; as alſo, that any whoſe Suits “ were depending, ſhould viſit them at Noon time. If any ſhould offend in “ this kind, he inflicts a Fine of five pounds of Gold upon the Judge, as much up- “ on his Office, and as much upon any of the Honorati, ſo offending. “ The latter part of this Law is but agreeable to what had been formerly ordained by Valens, Gratian and Valentinian, againſt viſiting of the Ordinary Judge, in the Afternoons; and Cuiacius obſerves, that it had been alſo provided by Auguſtus in the Julian Laws, concerning Judicature (by Macrobius called Edicts,) that neither the Defendant nor Accuſer ſhould enter the Houſe of the Judge: moreover, by the ſame Laws, a Judge was prohibited to come into the Houſes of other perſons; as under Tiberius a Senatnuſconſultum was made, that Senators ſhould not ſet their Feet within the Houſes of the Pantomimi; and another under Claudius, which forbade Soldiers to enter the dwellings of Senators under pretence of ſaluting them; ſuch diverſity is there in the ſtate and condition of times, according to which, Legiſlators are to take their meaſures.

Honorius endeavours to reform ſeveral Abuſes at Rome.

L.8. de Snariis Cod. Th.

L. unic. de officio Judicum Civilium Cod. Th. l.l. Cod. Juſt. eod. tit. hinc deſumpta: Dat. 3. Non. Feb.

Obſerv. lib. 6. c. 34.

34. But, while Honorius lay at Rome, the Provinces of Gall were miſerably afflicted by the Vandals, who paſſing out of Belgica into Aquitain, waſted all the Country, together with thoſe of Novempopulania, Lyons and Narbon. Now it was, that, as S. Hierom writes, innumerable and moſt ſavage Nations, had ſeiſed upon “ all Gall; that all the Tract lying betwixt the Alpes, and the Pyrenæans, the Ocean, “ and the River Rhoſne, was waſted by the Quadi, Vandals, Sarmatians, Alani, Gipedes, Heruli, Saxons, Burgundians and Pannonians. Maguntiacum, now Ments, in “ times paſt a noble City, ſaith he, is taken and deſtroyed; many thouſands of Men “ having been killed in the Church: thoſe of the ſtrong City of Rheimes, Amiens, “ Arras, the Country of the Morini, Tournay, Nemete and Argentoratus (or “ Strasburgh) are tranſlated into Germany. The Provinces of Aquitain, Novem- “ populania, of Lyons and Narbon are over-run, a few Cities excepted, and they “ are vexed, without by the Sword, and within by Famine. I cannot without tears “ make mention of Toulouſe, which hath hitherto been preſerved from Ruine, by “ the merits of holy Exuperius the Biſhop. Spain it ſelf, as about to periſh dayly, “ trembles, calling to mind the Irruption of the Cimbri, and other ſuch diſmal Stories. “ Conſtantine the Tyrant, at the ſame time endeavoured to eſtabliſh himſelf as Lord, of what theſe Barbarians left behind them. To interrupt him in his endeavours, one Sarus was ſent by Stilicho, with an Army; who meeting with Juſtinian, killed him with the greateſt part of his Forces; and having got very much booty, when he heard that Conſtantine had removed himſelf to Valentia, a City he thought very proper for his defence, he there reſolved to beſiege him. Nevigaſtes the other Commander, he treated with, and kindly received him; but afterward ſlew him, though he had given his faith to the contrary. Into their places Conſtantine promoted Edobechus a Frank, and Gerontius born in Britain; the skill and valour of which perſons were ſo well known to Sarus, that for fear of them, he roſe up and departed from Valentia, after he had beſieged it ſeven days. They purſued him, and that with ſuch vigour and execution, that with much labour he hardly eſcaped to the Alpes, where he gave up all his Booty to the Bacaudæ, who there met him, to ſuffer him to have free paſſage into Italy. He being removed, Conſtantine gathered together all his Forces, and reſolved to fortifie the Alpes, which lay in the way betwixt Italy and Gallia Celtica, being three in number, and known by the Names of Cottiæ, Poeninæ, and Maritimæ. This he did; and alſo fortified the Rhine, to provide as well againſt the Inſults of the Barbarians, as of the Romans, though

Gall miſerably waſted by the Vandals.

Ep. 11.

Zoſimus lib. 6. p. 824.

Conſtantine proſpers there.

Zoſimus

Sect. 2.

A. D. 408.

Zoſimus writes, that he fortified the Alpes to keep the Barbarous Nations out of Gall; as if they had come out of Italy, and were not in the heart of Gall already. And, he hints, as truly, that, ſince the time of his dear Julian; the Rhine, or the Limit thereof, had, till now, been neglected.

He gives the Title of Cæſar to his Son Conſtans.

35. Having taken ſuch order for his Affairs in Gall, he adorned Conſtans, his eldeſt Son (who had been a Monk; and, as our Brittiſh Writers ſay, in the Monaſtery at Wincheſter) with the Title and Habit of Cæſar, and ſent him into Spain; all the Nations whereof, he was ambitious to bring into ſubjection; both to augment his own Dominion, and to remove the power, which the Kindred of Honorius had in that Country: whence he feared they might ſet upon him from beyond the Pyrenæans, at ſuch time as the Emperor might ſend another Army over the Alpes; and ſo, overpower, and ſuppreſs him. Conſtans, with one Terentius, his General, and Apollinaris, his Præfectus Prætorio, paſſed over into Spain, furniſhed and attended ſufficiently; and ſet himſelf againſt ſuch as he there found of the Kindred of Theodoſius, who (as Zoſimus cannot forbear to vent his malice againſt that Prince) diſturbed the Affairs of their Native Country. They made uſe of the Soldiers belonging to Luſitania, or Portugal: And when with them they could not prevail, got together a multitude of Slaves and Husband-men; and ſo managed their matters, that they were in a fair way to ſucceed, and make an end of Conſtans. But, for all this, the Tide turned; and, inſtead of making him a Priſoner, they and their Wives were taken by him, and committed to cuſtody: their names being Verenianus and Didymius. They had two Brothers, Theodoſius and Lagodius; who, upon notice of it, fled, and made their eſcape; the one into Italy, and the other into the Eaſt. They themſelves were carried away by Conſtans; who (after he had committed the care of the Pyrenæans to Gerontius, to be kept with a Guard of Galls; though the Spaniſh Army deſired to have the Charge) returned to his Father, and preſented them to his View; who inſtantly commanded them to be put to death.

Who, in Spain, defeats the Kinſmen of Honorius.

36. Thus went matters in Gall and Spain; when, in the mean time, the Emperor Honorius, having loſt Mary, his Wife, the eldeſt Daughter of Stilicho; deſired, that Thermantia, her younger Siſter, might be given him in Marriage. Stilicho ſeemed to be averſe to it: But his Wife Serena urged him to it, upon this Account. When Honorius contracted Marriage firſt, with Mary; her Mother knowing that ſhe was not ripe for his Bed; and yet, not able to prevent or defer the Wedding: concluding alſo, that it was to offer violence to Nature, to have her Virginity taken from her; uſed the Art of a certain Woman, skilled in ſuch goodly Myſteries: and, by her endeavours brought it to paſs, that the Girl lived, and lay with the Emperor; but he neither had any Will, or Power, to enjoy her. Sometime, ſhe thus lived and died a Virgin: But, after her death, her Mother, deſiring to have ſome Iſſue by Honorius; that ſhe might not be deprived of that great power and place which ſhe enjoyed, uſed her endeavours to marry him to her ſecond Daughter: Which being done, ſhe died alſo not long after; the ſame thing having happened to her, as to the former. While this was tranſacting, News was brought to Stilicho; that Alarich, having quitted Epirus, and paſſed the Straits lying betwixt Pannonia and Venetia, had encamped himſelf at a Town called Æmon; built, as Zoſimus tells you, by the Argonauts, between the upper Pannonia and Noricum. From Æmon he removed, and paſſed the River Aquilis, as alſo, the Apennine Mountains; which cloſing up Pannonia, afford very difficult paſſage to ſuch as travel to Noricum; theſe Straits being eaſie to be kept by a few Men, againſt a great multitude, which would force their way. Having paſſed theſe Straits, from Noricum he ſent Meſſengers to Stilicho, to demand Money, both for the delay he had made in Epirus, and alſo, for this his Expedition, which, thereupon he was forced to undertake. Stilicho left the Meſſengers at Ravenna, and went to Rome, to conſult the Emperor and Senate, what was to be done in this Affair. The Senate being aſſembled in the Palace, and the Queſtion put, whether War ſhould not be made? very many gave their Voices in the Affirmative: Only, Stilicho, and a few beſides, who, by fear, were brought to be of his Party, were of the contrary opinion; and adviſed to make Peace with Alarich.

Zoſimus, lib. 5. p. 804.

Mary being dead, Honorius marries Thermantia.

Alarich marcheth Weſtward.

Stilicho and his Party for Peace.

37. They that preferred War, deſired Stilicho to ſhew his Reaſons, why he was ſo much for Peace, which was to be bought with money too; to the diſgrace of the Roman Majeſty. He anſwered; becauſe Alarich had continued ſo long in Epirus, for the advantage of the Emperor; that, joyning with himſelf, he might make War upon Arcadius; and, taking Illyricum out of his hands, add it to the Dominion of Honorius. This, he affirmed, would have come to paſs, if his Expedition had not been hindred by the Letters of Honorius; in expectation whereof, Alarich had conſumed ſo much time. With this, he ſhewed them the Emperor's Letters, and laid the blame upon Serena, her labouring to preſerve Amity betwixt the two Princes. Stilicho ſeeming to ſpeak nothing but Sence, the Senate was content, that four thouſand pounds of Gold ſhould be paid to Alarich; and that, for Peace; though moſt conſented, againſt their Judgments, merely for fear of Stilicho. And, Lampadius, a man of great Birth and Dignity, plainly told them; that, This was not a Peace, but a Paction of Servitude: For which liberty of ſpeech, fearing he might loſe that of his perſon, when the Senate was diſmiſſed, he betook himſelf to the next Church of the Chriſtians. Stilicho, having, by virtue of this Senatus-Conſultum, made Peace with Alarich; prepared all things for the Expedition, which he had deſigned; when the Emperor told him, he was reſolved to go from Rome, to Ravenna, to ſee and careſs the Army, which was to grapple with ſo conſiderable an Enemy. And, this he ſaid, not of himſelf, but was moved thereto by Serena: She deſiring he ſhould be in a City of moſt ſafety; that, if Alarich ſhould break the Peace, he might not yet get the Emperor into his Power; whom ſhe endeavoured to preſerve; her ſafety depending upon that of his. However, Stilicho did nothing approve of this his Journey; and deviſed ſeveral ways, how to prevent it: which, not being effectual, he procured Sarus, the Captain of the Barbarians, that lay at Ravenna, to make diſturbance; not with any deſign of Innovation, but to affright the Emperor, and divert him from his deſign. But, Honorius, not at all yielding to theſe Attempts; one Juſtinian, an Advocate of great note, whom Stilicho had made choice of for his Aſſeſſor and Councellor; being a man of excellent Wit, ſmelt out the Emperor's deſign, by certain Tokens: And, knowing that the Troops which lay at Ticinum, or Pavia, bore ill will to Stilicho, gueſſed what would become of him, if the Emperor ſhould repair thither. He ceaſed not therefore, ſtill to deſire him to prevent the Emperor's going. But, when he perceived, that Honorius would not hearken to what Stilicho ſaid; fearing that, for their Familiarity ſake, he might make ſhipwrack of his Fortune with him, he fairly left him, and went his way.

Why.

The Senate reſolves it.

But Honorius reſolves for Ravenna.

Stilicho deſires to be ſent into the Eaſt.

